Epistle to the Reader.

Censorinus, in his little book, written to Q. Cetellius of ones Birth day; having in hand the Explication of Times Intervals, thought good thus to Preface it. (a) Si Origo Mundi in hominum notitiam venisset, inde exordium sumeremus. If the Origin of the World had been known unto Man, I would thence have taken my beginning. And a little after, speaking of this Time. Sive habuit initium, saies he, (b) Sive semper fuit, certò quot annorum sit, non potest comprehendi. Whether time had a beginning, or whether it alwaies was; the certain number of years cannot be comprehended. Therefore Ptolemæus, from Astronomical supputations, thus renounces this Epoch of the World, as a thing most remote from the knowledge of Man. (c) Τὰς μὲν ὅλε τῶ αἰῶν@ ἢ ἢ τῶ μακρῶ τινὶ πολλαπλασίν τῶ τὰς κατὰ τήρησιν χρόνε διαβεβαιώσεις, ἀλλοτρίας φιλομαθείας, τε ἢ φιλαληθείας ἡγέμεθα. To find Observation upon the Passages of the whole World, or such an immense croud of times, I think much out of their way, that desire to learn and know the truth: And Julius Firmius Maternus, from his dircourse of Birth-dayes, that Geniture of the World, received from Esculapius and Anubius. (d) Non fuit ista genitura Mundi, (saies he) Nec enim Mundus certum diem habuit ortus sui, nec aliquid interfuit eo tempore quo Mundus Divinæ mentis ac providi Numinis ratione formatus est: Nec eo usque, se intentio potuit humanæ frigilitatis extendere ut Originem Mundi facile possit ratione concipere, aut explicare. That was not the Birth day of the World: Nor, indeed, had the World any certain day of its beginning: Nor was there any thing in Being at that time, when the World was formed by the Wisdom of the Divine Understanding, and Provident Deity; Nor could the intention of Human frailty so far extend it self, that it could conceive or unfold, by an easie account, the Worlds Original.

Nor, truly, is it strange that Heathens, altogether ignorant of holy writ, should thus dispair, of ever attaining the knowledge of the Worlds Rise; when as even amongst Christians, that most renowned Chronographer

Chronographer Dionysius Petavius, being about to declare his Opinion concerning the Creation of the World, and the number of years, from thence down to us, first made (e) this resolution before his discourse. Annorum ab orbe condito ad hæc tempora numerum neque certâ ratione compertum esse, neque citra Divinam significationem posse comperiri. That the number of years from the beginning of the World, to these our dayes, can by no reasons be certainly concluded, nor any way found out, without Divine Revelation. From whose opinion Philastrius Brixiensis did very much dissent; denoting it heresie (f) to affirm the number of years, from the beginning of the World, uncertain; and that men knew not the spaces of Time. And Lactantius Firmianus, whose assertion in his Divine Institutions, is somewhat more bold. (g) Nos, quos Divinæ literæ ad scientiam veritatis erudiunt, principium Mundi finemque cognovimus. We whom the Holy Scriptures do train up to the knowledge of Truth, know both the beginning and end of the World. For whatsoever may be done of things past, we are taught that the (h) Father hath reserved the knowledge of things future in his own power. Nor is there any Mortal to whom the whole continuance of time is known: whither that of the Son of Sirac is thought to tend. (i) Ἄμμον θαλασσῶν καὶ σταγόνας ὑετοῦ καὶ ἡμέρας αἰῶνος τίς ἐξαριθμήσει. The Sands of the Sea, the Drops of Rain, and the Daies of the World, who can number? Which Lyranus thinking to have been spoken of time past, (when as others interpret it here, and in Chap. XVIII. 11. of the dayes of eternity) draws thence this erroneous conclusion, That the dayes from the beginning of the World were never by any man cast up certainly and precisely.

The first Christian Writer, (that I have had the view of) who attempted from Holy Writings to deduce the Age of the World, was Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch; who, (k) concerning this whole account, thus generally declares. Ὅπως χρόνος καὶ τὰ ἔτη δείκνυται τοῖς βουλομένοις πείθεσθαι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ. All times and years are made known to them who are willing to obey the truth. But concerning the exactnesse of this Calculation, he thus afterwards proceeds. Ἡμεῖς τὸ ἀκριβὲς ἴσως ἀγνοοῦμεν ἁπάντων τῶν ἐτῶν τὸν ἀριθμὸν, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἀναγεγράφθαι ἐν ταῖς ἱεραῖς βίβλοις τοὺς ἐπιτρέχοντας μῆνας καὶ ἡμέρας. And haply we may not be able to give an exact account of every year, because in the Holy Scriptures there is no mention of the months and dayes current.

(k) Theoph. ad Autolyc. lib. 3.

For when as the Scripture commonly takes notice only of the whole intire years, not regarding the dayes and months either deficient to the making up compleat years, or supernumerary to the intire, there might a doubt arise of the accuratenesse of that sum which shall arise from such years added together. But yet, granting this one thing, (and that most consonant to reason) That Holy Writers, consigning the years of the World, in their several places, with such diligence, had this in designe, That the series of the Years of the World, which could no other way be learned, might be discovered unto us; This (I say) being granted, we affirm that the Holy Ghost hath, as much as was necessary, provided against this doubt: when as he hath to the several terminations and turnings of the several Periods, (on which the series of time depends) adjoyned the very moneth and day. As for example, when the Israelites are said to go out of Egypt, the (l) fifteenth day of the first moneth: and Solomon to begin to build the Temple, in the 480 year after their (m) departure, on the second day of the (n) second month, the moneths and dayes which bound each termination of that Period, shew, that 11 moneths and 14 dayes are to be taken away; and not that the whole 480, but only 479 years, and sixteen dayes are to be taken for the space of that Period.

Tempus Astronomicum, à primo creationis puncto ad principium æræ Christianæ exactum, qui se dare nobis posse promittunt, favore mihi digni videntur magis quam laude, quia majus quid ingenio humano moliuntur. Those who promise to give us an exact Astronomical Table of Time, from the first point of the Creation unto Christ, seem to me more worthy of encouragement than praise, in that they attempt a thing above human capacity, saies David Paræus, who, among the latest of our Writers, took upon him to number the years, even to Christs time, out of the Holy Scriptures. Therefore he saies, leaving the Astronomical, he betook himself to the Politick time of the Hebrews, Egyptians, and Persians, as to a δεύτερον πλοῦν; or, another Course.

But if I have any insight in this businesse, it is of no great concernment, what rule we make use of in measuring the course of time, so it be known and terminated with a certain number of dayes. And if any one could with D. Paræus, by some equal measure of years, define the distance between the foundation of the World, and Christs time; It were also most easie, without the help of any Astronomical Table, to set down how many Æquinoctials in number happened, during that Interval. And the noted revolution of time in any Political year, from an Æquinoctial to the same point again, what is it but a year natural and truly Astronomical?

But if any one, well seen in the knowledge, not onely of Sacred and exotick History, but of Astronomical Calculation, and the old Hebrew Kalender, shall apply himself to these studies, I judge it indeed difficult, but not impossible for such a one to attain, not onely the number of years, but even, of dayes from the Creation of the World. That, without doubt, by retrograde supputation, Basil, the great, teaches us we may attain to the first day of the World. (o) Ἀφ' ὃ χρόνου ἤρξατο ἡ τῆ περὶ τοῦτο σύστασις δυνατὸν ἀεὶ μαθεῖν. ἐάν γε ἐπὶ τῆ παρελθὸν εἰς τὸ ὀπίσω ἀναποδίζων φιλοπόνως ἐρευνᾷς τὴν πρώτην ἡμέραν τῆς τοῦ κόσμου γενέσεως. εὑρήσεις γὰρ πόθεν τοῦ χρόνου ἡ πρώτη κίνησις. Thou mayst indeed learn in what very time the foundation of the World was laid, if returning from this time to former ages, thou endeavour studiously to find out the day of the Worlds Origin. For thus thou mayest find whence time had its firſt motion. But in regard, in divers Ages and Nations, divers Epochs of time were uſed, and ſeveral forms of years: Here it's neceſſary that ſome common and known account ſhould be obſerved, to which the diverſity of the reſt may moſt appoſitely be reduced. And to us there is no meaſure of time more known, and more accommodatious to the common collation of times than the form of the Julian Years and Months, deduced from the middle of the night beginning the Kalends of January, of the firſt year of the common account from Chriſt; with thoſe three Cicles, by which being joyned, every year is diſtinguiſhed from all other years whatſoever. For example, the Roman indiction 15 years, the Cicle of the Moon, or Golden Number 19, and the Cicle of the Sun (the Index of Sunday, or our Lords Day) containing the Period of twenty eight years. Nor is there any thing more or better known than That at this day, the year (I do not ſay of the true Nativity of Chriſt, which is controverted amongſt the Learned, but) of the common Chriſtian æra MDCL is noted with the Caracters of 3 in the Roman indiction, 17 in the Lunar Cicle, and 7. in that of the Sun.

But for as much as our Chriſtian Epoch falls many Ages after the beginning of the World, and the number of years before that backward, is not onely more troubleſome; but (unleſſe greater care be taken) more lyable to errour, Alſo it hath pleaſed our Modern Chronologers, to adde to that generally received Hypotheſis, (which aſſerted the Julian Years, with their three Cycles by a certain Mathematical prolepſis, to have run down to the very beginning of the World) an artificial Epoch, framed out of three Cycles multiplied in themſelves; for the Solar Cicle being multiplyed by the Lunar, or the number of 28, by 19, produces the great Paſchal Cycle of 532 years, and that again multiplyed by fifteen, the number of the indiction, there ariſes the Period of 7980 years, which was firſt (if I miſtake not) obſerved by Robert Lotharing, Biſhop of Hereford, in our Iſland of Brittain, and 500 years after by Joſeph Scaliger, fitted for Chronological uſes, and called by the name of the Julian Period, becauſe it conteined a Cycle of ſo many Julian years. Now if the Series of the three minor Cicles be from this preſent year, extended backward unto precedent Times, the 4713 years before the beginning of our Chriſtian Account, will be found to be that year into which the firſt year of the Indiction, the firſt of the Lunar Cicle, and the firſt of the Solar will fall. Having placed therefore the heads of this Period in the Kalends of January, in that proleptick year, the firſt of our Chriſtian vulgar account, muſt be reckoned the 4714 of the Julian Period, which, being divided by 15. 19. 28. will preſent us with the 4 Roman indiction, the 2 Lunar Cycle, and the 10 Solar, which are the principal Characters of that year.

We find moreover that the year of our fore-fathers, and the

Note No 22 (and not No 10) seems to be the Solar Cycle for the Julian yr 4714.

years of the ancient Egyptians, and Hebrews were of the same quantity with the Julian, consisting of twelve equal moneths, every of them conteining 30 dayes, (for it cannot be proved that the Hebrews did use Lunary Moneths, before the Babylonian Captivity) adjoyning to the end of the twelfth moneth, the addition of five dayes, and every fourth year six. And I have observed by the continued succession of these years, as they are delivered in holy writ, That the end of the great Nebuchadnezars, and the beginning of Evilmerodachs (his sons) reign, fell out in the 3442 year of the World, but by collation of Chaldean History, and the Astronomical Cannon, it fell out in the 186 year of Nabonasar, and, as by certain connexion, it must follow in the 562 year before the Christian account, and of the Julian Period, the 4152. and from thence I gathered the Creation of the World did fall out upon the 710 year of the Julian Period, by placing its beginning in Autumn: but for as much as the first day of the World began with the evening of the first day of the week, I have observed that the Sunday, which in the year 710 aforesaid, came nearest the Autumnal Æquinox, by Astronomical Tables, (p) notwithstanding, the stay of the Sun, in the dayes of Joshua, and the going back of it in the dayes of Ezekiah) happened upon the 23 day of the Julian October; from thence concluded, that from the evening preceding, that first day of the Julian year, both the first day of the Creation, and the first motion of time are to be deduced.

(p) See my Annals on the year of the World, 2553.d. & 3291.c.

The difficulties of Chronologers, perplexed by that φιλονεικία, or love of contention, so termed by Basil, being at last over-passed. I encline to this opinion, that from the evening ushering in the first day of the World, to that midnight which began the first day of the Christian æra, there was 4003 years, seventy dayes, and six temporarie howers; and that the true Nativity of our Saviour was full four years before the beginning of the vulgar Christian æra, as is demonstrable by the time of Herods death. For according to our account, the building of Solomons Temple was finished in the 3000 year of the VVorld, and in the 4000 year of the VVorld, the dayes being (q) fulfilled, in which the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God, was to bring forth Christ himself, (of whom the Temple was a (r) Type) was manifest in the flesh, and made his first appearance unto man: from whence four years being added to the Christian æra, and as many taken away from the years before it, instead of the Common and Vulgar, we shall obtein a true and natural Epocha of the Nativity of Christ.

(q) Luc. 2. 6.
(r) John 2. 21.

But these things, (which I do onely point at for the present) God willing, shall be more fully hereafter confirmed in our Sacred Chronology, which I intend to put forth, together with a Treatise of the Primitive Years, and the Kalender of the ancient Hebrews: In the mean time I thought good to publish the Annals of the Old Testament, built upon the Foundation there laid, with a Chronicle of all

Forreign

Forreign Affairs, transacted in Asia and Egypt, before the beginning of the Olympiads, those things chiefly being reserved to a particular History of the Greeks and Romans, which are recorded to have past in Greece, (to which I joyn Rhodes and the Islands lying betwix Asia and Europe) and the Western parts.

In representing the Sacred History, I have followed the translation of Junius and Tremellius, using their Hebraism's also, and their Contents of the Chapters. In expressing the Prophane, I have observed the words of their ancient Authours, or of their best Translator out of the Greek, and particularly James Dalechamp in Athenæus; although in noting the Chapters I observed the edition of Natalis Comes, and out of these I have my self collected the Histories, or being gathered by them, taken them out of Codomanes, Capellas Emmias, Pezelius, Eberus, Salianus, or some other Chronologer, which I had at hand; yet so, that the very Fountains themselves of the first Authours, (whose places I did most diligently mark) were alwayes before mine eyes: for being wholly intent upon the right ordering of times, I was not much concerned in the alteration of other words, which, if it had seemed considerable, had been very easie to have performed.

And whereas amongst a multitude of Historians, which were before Julius Cæsars time, the malice of time left only four remaining, Herodotus, Thucidides, Xenophon, and Polibius, (and him also lame and imperfect in the greatest part of him) these, notwithstanding, I esteemed the most Authentick for their Antiquity; and having by their authority corrected the frequent errours in Chronology of Diodorus Siculus; but in Affairs that related to Alexander the Great, (which they not so much as mentioned, I endeavoured not by Diodorus onely, but by Curtius and Arrianus also, to cleer the light of those times, which were by others left dark and obscure.

The four first letters of the Alphabet I made use of, as indexes of the beginnings, progresses, and ending of the years of the World, A. signifying the Autumnal, or first Quarter, B. the Brumal or Winter Quarter. C. the Spring, and the Summer. D. other things, the Prudent Reader will of himself understand: to whom I wish the enjoyment of these endeavours, and bid farewell. London, the 13 Kalend. of Jul. according to the Julian Period, in the 1650 year of the Vulgar Christian æra, from the true Nativity of our Lord and Saviour, the 1654 year.

PHILIP

PHILIP MELANCHTHON

HIS

NARRATION, concerning PHILIP Prince Palatine, to RHENUS.

I Have often heard Capino relate thus, When Dalburgius, the Bishop of the Vangions, Rudolphus Agricola, and my self were with Philip Prince Palatine Elector; not onely in common discourse, but also in serious debates about the Affairs of the Common-wealth; they would often bring notable examples, or from the Persian or Grecian or Roman Affairs: whereby the Prince was very much inflamed with the desire of knowledge in History: but said he observed, the distinction of Times, Nations, and Empires, was very requisite to that end. And therefore desired them, that out of all Antiquities, as far as they were known, from the Hebrew Fountains, Greek, and Latine Authours, they would in order dispose the several Monarchies, that so the Times of the World, and the Series of the most considerable mutations might be known. There were then no books extant in the German tongue, concerning ancient Empires. Nor had the Latines any thing of that nature, save Justins confused Epitome, which also wanted the distinction of Times. Those learned men were then at leasure and delighted with the work. They therefore recite in order out of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latine Monuments, the several Monarchies, and insert all the most memorable transactions in their due place and order, with the distinctions of Nations, About the year 1480.

Nations, and Times. This Ingenious Prince read these Works most earnestly, and declared his delight in them, and That the Series of Times, and the memory of the most remarkable Affairs were preserved by Divine Providence. For they shewed him, how that the History of the World was continued so, that Herodatus begins his Narrations, a little before the end of the Prophetic History. For even before the end of the Persian Monarchy, concerning which we have most clear Narrations in Daniel, Esdras, and Nehemia, some names of the Kings of Assyria and Egypt, are the same in the Prophets and Herodotus. Jeremias foretells destruction to Apries, which Herodotus describes. After Apryes kills Jeremie, and then Amasis strangles the proud King after he had taken him. The Palatine Prince said he did acknowledge a Testimony of Divine presence, in the constitution of Empires, for that they could neither be attained nor retained by meer Humane power, and that they were therefore constituted, that they might be the Upholders of Human Society, conjoyn many Nations, Restore Laws, Justice, Peace, yea, they might teach men concerning God. And therefore did often repeat those words of Daniel, God changes, and confirms Empires. He said likewise, That by the mutations and punishments of Tyrants, the just judgment of the Almighty was most conspicuous, and that all Man-kind was, by these Illustrious Examples, premonished to acknowledg God, and were given to understand that he wills and ordains justice, and is truely offended with those who transgresse this his ordination. Such were the Speeches of that Prince, considering the Rises and Ruines of Empires.

THE

OF THE
OLD TESTAMENT,
From the beginning of the World.

IN the beginning God created Heaven and Earth, Gen. 1. v. 1. Which beginning of time, according to our Chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of Octob. in the year of the Julian Calendar, 710. 4004. 710.

Upon the first day therefore of the world, or Octob. 23. being our sunday, God, together with the highest Heaven, created the Angels. Then having finished, as it were, the roofe of this building, he fell in hand with the foundation of this Wonderfull Fabrick of the World, he fashioned this lowermost Globe, consisting of the Deep, and of the Earth; all the Quire of Angels singing together, and magnifying his name therefore. [Job. 38. v. 7.] And when the Earth was void and without forme, and darknesse covered the face of the Deepe, on the very middle of the first day, the light was created; which God severing from the darknesse, called the one day, and the other night.

On the second day [October 24 being Monday] the firmament being finished, which was called Heaven, a separation was made of the waters above, and the waters here beneath enclosing the earth.

Upon the third day [Octob. 25, Tuesday] these waters beneath running together into one place, the dry land appeared. This confluence of the waters, God made a Sea, sending out from thence the rivers, which were thither to return again [Eccles. 1. vers. 7.] and he caused the Earth to bud, and bring forth all kinds of herbs and plants, with seeds and fruits: But above all, he enriched the garden of Eden with plants; for among them grew the tree of Life, and the tree of Knowledge, of good and evil. [Gen. 2. vers. 8, 9.]

On the fourth day [Octob. 26. which is our Wednsday] the Sun, the Moon, and the rest of the Stars were created.

On the fifth day [Octob. 27. Thursday] Fish and flying Fowl were created, and endued with a blessing of encrease.

And upon the sixth day [Octob. 28. which is our Friday] the living creatures of the earth took their creation, as well going, as creeping creatures. And last of all, man was made and created after the image of God, which consisted principally in the divine knowledge of the minde, [Coloss. 3. vers. 10.] and in the naturall and proper sanctity of his will, [Ephes. 4. vers. 24.] And he forth-with, when all living creatures, by the Divine Power, were brought before him, as a Lord appointed over them, gave them their names, by which they should be called. Among all which, when he found none to help him like to himself, lest he should be destitute of a fit companion, God taking a rib out of his side, whiles he slept, fashioned it into a woman, and gave her to him for a wife, establishing withall, a law of marriage between them; then blessing them, he bade them wex and multiply, and gave them dominion over all living creatures, and for them all he provided a large proportion of food and sustenance to live upon. To conclude, sin being not yet entered upon the world, God beheld all that he had made, and, behold, it was exceeding good. And so was the evening, and so was the morning of the sixth day. [Gen. 1. vers. 31.]

Now upon the seventh day, [Octob. 29. which is, with us Saturday,] when God had finished nished his work which he intended, he then rested from all labour, and blessing the seventh day, he ordained and consecrated the Sabbath, [Gen. 2. vers. 2,3.] because therein he took breath, as himself is pleased to speak of himself, [Exod. 31. vers. 17.] and, as it were, refreshed himself. Nor as yet (for ought appeareth) had sin set footing into the world. Nor was there any punishment laid by God, either upon man-kinde, or upon Angels. Whence it was, that this afterward was set forth for a signe, as well of our sanctification in this world [Exod. 31. vers. 13.] as of that eternall Sabbath, to be enjoyed hereafter; wherein we expect a full deliverance and discharge from sin, and the dregs thereof, and all punishments belonging thereunto. [Heb. 4. vers. 4,9,10.]

After the first week of the world ended, as it seemeth, God brought the new married couple into the garden of Eden, and charged them not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; but left them free use of all the rest.

But the Devil, envying Gods honour and mans felicity, tempted the woman to sin by the Serpent; whence himself got the name and title of the old Serpent. [Apoc. 12. vers. 9. and 20. vers. 2.] The woman then beguiled by the Serpent, and the man seduced by the woman, brake the ordinance of God concerning the forbidden fruit; and accordingly being called, and convicted of the crime, had their severall punishments inflicted on them: yet with this promise added, that the Seed of the woman should, one day, break the Serpents head, (i.) That Christ in the fulnesse of time should undo the works of the Devil, [1 Ioh. 3. vers. 8. Rom. 16. vers. 20.] From whence it was, that Adam then first called his wife Evah; because she was then ordained to be the mother, not onely of all that should live this naturall life, but, of those also who should live by faith in her seed; which was the promised Messias: as Sara also afterward was counted the mother of the faithfull, [1 Pet. 3. verse 6. Gal. 4. verse 31.]

Upon this occasion our first Parents, clad by God with raiment of skinnes, were turned out of Eden, and a fierie flaming sword set to keep the way leading to the tree of Life, to the end they should never after eat of that fruit, which hitherto they had not touched Gen. 3. verse 21.22. &c. whence it is very probable, that Adam was turned out of Paradise the self same day that he was brought into it, which seemeth to have been upon the tenth day of the world (answering to our first day of November, according to supposition of the Julian Period) upon which day also, in remembrance of so remarkable a thing, as in all reason it should seem, was appointed the solemnity of Expiation, or attonement, and the yearly fast, spoken of by Saint Paul, Acts 27. verse 9. termed more especially by the name of νηστείας, wherein all, as well strangers as home born people, were commanded to afflict their souls with a most severe intermination, that every soul which should not afflict it self upon that day should be destroyed from among his people, [Lev. 16. v. 29. and 23. verse 29.]

After the fall of Adam, Cain was the first of all mortall men that was born of a woman, [Gen. 4. verse 1.]

Seth born 130. d. Abel being murthered by his brother Cain, the first born of all man-kind, God gave Eve another son in his stead; whence his name was called Seth, c. 4. v. 25. when Adam had now lived 130 years, c. 5. v. 3. From whence it is gathered, that between the death of Abel, and the birth of Seth, there was no other son born to Eve; for then he should have been recorded to have been given her instead of him: so that whereas now the race of man-kind had been continued to the terme of 128 years, it is probable, that the number of men was so encreased in the world, that Cain might justly fear, through the conscience of his crime, that every man that met him would also slay him. [c. 4. v. 14, 15.] 840. 3674.

235. d. Seth now being 105 years old, begat a son, whom he named Enoch; which signifies, the lamentable condition of all mankind. For even then was the worship of God wretchedly corrupted by the race of Cain: whence it came, that men were even then so distinguished, that they who persisted in the true worship of God, were known by the name of the children of God; and they which forsook him, were termed the children of men, Gen. 4. v. 26. and 6. 1, 2. 945. 3769.

1656	Now in the second month of this year, upon the 10 day thereof, (answering to the 30 of our November, being sunday) God commanded Noah, that in that weeke, he should provide himself to enter into the Arke: whiles the world, (in the mean time) void of all fear, sate eating and drinking, and marrying, and giving in marriage, [Gen.7.v.1,4,10. Mat.24.v.38.] In the 600 year of the life of Noah, upon the 17 day of the second month, answering to the 7 of our Decemb. upon a sunday, when he with his children, and living creatures of all sorts, were entered into the Ark, God sent a rain upon the earth forty days, and forty nights; and the waters continued upon the earth 150 days, [Gen.7.v.4,6,11,12,13,17,24.] The waters abating upon the 17 day of the 7 month, May 6. upon a wedensday, the Ark rested upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, [c.8.v.6,7.] And the waters still falling upon the first day of the tenth month (with us July 19. being sunday) the tops of the mountains appeared above the water, [c.8. v. 5.] And after 40 days, that is upon the 11 day of the 11 month (Being 28 of August, falling upon a friday) Noah opening the window of the Ark, sent forth a Raven, [c.8.v.6,7.] And seven days after, as may probably be gathered, out of those other seven days, mentioned [v.10] Noah sent forth a Dove and she returning, after seven days more, he sent her forth again: and about the evening she returned, bringing the leaf of an Olive tree in her mouth, and then staying yet seven days more, sent the same Dove out again, which never returned more unto him. valley of Sennar,[*Gen.*11.*v.*2.] where the people impiously laid their heads together, as we find in the book of wisdome,[10.*v.*5.] to hinder this dispersion of them commanded by God, and begun by Noah (as may be gathered out of [*Gen.*11.*v.*4,6,8,9] compared together) and went in hand to build the city and tower of Babylon: which purpose of theirs being frustrated by the confusion of languages, sent among them,(from whence it took the name of Babel, *c.*11.*v.*9.) the dispersion of Nations followed; divers companies and colonies, sitting them down in several places, as they agreed best each with other in that diversity of language. Captains and conductors, of which several companies; among others, the 13 sons of Joctan, the brothers of Phaleg, are recorded to have been, [*Gen.*10.*v.*26.] all which, certainly, at what time their Uncle Phaleg was born, were not come into the world. For seeing that Heber was but 34 years old, when Phaleg was born unto him, though we should suppose, that Joctan was born, when Heber was but 20 years of age, and that Joctans eldest son was born to him, when he was likewise but twenty years old, yet still it appears, that, that eldest son of Ioctan, must be six years younger than Phaleg, so that at least the younger crew of those 13 sons of Ioctan, to wit, Iobab, and three other brothers of his mentioned next before him, and which left their names, upon those golden countreys, Sheba, [*Psal.*72.*v.*15.Ophir. 1 *Reg.*9.*v.*28.& *Havilah. The years of man's age were again cut shorter by one half, than earst they were.

ABram, after his fathers decease, was called again by God, out of his own country, and from his kindred, and from his fathers house; with a further promise, and Evangelical covenant of blessing him, that is, in his blessed seed, our Lord Jesus Christ, all the nations of the earth, [Gen. 12.1,2. and Acts 7.4.] from which promise, and Abrams departure, which immediately followed, are to be deduced those 430 years which Abram and his posterity spent in forreign lands, [Ex. 12.40,41. and Gal. 3.17.] placing the first and last day of this their pilgrimage and sojourning, upon the 15 of the month Abib, which this year falls upon the 4 day of May, being wedensday, according to the Julian Calendar; by our accompt.

On this day therefore, Abram when he was 75 years old, following the call of God, took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother Harans son, with all the substance, which he had gotten, and souls which God had given him in Carran, and took his journey, and at length came into the land of Canaan: passing through it, till he came to a place called Sichem, to the oake of Moreah, [Gen. 12.4,5,6.] of which mention is afterward made, [Gen. 35.4. Jos. 24.v.25,26. and in Judges 9.6.] where God promised Abram, that to his seed he would give that land, and he there built an Altar to the Lord, which had there appeared to him. Afterward removing from thence he went into the hill-country, called Luz, and in after times, known by the name of Bethel, toward the east, [Gen. 28.19.] where again he built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord: and from thence holding on his journey, he came into the south part of that countrey, which looketh towards Egypt, [Gen. 12.7,8,9.]

2084. a. Abram, compelled by a famine, from thence went down into Egypt, where Sarah his wife (who to eschew a danger, went there by the name of his sister) was taken into Pharaoh, (Apophi) his house: but was not long after, with great gifts and presents, sent back unto him again untouch't; and, with a safe passe, were both dismissed to depart out of Egypt, [Gen. 12.10,20.] 2794 1920

Then Abram, with Lot returned into Canaan, where when the country which they pitched upon, was not sufficient to feed both their heards of cattle, they parted; and Lot went into the country of Sodome; after whose departures, the promise both of the possession of that land of Canaan, and also of his numberlesse posterity was again renewed unto him: and then removing from the place between Bethel and Hay, where he had formerly built an Altar, he dwelt in the plain of Mamre, near unto Hebron, & there built an Altar unto the Lord, [Gen. 13]

2091. Then did Bera K. of Sodom, with the rest of the petty kings of Pentapolis rebel, & shook off the yoke of Chedorlaomer K. of Elam, in the 13 year of their subjection unto him, [Gen. 14.4.] 2801. 1913.

no issue, promised him a posterity equal to the stars of heaven in number, which after 400 years sojourning and affliction in a land that was none of theirs, he promised to bring into the land foretold unto him, and bound that promise with a covenant to perform it, [*Gen.*15.]

c. Isaac, who was to be born of Sarah that time twelvemonth, gave him the seal of Circumcision (changing both their names, Abram into Abraham, and Sarai into Sarah) for a sure pledg & testimony of his promise, promising also to favour Ishmael the eldest born, for the fathers sake, which promises; Abraham entertaining and embracing with a lively faith, & true obedience, caused himself, being now 99 years of age, and his son Ishmael then thirty years old, and all his houshold, to be circumcised, the self-same day wherein it was enjoyn'd him. [*Gen.*17.21.to26.]

Abraham invites Angels coming like men travelling upon the way unto his house: and feasts them, who reiterating the promise of the birth of Isaac, in favour of Sarah declared, with all the judgment of God, intended upon the 5 cities, for their utter destruction; and Abraham fearing what would become of Lot, and his family in Sodome, made intercession to God for the sparing of that place, [*Gen.*18, and 19.*v.*29.] Sodome therefore, and Gomorrah and Aadmah, and Seboim, for their horrible sins, perished by fire and brimstone, raining down upon them from heaven, [*Gen.*19.] that they might be an example to all wicked livers in time to come, of the pains of that everlasting fire to be inflicted on them in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death [2*Pet.*2,6.*Jud.*7.*Ap.*19.20.*c.*20.10.*c.*21.8.] The monument whereof remaineth unto this day; even the dead sea. The valley of Siddim, where these 5 cities stood in former times, which was full of brimstone and salt pits, being since grown into a vast lake; which from the brimstone therein still floating, is called Lacus Asphaltitis, a lake of brimstone; & from the salt, mare salsum, the salt sea, [*Gen.*14.3,10.*Deut.*3.17.*c.*29.23.*Zeph.*2.9*Wisd.*10.6,7.] of which, Solinus thus writeth, A great way off from Jerusalem, there lies a woful spectacle, of a country to be seen, which that it was heretofore blasted from heaven, appears by the blacknes of the earth-falling all to cinders. There were in that place heretofore seated two Cities, one called Sodome, the other Gomorrah, where if an apple grow, though it seeme to have a shew of maturity and ripenesse, yet it is not eateable at all; for the outmost skin thereof, containeth nothing within it save a stinking steeme, mingled with ashes, and being never so lightly touched, sendeth forth a smoake, and the rest falls presently into a light dust or powder.

Lot being hasted out of Sodome by the Angels, avoided the destruction, by flying to a litle city, called Bela, which from thence was called Zoar; but his wife was turned into a pillar of salt; and Lot himself, fearing to continue at Zoar, left the plain country, and betook him to the Hill, as he was commanded, carrying his two daughters with him, [*Gen.*19.]

Abraham, going from the plain of Mamre, towards the south, that he might dwell at a place which was afterward called Beersheba, was entertained by Abimelech, K. of the Philistines, at Gerar, where Sarah, going once again under the name of his sister, was reft from him. But the K. being reproved therefore, and punished by God, restored her untouch't to her husband, with large gifts and presents added thereto, and by his prayers Abimilech and all his house were healed of their infirmities, [*Gen.*20.]

When Isaac was weaned, Abraham made a great feast, and Sarah spying Ishmael the son of Hagar the Ægyptian jesting with, or rather mocking (as in Gen. 39. 14. that word is taken) nay even persecuting (as the Apostle, [*Gal.*4.29.] expoundeth it) her son Isaac; as chalenging to himself, by way of eldership, the right of inheritance in his fathers estate, said unto Abraham, Cast forth this handmaid with her son, for the son of this handmaid shall not be heir with my son Isaac; which though he took very grievously at the first, yet he did it; God having said unto him, in Isaac shall thy seed be called, [*Gen.*21.8,12. and *Rom.*9.7,8. and *Heb.*11.17,18.] where observe that Isaac is called his onely begotten son. But among the Hebrews there is a difference of opinions; some holding that this was done in the 5 year after Isaacs weaning; others in the 12. but we
old, saith St Jerome, writing of the traditions of the Jewes, upon Genesis: so that from this declaration of the elect seed, and persecution (as the Apostle termeth it) of Isaac, by Hagars son, many of them, reckon the 400 years; which the seed of Abraham was to be a stranger and sojourner, and afflicted in a forreign land, as God had foretold unto him [*Gen.*15.13. Acts 7.6.] For that those 400 years were to be compleated at the instant of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, appears (*Gen.*15.14. *Ex.*12.35,36.) compared each with other; though the ordinary gloss out of Austin, refers the beginning of the account, to the very birth of Isaac, as if the Scripture called the number of 405 by the name of 400 years, as in a round summe, or number.

2126 d. Salah the fourth from Noah, died 403 years after the birth of Heber, [Gen. 11. v. 15.] 2836. 1878.

2131 b. Assis reigned in Egypt by the space of 49 years two moneths: Manetho. 2841. 1873.

Now Josephus reports that at this time Isaac was 25 years old. lib. 1. Antiq. 14. al. 22. and that he was at that time of good years, may be gathered from this, that he was able to carry so much wood, as was to go to the burning and consuming of such a whole burnt offering, as himself was then intended by Abraham to have been made, Gen. 22. v. 6.

2145 b. Sarah being 127 years of age, died in Hebron, for whose burial Abraham bought the cave in the field of Macpelah, which was the first possession that he gat in the land of Canaan, of Ephron the Hittite, for a summe of money, Gen. 23. v. 12, 19, 20. But as Abraham is registred to us for the father of the faithful, Rom. 4. v. 11, 12. So is Sarah for the mother of the faithful, 1 Pet. v. 3, 6. and she is the only woman whose full and entire age is mentioned in the Scripture. 2855. 1859.

2148 d. Abraham being careful to get a wife for his son Isaac, sent his chief servant, Eliesar of Damascus, Gen. 15. v. 2. (taking first an oath of him) to look out one for him: who going by the guidance of God into Mesopotamia, there obtained for him Rebecca the daughter of Bethuel, sister to Laban the Syrian, whom Isaac receiving for his wife, brought into the tent of his mother Sarah; and by the solace and content which he took in her, put off the dolor and grief which he conceived upon the death of his mother, who was departed this life three years before, Gen. 24. v. 1, 67. and he was forty years old when he married his wife Rebecca, Gen. 25. v. 20 2858. 1856.

About this time began the reign of the Argivi in Peloponesus, 1080 years before the first Olympiade, as Eusebius in his Chronicle reporteth, out of Castor.

The first that there reigned was Inachus, who reigned 50 years; of whom Erasmus, in the proverb, Inacho antiquior, speaketh; unto which also I refer that of the most learned Varro, in his 17 book of Humane Affaires, cited by A. Gellius in his first book, Noctium Attic. c. 16. and of Macrobius: lib. 1. Saturnal. where he saith, To the beginning of Romulus are reckoned more than 1100 years: For from the beginning of Inachus his reign, according to the accompt of Castor there mentioned, unto the Palilia, or solemne Festivals of Pales (the country Goddess among the Romans) mentioned by Varro, are reckoned 1102 years.

2168 c. When the twins strove in the womb, Rebecca asked counsell of God; by whom it was answered, that the bands of two differing and disagreeing Nations should proceed out of her in that birth, of which the one should be stronger than the other, and that the elder should serve the younger. But at the time of her travel, the first that came forth was ruddy all over, and like to a shag garment, and his name was called Esau; then came forth the other, holding the former by the heele, whereupon he was called by the name of Jacob; and Isaac their father, at the time of their birth, was sixty years old, Gen. 25. v. 22. Hosea, 12. v. 3. 2878 1836

2187. d. Heber, the fifth from Noah, died 430 years after the birth of his son Peleg, [Gen. 11. v. 17.] This man lived the longest of any that was born after the flood; and out-lived Abraham himself; and from him Abraham came first to be sirnamed the Hebrew, [Gen. 14. v. 13.] and in after times, all the posterity of his Grandchild Iacob, were known by the same name, [Gen. 40. v. 15.] Where note that Canaan, was stiled the land of the Hebrewes, while the Canaanite was yet living in that land. 2897 1817

2200. About this time, the promises formerly made unto Abraham, were, as it seemeth, fully performed to his son Isaac, such as were, I will multiply thy seed, as the stars of heaven; And, To thy seed will I give this Land: And, In thy seed, shall all the Nations of the earth be blessed, [Gen. 26. v. 4.] 2910. 1804.

2205. d. Chebron reigned in Egypt 13 years, [Manetho.] 2915. 1799.

2208. c. Esau, being 40 years old, took two wives, of the land of the Hittites, Iudith the daughter of Beeri, and Basemathams the daughter of Elon: which were very troublesome, and bitterly bent against Rebecka, [Gen. 26. v. 34, 35,] compared with [c. 27. v. 46.] and with [c. 28. v. 8.] 2918 1796

At this time the Ogygian, Deluge befel in the country of Attica 1020 years before the first Olympiade: as is reported out of Hellanicus, Castor, Thalus, Diodorus Siculus, and Alexander Polyhistor in his third book of his Chronographie, by Iulius Africanus, as we find it in Eusebius his book, de Prap. Evang. which yet Varro his accounts, makes to have been three hundred years before.

2231. b. Ismael, Abrahams son, at the age of 137 years, died. [Gen. 25. v. 17.] 2941. 1773.

2239. b. Amessis, the sister of Amenophis, reigned in Egypt 21 years, 9 months. [Manetho.] 2949. 1765.

2242. Euechous began to reigne in Chaldea, two hundred twenty foure years before the Arabians, [Iulius Affricanus:] which seemeth to be the same with Belus of Babilon, or Iupiter Belus, worshiped afterwards by the Chaldeans as a god. [Isa. 46. vers. 1. Ier. 50. vers. 2. and 51. v. 41.] 2952. 1762.

2245. a. Isaac now grown old and blind, in the 44th year before his death, sent Esau his elder son, to take some venison for him, purposing to blesse him at his returne; but Iacob his younger son, by the subtile counsel of his mother, coming disguised in his clothes, and with savourie meat in his hand, stole away the blessing, unwitting to his father; and the blessing, though so got, God confirmed ever after. But Iacob seeing that for so doing, his brother followed him with a deadly hatred, and being desirous to avoid his traps, willing also to take a wife of his own kindred, asking first his fathers blessing, he took his journey into Mesopotamia to his uncle Laban. But in his journey, by the vision of a ladder, God confirmed to him, all the blessings formerly given to his father, and assured him of his grace and favour for the future, in remembrance whereof, Iacob set up a pillar, and changed the name of the place from Luz, to Bethel, and there made a vow to God. And coming at length to Carran, and continuing a months time with Laban, fell in love with Rachel his daughter, and covenanted to serve him seven years for her, [Gen. 27. v. 1. and 29. v. 20.] with [Hosea 12. v. 12.] now that this fell upon the 77 year of Iacobs age, will appear by that which will be said, upon the year of the World, 2259. 2954. 1760.

Esau, seeing that Isaak had blessed Iacob, and sent him away into Mesopotamia, there to take him a wife, and that he liked not the daughters of Canaan, to pacifie his fathers mind, who was offended with him for marrying his first wife out of Canaan, took a second wife Mahalatha, the daughter of Ismael, the son of Abraham, [Gen. 28. v. 6, 9.]

Esau had been now a married man 37 years, and was 77 years old; whereas Iacob, who was as old as he, had all this while, lived a Batchelor; but being now mindful of his fathers command, he demanded Rachel his wife to be given to him; using this for a reason, that his dates were now full, [Gen. 29. v. 21.] that is that he was now of an age ripe for marriage, as Tremellius expoundeth it: though Tho. Lidyate would rather have it understood of that instant month or period of time compleated, wherein Laban, from the beginning, intended to make proof of Jacobs industry, and sufficiency in the managing of affaires committed to his charge, before he would bestow his daughter on him: which no doubt was mentioned at his first arrival there; seeing it was the only cause of his coming thither.

But by the fraud of Laban, instead of Rachel, Leah the elder daughter was put in bed unto him: neverthelesse, at the end of the marriage weeke, [Iudges 14. v. 12, 17.] Rachel also was espoused to him; upon covenant of serving seven years more for her; and Laban gave gave unto Leah, his maid-servant Zilpah for a hand maid, and to Rachel he gave Billah, and when Leah was not so gracious in Iacobs eye, as Rachel was: the one by Gods appointment remained barren, the other was made a mother of four children, successively in four years, [Gen. 29. 21, 22, &c.

2259. c. Rachel, afterward by the blessing of God, proving fruitfull, bare Ioseph unto him, at the end of his fourteen years service, and then asking leave of Laban to returne into his own countrey; he was held there six years more upon another bargain made between him, and his father in law Laban: for a certain part of his flock, [Gen. 30. 22, 25, 31. with 31. v. 41.] now that Iacob was 91 years old when Ioseph was born, and consequently, 77 years old, when he first began to serve Laban, appears by this, for that Iacob being 130 years of age, when he first stood before Pharaoh, which was when the seven years of plenty were passed, and two of the famine spent, [Gen. 45. 6. with 47. 9.] Ioseph was then 39 years old, as being 30 years of age, what time he first came into Pharaohs presence, immediately before the seven years of plenty began, [Gen. 41. 32, 46.] 2969 174

2261. a. Mephres reigned in Egypt, 12 years, 9 months, [Manetho.] 2971. 174

2265. c. Iacob, perceiving the heart-burning of Laban, and his sons malice toward him, was warned of God to returne into his own country: which having communicated to his wives; while Laban was shearing his sheep, at the latter end of the spring (as will appear anon upon the 2974th year of the world) after his 20 years service, getting away unknown to Laban, with all his substance, wives, and family, passed over the river Euphrates, [Gen. 31. 1, 3, 19, 21, 38, 41.] But whereas it is said that there were twelve sons born him in Mesopotamia, [Gen. 35. 22, 26.] Benjamine is not to be reckoned among them, who was certainly born afterward in the land of Canaan, not far from Bethlehem, [16. v. 18, 19.] in like manner, as the twelve Apostles are counted, though to make up that number, Iudas was wanting, Iohn 20. 24. 1 Cor. 15. 1.] of which matter, Augustine more at large, in his 117 Question upon Genesis. 2975 173

Laban three daies after (for so many daies journey was Laban off from the place where Iacob kept his sheep) hearing that his son in law was gone, took some of his friends and kindred along with him, and pursued after him, seven dayes journey, and at last overtook him in mount Gilead; which took its name, from this their meeting there, for after many and divers expostulations which passed there between them, making all fair at last, for a testimony and monument of their covenant and agreement there made, Iacob erected a pillar, with a heap of stones: which Laban the Syrian, called Iegar sahadutha: but Iacob the Hebrew called Galaad, (i.e.) the heap of a testimony, or witnesse between them two, Gen. 31. 47, 48.]

Iacob being sent away in peace by Laban, but affrighted with the newes of his brother Esaues approach with a band of men, divided his company, into two bands, calls upon God: sends before him presents to his brother Esau: and as well by a stronge wrestling with the Angel, as by the name of Israel given him by God, growes into a sure trust of the help of God, [Gen. 32. with Hosea 12. 3, 4.]

Esau, entertaining his brother courteously; after much entreatie, accepts of his presents, offers himself with his company to conduct him on his way; and when Iacob would not, took his leave of him, and departed: Iacob then went on to Succoth; so then called by him, for there he built him a house, and cotts for his sheep, from whence it was called Succoth. Afterward passing over Jordan, he came into Canaan, and pitched his tent in Salem, a city of the Sichemites; in a parcell of ground, which he had bought of the sons of Hamor the Sichemite, for an hundred peeces of silver: and there he built an altar, which he called by the name of El-Elohe-Israel; or of the mighty God, the God of Israel, [Gen. 33] to wit, in the self same place, where Abraham heretofore had built his first altar: [Gen. 12. 6, 7.] and where Iacobs well was, near unto mount Gerism: of which the woman of Samaria, speaking to our Saviour said, our Fathers worshiped in this mountain, [Iohn 4. 5, 6, 12, 20.] for that that mountain was placed in the country of the Sichemites, appeareth, [Iudges 9. 7.]

2273. d. Mephramuthosis reigned in Egypt 25 years: 10 months, [Manetho.] 2983. 17

2276. c. Ioseph being 17 years of age, told his father of his brethrens unthriftinesse, and was foreshewed by God that he should one day come to be the best man of all his fathers family; but fell thereby into so deadly a hatred and malice of his brethren, that first they conspired his death: and at length agreed to sell him away for a bond-slave into a far country: so drawing him out of the pit, whereinto they had cast him they sold him to the Ishmaelitish and the Midianitish Marchants (both which nations sprang from their grandfather Abraham) 2986 17

his own wise men; hearing of Josephs dexterity that way, sent for him; being then 30 years old, who having opened to the King his dreams; first that of the seven years plenty, then the seven years famine, added moreover, his advise, how to provide out of the store of the first seven years of plenty, against the famine of the other seven years of scarcity, which were to follow. Whereupon Pharaoh, by the general assent of all his Nobles, made him Governour of the whole Kingdome: giving him to wife Asenah the daughter of Potipher, Governour of the Onii or Heliopolitan in Egypt, [Gen.41.1,46.] Justin also out of Trogus Pompeius saies, that he was very great with Pharaoh: For, saith he, he was most exquisite in expounding of prodigies or signes, and was the first that found out, and taught the art of the interpretation of dreams: neither was there any part of divine or humane right, which seemed to be unknown to him; insomuch, that he foretold a famine, many years before; wherewith all Egypt had perished, unlesse the King by his advice, had caused corne to be laied up in store many years before it came.

From the harvest of this year, being to be counted 7 years of plenty, wherein Joseph laied up an infinite treasure of corne, and had born unto him of Asenah his wife, two sons, Ma-nasses and Ephraim, [Gen.41.47,53.]

ther countries likewise, [Gen.41.54,57.]

to know them, caused to be taken for spies, and they being laid in hold, could not be discharged, till Simeon, the eldest and chief of them, who consented to sell him, was cast into prison, and left in pawne, that the rest should bring before him Benjamin, their youngest brother, born of Rachel, Josephs own mother: and now being dismissed, they carried away their corne, and with it the money, which they had paied for, being conveyed into their several sacks, by the secret appointment of Joseph; they tell their father Jacob, all that had happened to them: and withal, declare unto him, the necessity laied upon them, of carrying their yongest brother Benjamin into Egypt, perswading him by all means to let him go: but all in vain, [Gen. 42.]

2298. b. Jacob, pressed with famine, sent again his sons, and with them Benjamin their brother 3008. 1706.
furnished with double mony, and other presents unto Joseph to buy more corne, and they at their returne were courteously entertained, and feasted by him, and Simeon was set at liberty, and restored to them, [Gen. 43.]

And when they were all to go away, Joseph arrested them, for stealing his cup; which he had caused privily to be conveyed into Benjamins sack: which crime they endeavoured to put off by shewing how truly they meant, by bringing again the mony which they found in their sacks, when they came home, offering themselves to die, or to be his bond-slaves, if any such thing could be proved against them: But in the end, the cup being found with Benjamin, and they brought back to Joseph, they all yeilded themselves to him for his bondslaves: which when he refused, saying he would have none but him with whom the cup was found, Judah then humbly offered himself to serve him in Benjamins
stead, [Gen. 44.]

Joseph hearing Judah to make this offer, discovered himself to his brethren, and seeing them all amazed at the remembrance of the sin, which they had formerly committed against him, comforted them, by shewing how that act of theirs was so wrought by the providence of God; and then, out of the Kings store, and by his command, furnished them all with carriages and provision for their journey, to go, and to return with all speed, bringing their father, and their own severall families with them: which when they related to their father, he would not believe, untill he saw the coaches, and other things answerable, all fitted for his transportation into Egypt, [Gen. 45.]

Jacob, after sacrifices offered, being strengthened by God, with all his family, in the beginning of the third year of the famine, went down into Egypt, being then 130 years old, [Gen.45.6. c.46.1,27. c.47.9. Deut. 26.5.]

Joseph, letting Pharaoh know of the arrival of his kindred in Egypt, brought his father and five of his brethren unto his presence: and having communed with them, assigned them a fitting place in the land of Goshen; where they were provided of all necessaries by Joseph, [Gen.47.1,12.]

2299 d. Mathamuthrosis deceasing, Thmosis reigned in Egypt 9 years 8 moneths [Manetho.] 3009. 1705.

2300 Joseph heaped together, all the moneys which were to be found in Egypt and Canaan, for the corn which he had sold unto them, [Gen. 47. v. 14.] 3010. 3704

2301 When the money of both these countries was spent; the Egyptians then sold all their flocks and herds of cattel unto Joseph, for food to live upon that year [Gen. 47. 15, 16, 17.] 3011. 1703.

2302. At the end of this year, when their money and stock of cattel was all gone; the Egyptians then sold both their lands and liberties unto Joseph: who thereupon supplied them with corne to feed them, and also with seed, to sow their ground withall, in this seventh and last year of the famine, to receive it again the year following, when the barrennesse of the earth was over; and to the end, that Pharaoh might have a full title and possession of the lands so bought, Joseph removed and transplaced them, every man from one side of the country to the other, and there assigned unto every man land to till and to manure, reserving neverthelesse out of the profits, a fifth part to Pharaohs own use, yearly, by a fundamental law of that kingdom: onely the chief Governours, and the Priests lands, came not into Pharaohs hands, because these living of the kings allowance, had no need to sell their lands for food as others had. 3012. 1702.

2309 b. Amenophis reigned in Egypt 30 years 10 moneths, [Manetho.] 3019. 1695.

2315. Jacob drawing toward his end, adopted Ephraim and Manasses the sons of Joseph, and blessing them, by instinct from God, set the younger before the elder, [Gen. 48. Hebr. 11.21.] then calling his sons together, blessed them all; foretold what should betide them in their several generations, and uttered to them that memorable prophesie of the Messias: and taking order with them concerning his burial, dyed when he had lived 147 years: whereof he had spent 17 years in the land of Egypt, [Gen. 49. compared with 47.25.] 3025 1669

The body of Jacob being embalmed by the appointment of Joseph, was kept by the space of 40 dayes: lamentation was made over him by the Egyptians 70 dayes, and with Pharaohs leave, was conveighed into the land of Canaan by Joseph and his brethren, acompanied with a great traine of the principal men of Pharaohs court; where lamentation was again made over him 7 dayes, and was buried with his kindred in the cave at Macpelah, as himself had given order for it, [Gen. 50.15.—21.]

2340. b. Orus reigned in Egypt 36 years 5 moneths, [Manetho.] 3050. 1664.

2369. c. By faith Joseph on his death-bed spake of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt; and gave order that his bones might be carried with them, and then departed this life, in the 110 years of his age: having seen of his off-spring to the third generation, [Gen. 50.22.--26. Hebr. 11,22.] to wit, Shutelach and Tachan, the sons of his son Ephraim, and Hadan or Haran, [Num. 26.36.] the son of Shutelach, and Macir the son of Manasse, and Gilead Manasses his grandchild. From whence it is, that the Greek Expositors, speaking of the families of Jacob and Joseph, which were said to consist of 70 souls, [Gen. 46.27. Deut. 10. 22.] adding thereunto these five which were borne unto Joseph in Egypt, upon [1 Chron. 7.] reckon them in all 75 persons: out of all which appears, that Joseph held on his rule and government of the state of Egypt, which lasted full 80 years, under several Pharaohs, as Eusebius in his Chronicle, hath rightly observed, and digested in this manner: Joseph, saith he, was made Governour of Egypt, in the 30 year of his age; when his father Jacob was 122 years old: which government he held 80 years, after whose decease the Hebrews were held in bondage by the Egyptians 144 yeers: so the whole time which the Hebrews spent in Egypt, was 215 years: reckoned from the time, that Iacob and his sons went down into Egypt. 3079. 1635. 3

The books of Genesis end with the death of Ioseph containing the storie of 2369 years space, which book, that it was written by Moses himself, is the opinion of the Talmudists in their Baba-bathra. lib. 1. and so is it generally believed by all the Hebrews. The sum whereof is delivered by Servius sulpicius, in the first book of his Historia sacra: thus, In this tract of time lived Job: a man embracing the Law of nature, and the knowledge of the true God, and all righteousnesse, rich in substance, and the more noted, for that neither the enjoyment of those riches corrupted, nor the loss of them depraved him in his way. For when as, first being spoyled of his goods by Satan, he was also bereft of his children; and at last tormented with grievous boches and sores in his body, he could yet never be drawn, thorough impatience, to sin in any sort: whereof having first received a testimonie from Gods own mouth; he was afterward restored to his former health, and had cast into his bosome double, of what ever he possessed before.

2376. c. Acenchres the son of Orus reigned in Egypt 12 years 1 month: [Manetho.] 3086. 1628.

2385. Levi died in Egypt, aged 137 years, [Exod. 6.16.] being grandfather by the mothers side to Moses and Aaron, and great grand-father by the Fathers. For when Levi had begotten Kohath in Canaan, who died at the age of 133 years, and a daughter called Iochebad in Egypt, Amram the son of Kohath took to wife Iocebed the daughter of Levi, his own Aunt, and of that marriage (expressely afterward forbidden) [Levit. 18. 12. and 20. 19.] had Moses and Aaron, and their sister Miriam, and having attained to the age of his grand-father, and withall his father in law, which was 137 years, dyed a little before the 3095. 1619. 6

2427. d. Ramesses Miamun reigned there 66 years 2 moneths; the latter part of whose surname seems to have been deduced from the forepart of the name Amen-ophis; by which name both his son after him, and sundry also of his predecessors were called; but the former part of it from the word Moy: which with the Egyptians signifieth water, as Josephus l. 1. contra, Apion. and Clemens Alexand. l. 1. stromat. and Suidas (in Μωῦ) affirms, whence also those writers, who deliver all by way of Fables; called Mythologians give him the name of Neptune, the feigned God of the waters, as shal be shewed upon the year 2533. This is that new king, which knew not Joseph, as being born after his death, and remembred no more the great benefits received from him. And by his policie it was that the Egyptians, taking a fright at the number and strength of the Israelites in the land, overlaid them with a heavie and cruel bondage, laying upon them, over and above their continuall labour and tillage of the ground, the building also of the Kings magazines and store-houses: and the whole cities of Raamsis, or Ramesis: [Exod. 1.8.14. Acts 7.18,19.] the later whereof took its name, as Mercator thinketh, from Ramesses the founder of it, and the other perhaps from his Queen. 3137 1577

2430. b. Aaron was borne 3 years before his brother Moses, eighty three years, before the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, [Exod. 7.7.] 3140. 1574.

2431. The ungodly king, when he could not prevaile with Shiphra and Pua two principal midwives of the Hebrew women, privily to make away the male children of them, set forth a barbarous edict, to destroy them all, by drowning them in the river, [Exod. 1.15.--22. Acts 7.19, 20. in the time which interceded between the birth of Aaron and Moses. 3141. 1573.

Now for as much as Moses, (God so disposing) was a lovelie childe to look on, as Justin also out of Trogus Pompeius, mentions him to have been, his parents, hid him 3 moneths in their house, and did not regard the kings edict, [Exod. 2. 2. Acts 7. 20. Heb. 11. 23.]

But when as, by the over diligent inquiry made by the kings searchers, and their bad neighbours the Egyptians, he was at length found out, they put him in a basket of bullrushes, daubed over with slime and brimstone, and layed it in the flags, by the brim of the river, his sister, Miriam, or Mary, [Numb. 26. 59, 1 Chron. 6, 3.] standing a loof off from the place, to see what would become of him. But Pharaohs daughter (whom Josephus 2. Antiq. c. 5. al. 9. calleth Thermutin, and so doth Epiphanius, in Panario, and others) finding him there, put him forth to be nursed, as it fell out, to his own mother Jocebed, and afterward adopted him for her son, and caused him to be brought up, and instructed him in all manner of science and learning of the Egyptians, [Exod. 2.5.10. with Acts 7.21,22.]

2448. Cecrops, an Egyptian, transporting a colonie of the Saits into Attica, as we learn out of Diodorus Siculus, lib. 1. set up there the kingdom of the Athenians, 780 years before the 1. Olympiad, as Eusebius in Chron. reporteth out of Castor, from this Cecrops his time, the Cronologie of the Ile of Paros, published by that most learned J. Selden, among his Marmora Arundelliana, deduceth his Historie or Antiquities of Greece, for that after him & Moses, who was contemporarie with him, so many memorable things fel out in Greece; as Deucalions flood, Phaetons fire, the birth of Ericthonius, the rape of Proserpina, the mysteries of Ceres, the institution of the Elesinian sacrifices, Triptolemus his art of tilling the ground, the carrying away of Europa by Jupiter, the birth of Apollo, the building of Thebes, by Cadmus, and those of somewhat a later time, Bacchus, Minos, Perseus, Esculapius, Castor & Pollux, Hercules. Euseb. l. 10. de Prap. Ev. c. 9. 3158. 1556.

2465. In the 18 year of this Cecrops, the Chaldeans made war, and fought with the Phenicians, [Euseb. Chron.] 3175. 1539.

2466. In this war, the Chaldeans being overthrown, the Arabians reigned in the country of Babylon 216 years before Belus the Assyrian came there to reign. The 1 K. of the Arabians was Mardocentes, who reigned there 45 years, Jul. Affric. and seemeth to be the man that is called Merodach: who was afterward reputed by the Babylonians for a god, [Jer. 50.2.] from whom the succeding kings borrowed their names; as Merodach, Baladan, and Evil-merodach. 3176. 1538.

2473. Moses being now 40 years of age, and going to visit his brethren, the Israelites, and beholding their sad condition, when he saw an Egyptian, smiting a man of the Hebrews, slue him, and buried him in the sand; which when he saw was known, not onely to his brethren 3183 1531

2494. Rameſſes Miamun died in the 67 year of his reigne; the length of of his tyranical reign ſeemeth to be noted, [Exod.2.23.] in theſe words: After many years died the K. of Egypt; and the children of Iſrael groaned and cried out for the burthen which they under-went, to wit, the cruel bondage, which continued upon them, even after Rameſſes was dead, by the ſpace of 19 years and a half, under his ſon Amenophis, who ſucceeded him; for ſo long and no longer a time of his reign is aſſigned by Manetho: out of whoſe whole narration, though ſtuffed with a multitude of old wives tales, all which are abundantly refuted by Joſephus, in his 1 book against Apion: yet there are 2 hiſtorical verities clearly appearing in him: 1. that under this Amenophis, the father of Sethoſis, al. Rameſſes (the 1 K. of the following Dynaſtie, or ſucceſſive principality) which Manetho makes the 19, and not under the other Amenophis which was the 3 of that Dynaſtie (as Joſephus vainly ſurmiſes) the Iſraelites, under the conduct of Moſes, according to Manethoes relation, departed out of Egypt. 2. That he whom the Egyptians call Amenophis the father of Sethoſis and Armais, him the Greeks call Belus, the father of Egyptus, and Danaus. For the time of this Belus, by Thallus the Chronographer (as he is alleaged by Theophilus Antiochenus and Lactantius) falls in jump with the age of this Amenophis; though the fable writers confounding this Belus of Egypt, with Belus the Aſſyrian, the father of Ninus, tell us, that certain Colonies were tranſported by this Belus (who was drowned in the Red-ſea,) into the country of Babylon. 3203. 1491.

2513. God appeared to Moſes, whiles he was keeping his father in law Jethroes ſheep in the mountain of Horeb, in a bramble-buſh, burning, but never conſumed with fire, and called him to deliver his people Iſrael, out of their ſlavery and bondage in Egypt. And he though he ſought by divers excuſes to avoid this imploiment, yet at length, partly by miracles, partly by aſſurance given him of the aſſiſtance of God, and his brother Aaron given him for an aſſiſtant, he undertook the work, [Acts 7.30, 35. Exod.3. & 4. 1, 18.] 3323. 1491.

Moſes, taking leave of Jether or Jethro his Father in law, with his family; took his journey for Egypt: but in the way, for neglecting to circumciſe his ſon Eliezer, he was ſtopt by God, and not ſuffered to paſſe, till he had circumciſed his ſon, and from thence ſending back his wife Zipporah, and his two ſons, Gerſhom and Eliezer, to her father Jethro, and freed from all encombrance, he returned to mount Horeb, where meeting with his brother Aaron, he went on and performed his embaſſie, confirmed by miracles, in the open ſight of the children of Iſrael, [Exod.4.18, 31. & 18.1, 6.]

Moſes and Aaron, having declared to Pharaoh, the meſſage in which they were ſent unto him from God, are charged by him as heads of a mutiny, and ſent away with many bad words, and more grievous labours were forthwith laid upon the Iſraelites, than their daily task formerly came unto: and when their overſeers were beaten, becauſe all was not done that was commanded, and they complained thereof (though all in vain) to Pharaoh, they expoſtulated the matter with Moſes and Aaron, and Moſes with God: who graciouſly heard him, and confirmed him to go on in the work he had begun, [Ex. 5.]

Moſes returned to the Iſraelites, with further inſtructions from God; but their oppreſſion ſtill encreaſing, could do no good with them: and thereupon being commanded by God to go again to Pharaoh, he excuſed himſelf, [Exod. 6.]

Moſes being now 80, and Aaron 83 years of age, urged thereunto by God, returned again to Pharaoh, where the Magicians by their ſorcery, imitating the miracles of Aarons rod, turned into a ſerpent, made Pharaoh more obſtinate than he was before.[Ex.7.1, 13.] The chief of theſe magicians which oppoſed Moſes, were Jannes and Jambres, al. Mambres, named by the Apoſtle,[2 Tim.3.8.] whoſe names are celebrated, not only by the Jewes in their Talmudical Treaty of מנחות (i.e.) of oblations, c.9. where they are called by the names of יוחני and וממרא (i.e.) Jochanne, and Mamre, and in the Chaldee Paraphraſe, attributed to Jonathan upon, [Ex. 1.15. & 7.11.] but alſo among ſome heathen writers, for ſo Numenius Apamæus, a Pythagorean Philoſopher, in his 3 book, περὶ τἀγαθοῦ, cited by Euſeb.l.9.Præpar.Evang. c.8. relates this hiſtory: Jannes and Jambres, ſaith he, interpreters of the myſteries of Egypt, were in great repute, what time the Jewes were ſent out of Egypt, being in the opinion of all men, inferiour to none in the Art of Magick. For by the general voice of the Egyptians, they two were choſen to oppoſe Moſes, ring-leader of the Iewes, whoſe praiers were of all others, moſt prevalent with God, and they only were able to undoe, and fruſtrate all thoſe moſt grievous calamities, which Moſes brought upon the Egyptians, in the open view and ſight of all the Egyptians: whereto alſo that of Pliny, l.30.c.1. is to be referred, where he ſaith, There is alſo another ſect of Magicians, depending upon Moſes, and Iannes and Iotape Iewes. Wherein neverthleſſe he falls into a double error, 1. In reckoning Moſes among the magicians. And 2. in making Jannes and Jotape to be Jewes. But when Pharaoh's magicians, could do no more, God by the hand of Moſes laied his ten plagues upon the Egyptians, all which are recounted [Pſal. 78. & 105.] The which plagues, took up, as the Jewes ſaw, a whole years ſpace, at ſeveral intervals of time; whereas indeed they were all ſent within one month in this order.

About

About the 18 day of the 6 month, (which in the year following and after, was reckoned the 12 month) was sent the first plague, of the waters turned into blood: and after 7 daies ended, [Ex.7.25.] about the 25 day, came the 2 plague of the frogs; which was removed the day following: About the 27 was brought upon them the third plague, of flies and lice.

About the 28 day, Moses threatned them with a fourth plague, of flies, and other vermin which came upon the 29 day, and were all taken away upon the 30.

About the 1 of the 7 month (which shortly after was made the 1 month of the year) Moses having foretold them of a fifth plague to come, brought it upon them, the day following, to wit, the plague and murrain of cattel. About the 3 day, the 6 plague, of boiles & boches, which brake out upon man & beast: of which plague the Magicians tasted, & had their share, no lesse than the rest of the Egyptians, [Ex.9.11.] whence proceeded that of Justin, out of Trogus Pompeius, lib. 36. The Egyptians, saith he, being afflicted with the scab, and scurf, and being warned by an Oracle, they turned Moses, and all that were infected with that disease, out of Egypt, least the contagion thereof, should spread further among the people. Adde hereunto, the sayings collected out of Diodorus Sicul. l.40. reported in Photii Bibliotheca, p.520.

About the fourth day, Moses foretelling them of a 7 plague, brought it on them upon the 5 day of the same month, which was of thunders and rain, and grievous haile, mixt with fire; with which their flax and barly was smitten, because the barly was then in the ear, and the flax boled, but their wheat and the rie were not hurt therewith, because they were not yet out of the ground, whence Nicolaus Fullerus, lib.3. of his Miscellanies rightly observeth, p. 389. that this plague happened in the month Abib.

About the seventh day Moses threatned them with an eighth plague, and accordingly sent it the day following, that was, of Locusts, to devoure all; which plague he removed about the 9 day, [Exod. 10.4,13,19.]

2513 The month Abib, which hitherto was the 7 month, was from this time forward, made the 1 month of the whole year, [Ex.12.2. with 13.4.] for a memorial of their departure out of the land of Egypt: from the beginning of which month the epocha of the Jewish Calendar, is from thence forward deduced, [Num 9.1,2. with Ex.40.17.] though the end of the former account, fell on the middle of the month. 3223 1491

Upon the 10 day of this now first day of the month, (which was the 30 of April, according to the Julian Calendar, upon Thursday) was instituted the feast of the Passover, and sweet bread, to wit, the Pascal lamb, was chosen, and kill'd the fourth day after, [Ex.30.36.]

Moses now bringeth upon them the 9 plague, of 3 dayes darknesse, which were such, that none of the Egyptians during that time, once removed out of the place where the darknesse found him: though the Israelites had all that time, light abundantly in their dwellings [Ex.10.22,23.]

Upon the 14 day (which was May 4. upon munday with us.) which was the last time that he spake with Pharaoh, Moses foretold him of the 10 plague, which should come upon him; namely, the destruction of all the first-born of Egypt, which came to passe the night following, at midnight, and then turning him about in a great anger departed from him, [Ex.10. 24,29.c.11.1,4,8.] At the evening of this day was the Passover celebrated, [Exod.12.11,12.]

The fourth Age of the World.

UPon the 15 day of the 1 month (our 5 of May, being tuesday) at midnight, the first-born of Egypt being all slain, Pharaoh and his servants, made hast to send away the Israelites, with all their substance, & the spoiles which they had gotten from the Egyptians: and they the self same day, wherein they were let go out of bondage, being the compleat terme of 430 years, from the first pilgrimage of their ancestors; reckoning from Abrahams departure out of Carran, the day after the Passeover, took their journey, & marched away, being 600000 men, besides children, and came to Ramesses, [Ex.12. 29, 30,31,37,41,51. Num.33.3.] From hence their several encampings are set down by Moses: which out of the Hebrew signification of words, Jerom expoundeth mistically, in his Treatise of their 42 encampings, written to Fabiola, from whom I have thought good to make the first encamping at Ramesses. Thus then:

1. At Ramesses, where the Israelites were placed by Ioseph, [Gen.47.11.] they all met who either dwelt mixt among the Egyptians [Exod.3.2.] or who at that time were scattered over all Egypt to gather stubble, [Exod.5.12.]

2. Was succoth, where Moses first declared to them the Commandments of God, for the yearly keeping of Easter, and the hallowing of the first-born to him; [Ex.13.]

3. Was Etham, in the border of the wildernesse; whither they came, the Lord conducting them in a pillar of a cloud by day, and in a pillar of fire by night, [Exod 13.20,21.]

4. Was Pihairoth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baalzephon.

Here Pharaoh with his host overtook them, here Moses divided the waters with his rod, and they passed through the midst of the Erythraean, or red Sea, unto the desert of Etham, whom, when Pharaoh & his army would needs follow, they were all overwhelmed of

of the waters coming together again, at the dawning of the day, whereby the Israelites were wholy quit and freed from the bondage of the Egyptians, whose carcasses when they saw floating all the sea over, and cast upon the shore, [*Exod.*14.13.] they forthwith sang a song of praise and thanksgiving unto God, for their deliverance, [*Exod.*5.20.] Which in the [Apocalyps, 15. 3.] is called the Song of Moses: and is of all others, any where to be found or mentioned, the first of that kind.

Now that this fell out, upon the 21 day of the first month, to wit, upon the last day of the feast of sweet bread (whereon a solemne assembly by Gods appointment was to be held) is the general opinion of the Iewes, and most agreeable to truth.

From hence they marched three whole daies through the wildernesse of Etham, to wit, the 22, 23, 24. dayes of this month, being Tuesday, Wedensday and Thursday of our weeke, but found no water all the way, [*Ex.*15.22. *Numb.*33.8.]

5. Was at Marach; so called from the bitternesse of the waters there found; whereupon the people which had gone without water three whole daies, begining to murmure, Moses, by the throwing a piece of wood into them, made them sweet, and withal taught the people, in time to come, to put their trust in God, [*Ex.*15.23.26.]

6. Was at Elim; where were 12 fountains of water, and 70 palme trees: and at Elim, they encamped by the side of those fountains, [*Ex.*15.27. *Numb.*33.9.]

7. Was by the Red Sea, [*Numb.*33.10.]

And now we come to the Second month.

8. Upon the 15 whereof, (our June 4. being thursday) the Israelites came to the place of their 8 encamping: in the wildernesse of Sin, which lieth between Elyma and Sinai, where, when for want of food, they had murmured against God, and their leaders, about the evening-tide, God sent them Quailes, and the next morning, rained upon them Manna from heaven; and of that kind of bread, they lived afterward, by the space of 40 years, and even untill they came to the borders of the Land of Promise, [*Ex.*16.1,35.]

9. Was at Dophka.

10. Was at Alush.

11. Was at Rephid'm; where when the people murmured again for want of water, (from whence the place was afterwards called Meriba and Massa) Moses gave them water, by striking the hard rock with his rod, [*Exod.*17.1,7.] which rock followed them also throughout the wildernesse, [Psalm 78.16,20. Psalm 105.41. 1 *Cor.*10.4. Deut. 9. *v.*21.]

The Amalekites, falling upon the reare of the Israelites, all spent and tired with their long journey in the wildernesse as they were, slew some of the hindermost and feeblest of them, against whom Moses sent out Jehosua, al. Josua the son of Nun his servant, to fight with them, [*Ex.*33.11.] whose proper name, which was Hosea, Moses changed into Iehosuah, [Num. 13.16.] or Iesus, [Nehem. 8.17 Acts 7,45. and *Heb.*4.8.]

He therefore fighting with the Amalekites in Rephidim, whiles Moses was in prayer on the top of the hill, overthrow them: and the people by Gods Commandement were charged utterly to destroy and root out that whole nation: and for a memorial thereof, they there built an Altar, [*Deut.*25.17,18,19. Exod. 17.8,16.]

The Third month.

12. Encamping was in the Desert of Sinai: where the Israelites encamped over against Horeb: from whence they removed not by the space of almost a whole year; for they removed from the wildernesse of Sinai, upon the 2 day of 2 month, of 2 year, after their coming out of the land of Egypt, [*Numb.*10. 11,12.] and they came thither upon the same day of the 3 month, of the 1 year, after their coming out of Egypt: to wit, the same day, or number with 3 month, (i.e.) upon the third day of the third month, as Fr. Ribera, lib. 5. de Templo, at large declareth; and that falls in, with 22 of our Iune, happening upon a Monday.

When Moses went up into the mount, God there declared to him, that he would renew his covenant with the Israelites; That he would bind them to himself by a law; and that he would favour and love all those, who would observe and keep that law: which when they readily agreed unto, he gave them two daies space to prepare themselves for the reverend receiving of that Law. He forbade all save Moses and Aaron, to approach the mount: and afterward, in great majesty (they all looking on and trembling at the sight) God came down upon the Mount, (Ex. 19.)

God published his law, contained in the ten commandements, with a terrible voice, [Ex. 20. Deut. 5.] which neverthelesse disannulled not the promise of Grace, made unto Abraham 430 years before. [Gal. 3. 17.]

The people being in this great fear, God gave them sundry other Lawes, [*Ex.*20.21,22, 23. with *Deut.*4.13,14.] all which being written in the book of the Covenant, Moses proposed to the people: which done, rising early in the morning, he built an Altar at the foot of the mountain, and set up 12 statues, according to the 12 tribes of Israel, and sent 12 young men of the first-born (as the Chaldee paraphrase hath it) whom the Lord had consecrated to himself, [*Exod.*13.2. *Numb.*3.13. and 8.16,17.] as ministers of those holy things, [*Exod.*19.22.] before the Levitical Priesthood was ordained; which offered sacrifices, first for

for sin, and then of thanksgiving to the Lord; and when Moses had read the book of the Covenant, containing the Commandments expressed in the [20 c. of Exod.] with the three chapters following, in the years of the people, then taking the blood of the calves and goats so offered, with water, and scarlet wool, and hissop, he sprinkled the book therewith, and all the people, or those 12 statuaes representing the 12 Tribes of Israel: and so perfected that solemne covenant between God and his people, [Exodus 24, 2. with Hebr. 9. 19, 20.]

Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and 70 men of the Elders of Israel, went up into the mount, and there beheld the glory of God: and the rest returning, Moses with his servant Joshua, abode there still, and waited six daies, and upon the seventh day, God spake unto him, and there he continued 40 daies, and 40 nights, [Exod. 24. 9, 18.] (reckoning those six daies which he waited for the appearance of the Lord) eating no meat all that while, nor drinking water, [Deut. 9. 9.] where he also received Gods command, touching the frame of the Tabernacle, the Priests garments, their consecration, sacrifices, and other things comprised in [Exod. 25.] and in the six chapters following.

The Fourth month.

When those 40 daies and 40 nights were ended, God gave Moses the two Tables of the Law in stone, made by Gods own hand, and written with his own finger, [Exod. 31. 18. Deut. 9. 10, 11.] bidding him with all, quickly to get him down, for that the people, had already made to themselves a molten calf, to worship it: Moses by prayer pacified God, and went down from the mount, and seeing the people keeping a festival in honour of their Idol, in the Camp, he brake the Tables of the Law, at the foot of the mount: for which the Jewes keep a solemn fast unto this day, the 14 day of the 4 month: which hath led some men into this errour, to think that the 40 daies of Moses his staying in the mount, are to be counted from the day imediately following the promulgation of the ten Commandments, omitting altogether the intermediate time, spent in writing, and reading the book of the Covenant, and composing the Covenant so made between God and his people, with solemn Rites and Ceremonies thereunto belonging. [Exod. 24.]

Moses, having burnt and defaced the Idol, put 3000 of the people to death, by the hands of the Levites, [Exod. 32. 20, 29. Deut. 9. 21. & 33. 9.]

The next day Moses returned again into the mount; and there again entreated the Lord for the people, [Ex. 32. 30, 31, 32.]

He commanded them to lay aside their gorgeous aparrel, and to set up the Tent of the Congregation (which for that present supplied the room of the Tabernacle afterwards built by Bezaleel) without the Camp; and having drawn the people out of a deep sense of Gods wrath, to repent them of their sin, by his prayer obtained, that no longer the Angel, but God himself, should be their guide and leader in their way, [Exod. 33.]

God commanded Moses to frame new tables of stone, and the next day, to bring them with him into the mount: coming with them the next morning, and standing in the cleft of a rock, God passing by, shewed him a glimpse of his glory, [Ex. 34.]

Moses staying again 40 daies and 40 nights in the mount, without meat or drink, praied there for the people, [Deut. 9. 18. & 10. 10.] God being appeased, renewes his Covenant with the people, upon certain conditions, gives his Lawes anew, and bids Moses to commit them to writing: and he himself again, writes the ten Commandments in the tables which Moses brought unto him, [Ex. 34. 10, 28.]

The Sixth month.

Moses after 40 daies returnes from the mount, with the tables in his hand; and covering his face with a vaile, because it shone, he published the Laws of God to the people, enjoyned the observation of the Sabbath; and commanded a free-will offering to be made toward the building of the Tabernacle according to Gods order, [Ex. 34. & 35.]

And to the end that this offering and contribution should the more orderly and effectually proceed, all were numbred from twentie years old and upward, and they were found to be six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty, every of which, according to the Law prescribed by God, [Exod. 30. 12, 13.] contributing half a shekel, the total summe amounted to one hundred talents of silver, and 1775 shekles, [c. 38. 25, 26.] whence it is gathered, that every talent among the Jewes, amounted to 3000 shekles: or 50 pounds sterling: every pound containing 60 shekles, [Ezek. 45. 12.] over and above which polemoney, out of the voluntary offerings, was made up the sum of 29 talents of gold, and 730 shekles; and of brasse, 70 talents, and 2400 shekles, [Exod. 38. 24, 29.] As for other materials requisite to this building of the Tabernacle, there came in more than enough: insomuch that the people were commanded to bring in no more, [Ex. 36. 5, 6, 7.]

Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed by God for the chief workmen herein, [Exod. 31. 2, 6. and 35. 30, 35.

2514 a. In the first six months of this year, were the Tabernacle, the Arke of the Covenant, the Altar, the Table of shew bread, the Priests garments, the holy Oyntments, the Candlestick, and other utensils, and vessels belonging to the sacrifices, finished in the desert at mount Sinai, and were brought unto Moses; [Exodus 36. with the three chapters following.] 3224. 1490.

Then

Then was Moſes commanded by God,firſt that upon the firſt day of the ſecond moneth he ſhould ſet up the Tabernacle and furniſh it with all things belonging thereunto,[Exod. 4.2, 8.] Secondly, that he ſhould anoint them with holy oyl; and ſhould conſecrate Aaron and his ſons for the Prieſthood, [Exod. 9. 15.] which he alſo is ſaid to have done; but not both of them at the ſame time: For upon the very day appointed, he erected the Tabernacle, with all things thereunto belonging, [Exod. 40. 17, 33.] but the other part of the command he performed a while after, and at another time, prefixed by God; [Levit. 8. 1, 13.] for performance whereof, one day ſufficed not, namely, for the conſecration of the Prieſts and Altar both; but full ſeven dayes were ſpent therein; [Exod. 29.35, 36, 37.]

6. On the firſt day of the firſt moneth (anſwering to our 21. of April, being wedenſday) of the ſecond year after their departure out of Egypt, the Tabernacle of the Covenant was ſet up, and filled with the glory of God, [Exod. 40. 2, 17, 34.] out of which God, at ſeveral times, uttered his will and commandments to Moſes; which are compriſed in the 7 firſt chapters of Leviticus. In the ſame 2 year, and firſt moneth, the Iſraelites, forewarned by God, celebrated the Paſſeover at the evening of the fourteenth day, (which with us is 4. May, being tueſday:) Upon which day, ſome of the people complaining to Moſes and Aaron that they could not keep the Paſſeover with the reſt of their brethren, upon the day appointed, becauſe they were become unclean by touching a dead body; a law was made by God that all ſuch perſons ſhould keep their Paſſeover upon the 14. day of the ſecond moneth,becauſe they could not keep it upon the day firſt appointed [Numb. 9.1, 14.]

On the firſt day of the ſecond month(21. of May, Friday by the Julian Calender)God commanded Moſes to take the number of all the males of the children of Iſrael; except the Levites, from 20 years old to 60 by their Tribes: and to appoint the Levites for the ſervice of the Tabernacle, and to give their attendance, for the ſetting of it up,for the taking of it down, and removing and carrying it from place to place, as occaſion ſhould require, [Numb. 1. 1. c. 26. 64.]

The number of them came to 603550. [Numb. 10. 1, 46.] being juſt the ſame number which was taken 7 moneths before, when they were ſeſſed for a contribution to the building of the Tabernacle, [Exod. 38. 26.]

Moſes, according to Gods command, Exod. 29. 37. c. 30. 22, 30. & 40. 9, 15.] anointed the Tabernacle and the Altar, with all things thereunto belonging, with the holy oyl, and conſecrated them to the Lord. He conſecrated alſo Aaron, and his four ſons, with the ſame oyl, and with rites and ceremonies preſcribed for the execution of the Prieſtly Office; commanding them not to depart from the door of the Tabernacle in ſeven days ſpace, [Levit. 8.] for ſo many dayes the work of the conſecration of them, and of the Altar was in doing, [Exod. 29. 35, 36, 37. Levit. 8. 33.]

Then was ſet down and commanded the order of the Tribes in their march and encampings, [Numb. 2.]

The number of Levites from one moneth old and upward, was found to be 22300. [Numb. 3. 15, 35.] or, taking out thence their firſt born, to 22000. onely: all which were aſſumed to the ſervice of God, in lieu of the firſt born, of all the reſt of the children of Iſrael. And becauſe the number of the firſt-born of the children of Iſrael, exceeded the whole number of the Levites, (their firſt-born deducted) to the number of 273. therefore was there laid upon them for every of thoſe ſupernumerary heads five ſhekels, by way of redemption, [Numb. 3. 39, 50.]

The Levites thus ſet apart, were, with all due ſolemnity, conſecrated to God, and for his ſervice; every man having his certain time appointed, when he ſhould begin, and when he ſhould end his attendance upon his miniſtration, [Numb. 8. 5, 26.]

The Levites from 30 years old to 50. were found to be 8580. and their offices and ſervices were parted among them, according to their families, [Numb. 4.]

All leprous and unclean perſons were put out of the Camp. The lawes for reſtoring of damages, and of jealouſie were ordained, [Numb. 5.]

The vow, the conſecration, and manner of the Nazarites was inſtituted, [Numb. 6.]

Upon the 8 day next following the finiſhing of the conſecration, Aaron offered ſacrifices and oblations; firſt for himſelf, and then for all the people: all which being kindled and conſumed by fire, falling from heaven upon them, bred a full belief in the people, that the Prieſtly office among them was ordained by God himſelf, [Levit. 9.]

When all the Tabernacle was now fully ſet up, and anointed all over, together with the utenſils, and things thereunto belonging; and the Altar which had been 7 dayes in conſecrating, was now dedicated by Aaron his firſt oblation of ſacrifices made upon it; (for the ſeven former dayes were for expiation, or cleanſing, and ordained for the hallowing of it, Exod. 29. 36, 37.)

Then came the Heads of the Tribes which were numbred, and they brought ſix waggons covered over, and twelve oxen, and joyntly offered them before the Tabernacle: all which were conſigned into the hands of the Levites, the ſons of Geſhon and Merari; as belonging to their office, and afterward others every day brought their ſeveral ſacrifices, and things belonging to the miniſtry of the Tabernacle, and offered them towards the dedication of it, wherein twelve dayes were wholly spent, [Numb. 7. 1, 10, 11. and 84. 88.]

Wherefore upon this first day, Naasson, from whom David, and according to the flesh, our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ himself came; made his offering for the Tribe of Juda: and then the rest, every one for his Tribe, and in that order as they were ranked in their encampings. [Numb. 7. 11, 12, 83.]

Nadab and Abihu, the two eldest sons of Aaron (which going with their father up into the Mount Sinai, had there seen the glory of God, Exod. 24. 1, 9, 10.) going into the Sanctuary, with strange or common fire (not with that fire which fell from heaven, Lev. 9. 24. and which was perpetually to be kept alive, and continued for the burning of the sacrifices and incense in times to come) were struck dead in the place by fire sent from heaven, [Levit. 10. 1, 9. Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.] And for them the Priests were forbid to make lamentation: Moreover for some particular mens neglect of duty, all the Priests were charged to forbear wine and strong drink, before they were to go into the Tabernacle. A law also was made, that what was left of the sacrifices should be eaten by the Priests: and Aarons excuse therein was admitted by Moses, [Levit. 10. verse 6, 20.]

Upon that occasion was the Law made (about the tenth day, as it seemeth, of this moneth) that the high Priest alone; and he but once in every year, should enter into the Sanctuary; and that to be upon the day of expiation and general fast, which was to be kept upon the 10 day of the seventh moneth, [Levit. 16. 1, 34.]

On the 14 of this moneth, (June 3, Thursday) at Even, the Passover was to be celebrated by those, who that day moneth before were in their uncleannesse, [Numb. 9.]

The blasphemous person, by Gods command was carried out of the Camp, and stoned, [Levit. 24. 10, 11, 12, 13.]

All the laws contained in the seventeen last chapters of Levit. seeme to have been made in this moneth.

God commanded two silver trumpets to be made, by which the Congregation was to be called together; and the time of their removing, and marching, and sacrificing, signified to the people, [Numb. 10. 1, 28.]

Jethro, who was also called Hobab, brought his daughter Zipporah, with her two sons, Gershon and Eliezer, which were left with him, to his son in law Moses, and he dedelivered them to him: and having congratulated his, and the whole people of Israels deliverance out of that Egyptian bondage; he openly declared, both by word and deed, his faith and devotion toward the true God. And by his advise, Moses imparted the government of the people to some others, and ordained Magistrates for the deciding of lesser causes, [Exod. 18. with Deut. 50. 9, 18. and Numb. 10. 29.]

The 19 day of this moneth, seemeth to have been the last that the 12 Heads of the Tribes made their oblations in, for the dedication of the Altar; on which Ahira made his offering for the Tribe of Nephthalie, [Numb. 7. 78, 88.]

On the 20 day of the second moneth (being the ninth of our June, falling on a Wensday) God commanded the Israelites to remove their camp, and to go forward in their journey, to take possession of the land which he had promised to give them, [Numb. 10. 11. 12. Deut. 1. 6, 7.] whither Moses would have had Jethro to have gone along with him: But he refused, and thence returned to his own home, [Numb. 9. 29, 30. with Exod. 18. 27.]

The cloud, which covered the Tabernacle being lifted up, they cast themselves into four squadrons, or battalions, and marched from Sinai; where they had stuck, by the space almost of one whole year; and after 3 dayes continual journey, came to the wildernesse of Paran, [Numb. 10. 12, 33.] where they rested them 23 dayes, without removing.

13. Their 13 remove, was to Kibroth Hattaavah, [Numb. 33. 16.] where they that murmured were struck with fire from heaven, (whence that place, was called Taber) but were delivered at the intercession of Moses; yet fell again to murmuring, and provoked God, by their loathing of Manna, and desiring of flesh, [Numb. 11. 1, 10. Psalm 78. 19, 20, 21.]

Moses complained to God of the over-great burden of this government which lay upon him; and desired to be discharged of it: but God to ease him of the charge, gave him for assistants, the Court of the 70 Elders; of which number, Eldad and Medad, remaining in the Camp, prophesied, [Numb. 11. 10, 17, 24, 30.]

God gave the people Quailes: not as in the year before, for one day, [Exod. 16. 12. 13.] but for the whole moneth together: but sent withal a most grievous plague among them. Whereupon, and from the burying place, or graves of them that lusted, that place was called, Kibroth-Hattaavah, [Numb. 11. 31, 34. Psal. 78. 26, 31. and Psal. 106. 15.]

14 The fourteenth remove, was to Hazaroth, [Numb. 11. 35. & 33. 17.]

Miriam and Aaron spake evil of Moses their brother; because he had married a woman of Ethiopia; to wit, Zipporah of Madian, which was a part of the Eastern Ethiopia, otherwise called Arabia: and made themselves equal in all points with him: But God main-maintained Moses above them, and struck Miriam with a leprosie: whereupon she was removed out of the Camp: But at the prayer of Moses, after seven dayes, she was healed, [Numb. 12. 15. Deut. 24. 9.]

d. Miriam, being cleansed, upon some day of the 4 moneth; as may be gathered out of what is said before, returned into the Camp: and upon her return, the Israelites removed: and,

15. Upon their 15 remove, they pitched in Rithma, in the desert of Paran, [Numb. 12. 6, 33, 18.] near unto Kadesh-Barnea, [Numb. 13. 26.]

On the fifth moneth.

From the Wildernesse of Paran, [Numb. 13. 3.] or Kadesh Barnea, [Numb, 32. 8. Deuter. 1. 19, 22. & 9. 23. Josh. 14. 7.] the people desiring it, and Moses likeing well thereof, [Deut. 1. 22, 23. But above all, God commanding it, [Numb. 13. 1, 2.] at the time when grapes first grew ripe; twelve spies, one for every Tribe, (of which Caleb the son of Jephunna, was for the Tribe of Judah) being then 40 years old, [Josh. 14. 7.] and Hoshea the son of Nun, whom Moses had called by the name of Joshua, for the Tribe of Ephraim, were sent to discover, and spye out the land of Canaan: which entering into it by the desert of Sin, lying toward the south, went quite thorough it, to the very North parts thereof, even to Rechob, [Numb. 13. 21, 22. Deut. 1. 23.]

The sixth moneth.

The spies having spent 40 dayes in searching out the land, returned to Kadesh in the Wildernesse of Paran: bringing with them one branch of a vine, with a cluster of grapes upon it, gathered in the valley of Eshcol, which took its name from thence, with Pomgranats, and Figgs of the land, [Numb. 13. 23, 27. Deut 1. 24, 25.] from which ripenesse of the fruit at that season it appeareth, that this happened near before the 7 moneth, because a little before the feast of Tabernacles, (which was kept upon the 15 day of that moneth) the fruits of the barne and wine-presse, were always gathered, [Exod. 23. 16. Levit. 23. 39. Deut. 16. 13.] Ten of the twelve so sent to spie out the land, by speaking ill of the country, and the barrennesse thereof, and withal, magnifying the Cities for their strength, and the giantly stature of the men therein; disheartened the people from marching any further toward it; whiles Caleb, did all he could, to perswade the people to go on, [Numb. 13. 28, 33, & 32. 9.]

The people being terrified with the relation made by the rest, would needs back again into Egypt; and were ready to stone Caleb and Joshua, for telling a contrary tale. And God threatning the people, with a sudden destruction, was bowed to spare them, by the prayers of Moses: Yet so, as withal he denounced to them, that all of them which were then twenty years old and upwards should die in the Wildernesse, and never see the land which was promised unto them: and that they should wander in that Wildernesse fourty years, [Numb. 14. 1, 35. & 26. 64, 65. & 32. 10, 13. Deut. 1. 26, 36. & 9. 23. Josh. 5. 6. Psalm 95. 8, 11. & 106. 24, 25, 26.] reckoning all in a round summe; for it is manifest, that their children entered that land, in the 39. year, by comparing [Numb. 32. 13. with Deut. 2. 14.]

The ten spies, which had caused this mutiny among the people, God destroyed all by sudden death, [Numb. 14. 36, 37.] in remembrance whereof, the Jewes to this day, keep a fast, upon the seventh day of the sixth moneth, called Elul.

God therefore bad them remove their camp, and return back into the desert toward the Red Sea. But they, contrary to this command, would needs go forward into the mountain, and were there vanquished by the Amalekites and Canaanites, and pursued, as farre as Hormah. Therefore they sate down and wept before the Lord; but he would not hear them, [Numb. 14. 40, 45. Deut. 1. 40, 45.]

Upon this calamity, and the continual dropping away of the Israelites, in the Wildernesse, Moses composed the 90 Psalm, [Lord thou hast been our refuge, &c.] in which he also sheweth that the ordinary age of men, was reduced to 70 or 80 years at the utmost: therefore,

The age of man, was now a third time, contracted and cut short a third part of what it was before. 3225 1489

2515. e. The Israelites continued in Kadesh many dayes, [Deut. 1. 46.] for whether it were for a day or two, or a moneth, or a year, so long as the cloud continued over the Tabernacle, the Camp all that while continued in the same place, and removed not, [Numb. 9. 22.] But that in some places the Camp continued many years, appeareth, for that in the space of 37 years, there are but 17 encampings mentioned; for leaving Kadesh, they returned into the Wildernesse, as I said before, toward the Red Sea, and encamped about the Hill-Country of Seir many dayes, [Deut. 2. 1. Judg. 11. 16.] Now the 17 encampings, belonging to this compassing of the Wildernesse of Seir, mentioned in the 33 of Numb. were in this order:

The 16 encamping was at Rimmon Parez. The 17 at Libna. The 18 at Rissa. The 19 at Kehelatha. The 20 at Mount Shepher. The 21 at Harada. The 22 at Makheloth. The 23 at Thahath. The 24 at Thara. The 25 at Mithka. The 26 at Hashmona. The 27 at Moseroth. The 28 at Bene-Iaakan, or Beeroth Bene-Iaakan: (i.) Of the well of the sons of Iaakan, [Deut. 10. 6.] The 29 at Horagidgad, or Gudgoda, [Deut. 10. 7.]

The 30 at Iothatha, (i.) a place full of springs of water, [Deut. 10. 7.] The 31 was Hebrona. The 32 was Ezion-Gaber, which is near to Elotha, and joyning upon the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom, [1 Reg. 9. 26.]

2515 Now to that long demourage of theirs in Kadesh, or the encampings next ensuing upon their removes from thence, all that seems to referre, which we finde delivered in the fifteenth, and four next ensuing chapters of, Numbers; as well that of the lawes there mentioned to have been made, as the Historicall part thereof. As how he that gathered sticks on the Sabbath; (for though the sacrifices were omitted in the Wildernesse, yet was still the use of the Sabbath entirely observed) was, by the Oracle from God, stoned to death, by all the people, c. 15. and how Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, raising a mutiny against Moses and Aaron, were swallowed alive into the earth, and 250. of their associates, whiles they offered incense perished by fire, sent upon them from God. And how God commanded their censors to be taken and used, for the over-laying of the Altars, for a memorial of them to the children of Israel. And how the people murmuring against Moses and Aaron for the calamitie which had befallen their brethren, were stricken by God and perished, to the number of 14700. men, c. 16. And how twelve rods being brought by the twelve Princes, and laid in the Sanctuary: Aarons rod, onely budded, and brought forth almons; and was laid up before the Ark, for a sign to those who should afterward be given to rebellion, [cap. 17.] All which things are thought to have been done in the later half of the second year, after their departure out of the land of Egypt. Moses committing to writing nothing, but what fell out in the two first years, and the last of their travel in the Wildernesse; and passing by what else happened in those 37 years intervening, saving onely the matter of the 17 stages or encampings formerly mentioned. See Abulensis, upon Numb. cap. 1. Quæst. 3. 3225. 1489.

The Scripture also sheweth that the time, which the Israelites spent in travelling from Kadesh-Barnea, till they passed the vale, or brook Zerad, which was half a year after they removed from their 32 encamping; and another half year before they passed the River Jordan, took up the full time of 38 years. In which space of time, all that generation of rebels against God was wholly spent, dead and buried, [Deut. 2. 14, 15, 16.]

Now for the 9 first years, which the Israelites spent in the Wildernesse, Armais governed in Egypt, and Sethosis invaded the East: both which were brothers and sonnes to Amenophis, (which was he that was drowned in the red Sea) as we have formerly noted, to the year of the world, 1494. Of whom Manetho in his Egyptiaca, mentioned by Josephus in his first book against Apion, writeth thus. Sethosis being furnished with cavalry and shipping, made his brother Armais ruler, indeed over all Egypt, and let him use all other Regall power and authority there: onely he forbad him to wear a Crown; and charged him in no wise to abridge the Queen which was the mother of his children: and that he should also refraine from all other concubines of the King: But he himself made war in Cyprus and Phœnicia, and against the Assyrians and the Medes. Some of which he subdued by power and force of arms, others he took in, thorough the sole dread and terrour of his name: and now puffed up with this great successe near home, he went on with the greater confidence to ravage and spoile all the Kingdoms and Countries of the East. But some few years after he was gone, Armais whom he left in Egypt, casting off all fear of sinne, did all things contrary to what he was commanded by the King. For first, he misused the Queen, and lay continually with the Kings concubines; and at length, following the advice of his friends, used a Crown also, and plainly rebelled against his brother. Thus Manetho the Egyptian, adding withal, that Armais, was Danaus; and Sethosis was called both Egyptus, and that from him, the whole land was called Egypt: and also Ramesses, after his Grandfathers name. From which similitude of names and things, it is manifest, that both Tacitus comes to call him Ramses, and Herodotus, Sesostris; for so Tacitus sayes, That a King called Rhamses, having conquered all Lybia, and Ethiopia, and the Medes and Persians, and Bactria, and Scythia, and all the lands which the Syrians and Armenians, and their borderers the Cappadocians held, together with Bythinia, and Lycia, lying upon the Mediterranian Sea: and so far Tacitus of him, under the name of Rhamses. And for Sesostris, Herodotus in his second book, writes in this manner. Their Priests, saith he, speaking of the Egyptians, report; That he was the first, who with a Fleet of long Ships, going out of the Arabian gulf, brought all the nations, bordering upon the Red-Sea, into his subjection. Which done, he came back the same way: and having gathered a mighty Army, marched into the Continent (of Asia) and there subdued all the nations which stood in his way. Then passing out of Asia, crossed into Europe; there conquered the Scythians, and Thracians: whither, and no further, saith he, it seemeth to me, that Egyptian Army came, because here, and no further off, are to be seene yet extant, the Markes and Monuments of his name and Victories. Of which Monuments so erected by Sesostris, he averreth, that himselfe had seen some remaining in Palestine of Syria: as also two others in Ionia, one at Ephesus, as ye go into Phocea, the other, on the way leading from Sardis to Smyrna. The like report makes Diodorus Siculus, of Sesoosis lib. 2. but makes him far ancienter, than these times: and indeed the age attributed to his brother Danaus proves, that he was contemporarie with Moses, as also Manetho makes makes him, and Diodorus himself in his 40 book, misseth not much of the same mark; where he saith, That at what time all forraigners were turned going out of Egypt, Danaus and Cadmus, with their companies came into Greece, and moses with his, went into Judea, as we may find in the Selections of Photius, for the better understanding whereof, and in some sort, to fill up this void space of 37 years, omitted by Moses, it shall not be amisse here to insert, the times of these forraign affaires, taken out of Eusbeius his Tables, and are as follows.

2520. Egypt (which was formerly called Aeria) was so called from Egyptus who was there made King, upon the expulsion of his brother, Danaus: wherein our account varies two years only from that of Eusebius, for 3230. 1484.

2522. Egyptus, who was also called, Ramesses, and Sesostris, and Sesoosis, after the terme of 9 years spent in several voiages and wars in forraign parts, (as Diodor. Sic. in his first book testifieth,) returned to Pelusium. Whereby Armais, who is also called Danaus, when he had ruled over Egypt 9 years, fled for fear of his brother Ramesses, or Egyptus; and falling from the kingdom which he had so gotten in Egypt, came into Greece, as Georgius Syncellus hath it, in the Greek Eusebius, published by Scaliger, page 26. 27. having first attempted to poyson his brother Egyptus, at a banquet provided for him: but missed of his purpose, as both Herodotus lib. 2. cap. 107. and also Diodorus Siculus lib. 1. pag. 53. (in the Greek and Latin edition of him) testifies. 3232. 1482.

2530. Danaus coming into Greece, there made himself Master of Argos; and made it abound with waters: Danaus by his 50 daughters, Destroyed the 50 sons of his brother Egyptus: save onely his son Lynceus, which reigned after him, to wit at Argos. 3240. 1474.

2533. Busiris the son of Neptunus, and Libya the daughter of Epaphus, exercised a tyranny in the parts joyning upon the river Nile, barbarously murdering all strangers, which passing that way fell into his hands; whence is that of Ovid. lib. 3. de Tristi. more cruel thow, than was Busiris art, and that of Virgil, 3. Georg. who of Eurystheus heard hart, hath not heard? And altars, by the unworthy Busir reard? unworthy indeed to be defended; but much more unworthy was he to have been commended by any man, which yet was his hap to be, by Socrates the Orator, in his, Busiridis Encomium, and therein, (as after him, also Eusebius did) he sayes, that he was the son of Libya, the daughter of Epaphus and Neptunus. Where observe, that this Ramesses, surnamed Myamun, (of whom I spake, in the year of the world 2427) is by Muthological writers, surnamed Neptunus, and was the man who commanded the new born infants of the Hebrews to be drowned; and that left behind him two sons, Amenophis, (i.e.) Belus of Egypt (the father of Egyptus and Danaus) that oppugner of the Almighty God, and which with his host, was overwhelmed in the Red-sea; and left Busiris his son, so infamous, for butchering of strangers, (a fitting off-spring of such a father) to succeed him, whereunto you may add, if you please, out of A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 21. that the Poets were wont to call men, barbarous, cruel, and devoide of humanitie, the sons of Neptune: as born of that mercilesse element, the sea. ~~3241~~ 3243. 1471.

2543. In these times, Tat the son of Hermes Trismegistus, lived, saith Eusebius, with which agreeth that which the Egyptians deliver, that Sesostris, learned his wisdom, from the Hermes, as we find in Elian, lib. 12. Var. Histor. cap. 4. 3253. 1461.

2549. Cadmus and Phenix, going from Thebais in Egypt into Syria, erected a kingdom in Tyre and Sidon. Euseb. Chron. 3259. 1455.

2552. b. Now after the Israelites had compassed the hill-country of Seir and Edom, by the space of 37 years, from Kadesh-barnea, to Ezion-gaber, in Edom; going from the North to the South, even to the shoare of the Red-sea, God then commanded them to turne Northward, and march strait forward to the land of promise: and because the land of Edom lay in their way thitherward, he charged them, that they should not, in any wise, draw a sword upon them, as being their brethren: telling them how great a providence and care he had used, in preserving themselves by the space of 40 years in the wildernesse, [Deut. 2. 1, 7.] putting such an imperfect number of 40. for an imperfect, of 39. 3262. 1452.

In the first moneth of the 40 year, after their departure out of Egypt; the Israelites coming into the wildernesse of Tzin, they there encamped.

33 Encamping was at Kadesh, [Numb. 20. 1. with the 33. c. of the same, v. 36, 37, 38. and Judg. 11. 17.] To wit in Kadesh of Tzin, in the very borders of Edom, [c. 20. 14, 15.] towards Ezion-Gaber, and the Red-sea, and not at Kadesh Barnea, where they made their fifteenth encamping, and which lay near the border of Canaan, toward the south, [Numb. 34. 4. Josh. 15. 3.]

Here Miriam, al. Maria, died. [Numb. 20. 1.] 4 moneths before her brother Aaron, and 11 moneths before her brother Moses. But that she was the eldest of the three; and attained to the age of 130 years, appeareth, [Exod. 2. 4, 7.] so that she was a pretty big Maid, when Moses was born: as was noted before upon the year of the world, 2433. and the Jews to this very day, keep the memory of her decease, upon the tenth of the first moneth.

The people again, for lack of water, murmure against Moses and Aaron: whom when God commanded to call water out of the hard rock, onely by speaking to it; Moses being moved moved in his mind, through impatience, and diffidence of the thing; spake something, what ever it was, unadvisedly with his lips, but struck the Rock twice with Aarons rod, that was budded and blossomed, and thereby drew water from it, which, as those other drawn out of another Rock, 37 years before, [Exod. 17. 7.] upon this occasion, were called Meribah, or Waters of strife, [Numb. 20. 2, 13.] for it is most likely, that the former water, which Tertullian calleth, Aquam Comitem, The water that followed them, (of which I spake in the eleventh encamping) was swallowed up in the Red-sea, so that in this second distresse for water, the children break out into the like mutinous disposition, as their Father, so long before, had done.

Moses and Aaron for their diffidence and unbelief here shewed, in executing the commandment of God, were debarred from entering into the land of Canaan, [Numb. 20. 23. 24. c. 27, 14. Psal. 106. 32, 33.

The Israelites, sent messengers to the Edomites and Moabites, to desire passage thorough their land; But they refused to let them passe thorough the bodie of their countrie, [Num. 20. 14, 20. Iudg. 11. 17.] yet were content they should passe by the skirts thereof, [Deu. 2. 4, 6, 29.] whereupon they, staying a while at Kadesh, [Iud. 11. 17.] went forward.

34 The 34 encamping, which was in mount Hor, upon the borders of Edom, [Num. 20. 22, 23. and 33. 37.] or Mosera, [Deut. 10. 6.] whither the Isrelites are saied, when they removed from Beereth-bene Iaakan, or the wells of the sons of Iaakan, which was their 28 encamping, to have come; to wit, having by the way encamped, in Gudgoda, al. Hor-agidgad; Ietbatha, and other places; for whereas it is said, [v. 7.] that from thence, they came to Gudgoda, and from Gudgoda to Iotbatham, the words from thence are not to be understood of Mosera, but of Beeroth, as many learned men have long since observed upon this place.

Upon the first day of the fifth moneth, our August 18. being tuesday, in the 40 year, after their coming out of Egypt, Aaron dyed at Mosera, in the top of the Mountain, of Hor, at the age of 123 years, leaving his son Eleazer, his successor, in the high Priest-hood, [Numb. 20. 23, 28. and 33, 38, 39, Deut. 10. 6.]

The Israelites bewailed Aaron 30 dayes long, [Numb. 20. 29.] to wit, all that whole month, wherein he dyed.

Upon the sixth moneth, the king of Arad, who dwelt on the Southern part of Canaan, hearing of the Israelites approach, went forth, and fought against them, and took many of them prisoners, whereupon they vowed, a vow to God; and having gotten the victory over them, accordingly they destroyed them and their cities: from whence that place was ever called Horma, (i. e.) the place where that vow, of utterly destroying the Cananites, was made, [Num. 31. 1, 2, 3. and 33. 40.]

Then leaving mount Hor, and shunning the plain country, which leadeth from Elatha, and Ezion-Gaber, and the Red-sea straight into Idumea, they fetcht a compasse and came about to the East-side of it, [Numb. 21. 4. Deut. 2, 40. and there they made

35 The 35 encamping at Zalmona, [Num. 33. 41.] so called from an image there set up: for when the people murmured because of the fierie serpents, (not little worms, breeding in their flesh, (as Fortunius Licetus, in his third book, de spontaneo Viventium ortu, c. 51. dreameth) but plain fierie serpents) sent among them by God, which annoyed them, they were there healed, by looking up to the figure or image, of a brazen serpent, set up upon a pole, or post, by Gods appointment. [Num. 21. 5. 9. Joh. 3. 14. 1 Cor. 10. 9.]

36 The 36 encamping, was at Punon, [Numb. 33. 42.]

37 The 37 at Oboth, [Numb. 21. 10, 33, 43.]

38 The 38 at Ije-Abarim, upon the borders of Moab, [Num. 33. 40.] to wit in that desert, which lyeth over against the land of Moab, toward the East, [Numb. 21. 11.] and is called the desert of Moab, [Deut. 2. 8.] for continuing their march thorough that wildernesse, they came at length to the East of Moab, [Iudg. 11. 18.]

And when they removed thence, to passe by the valley or brook of Zared, God forbad them to make war upon Moab, [Num. 21. 12. Deut. 2. 8, 13.]

Now they passed over Zared, 38 years, after the sending of their spies, from Kadesh Barnea, the whole race of them which mutined, and rebelled against God from 20 years old and upwards, being wholly extinct and dead, [Deut. 2. 6.]

39 The 39 encamping was at Dibon-Gad, [Numb. 33. 5.]

The 40 was at Almon-Diblathaim, [Numb. 33. 46.] al. Beth-Diblathaim, in the wildernesse 3263 1451

2553. of Moab. [Ier. 48. 22. Ezek. 6. 14.]

a. The Israelites coming now to passe the borders of Moab, at Ar, and approaching the country of the Ammonites, God forbad them to make any war upon the Ammonites, [Deut. 2. 18, 19, 37.] and then commanded them to passe over the river Arnon: which at that time was the boundary between Moab and Ammon, [Deut. 2. 24. Num. 21. 13.] so that they encamped over Arnon, and never touched upon the territory of Moab, [Deut. 2. 24. Num. 21. 13. Iudg. 11. 18.]

For departing from thence to Beer, where was the well, which the Princes, and better sort of the people, with Moses their Law-giver, digged with their staves, they came to Matthana, Nahaliel, Bamoth, and the valley, which is in the country of the Moabites, at the entrance of the hill which looketh toward the wildernesse, [Num. 21. 16.] to wit of Kedemoth, [Deut. 2. 26.] and there pitcht.

41. Being their 41 Encamping: to wit, at Abarim, over against Nebo, [Numb. 33.47.] For as for Maanah and the others names, they were not encampings, as Tremellius obserˇveth upon [Num. 2.12.] but only places thorough which they passed in their march, before Moses sent messengers to the Amorites. Though the Chaldee Paraphrases take them not at all for proper names of places, but only as appellative, and interpret them of the waters of the well (as of the Rock, 1 Cor. 10.4.) which followed the Israelites to the brooks, and from the brooks, to the mountaines, and from the mountaines, to the Valley of the Moabites.

From the wildernesse of Kedemoth, Moses sent messengers to Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, praying him to suffer him to passe quietly through his borders (as the Edomites and Moabites had done) because that was a shorter cut to the foords of Jordan; but when he denyed them passage, and made war upon them, they slew Sihon, and possessed themselves of all his Cities, and dwelt in them [Deut. 2. 24, 36. Numb. 21. 21, 31. Judg. 1. 19, 22.]

Then sent Moses his spies to Jaser; which they took, with the townes thereunto belonging, and cast out thence the Amorites, from the river of Ruon, which is the bound of Moab, [Numb. 21.13. & 22. 36.] to the brook of Jabboc, which parteth it from Ammon, [Deut. 3.16. Jos. 12.2. and 13.10.] yet never medled they with the Country lying upon the river Jabboc, neither with any of the lands belonging at that time to the children of Ammon or Moab, as God had commanded them, [Deut. 2.9. and 9.37. And therefore, when the Ammonites, 264 years after, complained that the Israelites had taken their land, from Jabboc to Arnon, and even to the brooks of the river Jordan; Jephtha rightly answered them, that they had not meddled with the lands either of the Moabites or the Ammonites; but that when they had slain Sihon, they took all the lands belonging to the Amorites, from the river Arnon, to Jabboc, and possessed it, as their own inheritance, [Judg. 11.13, 15, 22, 23.] Though it be true also, that Sihon King of the Amorites had formerly taken from Vaheb King of the Moabites, Heshbon, and all that Country of his, unto Arnon: [Numb. 21.14.] so also had he taken from the Ammonites, half their Country, in like manner, even to Aroer, which lieth over against Rabba, [Deut. 3. 11.] for that all that land belonged formerly to the Ammonites; and afterward was taken from the Amorites, and assigned to the tribe of Gad, to dwell in, appeareth, [Jos. 13.25.]

When the Children of Israel marched on their way to Basan, Og King of Basan, being a remnant of the Giants, met and fought with them at Edrei, and was there with all his people, utterly destroyed; and the Israelites possessed themselves of all his Country, to wit, threescore Cities, and all that coast, as far as Argob, [Deut. 3. 1, 11. Numb. 21. 33, 34, 35. Amos 2.9.] All which Country of Argob, stretching to the borders of the Geshurites, and Mahacathites, Jair the son of Manasses, is said to have taken and called after his own name, Havoth-Jair, [Numb. 32. 41. Deut. 3. 14.] Which Manasses was indeed the son of Segub, of the tribe of Judah; but reckoned among the Manassites, both in regard of the inheritance he had among them, and also in reference to his Grandmother; for she being the daughter of Machir, of the tribe of Manasses, the father of Gilead, bare Segub, father of this Jair, unto Hezron, when he was sixty years of age, as appeareth [1 Chron. 2. 21, 22.] where it is further added, that this Jair possessed 23 Cities, in the land of Gilead, and that he took Gessurim and Aram (according to the best Expositors) with the villages of Jair, and Kenath with her villages, sixty Cities in all; though indeed Nobach, under him, took Kenath, with her villages, and called it Nobach after his own name, [Numb. 32.42.]

After these victories the Israelites leaving the mountains of Abarim, encamped in the plain of Moab, on this side of the foord of Jordan, which leadeth to Jerico, from Beth-Jeshimoth, unto Abel-Shittim, [Numb. 22. 1. and 33. 48, 49.] So that their

42. Two and fortieth encamping, was at Shittim, [Numb. 25. 1. al. Abel-Shittim, c. 33. 49.] where they continued, till at length under the leading of Josuah, they came to the bank of Jordan, [Jos. 3.1.]

Baalak the son of Zippor, King of Moab, considering all, what the Israelites had done to the Amorites, feared, least that under colour of passing through his Country, they would possesse themselves of his whole kingdom: and therefore, taking counsel with the Princes of the Midianites, his neighbours, sent for Balaam the son of Beor, a soothsaier, out of Mesopotamia, to come and curse the Israelites; promising him great rewards for his labour: purposing afterward to make war upon them, [Numbers 21. 1, 6. Deut. 33. 4. Josuah, 24. 9.]

Balaam, forewarned of God, refused at first to come: but being sent for a second time, he importuned God to let him go, and went with a purpose indeed to curse Israel; but God offended herewith, made the dumb Asse of this wisard, on which he rode, speaking in a mans voice, to reprove his folly, [Numbers 22. vers. 7, 35. 2 Peter, 2. vers. 15, 16.]

Balaam, twice offered sacrifices, and would fain have cursed Israel, to gratifie Balak therein: but being forced thereto by the Spirit of God, instead of cursing, he blessed them altogether; fore-telling, what felicity attended them, and what calamities should befall befall their enemies, [*Numb.*23, and 24. Deut. 23. 5. Josuah 24. 10.]

And by his advise it was, that the women of Moab, and Midian were set on work, to turn the Israelites away to Idolatry: and to make them fall a whoreing with them, [Num. 25. 1, 2, 3. c. 31. 16. *Deut.*4.3. Psal. 106. 28. Apocal. 2. 14.] Wherefore God commanded Moses, first to take all the ring-leaders of this disorder, and to hang them up before the sun: and then he gave order to the Judges, to put to death all such of them as had joyned themselves to Baal-Peor; and last of all, God sent a plague upon the people, whereof there died 23000 men in one day, [1 Cor. 10. 8.] which added to them which were hanged, and killed with the sword, amount in all to twenty four thousand, [Numb. 25. 4, 5, 9.]

Phineas the son of Eleazer, by killing Zimri, the son of Salu, chief of his fathers family, of the Tribe of Symeon; and Cosbi the daughter of Sur, a Prince of the Midianites, appeased the wrath of God, and so that plague ceased, [Numb. 25. *Psal.*106.30.] And God therefore setling the High-Priesthood for ever upon the house of Phineas, commanded them also to make war forthwith upon the Midianites, [Numbers, 25. vers. 12, 13, 17, 18.]

Moses and Eleazar, by Gods command, in the plain of Moab, near unto Jordan, over against Jerico, numbred the people from 20 years old, and upwards, and found them to be 601730 men: besides the Levites; whose number, reckoning them, from one month old and upwards, came to 23000. and then Moses received Gods command for the parting of the land of Promise, among the Israelites, [*Numb.*26. 1, 63.]

The daughters of Zelophead, had their fathers land parted among them for want of issue male: and by this occasion was the law for succession in heritages drawn up, and made, [*Numb.*27.1, 11.]

God signified to Moses, that he should die: and Josuah was thereupon declared to be his successor, and Moses laied his hands upon him, and gave him instructions, [Numb. 27. 12, 23. Deutronomie 3. v. 26, 27, 28.] And several lawes were then made, [Deuteronomie 28. v. 29, 30.]

Twelve thousand of the Israelites, under the leading of Phineas, vanquished the Midianites, and slew all the males among them, with their five Princes, and among them Sur the father of Cosbi, all which were under the subjection of Sihon the Amorite, whiles he lived; and Balaam the wisard, who when he should have returned into his own Country of Mesopotamia, [Numbers 24. 25.] staied among the Midianites, [Numbers 31. 1, 8. Josuah 13. 21, 22.] And of the females only the virgins were saved alive, [Numb. 31. 9, 54.]

The lands which belonged to Sihon, and Og were divided and given to the tribes of Reuben, and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasses, by Moses, [Numb. 32. Deut. 3. 13, 20. and c. 29. 8. Jos. 13. 8, 12. and 22. 4.] all from the river Arnon, to mount Hermon (which is also called Shenir, and Syrion, and Sion) and joyneth upon Anti-Lebanon, [Deut. 3. 8, 9. *Deut.*4. 48. Jos. 12. 1. Jos. 13. 9, 11.]

When the Israelites were now going into the land of Canaan, God commanded them to root out the Canaanites and their Idols, [*Numb.*33 50, 56.] and that they should divide the land, westward of Jordan, among the nine remaining tribes, and the other half tribe of Manasses, [Numb. 34.] and concerning the 48 Cities of the Levites, and six Cities of Refuge, [*Numb.*35.] of which there were three appointed then by Moses himself, on the east of Jordan, [*Deut.*4. 41, 42, 43.]

Upon the 5 day of 11 month (*Feb.*20. falling upon our Saturday) in the 40 year after their departure out of Egypt, in the plain of Moab; Moses made a speech to the children of Israel; set down in the 1, 2, 3. c. of Deut. and to the 40 v. of the 4 c. and afterward continued his speaking to them; to the 27 c. of the same.

Moses, with the Elders of Israel, commanded the people, that in their passage over Jordan, they should set up great stones, whited over with chalk or plaister, and the ten Commandments to be written on them, and the forme of blessing upon the mount Gerizim, and of cursing in mount Ebal, [Deut. 27.] exhorting them to observe the Law of God, by setting before their eyes, what benefits would ensue thereof; and dehorting them from the breach of that law, by assuring them of what miseries would overtake them: if they forsook the Law, [Deut. 28.]

Moses, by Gods command, renewes the Covenant, made by God with them, and their children in mount Horeb: and again perswades them, to keep that Covenant, by all the blessings and curses, which would undoubtedly follow the keepers or breakers of it, [Deut. 29.] yet with a promise of pardon and deliverance, if at any time, having broken it, they should repent them of their sin: and tells them further, that God had therefore thus declared his will unto them, to the end, that none hereafter offending, should pretend ignorance, if he offended, [Deut. 30.]

Moses having written this law, delivered it to the Priests, the sons of Levi, and the Elders of the people to be kept: The same day also he wrote his song, and taught the same to the children of Israel to be sung, and having finished the book of this law, he took order to have it laied up, in the side of the Arke, [*Deut.*31.] But that most excellent song of his, is contained in [*Deut.*32.]

Moses, drawing now near to his end, blessed every tribe in particular, by way of prophecie, saving only the Tribe of Symeon: which his last Will and Testament is conteined in [Deut.33.]

In the twelfth month of this year, Moses, going up out of the plain of Moab, into mount Nebo, which was a part of the countrey of the Abarims, from the top thereof, lying over against Jerico, he beheld the land of Promise, all over, and then dyed, [Numb. 27.12,13. Deut. 3. 23,29. Deut. 32. 49, 50. Deut. 34. 1,5.] being then, 120 years old, [Deut. 31.2,3, 4,7.] Of all which time, he spent a full third part, wanting only one month; in his government of the people of Israel: as is not amisse observed by Josephus, in the later end of his 4 book of antiquities: as departing this life in the last month of the year, and first day of that month, which by the Macedons is called Dystrus, and by the Hebrewes Adar: which better suiteth, with the accompt of Historians shortly after following, than with the tradition of the Jewes of later time: who saith that he died upon the seventh day of the month Adar, as in Sedar Olam rabba, c. 10. in his פטירת book of the death of Moses, in the proeme of Maymonidas to the book, called Misnaioth; and in the Calendars of the Jewes of this time appeareth: who still celebrate the memorial of his death, by a solemne fast upon this day.

The body of Moses, God translated out of the place where he died, into a valley of the land of Moab, over against Beth Peor, and there buried it: nor doth any man know the place where he laied it, unto this day, [Deut.34.6.] But that this valley was in the land of Sihon King of the Amorites, which the Israelites won from him, appeareth out of [Deut. 4. 46.] and that Beth Peor, was assigned to the Rubenites, out of [Jos.13.20.] and therefore, whereas here Moses is said to have been buried in the land of Moab; as likewise [Deut. 29. 1.] the Covenant is laied to have been renewed in the land of Moab, it is to be understood of the land which formerly did belong to them: but was lately taken from them by Sihon King of the Amorites, as I shewed before out of [Num.21.26.] and was now possessed by the Israelites.

Michael the Arch-Angel, as we read in the Epistle of Jude; disputed with the Devil about the body of Moses: which the Devil would fain have brought to light; that he might thereby have ministred an occasion of Idolatry to the people of Israel, as Chrysostome in his 1. Homilie upon Mathew: and Thodoret, upon Duteronomie, Quest. 43. and Procopius Gazaus, upon Deuteronomie, and others say: though we no where find that the Jewes ever gave themselves to this λειψανολατρεία: i.e. This worshiping of Reliques: But this contention of Michael with the Devil about the body of Moses, went about heretofore in a certain Apocryphal, entitled, περὶ Ἀναλήψεως Μωυσέως: i.e. of the Assumption of Moses, as we read in Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν, lib. 3. cap. 2. and in Gelasius Cyricenus in the Acts of the Council of Nice, part. 1. c. 20. Like unto which, somewhat is also found in אבות of Rabbi Nathan.

The Israelites mourned for Moses in the land of Moab, 30 dayes, [Deut. 34.8.] to wit, all the whole 12 month.

And here ends the Pentatuch, or the five books of Moses, containing the history of 2552 years and a half, from the beginning of the world; and the book of Josua begins with the 41 year after the departure of the Children of Israel out of Egypt.

The First Month.

Josuah being confirmed in his Government by God, sent forthwith spies from Shittim to the City of Jerico: which being harboured by Rahab in an Inn, and privily sent away when search was made for them, lay three dayes close in the mountain, and then returned to him, [Jos.2.]

Josuah commanded the people, besides their manna, which as yet ceased not, to take other provant and victuals along with them, as being three dayes after to passe over Jordan, [Jos.1. 10, 11.]

The next morning, they removed from Shittim and came to the river Jordan, and there encamped that night, [Jos.3.1.]

The third day after, warning was given them, as it should seeme, to provide victuals; the people also were commanded to sanctifie and prepare themselves to passe over Jordan the morrow after, [Jos.3. 2, 5.]

Upon the 10 day of the first month, April 30. being on a Friday, to wit, the same day that the Paschal lamb was to be chosen out of the flock, the Israelites, by the leading of Josua, a type of Jesus Christ, went up out of the river Jordan, into the promised land of Canaan, a type of that heavenly country: they passed through the river on dry foot, the waters being for that present divided, and that at a season, when they usually over-flowed the banks, for a memorial of which miraculous passage, Josua set up twelve stones in the very channel of Jordan; and taking twelve other stones from out of the middest thereof set them up in the place where they next encamped, at Gilgal, [Jos. 3. and 4.]

The day following (as it seemes) Josuah renewed the use of Circumcision in Gilgal, which had been omitted 40 years, and there the people rested them and abode, untill they were whole again, [Jos.5.2,9.]

Upon the fourteenth day of the firſt month (the fourth of May, being our Tueſday) in the evening, the Iſraelites celebrated their firſt Paſſover in the land of Canaan; [Joſua 5. verſ. 10.]

Next day after the Paſſeover (May 5. being Wedenſday) they ate of the fruit of the Land of Canaan, unleavened bread, and parched corne; and manna ceaſed, the very day after they began to live of the fruits of the land; and the children of Iſrael after that, ſaw manna no more, but lived that year, of the fruits of the land of Canaan, [Joſ. 5. 11, 12.]

Our Lord Jeſus, Captain of his Fathers Hoſt, appearing to Joſua, the typical Jeſus, before Jerico, with a drawn ſword in his hand, promiſed there to defend his people, [Joſ. 5. 13, 14, 15.]

Jerico, the Ark of God having been carried round about it, was taken the ſeventh day, the walls thereof falling flat down, at the ſound of the Prieſts trumpets: and was utterly deſtroyed, and all put to the ſword, ſaving only Rahab, and her family, [Joſ. 6.] who marrying afterward to Salmon, of the Tribe of Judah, bare of him, Boaz, [Mat. 1. 5.]

The Iſraelites at their ſiege of Ay, being abandoned by God, for the ſacriledge, committed by Achan, are ſmitten by their enemies: Achans ſin being diſcovered by the caſting of lotts, and he found guiltie, was ſtoned to death, and together with his children and cattel, burnt with fire, [Joſ. 7.] and God being hereby pacified, Ay was taken by an ambuſhment; and utterly deſtroyed, and twelve thouſand men ſlain in the taking of it, [Joſ. 8. 1, 29.]

In mount Ebal, according to the law made, there was an Altar erected, for ſacrifices to be made thereon, and the ten Commandments, engraved on it, the bleſſings and curſings were repeated in mount Ebal, and mount Gerizim, and the book of the Law read in the ears of all the people, [Joſ. 8. 30, 35.]

The kings of Canaan, moved with this great ſucceſſe of the Iſraelites, bandy themſelves together againſt them, ſave only the Gibeonites, who craftily found a way to ſave their own lives, by making a league with them: but were, neverthelesſe, afterward deputed to the ſervile offices of the houſe of God: [Joſ. 9.]

Adoni-zedec, King of Jeruſalem, with the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachiſh, and Debir, hearing that Gibeon was fallen off from them, joyned their forces together, and beſieged it; But Joſua having raiſed the ſiege, purſued thoſe five Kings, and had the killing of them, as far as Azecah, and Mackeda, at which time, the ſun ſtood ſtill over Gibeon, and the moon over the valley of Ajalon, by the ſpace almoſt of one whole day, and untill the Iſraelites were fully avenged of their enemies, [Joſ. 10. 1, 14.] Whereupon Laurentius Codomannus obſerves two things: 1. That whereas Aialon, was diſtant from Gibeon, ſcantly one German mile toward the weſt, it is very likely that the moon was then paſt the full and well on in the wain. 2. That ſeeing both thoſe great lights began and ended their ſtanding ſtill both together, the Aſtronomical account is no waies confounded by this ſtay, even as (ſaith he) in muſick, the harmony is not in any ſort broken, nor the voices jar, if they all reſt at the ſame time, and then begin again, every man in his part, unto the end of the leſſon.

Joſuah, following the chaſe, thoſe five Kings hid themſelves in a cave at Mackeda, which cave, Joſuah commanded to be rammed up with ſtones, and a guard to be ſet upon it, till the enemy being wholy routed, had betaken themſelves to their fenced Cities: and when all the armie was ſafely returned to Joſua in Mackeda, then were the ſtones removed, and thoſe five Kings taken out of the cave, and the captaines of the Hoſt, bid to put every man his foot upon their necks; and them to be hung up upon five gibbets, untill the ſun went down, and then to be throwne into the ſame cave again, and the mouth thereof ſtopped up with ſtones as before: [Joſ. 10. 16, 17.]

And thus ended that moſt buſie year of the wold, 2553. in the firſt ſix months, whereof Moſes himſelf took in and poſſeſſed all that land over Jordan, toward the eaſt, and in the later, Joſhuah conquered the moſt part of all, that lay to the weſt of it: and in the middeſt of the year, manna ceaſing, the people of Iſrael began to ſubſiſt and live upon the pro-2554. a. fits of the land of Canaan. 3264. 1450.

From the Autumne of this year, wherein, after the failing of manna, they began to till the ground and ſow it, is to be reckoned the firſt year, τῆς γεωργίας, (i.e.) of their tillage, and the riſe of the ſabbatical years hence to be taken, [Ex. 23. 10, 11. Lev. 25. 2, 7. Deut. 15. 1, 9. and Deut. 31. 10.]

The five kings thus deſtroyed, all the reſt of the kings, combined together againſt the Iſraelites; and with them Joſuah had a long war, [Joſ. 11. 1, 18.] which laſted full ſix 2559. a. years: as we ſhall ſee anon. 3269. 1445.

Joſuah, now grown old, was commanded by God, to divide all the land on the weſt of Jordan, among the nine tribes remaining, and the other half tribe of Manaſſes, [Joſ. 13. 1, 7.] whereupon he firſt divided the land of Gilgal, (where the Tabernacle of God then was, and the Army then lay) among the Tribes of Judah, and Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manaſſes, [Joſ. 14. 6. Joſ. 15. 16, 17.] at which time Caleb the ſon of Jephunna, 45 years after the time that he was ſent to ſpie out the land by Moſes, deſired to have Hebron with the mountain countries of Judea, to be aſſigned to him for his part: undertaking to expulſe the Anakims from thence, [Joſ. 14. 6, 10, 13.]

Yet

Yet would not Joshua permit (as Tremellius hath here very well observed) that Caleb with his own company should assault Hebron: but himself went with the whole Army to take it in; and having taken it, then gave it unto Caleb; to wit, the land and villages thereunto adjoyning: reserving the city it self, and suburbs thereof for a city of refuge, and for the Priests use, [Josh. 21. 11, 12, 13. 1 Chron. 55. 56, 57.] For, that, neither Hebron, nor Debir, though both lying within the land, and inheritance assigned to Caleb, were yet taken by the Israelites, nor the Anakims rooted out from thence, appeareth out of the [14 and 15 chap. of Joshua] so that all which is contained in the book of Joshua, from [verse 28. cap. 10.] to the end of chap. 11. and in the first chapter of the book of Judges, from the ninth, to the fifteenth verse, seems wholy to be referred to this place, because of the contiguity and coherence of the matter handled in each of them.

For when as the children of Juda and Joseph, being established in their possessions, according to their Tribes; a great part of the land of Canaan remained still in the hands of the Gentiles; Joshua before he proceeded to any further apportioning of lands, going with the Host of Israel from Gilgal, took Makkeda at the first assault: and so did he Libna in like manner; utterly destroying the Kings and people of either Kingdom, [Josh. 10. 28, 29, 30.]

From thence he marched with his Army to Lachish: took it the second day after he came before it, and put all there likewise to the sword. And when Horam King of Gezer, came to relieve it, Joshua met him, and destroyed him and his people, so that he left not a man of them alive: and then marching to Eglon, took it the very day he came before it, and put all to the sword, [Josh. 10. 31, 35.]

Afterward Joshua with all Israel, going up from Eglon to Hebron; took it, and put to the sword the new king thereof; (for the old one was hanged six years before) with all the cities belonging, [Josh. 10. 36, 37.] whence Caleb also cast those three Gyants, the sonnes of Anak, so much renowned and talked of 45 years before, [Numb. 13. 22, 23.] to wit, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, [Josh. 15. 14.]

Then Joshua with the Army, marching out of the south of Canaan, came before Debir, [Josh. 10. 38.] which formerly was called, Kariath-Sepper; where, when Caleb had proclaimed, that whoever took it, should have his daughter to wife: it fell out that Othoniel, cousin germain to Caleb, and the son of Kenaz took it: and thereupon married his daughter Acsah, and had with her in dowry, a piece of land with springs of water in it; [Josh. 15. 15, 19 Judg. 1. 11, 15.] and having taken the city, he put their new King also (for the other he had caused to be hanged with the rest, six years before) with all his cities to the edge of the sword, [Josh. 10. 39.]

To conclude, Joshua destroyed all the Hill-Country, and all the South parts, plaine and valley, and all their Kings, even from Kadesh-Barnea, as far as unto Gaza; and all the country of Goshen, (which was in the lot of the Tribe of Judah) as far as Gibeon. And all these Kings, and all their lands took Joshua at one time (i.) in one expedition or journey; for God himself all that while fought for Israel: and having thus done, then he with all the Host of Israel, came back to Gilgal, [Josh. 10. 40, 43.]

The rest of the Kings, with whom Joshua had warred a long time, hearing what Joshua had done, resolved to set upon him with all their forces united in one: but Joshua coming suddenly upon them, and unawares, slew them and possessed all their land, [Josh. 11. 1, 16.] from the mountain, which goeth up to Seir, which is the frontier of Edom, unto Baal-Gaddem, in the valley of Lebanon, which lyeth under the Hill of Hermon, [Josh. 11, 47. Josh. 12. 7.]

Then went Joshua and rooted out those Gyants, the Anakims with their cities, out of the Hill-Countries, out of Hebron: (this was done by the hands of the Tribes of Judah, [Judg. 1. 10.] out of Debir, out of Anab, and generally out of all the mountains of Juda, and all Israel. And so having gotten the whole land into his hands, he divided it among the children of Israel for a possession, by shares or portions (as we shall see in the year following) according to their Tribes: and so the land rested from war, [Josh. 11. 23. Josh. 14. 15.]

2560. The seventh year, reckoned from the first year wherein they began to till the ground 3270 1444
4. in Canaan, was withal the first Sabbatical year which was kept among them. When by this typical Jesus they were brought into this place of rest, which was a true type and figure of that Sabbath and Rest, which the true Jesus was to acquire, and bring the people of God into, [Heb. 4. 9.] And from hence also, the years of Jubile, or of every fifty years space, is to be reckoned, [Levit. 25. 8, 13.]

Upon the 15 day of the seventh moneth, (our November the fifth, falling upon a Saturday) the Israelites kept the Feast of Tabernacles in booths made of boughs of trees, according to the law, [Levit. 23. 39, 40.] and much more solemnly than was afterward used in the times of the Judges or Kings, [Neh. 8. 17.]

When God was now about to give the Israelites rest from all their enemies round about them, so that they might dwel there securely; it was requisite that a place also should be appointed, which himself should chuse, to place his name there, [Deut. 12. 10, 11.] Wherefore coming together at Shilo, they there fixed the Tabernacle of the Congregation;

tion; after the whole land was subdued unto them.

[Iosh. 18. 1.] Now Shilo (where the Tabernacle with the Ark of the Covenant continued by the space of 328. years) both by the signification of the name, and also by the situation of the place, seemeth to be the same with Salem: for, as שלום signifieth Peace, or Rest, [Gen. 34. 21. Nahum 1. 12.] so also doth שלו [Dan. 4. 1.] where also the Messias is thought to have been called Shilo, [Gen. 49. 10.] because not onely himself was peaceable and quiet: but was also the Authour of eternal rest and peace unto us; being aswell as Melchisedech, King of Salem, (i.) the King of peace, [Hebr. 7. 2.] which was Melchisedechs dwelling place, or palace, as Jerom in his 126. Epistle to Evagrius saith, was in his time to be seen in the city of Salem, near the place where John baptized, [Ioh. 3. 23.] which, [Gen. 33. 18.] according to Jeroms own, and the Septuagints exposition, was called Sichem, because feared as Shilo was, [Iosh. 24. 25, 26. Iosh. 18. 1. Gen. 35. 4. Iudg. 9. 6. compared with 21. 8, 19.] in the countrey of the Sichemites.

The land which remained, was divided among the other seven Tribes for their inheritance, and a book drawn up containing their several proportions, [Iosh. 18. and 19. chapters] and so after the seven Nations of the Canaanits were destroyed, the distribution of their lands among the Israelites followed, and was compleately finished.

In the year after the Election of the Fathers, much about 450. [Acts 13. 17, 19, 20.] for from the birth of the promised seed Isaac, to this time, are reckoned, 452. years: and from the rejection of Ishmael, 447. but between both, we may count, 450. years.

d. 2560 Out of the land, as well on this, as on that side Jordan, were set apart, 48 Cities for the inheritance of the Levites: six whereof were made Cities of Refuge; and Sanctuaries were therein made, unto which those who committed not wholy wilful murder, might flie for protection, [Iosh. 20. and 21.] and so the Israelites now possessed the land promised to their fathers: God giving them rest and peace round about, according to all that he had promised to their fathers by an oath, [Iosh. 21. 43, 44.] whereupon the companies of the Rubenites, Gadites, and halfe Tribe of Manasses, which came over Jordan to help their brethren in this atchievement; God having now fully setled them there, took their leave of Joshua, and returned to their possessions, which Moses had given them, on the other side Jordan, [Iosh. 22. 4. with chap. 1. 14, 15. and Numb. 32. 21, 22.] 3270. 1444.

But when in their return homeward, they were come unto Gilead at the passage of Jordan, in the borders of the land of Canaan, they had there built a great Altar: the other Tribes supposing thereby that they intended a separation, and to revolt from them, they resolved to make war upon them; yet sending Phineas, the son of Eleazar, the High Priest, with ten other Princes of the people, to know the reason of their so doing; and understanding, that the Altar was not built to offer sacrifice thereon, but onely testifie the communion and fellowship which they had with the rest of the Tribes of Israel, they changed their purposes, and laid down their armes, [Iosh. 22.]

2561. Joshua built the city of Timnah-Sera, in mount Ephraim, in which he dwelt many years, after that God had given Rest to Israel; and having lived 110. years (which was the age of Joseph, mentioned in the end of Genesis) he there died, and was buried, [Iosh. 23. 1. Iosh. 24. 29, 30.] 3271 1443

2591. d. When as in the times of Anarchie or mis-rule, which followed after the decease of Joshua and the Elders, who out-lived him, and who being young men, when they came out of Egypt, could well observe and remember the wonders which God had wrought for Israel: every man now doing what seemed him good in his own eyes, all those disorders were committed, which are reported in the five last chapters of the book of Judges; to wit, the Idolatry of Micah, and the children of Dan, and the war of the Benjamites, and the cause thereof. And there succeeded a generation of men which forgat God, and mingled themselves with the Canaanites by marriage, and worshipped their Idols. And God hereby provoked to wrath, gave them up into the hands of Cushan, King of Mesopotamia; which first calamity of theirs, held them eight years onely, [Judg. 2. 7. and Judg. 3. 6, 7, 8.] 3301. 1413.

2609 2608. In this year was kept the first Jubilie, in the land of Canaan. 3319 1395 1396.

a. 2658 2657 Was kept the second Jubilie. 3368 1346

a 2661. d. After the decease of Othoniel, the Israelites, falling again to sin against God, were again by him given over into the hands of Eglon, King of Moab; who joyning with the Ammonites 3371. 1343.

moabites, and Amalekites, overthrew the Israelites; and took Jericho, and this second oppression of theirs continued, for the space of eighteen years, [Judg.3.12,13,14.]

2679. b. Then Ehud, the son of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin (which was but a little before, almost wholly destroyed) was raised up by God for an avenger of his people: for feigning a message to Eglon, he ran him into the belly with his dagger, and left him dead in his own dineing room, and then getting cunningly away, he gathered all Israel into a body, in Mount Ephraim, and slew ten thousand of the most valiant men of Moab; and the land had rest 40 years; after the former rest, and deliverance gotten them by Othoniel, [Judg. 3.15,30.] 3389. 1325.

After him also Shamgar, the son of Anath, slew 600 Philistines with an Ox-goade; and he also avenged Israel, ib. v. ult.

2682. Belus the Assyrian reigned in Babylon, after the Arabians 55 years, saith Iul. Africanus. 3392. 1322.

2699. d. The Israelites, after the death of Ehud, returning to their old sinne, were given up by God into the hand of Jabink of Canaan: who reigned in Hazor, and had 900 chariots of Iron: and this third thraldom of theirs continued 20 years, [Judg. 4. 1,2,3.] 3409. 1305.

2707. Was the 3 Jubile. 3417. 1297.

2737. Ninus the son of Belus founded the Empire of the Assyrians; which continued in Asia by the space of 520 years, as Herod. in his first book, cap. 95. affirmeth: whom Appian. Alexandr. in the beginning of his work followeth. But Dionysius Halicarnassus, a most diligent searcher into all such matters, in his first book of Antiquities, saith, that they had a very small part of Asia, under their command; yet Diodorus Siculus in his Bibliotheca, reports that Ninus, confederating with Arieus King of Arabia, possessed all Asia, having India and Bactria, by the space of seventeen years, and that at length, he took in the Bactrians also with their king Zoroastres: of whom Justin also; out of Trogus Pompeius, thus writeth, lib. 1. Ninus, having conquered his next neighbours, joyned their forces to his own, and thereby went on still the stronger to the conquest of the next, and every last victory was a step to another, and by this means, he subdued all the people, of the east. His last war was with Zoroastres King of Bactria, who is said to have been the first that found out the art magick, and to have most diligently looked into the nature of the world, and motion of the stars: him Ninus slew; and presently after died himself. Julius Africanus and Eusebius say, that he reigned 52 years. 3447. 1267.

2752. d. The Israelites sinning again, are delivered into the hands of the Midianites, which fourth thraldom of theirs, lasted 7 years, [Iudg.6.1.] 3462. 1252.

2755. a. Was the 4 Jubile. 3466. 1248.

The Israelites falling into this fourth thraldom, cryed unto God for help, and were reproved by a prophet. Then was Gideon of Manasses, son of Joash the Abiezrite stirred up by an Angel sent from God, to deliver them. And first by command from God, he overturned the Altar of Baal, and burnt his grove: whereupon, when strife arose between him and the people, he was called Ierub-baal, and Ierub-besheth, [2 Sam.11.21.] He out of 32 thousand men, which came unto him, chose onely (God so commanding) 300. but with them, and their trumpets, pitchers and torches in them, he so affrighted the Midianites, that he put to flight all their host; whom the Ephramites afterwards pursuing, slew their Princes, Oreb and Zeeb. Gedeon then, having first pacified the Ephramites, who complained that they were not called to the battle at first, passed the river Jordan, and defeated the remainder of the Midianitish armie: he chastised also the men of Succoth and Penuel, who had refused him victual in his journey, and slew two Kings of the Moabites, Zeba and Zalmunna. After which great victories attained, when the Israelites offered to settle the kingdom upon him, and his posterity, he refused it: but receiving their golden earings, he made thereof, an Ephod, whereof they took afterward an occasion to fall into Idolatry, and so the Midanites being vanquished, the land had rest 40 years, after the former rest restored to them by Debora and Barak [Iudg. 4.8.28.]

2768. d. So soon as Gedeon was dead, the Israelites falling back to Idolatrie, worshipped Baal-Berith for their god, [Iudg. 58.33.] and Abimelech the son of Gedeon, (begotten upon a woman of Sichem, his Concubine) purposing to get to himself the kingdom, which his father had refused, slew seventie of his Brothers, all upon one stone, [Iudg. 9. 15, 18, 24. 56.] 3478. 1236.

When

2769. a. When Abimelech, by the help of the Sichemites had got to be made king, Jotham the youngest son of Gedeon, who onely escaped Abimelech's clutches, from the top of the mount Gerizim, expostulated with them in the wrong they had done to his fathers house: and by way of a parable, foretold them of their ruine, that would ensue thereon: which done, he forthwith fled, and dwelt quietly in Beerith, [Judg. 9.] 3479 1235

2771. d When Abimelech had now reigned over the Israelites three years; Gaal, a man of Sichem, made a conspiracy against him; which being discovered to him by Zebul, the city of Sichem was utterly destroyed, and sowed with salt, the inhabitants all put to the sword, and the temple of their god Beerith burnt with fire. And from thence Abimelech, going to besiege Thebez, he was there knockt on the head, with a piece of a milstone, cast upon him by a woman, and then kild out right, by his own Armour-bearer, [Judg. 9. 50, 54. with 2 Sam. 11.21.] 3481. 1233.

2772. a. After Abimelech, Tolah, the son of Puar, of the tribe of Issacar, judged Israel 23 years, [Judg. 10. 12.] 3482 1232

2781. Argon, the son of Ninus, after the Atyadans first reigned in Sardis: whose posterity held the kingdom of Lydia, by the space of 505 years, two and twenty generations, the son ever succeding the father in his throne: down to Candaules the son of Myrsus, Herod. lib. 1. c. 7. 3491. 1223.

2789. Semiramis, the daughter of Derces, wife, first of Menon, afterward of Ninus, reigned over all Asia, save onley India, and lived sixty two years, whereof she reigned forty two, as Diodorus Siculus reports in the second book of his Bibliothcea: out of Ctesias Cnidius: where out of the same Ctesias, he setteth out at large, her noble Acts, especially against Strabrobates King of Indea: though Megasthenes, who writes expressely of the Indian affairs, as we find in Strabo, lib. 15. and in Arrianus, in his book, De Indicis saith, that she dyed before she ever came into India. Herod. lib. 1, cap. 184. reporteth, that she cast up huge works round about Babylon; whereas formerly the river (Euphrates) was wont to overflow all the lower parts thereof: and Justin also, speaking of her, lib. 10. out of Trogus Pompeius, speaketh in this wise. This Semiramis, built Babylon, and walled it round with bricks: laying the stones with brimstone, instead of sand; which brimstone riseth naturally out of the earth, every where in those parts. This Queen did many other very memorable acts: for not content to keep what her husband had got, she added also, Ethiopia to her dominions, she also made war upon India; which never any set foot in besides her self; and Alexander the great. Where yet we must note, that besides these two, Dionysius also, al. Bacchus, is reported by all other writers, to have conquered India; as for that tale which goes of her enclosing of Babylon, with a wall of brick, it is indeed generally so said, when in truth it was the work of Nebucadnezar, and his daughter in law, Nitocris many ages after. But for that lie of her first building of Babylon, reported by Diodorus and Trogus, as also by Strabo, in his second and sixteenth books of his Geography, it is evidently refuted, not onely by the sacred History of the book of [Gen. c. 11.] but also out of Eupolemus, who in his book, περὶ Ἰουδαίων Ἀσσυρίας, in Eusebius, lib. 9. Preparat. Evangel. saith, that it was first built by those, which escaped the deluge; and out of Ettanius, mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus, in his book, de Urbibus, in the word Babylon: and Eustatius in Dionys. Perieg. p. 126. where he notes, that Babylon was built 1002 years before Semyramis was borne; who if he had said 1022 years, (as perhaps he did) had not much varied from the Babylonish Calendar or account, sent from thence by Calisthenes, (which I mentioned before) out of Porphyrie, upon the year of the world, 1770. The same Porphyrie also, lib. 4. cont. Christianos, cited by Eusebius. lib. 1. Prepar. Evangel. speaking of one Sancuniathon Berution, a most ancient writer, of the first origin, or beginning of the Phenicians, saith, that he took his argument or matter from Hierombal (which comes very near to the name of Jerubbaal, of whom I spake before, to the year of the world 2759) a Priest of Ἰευὼ of Jevo, al. Jehova, the God of the Jews, which History of his was dedicated to Abibalus, King of ths Berutians, and he sayes further, that this Saucuniathon, lived in the dayes of Semyranis, Queen of the Assyrians; ἢ καὶ πρὸ τῶν Ἰλιακῶν ἢ κατ' αὐτοὺς χρόνους γενέσθαι ἀναγέγραπται, (i. e.) who is said to have been before the Troian wars, or about that very time: which very well agreeth with my account: which, allowing her to have out-lived the destruction of Troy eleven years, shews, that she was in her prime both before, and at the time of the war at Troy. 3489 1215

2790. a. Eli, the Priest was borne, for he dyed at the age of 98 years, [1 Sam. 14. 15.] in the year of the world, 2888. 3490 1214

2794. a. When Tola was dead, and buried at Shamir, in mount Ephraim, there succeeded after him, Jair a Gileadite, of the tribe of Manasses, beyond Jordan, who judged Israel, 22 years, [Judges 10. 1, 2, 3.] and was descended of that Jair, who having taken the cities of Argob, called them after his own name, Havoth-Jair, [Numb. 32. 41. Deut. 3. 14] after whose example, the thirty sons of this second Jair; (who, to difference him from the former, [1 Sam. 12. 11. and 1 Chron. 7. 17.] seemeth to have been surnamed Bedan; called likewise the 30 cities, which they possessed by the name of Havoth-Jair, [Judg. 10. 4.] 3504. 1210.

2799 a. The Israelites, forsaking the true God, and falling to worship the gods of several nations, were given up into the hands of the Philistines, and of the Ammonites, which fifth thraldom of theirs, lasted 18 years, [Judg. 10. 8.] ending with the victory, which was gotten over the Ammonites, in the beginning of Jephthaes ruling over the Israelites.

He, when he had tryed all fair means with the Ammonites, and could do no good with them, made war upon them, and subdued them. But returning from the battle, vowed his daughter unawares to be offered in sacrifice to God, and put to the sword 42000 Ephramites, who had behaved themselves somewhat insolently against him, and judged Israel six years, [Judg. 11. and 12. 6, 7.]

Her son and successor in the kingdom, Ninus or Ninyas, resting content with the Empire, which his parents had gotten, laid aside all cares of military affairs, and, as if he had changed sexes with his mother, seldom came in company, or sight of men; spent his age in the company of women and Eunuchs, Justin. lib. 1. cap. 2. out of Trogus, *Diodor. 2868. Sampson again in harvest-time, went to present his wife with a kid, at his fathers house; 3578. 1136.
c. but found that she was otherwise disposed of, and given away to another man in marriage, whereof he resolved to be revenged: and catching three hundred Foxes, and tying fire-brands to their tailes, turned them all going into the Philistines corne-fields, and vine-yards, and olive-gardens, and set them all on fire: whereat the Philistines being moved to wrath, took Sampson's wife, and father in law, and consumed them with fire. In revenge whereof, Sampson slew a great multitude of them, and sate down upon the rock of Etam: from whence being taken by three thousand of the Jews, and by them delivered into the hands of the Philistines, he slew of them a thousand men with the jaw-bone of an asse. In which place called Lechi from that jaw-bone, God at the prayer of Sampson, opened a hole in the earth, and made it a Fountain (called Enhaccore, (i.) the Fountain of him which called upon God;) with the water whereof, he refreshed himself when he was thirsty, and ready to faint, [Judg. 15.]

2888. The Israelites (taking courage, as it seemeth, by this great losse of the Philistines,)
a. gathered together and pitched near unto Eben-Eser (for so it was called by the Prophet Samuel, when twenty years after this time, the Philistines were by him overthrown in the the very self same place) [1 Sam. 7. 12.] and there the Israelites lost 4000. men. And when they had sent for the Ark of the Covenant from Shiloh to be brought into the Camp; the Philistines seeing that now all lay at stake, upon that battel; encouraged one another to play the men that day, least (said they) we be forced hereafter to live in thraldom, under the Hebrews, as they hitherto have done under us. And so falling on, they slew in that second battel, 30 thousand of the Israelites. The Ark of God was taken by them, Hophni and Phineas, Priests, the sons of Eli, were there slain; of all which, when tydings came to Eli, with the very fright thereof amazed, he fell off from his chair backward, and brake his neck: his daughter in law also, the wife of his son Phineas, hearing thereof, fell in travel of the child she went with; and being delivered of a son, called Ichabod, gave up the ghost, [1 Sam. 4.] But the Philistines having gotten the Ark into their hands, carried it to Azotus, and placed it in the Temple of their god Dagon.

But when Dagon had been found two several times fallen groveling before it upon the ground, and the inhabitants of the place, partly died of the plague, and partly were struck with the filthy emerauds in their secret parts, [Psal. 78. 66.] they removed it from thence, to the Gittites first, and afterward to the Ekronites: But when the same plagues or judgements followed, where ever it went; after seven moneths space, by the advice of their Priests, the Philistines, they sent home the Ark again with presents, and gifts, into the land of the Israelites; where the men of Beth-Shemish, in the time of wheat-harvest, (which was toward our Whitsontide, and about the beginning of the third moneth) who would needs be peeping into the Ark, were striken, and perished, to the number of fifty thousand and seventy souls, [1 Sam. 5. and chap. 6. 1, 13, 19.] From thence therefore the Ark was removed, and carried to the house of Aminadab in Gibeah, al. the Hill of the city of Kirioth-jarin, [1 Sam. 7. 1, 2. 2 Sam. 6. 3, 4.] which standing in the Tribe of Juda, was called also Baala, and Kiriath-Baal, [1 Chron. 13. 6. Josh. 5. 9. 60.] yet all this while the Tabernacle, and the Worship of God therein used, continued still in Shiloh of the Tribe of Ephraim, [Judg. 18. 31. with 1 Sam. 14. 3.]

2908. For twenty years togeher after the Ark came to Kiriath-Jearim, [1 Sam. 7. 2.] the 3618. 1096.
c. Israelites were grievously oppressed by the Philistines; but being at length perswaded by Samuel, they returned to the Lord; and having first abandoned all their Idols, came together at Mispah: where they are said to have drawn water, (i.) to have drawn teares from the bottom of their hearts, and to have poured them out before the Lord, [verse 6.] using withal, perhaps, some external effusion or powring forth of water, to represent and signifie their inward repentance and mourning, for their sins: as may be gathered [2 Sam. 14. 14.] which yet some will rather have to be understood of the Repentants themselves, out of [Gen. 35. 2. and out of Exod. 19. 14.] But upon this conversion of theirs; God by thunder from heaven immediately delivered the people of the Israelites from the invasion of the Philistines, [1 Sam. 7. 10. compared with Josh. 10. 10, 11.] with which terrible thunder from God, the Philistines being affrighted, quitted all the cities of the the Israelites, which formerly they held, [1 Sam. 7. 14.] leaving certain small garrisons, and that, in some few places onely, [1 Sam. 10. 5.] and came no more to invade their borders; because they saw that the hand of the Lord was against them all the dayes of Samuel, [1 Sam. 7. 12.] to wit, till Saul came to be King: under whom, they returned again, and grievously oppressed Israel, as we shall see anon. Meane while, Samuel, being now grown old, and desirous to take his ease, took for his Assistants, his two sons; that they might judge the people at Beersheba, who yet walked not in their fathers wayes; but for rewards and bribes perverted judgement, [1 Sam. 8. 1, 2, 3.] But, that he put not off the whole office of Judicature to his sons, is manifest out of, [chap. 7. 15, 16, 17.] for there it appears, that he continued his custom of judging the people by himself to the very last.

2909. 6. Now after that, when not onely his sons, but King Saul himself, also came to the government of things, the Israelites began to make light of the good old man; which troubled him, and offended God, [1 Sam. 8. 6, 8.] grounding their dislike, upon the ill carriage and behaviour of his sons; who at their very first enterance into the government, (at what time Rulers, which are none of the best, yet use commonly to shew a little moderation) brake out into all excesse, which the people greedily laid hold on, and desired a new form of government, and to have a King, as other Nations had [chap. 8. 4, 5.] of which Innovation, there was yet another, and in truth, a more urgent cause: which was, that whereas the Philistines kept still some footing, and garrisons in their land: the same also went, that Naash, King of the Ammonites made great levies of men, and preparations for war against them; which fear sinking deep into them, they resolved to relie no longer, neither upon Samuels wisdom, nor yet upon the power or providence of God, who yet had hitherto been their King and Avenger, of which they had so late an experiment, in sending the Philistines packing out of their coasts: but cast off both, and desired to have a King, [1 Sam. 12. 12, 17, 19.] whereupon God gave them a King in his wrath, [Hos. 13. 10, 11.] to wit, Saul, the son of Kish, of the Tribe of Benjamin, by the space of fourty years, [Acts 13. 21.] of which age, when his son Ishbosheth who succeeded him in the Kingdom, is said to have been, [2 Sam. 2. 11.] it is manifest, that he was then also born into the World. Saul therefore was first anointed privately, and afterward publickly, and before all the people, made and proclaimed King at Mispa, by Samuel, who from the death of Eli, to this time, had judged Israel one and twenty years, 1 Sam. 10. 1, 24, 25.] And not long after, as appeares, [chap: 12. 12. 16.] to wit, about one moneth, (as the Septuagint, and Iosephus, lib. 6. Antiquit. expressely have it) Jabesh Gilead was besieged by Naash King of the Ammonites; and the siege was raised by Saul, who there put the Ammonites to flight: whereupon all the whole Congregation of Israel coming together at Gilgal, Saul was there again made and proclaimed King, [chap. 10. 14, 15.] Samuel meane while protesting of his sincerity in the execution of his place and function, and complaining of the wrong that had been done him, and terrifying the people on the one side with the raine and thunder which fell upon them in the time of wheat-harvest, and recomforting them on the other, with the promises of Gods mercies, [chap. 12. v. 17.] from whence it appeareth, that all this fell out, about our Whitsontide, or feast of Pentecost, and beginning of the third moneth; one and twenty years after the bringing again of the Ark out of the country of the Philistines, at the very self same season of the year, [1 Sam. 6. 13.] from all which, as we gather, that full twenty years passed between the bringing back of the Ark, and the subdueing of the Philistines out of the, [seventh chap.v. 2, 13.] so that there passed one whole year, between the ridding of the Philistines out of the land of Israel, and the declaring of Saul to be King, we gather out of those words of the thirteneth chapter, first verse; Filius anni erat Saul, cum regnaret ipse, & duobus annis regnavit super Israelem (i.) Saul was the son of one year when he reigned; and reigned two years over Israel. Of which word, there can be no fitter sense rendered, than this; that after the Philistines were subdued by Samuel, there had passed one year, when Saul began to reigne: and that then he reigned two year free from the subjection of the Philistines. | 3619. | 1095.

2911. 6. For shortly after, Saul was put from the Kingdom again by the Philistines, and the Israelites again grievously enthraled by them: Which yoke being again shaken off, Saul is said to have gotten the Kingdom: that is, to have recovered it again, out of the Philistines hands, [1 Sam. 14. 47.] Now that this thraldom cotinued many years upon them, appeareth by this: that whereas it began eight years before David was borne, yet before it ended, Samuel prophesied and foretold of his succeeding after Saul in the Kingdom. The Lord hath sought him a man according to his own heart, and God hath commanded him to be Ruler over his people, [1 Sam. 13. 14.] For the Philistines, to put them out of all possibility of any more rebelling against them, for want of armes, had taken from them all kind of smithes: so that when afterward, notwithstanding they did rise and came to fight; none of the people, but onely Saul and Jonathan his son, had either sword or speare to bring into the field against them, [1 Sam. 13. 19, 22.] | 3621. | 1093.

2941. God having now rejected Saul, and debarred his race and family from succeeding 3651. 1063.
c. in the Kingdom, sent Samuel, after his long mourning for Saul, to Bethlehem, there to anoint David to be King, fourty years before the rebellion of Absolom, [1 Sam. 16. 1. with 2 Sam. 15. 7.] who being, A lovely keeper of a lovely flock, was called from keeping his fathers sheep, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] and preferred before his elder brethren; and being anointed in their presence, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] incurred their envy, [chap. 17. 28.] no lesse than Joseph did of his brethren: and at last, was set over the Tribe of Judah, at the same age that Ioseph was made Ruler over all Egypt, [Gen. 41. 46.] Meane while, from the very day of his anointing, the Spirit of God came upon him; to wit, the spirit of courage and wisdom, [1 Sam. 18. 5, 13. 2 Sam. 5. 2.] In both which respects, even while Saul lived, he was made General over all Israel, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.] and withal grew a great Warriour, to fight the Lords battels, [1 Sam. 25. 28.] and besides was a Prophet, and made the sweet Singer of Israel; as one, who by his divine Psalms should teach and instruct the people of God to the end of the world, [Acts 2. 30. 2 Sam. 23. 1, 2.]

Mephibosheth, who was also called Meribbaal, [1 Chron. 8. 34. and 9. 40.] the son of Ionathan was borne five years before the death of his father, [2 Sam. 4. 4.]

2944. David fearing he might at last fall into Sauls hands, fled to Gath, (whither he had 3654. 1060.
c. also formerly retired himself, 1 Sam. 21. 10.) unto King Achish, carrying with him, six hundred men: and having obtained of him the town of Ziglag to dwell in, he continued one year and four moneths in the land of the Philistines: from whence, making often inroads upon the Geshurites, and Gersites, and the Amalekites, he put to sword all, both men and women, not leaving one alive to carry news thereof to King Achish, of what he had there done, [1 Sam. 27. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, &c.]

Whiles David was at Ziglag, there repaired to him, of the kindred of Saul, many valiant men of the Tribe of Benjamin, as also of the Tribe of Gad, sundry principal souldiers, which came over Iordan to him in the first moneth, at what time it overflowed all his banks, with divers other Captains and Commanders of the Tribes of Benjamin and Iuda [1 Chron. 12. 1, 15, 18.]

Saul seeing the Army of the Philistines, fell into a fear, and sought counsell from the Lord: But receiving no answer from him, neither by dream, neither yet by Urim, nor by his Prophets: leaving him, he went to Endor by night, to consult with a Witch there: where by a vision of Samuel raised by her, he received that dreadful doome. God shall deliver Israel, together with thy self, into the hands of the Philistines: and to morrow, thou and thy children shall be with me, [1 Sam. 28. 5, 6, 19. and 1 Chron. 10. 13, 14.]

While David was away upon his march, the Amalekites took Ziglag; plundred it, and burnt it: carrying away with them among the rest, Davids two Wives, Ahinoam of Iezrael, and Abigal, the relict of Nabal, [1 Sam. 30.]

Saul returning the same night from the Witch, the Israelites removed to the Fountain of Iezrael, and the Philistines to Aphek: where the Princes of the Philistines growing jealous of David, he and his company early the next morning, left their army, and returned towards Ziglag; and the Philistines in this interim, marched up to Iezrael, to fight with the Israelites, [1 Sam. 28. 25. and 29. 1, 3, 10, 11.] whence it appears, that Saul and his sons, were not slain the next day after his communication with the apparition of Samuel (for all that day David was in the army of the Philistines) but some while after his departure from them.

When David was upon his return to Ziglag, there came unto him seven Colonels of the Manassites, [1 Chron. 12. 20, 21.] where arriving the third day after, and finding the tovvn plundred and consumed vvith fire; he left tvvo hundred of his Company, vvhich vvere tired in the march, at the brook Bezor; and vvith the other four hundred he followed after the Amalekites, and overtaking them, slew them, from the twilight of the first day, to the evening of the next; and having recovered all that was lost, returned home with joy, [1 Sam. 30.]

The Host of Israel being wholy routed, the three sons of Saul, Jonathan, Aminidab, and Milchishua, were there also slain; Saul, and the Squire of his body fell upon their own swords. The day following, the Philistines having taken off the head of Saul, hung up his armour in the temple of their Idol Ashtaroth; and the bodies of him, and his three sons, upon the walls of Bethshemish: But the men of Jabesh Gilead, remembring the favour which Saul at the entrance of his reigne had done unto them, stole away their bodies from thence and burnt them; and buried their bones under an oak at Jabesh, and kept a fast for them seven dayes long, [1 Samuel 31. verse 1. 1 Chron. 10.]

Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, who was now slaine, when his nurse, upon the tydings thereof, fled away with him, in a great fright and haste, fell out of her armes, and became lame of his feet ever after, [2 Sam. 4. 4.]

David returning from the slaughter of the Amalekites, three dayes after heard of the defeat of the Army of the Israelites, by a boy of the Amalekites, who was in the fight: and brought Sauls Crown, and the Bracelet of his arme (both which he had taken off from Sauls body,) unto him, [2 Sam. 1. 1.] From which so late tydings, though brought with all speed, coming unto David, it is gathered, that the defeat in Gilboa, happened some number of dayes after Davids leaving the Army of the Philistines. Nor may any man marvel, that the battel was so long after delayed, when we read, that the Syrians also long after that, encamping against the Israelites at the same place of Aphek, sate there seven dayes, and upon the seventh, joyned battel with them, [1 Reg. 20. 26, 29.]

David having put to death the Amalekite who professed that he had slain Saul, lamented the death of Saul and Jonathan, and of the people of God in a funeral Song, [2 Sam. 1.] And when the companies of the Israelites Army came daily flocking to him, [1 Chron. 12. 22.] asking counsel first of God, he went up to Hebron with those which were about him and their families: where being anointed King by the men of his own Tribe, when he was now thirty years of age; he reigned over Judah by the space of seven years and six moneths, [2 Sam. 2. 1, 3, 4, 11. and chap. 5. 4, 5.]

Abner, who was formerly the chief of Sauls gendarmery, carrying Ishbosheth Sauls son to Mahanaem, there made him King over the rest of Israel; who being then fourty years old, is said to have reigned two years over Israel, [2 Sam. 2. 8, 9, 10.] to wit, quietly, and without any quarrel with the house of David: as also his fathers two years reigne is meant of his reigne free and uncumbred by the Philistines; as was said before, [1 Sam. 13. 1.]

David sent messengers to the men of Jabesh Gilead, thanking them for the kindnesse which they had shewed to their Lord and Master Saul; and to let them know, that the kingdom of Juda was settled upon him, [2 Sam. 2. 5, 6, 7.] wherein the better to strengthen himself, he contracted affinity with Tolmai, King of Geshur, and married his daughter Maacah: which bare unto him, Absalom and Thamar, [2 Sam. 3. 3. and 13. 1.]

2951. c. After the two years quiet reigne of Ishbosheth over Israel, there grew a long war between his partakers, and the partakers of David; Joab the son of Zervia, Davids sisters son, bearing up the one side, and Abner the other: and sundry battels and skirmishes passed between them; yet so, as that Davids party waxed every day stronger and stronger, and the other weaker and weaker, [2 Sam. 2. 26. and chap. 3. 1.] 3661. 1053.

2956. d. Abner being used with some disgrace by Ishbosheth, revolted from him, and fell over to David: and dealt with the chief Men and Heads of Israel, to transfer the whole kingdom unto David, and this, in the hearing of the Benjaminites, [1 Sam. 25. 44. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.] 3666. 1048.

Michal Davids wife, whom her father Saul after David was fled, had given in marriage unto Phaltiel; upon Davids demand, was sent back to him by Ishbosheth, [1 Sam. 25. 44. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.]

Abner coming with a traine of twenty men unto David, was by him received and feasted; and returning from him in peace, was upon the way treacherously slaine by Joab; and with great mourning and lamentation made over him by David, was buried at Hebron, [2 Sam. 2.]

When all Israel was troubled at the death of Abner, Bahana and Recab, of the Tribe of Benjamin, murdered their Lord and Master Ishbosheth, as he lay resting himself on his bed in the heat of the day: and bringing his head to David, were for their pains by him put to death, [2 Sam. 4.]

The Captains and Elders of all the Tribes coming to Hebron, made David now a third time, an anointed King over all Israel, [1 Chron. 12. from verse 23. to the end of that chapter, with chap. 11. 1, 2, 3. and 2 Sam. 5. 1, 2, 3.]

2957. a. David with all Israel marched to Jerusalem against the Jebusites; and there took the Fort of Sion, by the special service of Joab; and from thence, that was called the City of David, no lesse than Bethlehem, where he was borne. And making Jerusalem the seat of his kingdom, reigned there over all Israel, the terme of 33. years, [2 Sam. 5. 5, 6, 7, 9. 1 Chron. 11. 4, 5, 6, 7.] 3667 1047

2957 The Philistins hearing that David was, by the general consent of the tribes, made King 3667. 1047 ~~1497.~~

over all Israel, led their army twice against him to the valley of the Raphaeans: and were twice beaten by him, [2 Sam. 5. 1 Chron. 14.] where when David, in the time of harvest, desired a draught of water, out of the well at Bethlehem; and three most valiant Captains of his armie, to pleasure him, brake through the host of the enemy to fetch it, and brought it to him, he would not drink it, [2 Sam. 23. 13. 1 Chron. 11. 15.]

2958. b. David built the City of Sion round about, as well the fortification, as the houses within, and Joab repaired the rest of the City, [2 Sam. 5. 9. 1 Chron. 11. 8.] 3668. 1046.

Hiram sent messengers to David, and cedar wood, and Carpenters and Masons, who built him his house, [2 Sam. 5. 11. 1 Chron. 14. 1.]

2959. The Arke of the Covenant, which in the first Sabbatical year, was brought from Gilgal to Siloh, was this year, being also a sabbatical year, brought from Kiriath-jearim (whither it was removed from Shiloh 70 years before) out of the house of Abinadab, thirty thousand choice men out of all Israel, attending on it, and singing the 68 Psalm, as may probably be collected out of the first verse thereof, because taken out of that forme of praier which was appointed by Moses, to be used and sung at every removal of the Arke, [Numb. 10. 35.] and was carried first to the house Obed-Edom; and after three months, removed into the City of David, or the fort of Sion, David himself rejoycing before it, and singing that of [Psalm. 132. 8.] which Solomon his son in the year of Jubilie next following, when he brought the Arke into the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple, repeated, viz. Arise O Lord into thy resting place, thou and the Arke of thy strength: with the rest there found, concerning the same Ark, [v. 60.] Behold we (i. e. the men of Bethlem dwelling thereby) have heard of it at Ephrata (our own Country) and found it in the fields of Jair, or the wood; i. e. In the hill of Kiriath-jearim, for that signifies a City, bordering upon woods, and again, [v. 13, 14.] The Lord hath chosen Sion, for an habitation for himself; saying, This is my rest for ever here will I dwell, for I have a delight therein: whence it is, that the Arke is said There to have rested, [1 Chron. 6. 31.] being received into the new Tabernacle which David had prepared for it at Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 6. 17. 1 Chron. 16. 1. 2 Chron. 1. 4.] 3669. 1045.

For the Tabernacle of the Congregation built by Moses, with the brazen altar, whereon was offered the daily sacrifice, remained at Gibeon (which was likewise in the Tribe of Judah, and stayed no longer in Shilo, which was in the tribe of Ephraim) untill the Temple of Solomon was built, [1 Chron. 6. 32, 48, 49. 1 Chron. 16. 39, 40. and 21. 29, 16. 2 Chron. 1. 3, 5, 6. 1 Reg. 3. 2, 4.]

And so the Arke, being removed out of the Tribe of Joseph, of which Ephraim was a part, into the Tribe of Judah, Shilo from thence forth lay neglected, [Psal. 78. 63, 64. Ier. 7. 12, 14. and Ier. 26. 6.]

2960. d. David now dwelling in his house of cedar, which he had built, and living in a full and perfect peace, imparted unto Nathan the Prophet, the purpose he had of building a house for God: but was answered from God, that this was a work which should be done, not by him, because he was a man of blood, and trained up wholy in warlike affaires, but by his son Solomon a man of peace, which should be borne unto him, [2 Sam. 7. 1, 2, 11, 13. 1 Chr. 17. and c. 22. 8, 9, 10. and c. 24. 3, 6. and 2 Chron. 6. 8, 9. 1 Reg. 8. 18, 19.] Now the time which passed from hence forward, till the birth of Solomon, was all taken up, and spent in wars; wherein David subdued the Philistines, the Edomites, the Amalekites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Syrians, [2 Sam. 8. 3. 1 Chron. 18.] and the bounds of Israel stretched not only from Shicor in Egypt to Hamath, [1 Chron. 13. 5.] but even from thence to the river Euphrates, and even to the borders of Syria Zobea, [2 Sam. 9. 3.] which was the utmost bound of all that land, which had been formerly promised to the seed of Abraham, [Gen. 15. 18. with Deut. 11. 24. and Ios. 1. 3, 4.] and never possessed by any of them, save only by David, and his son Solomon, [1 Reg. 4. 21, 24. 2 Chron. 9. 28.] 3670. 1044.

At this time Hadad-ezer, al. Hadar-ezer (for ד and ר are with the Hebrews easily taken one for the other) the son of Rehob, was King of Syria Zobea, and to him was joyned Rezon the son of Eliod with his forces out of Syria of Damascus when he was ready to fight against David, not far from the river Euphrates. But David having first routed Hadad-ezers army, slew afterward, two and twenty thousand of the Syrians of Damascus, and put garrisons uppon all that countrey: But when Rezon saw that David prevailed, he fell off from Hadad-ezer, and commanded, himself in chief, over such forces as he had newly raised; and marching with them to Damascus, set up there a kingdome for himself, and his own posterity, who, we find, afterward proved very bitter enemies to Solomon, and the rest of the Kings of Israel, [2 Sam. 8. 5, 6. 1 Reg. 11. 23, 24, 25.] of this battel fought by David near unto the river Euphrates, Nicolaus Damascenus, in Josephus, (lib. 7. Antiq. c. 6. al. 5.) maketh mention, where he calleth this Rezon Adad; and addeth, that he left this name to descend to his successors to the tenth generation, as Ptolomy did to his in Egypt.

2967. a. After Naash King of the Ammonites, succeeded Hanun his son: who fowly abused such messengers, as David out of kindnesse had sent to comfort him over the death of his Father. 3677. 1038.

Against

2967. Against him therefore Joab, sent by David, went and overthrew a huge army of the Ammonites, and Syrians, whom the Ammonites had in pay: and so returned with victory to Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19] 3677. 1037.

2968. b. David passing over Jordan with his army, made a vast slaughter of the Syrians, led by Shobach, General of the army of Hadad-ezer, King of Syria Zobea: whereupon followed a peace between David and the petty Kings of Syria; so that they durst no more send aide to the Ammonites: but served him, [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.] 3678. 1036.

2969. b. At the end of this year, what time kings use to go forth to battle, Joab, going with the army against the Ammonites, besieged Rabba, the head City of Ammon: whiles David took his ease at Jerusalem, [2 Sam. 11. 1. 1 Chron. 20. 1.] and there defiled, by adultery, Bathsheba the wife of Uriah the Hittite, who was then in the army, and in consequence thereof, procured the husband to be slain by the hand of the Ammonites, [2 Sam. 11.] 3679. 1035.

2970. b. When the child so gotten in adultery, was born, David being convinced by Nathan the Prophet of his fault, repented him of his sin, and composed the 51 Psalm, for a memorial of it: yet the new born babe was taken away by death, [2 Sam. 12.] 3680. 1034.

2971. a. Bathsheba, being now his wife, bare David a son, unto whom, as to one who should prove a man of peace, God gave the name of Solomon, [1 Chron. 22. 9.] and as to one beloved of God, the name of Jedidia, [2 Sam. 12. 25.] 3681. 1033.

2972. c. Ammon, Davids eldest son, deflowred his sister Thamar, [2 Sam. 13.] 3682. 1032.

2974. c. Ammon, two years after that incestious rape of his, was slain by the setting on of his brother Absolom at the time of sheep-shearing, [2 Sam. 13. 23.] to wit, at the end of the spring, at the second math of grasse, which was wont to be mowed before corne harvest, a little after the middest of the first month: as Codomanus upon this place noteth, out of [Amos 7. 1. compared with Jos. 3. 15. and Jos. 4. 9. and Jos. 5. 10, 11, 12.] 3684. 1030.

But Absalom having done the deed, fled away to Geshur in Syria: where he continued 3 years with king Tolmay his grandfather by the mothers side, [2 Sam. 13. 37, 38. and 15. 8.]

2977. c. Absalom, after three years exile, returned to Jerusalem: his father being then pacified towards him by the speech of the woman of Tekoa, set on work by Joab, [2 Sam. 13. 38. and 14. 1, 23. ib.] 3687. 1027.

2979. Absalom, having set Joabs barly on fire, a little before harvest this year (for the year following was a sabbatical year, wherein there was no harvest in Judea) was by his means admitted to his fathers presence, whom he had not seen in two years after his return from exile, [2 Sam. 14. 28, 30, 33.] 3689. 1025.

2980. This sabattical year came between the burning of Joabs corn field, and the rebellion of Absalom against his father: in which this rebell son, having gotten chariots, and horses, and a guard of ruffians about him, insinuated himself into the favour of the people, and stole away their hearts from his father David, [2 Sam. 15. 1.] 3690. 1024.

2981. c. Fourty years after the anointing of David by Samuel, Absalom, following the advise of his chief counselor Architophel, got himself into possession of his fathers kingdome, between Easter and Whitsontide; as Codomanus gathers out of Barzillaie his furnishing of David (when he fled) with new fruits, and parched corne, [2 Sam. 17. 28.] 3691. 1023.

Against the practises of Absalom, and Architophel, David composed the 3, and 55 Psalmes: Shimei also, of the Tribe of Benjamin, railed upon David, as he fled, [2 Sam. 16.]

And Architophel seeing his counsel not followed by Absalom, went and hanged himself, [2 Sam. 17.]

Absalom, having lost twenty thousand men, fled, and a bough of a thick oake, catching hold of his long haire, he there hung between heaven and earth, and was thrust through and slain by Joab, [2 Sam. 18.]

After the victory thus gotten, David, by the men of Judah, and one half of the people of Israel, was brought home again; and the Israelites mutining, because they had not had a chief hand in that work, a new rebellion grew thereon: which yet was soon over, by throwing the head of Sheba the son of Bicri, over the walls to Joab, by the inhabitants of Abel, [2 Sam. 19. 20.]

2983. c. The harvest of this year failing, there began a famine, which afflicted the land three years, for the bloud of the Gibionites, shed by Saul and his family, [2 Sam. 21. 1, 2.] 3693. 1021.

2986. c. The famine still continuing, the Gibeonites, in the beginning of barley harvest, hung up two sons, and five grand-children of Sauls: whose bodies, Rispa, Sauls concubine, watched, and kept from being devoured by ravenous birds or beasts, till water dropped upon them from heaven, [2 Sam. 21. 8, 9, 10.] 3696. 1018.

David caused the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son to be removed out of Jabesh Gilead, together with the bones of the seven that were hanged, and to be buried at Zela, in the sepulchre of Kish the father of Saul, [2 Sam 21. 12, 13, 14.]

Many battels were fought with the Philistims and their Giants; in one whereof, David being now old, and fainting in the fight, was like to have been slaine by Ishibenod benod a Gyant, and hardlie escaped: and this was the last fight that ever David was in, in person, [2 Sam. 21. 1 Chron. 20.]

2987. d. David, what by the testation of Satan, what through his own ambition, would needs have the number of his people to be taken; and thereby kindled the wrath of God against the Israelites: The number therefore throughout all the tribes, (except the tribes of Levi, and Benjamin, [1 Chron. 21. 6. with chap. 27. 24.] of all the men upwards of twenty years old, [1 Chron. 27. 23.] was taken. Which numbring, being finished in nine moneths and twenty dayes, [2 Sam. 24. 8.] the choice, of famine, sword or Pestilence, was put unto him by Gad the prophet, [2 Sam. 2. 48.] which famine was to be of three years continuance, to wit, one after another then immediatly following, as [1 Chron. 21. 12.] or of seven years, as [2 Sam. 24. 13.] to wit, counting the three years of famine preceding, and this present sabbatical year, (which having no sowing, cannot repair the losses of the former years) for a fourth, as if it had been said. Three years of famine, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites, are allready past: after which there was a harvest indeed; but for want of seed, a very poor one, and no wayes able to supply the want of the two years following, which the intervening of the sabbatical year must needs draw with it; so that the famine must needs continue still upon the land, especially upon the poorer sort therein, and now to these by-past years of famine, God proposeth unto thee three years more of famine, to chuse, if thou wilt. And the way or reason of reconciling these two differing places, hath especially moved me in this passage, to refer this history of Davids numbering the people, unto this Sabbathical year. 3697 1017

Now of the three, David chose the plague; whereof there dyed in one day seventy thousand men: and when the Angel was about to destroy Jerusalem, God of his mercy bade him hold his hand; and withall, commanded David to offer whole burnt offerings, and peace-offerings in the threshing-floor of Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite, [2 Sam. 24.
2988. 1 Chron. 21.] 3698 1016

a. David fore-seeing, that the house of God should be built in that threshing-floore of Araunah, [1 Chron. 22. 1. with 2 Chron. 3. 1.] began presently to prepare materials necessary for so great a work, exhorting his Sonne Solomon, and all the Heads of Israel, to fall in hand with all their might, and to go thorough with it, [1 Chron. 22. 1, 2989 2, 3, 17, 18, 19.] 3698. 1016.

He also taking the number of the Levites, first from thirty, then from twenty years old and upwards, divided them into many ranks, and appointed to every of them their several offices and established a set forme, both of ecclesiastical, and also of civil government, in the fortieth year of his reign, [1 Chron. 23. 2, 27. and 24, 25, 26, 31.] to wit, in the beginning thereof, (i. e.) one year and an half before his death.

Rehoboam was born unto Solomon by Naaman, an Ammonitish woman; as being 40 one years old, when he began to reign, [1 Reg. 14. 21, 1 Chron. 12. 13.] for though Solomon called himself a little childe, [1 Reg. 3. 7.] and David his father said, he was a child, young and tender, [1 Chron. 22. 5. and 29. 1. yet in another place, he termeth him a man of wisdom, [1 Reg. 2. 9.] and this, before that great measure of knowledge and understanding was cast upon him over and above by God: which three things; tender years, a son born, and perfect wisdom, no man may wonder to find attributed to Solomon, at eighteen years of age, when he sees the very same to be spoken afterward of King Josiah, at his age of six-2990 2986. teen, [2 Chron. 34. 1, 2, 3. with chap. 36. 5.] 3699. 1015.

d. David being now seventy years of age, and broken with continual cares and wars, was grown so weak and feeble, that applying of warm cloaths, would hardly keep any heat in him: And therefore was there sought out Abishag, a young maiden, a Shunamite,
c. to keep him warm: and Adonias, seeing his father thus declining, by the counsaile and advice of Joab, and Abiathar, the High Priest made himself King: whereof, when David was advertized by Bathsheba, and Nathan, he presently caused his son Solomon to be anointed King by Zadock the Priest, and Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah, the son of Jehojada, in Gihon; which so soon as Adonias heard, he presently fled, and took sanctuary: and laying there hold on the horns of the altar, was pardoned by the grace and favour of Solomon, and set at liberty, [1 Reg. 1.]

David assembling all the Governours, Captains and Commanders of Israel, together with his sons and servants, exhorted them all to the fear and worship of God, and in special, Solomon his son to go in hand with the building of the temple: giving him in writing, the platform, or model, according to which it was to be contrived and built, and consigning into his hands gold and silver, by weight, for the making every vessel and implement for the use of the Temple [1 Chron. 28.] after which, what by his example, what by his exhortations, he prevailed so far, that every man, cast in gold and silver, and brasse, and iron, and stones, all in great abundance towards the building of Gods house. And then, thanks first rendred unto God, the next day after, they offered a thousand young bullocks, a thousand rams, and a thousand lambs, with the meat-offerings thereunto belonging: and for a conclusion, made Solomon King the second time anointing him for their Sovereign King, and Zadock, for the High Priest, [1 Chron. 29. 1, 23.]

David

David having given instructions to his son Solomon; departeth this life, [1 Reg. 2. 1, 10.]
2990 a. after he had reigned in Hebron seven years six moneths, and 33 years in Jerusalem, over all Israel, [2 Sam. 5. 5.] of which the fourty years, which the Scriptures attribute to his reign, we must take for the terme which he reigned, before he made Solomon king in his roome; and that he survived six moneths after: so that the years of Solomons reign, mentioned in the scripture, are to be reckoned from the first moneth, a full half year, before the decease of David.

b. Adonias, by the means, and intercession of Bathsheba, sueth to Solomon; to give him Abishag the Shunamite to wife, and was therefore as one aspiring to the kingdom, put to death. Abiather of the race of Eli, was put from the High Priesthood; and Zadock put in his room, who was descended from Phineas: as it was foretold by God, should come to passe, [1 Sam. 2. 33, 35.] and so the High Priesthood reverted from the family of Ithamar to the family of Eleazar, and there continued; Joab for fear fled to the Tabernacle, where, having hold on the hornes of the taltar, he was slain by Benajah the son of Jehojada, who was forthwith made captain of the host, in his room by the king. But Shimei, who had heretofore railed upon David, was confined onely to his house, yet with this condition, that if at any time, he passed over the brook Kedron, he should die the death, [1 Reg. 2.] 3700. 1014

Hadad the Edomite, hearing that Joab was dead, returned out of Egypt into his own country. Him God afterward, when Solomon began to follow after vanities, raised up an enemy unto him, [1 Reg. 11. 14, 21.]

2991. a. Pharaoh King of Egypt, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, and gave her Gezer, a city sometime belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, [Jos. 21. 21.] but which he had taken from the Cananites, putting all the inhabitants to the sword, [1 Reg. 9. 16.] and Solomon brought her into Sion, the palace of David, [1 Reg. 3. 1, 2. 2 Chron. 8. 11.]

c. Salomon offered a thousand whole burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the Tabernacle then was, where, when God appearing to him in his sleep, and bad him chose and ask what he would, and it should be given him; he chose, and asked wisdom to be given him: God therefore gave him wisdom from above; casting in all other gifts over and above: And of his wisdom, the first experiment was made, in deciding the controversie between the two women about the child, and that first gave him an opinion and reverence with the people, [1 Reg. 3.] 3701. 1013.

2992. a. Solomon being visited by messengers sent from Hyram, King of Tyre, desired further of him, to help him with timber, toward the building of the Temple: which Hyram, upon certain conditions, and consideration of paying for it, promised to doe, and did it, Solomon finding the work-men, over whom he had set pay-masters, and other officers to put on the work.

The fifth Age of the World.

c. IN the year 480. from the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the fourth year of the reign of King Solomon, on the second day of the second moneth, which was then called Ziu (of our May 21, being munday) the foundation of the temple was laid, [1 Reg. 6. 1, 37. 2 Chron. 3. 2.] 3702. 1012.

2993. b. Shimei, three years after he was commanded to keep him at Jerusalem, and not to go over the brook Kidron; returning from Gath, from whence he had fetcht back two run-away servants of his, was put to death by Solomons command, [1 Reg. 2. 39.] 3703. 1011.

3000. a. In the eleventh year of Solomons reign, in the eighth moneth, which was called Bul. the building of the temple was finished with all things belonging thereunto: having been seven years and an half in working, [1 Reg. 6. 38.] but the dedication of it was put off till the next year by reason of the Jubile. 3709. 1005.

3001. a. This was the ninth Jubile, opening the fourth Millenary of the world, wherein Solomon with great magnificence, celebrated the dedication of the temple. For all Israel being assembled together in the 7th month, called Ethanim, the Ark was brought out of Sion, into the Sanctum Sanctorum, and the Tabernacle and holy vessels, from Gibeon, into the treasury of the Temple; where when God had given a visible and wonderful token of his presence, Solomon being upon a scaffold made of brasse, and kneeling upon his knees, uttered a set prayer unto God, and afterward blessing the people, he offered twenty two thousand oxen, and 120 thousand sheep; and so having celebrated the feast of the dedication of the Altar seven dayes, (and the feast of Tabernacles other seven dayes, and the celebrity of the eighth day of Tabernacles being finished, at last, upon the three and twenty day of the seventh month, the people were dismissed every man to his home, [1 Reg. 8. 1, 2, 65, 66. 3710. 1004.

65, 66. 2 Chron. 5. 3, 4, 5. chap. 6. &c. chap. 7. 8, 9, 10.]

The eighth day of the seventh moneth, (to wit, 30 of our Octob. being friday, was the first of the seven dayes of the dedication; the tenth day, (with us, Novemb. 1. upon a Saturday) was the fast of expiation or atonement held, whereon (according to the Leviticall law, [chap. 25. 9.) the Jubile was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet.

The fifteenthday, (our November 6. being friday) was the feast of Tabernacles. The 22 (our Novemb. 13. being also friday) was the last of the feast of Tabernacles; which was alwayes very solemnly kept, [2 Chron. 7. 9. with Levit 23. 36. and John 7. 37.] and at the day following, (Novemb. 14. being our Saturday) when the sabbath was ended, the people departed home.

3012. c. Solomon, in the thirteenth year after the temple was built, made an end also of building his own house, having spent full twenty years upon both of them: whereof seven and a half upon the Temple, and thirteen or twelve and a half upon his own, [1 Reg. 7. 1. and 9. 10. ib. and 2 Chron. 8. 1.] 3722. 992.

After all which, Solomon offered unto Hiram King of Tyre 20 cities of Galilee, or Cabul, joyning upon the tribe of Asher, (which himself had purchased) in requital of those many good offices which Hiram had done him, toward the building of the temple; which when Hiram refused, he built them all anew himself, and planted colonies of the Israelites in them, [1 Reg. 9. 10. and 2 Chron. 8. 1, 2.]

When Solomon had finished both houses, and the wall of Jerusalem round about, then he removed his wife, the daughter of Pharaoh, out of the city and house of David, into a house, which himself had built, and prepared for her, [1 Reg. 3. 1. and chap. 7. 8. and chap. 9. 24. and 2 Chron. 8. 11.] He new built also Gezer, which Pharaoh the father, having taken from the Cananites, had given to Solomon, lying within the precincts of the tribe of Ephraim, [1 Reg. 9. 15, 16, 17.]

3026. c. Sesack; which others cal Sesonchis (according to our Egyptian Chronology) began to reign; unto whom Jeroboam the son of Nebat fled, and continued with him till after Solomon was dead, [1 Reg. 11. 40. and chap. 12. 2.] 3736. 978.

3029. c. Solomon, having forsaken his lusts and vanities, to which he was too intemperately addicted toward his later dayes, having testified his deep repentance for it, in his book called The Preacher, and having made his peace with God, [2 Chron 11. 17.] at last died; when he had reigned 40 years, [1 Reg. 11. 42. 2 Chron. 9. 30.] 3739. 975.

Rehoboam the son of Solomon, when all Israel met at Sichem to make him King, by a harsh answer made unto them, alienated the hearts of ten tribes from him, who presently sending into Eypt for Jeroboam the son of Nebat, made him King over them, and under his conduct, they fell of both from the house of David (killing Adoram, whom Rehoboam had sent unto them) and also from the true worship of God, [1 Reg. 12.] In memorial of which sad disaster, the Jews afterward, kept a solemn fast yearly, upon the 23 of the third moneth, called Sivan.

From this dismal rent made of that kingdom, Rehoboam reigned over Judah and Benjamin seventeen years, [1 Reg. 14. 21. 2 Chron. 12. 1, 2.] and Jeroboam over Israel, (i.e.) over the other ten tribes, by the space of 22 years. [1 Reg. 14. 20.]

Rehoboam returning to Jerusalem, levying men to the number of one hundred, and fourscore thousand men, and purposed to make war upon the ten tribes: but being admonished from God by the prophet Semajah, he gave it off, [1 Reg. 12.] though there followed continual wars between the two kings all their dayes, [1 Reg. 14, 13.

Jeroboam in the beginning of his reign, repaired Sichem, where he was chosen king by the people, and which had been destroyed by King Abimelech, 258 years before, and there dwelt, till going afterward over Jordan, he there built Penuel, [1 Reg, 12. 25. and at last, built Tirza, and made that the seat of his kingdom, [ib. chap. 14. 17.] But fearing lest his new-gotten subjects should happly revolt from him again, he diverted their thoughts from looking any more after Jerusalem, by a new devised form and fashion of religion, setting up two golden calves, the one at Bethel, the other at Dan, for the brain-sick people, to run a whoring after them, [1 Reg. 12.]

3032. d. Rehoboam, being once setled in his kingdom, forsook the Law of the Lord, and all Israel and Juda with him, [2 Chron. 12. 1.] For the Jews, who by their good example should have stirred up their brethren the Israelites to repentance, provoked the Lord with their own sins; wherein they offended beyond all that ever their forefathers had done. For they made also to themselves High-places, and Images, and Groves, upon every high hill, and under every green tree, doing according to all the abominations of the Gentiles, which the Lord had therefore cast out before them, [1 Reg. 14. 22, 23, 24.]

3033. c. In the 5 year of Rehoboam, Sesak, certain Prophet sent by God out of Iury, foretold what judgement one of King Davids linage, Iosias by name, should one day execute upon the Altar, and the Priests that served at it: which Prophesie he then and there confirmed, by signs and prodigies shewed upon that Altar then standing, and upon the King himself, [1 Reg. 13. 2. Reg. 23. 16, 17.] From which beginning of this Idolatrous worship, and publick manifestation of Gods judgement thereupon; we are to reckon the 390. years of the iniquity of Israel, spoken of in [Ezek. 4. 5.]

This Prophet being deceived by another Prophet of Bethel, who abused the name of God unto him: did contrary to the expresse commandment of God to himself delivered, eat meat at Bethel; and was therefore in his return homeward met with and slaine by a Lion: whereof when tydings came to the Prophet which had deceived him, he took up the body, and honourably enterred it, assuring his sons, that what had been foretold by that other Prophet, should undoubtedly come to passe, [1 Reg. 13. with 2 Reg 23. 17, 18.]

Jeroboam persisting in his revolt, cast off the Priests that were of the linage of Aaron and the Levites, and made Priests of the High places, men taken from among the common people, [1 Reg. 13. 33, 34. 2 Chron. 11. 14, 15. and chap. 13. 9.] whereupon the Priests and Levites, leaving their possessions which they formerly had in those parts; retired into Jury, and were followed thither, by all such out of every Tribe, as set their minds upon the true worship of God; and came to Jerusalem, there to do worship and to sacrifice to the God of their fore-fathers, [2 Chron. 11. 13, 14, 16. 3740. 974.

Baasa, when he saw Asa thus busie in restoring religion, and perceived that many of his subjects were fallen over to him; that they might partake of the covenant of God, [2 Chron. 15.9.] never ceased to make war upon him all his dayes, [1 Reg. 15. 16, 32.] and pursuing his point, this year which was the 36 of Asa his reign, to wit, over the kingdom of Juda, as it stood divided from Israel, and which Asa then held, went up against Juda, and built Rama, that he might suffer no man to come out from, or go into Asa, king of Juda, [2 Chron. 16.1.]

Asa hired Benadad King of Syria to come and hinder the building of Rama, which he did; and Asa of the stones and timber which was provided for the building of Rama, built Geba and Mizpa. Achazia returning from the battle at Ramoth Gilead, against Hazael, after a while, went to Iezrael, to see Iehoram the king of Israel, lying sick of the wounds, which he had taken, where Iehu finding many of his blood, which there attended him, and sundry princes of Juda, he slew them also: and then searching for Achazia himself, who had gotten a way			Iehoram king of Israel, and Achazia King of Iuda, went out joyntly with their armies to Ramoth Gilead, against Hazael, who had newly succeded Benadad, in the kingdom of Syria, as Eliseus the prophet had foretold him. In that fight, Iehoram was grievously wounded by the Syrians, and he retired himself to Iezrael, there to be cured of his wounds, [2 Reg. 8.] mean while a certain son of the prophets sent by Eliseus the prophet, came to Ramoth, and there anointed Iehu, the son of Iehosaphat the son of Nimshi, king over Israel, and opened to him the will of God, for the rooting out of the house of Achab, who forthwith being proclaimed king, by the captains and officers of the Army, marched straight on to Iezrael, and there slew both Iehoram and Iezabel,	3830.	884.

[Search and know that out of Galilee, never arose any Prophet] for this man in the time of Ioash, as it seemeth, what time the Syrians oppressed Israel, and all lay open to their invasion, and they spoiled all, and there was none to deliver them; foretold that Ioash his son Ieroboam, should deliver Israel out of their hands, and avenge them of the wrongs they had endured, [2 Reg. 14. 25, 26.] and was afterward sent unto Ninive, the Metropolis or Head city of Assyria; and by his preaching brought both King and people there to repentance for their sins, [Jon. 3. Matth. 12. 41.]

Hosea, in the dayes of Ieroboam, under whom the kingdom of Israel principally flourish't; foretold the ruine and desolation of it: which also himself lived to see, as continuing in that function of prophesing, to the reign of King Hezekiah, [Hosea 1. 1.] In the sixth year of whose reign, that of Israel came to its final end, [2 Reg. 18. 10.]

Now after the end of those six months, he was murthered by Shallum the sun of Jabesh, in the sight of all the people, [2 Reg. 15.10.] after whose death, followed those direful calamities which were foretold by Amos the Prophet, [*c.*7.9.] The High places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel made a wildernesse, when I shall arise with a sword against the house of Jeroboam.

Shallum the son of Jabesh, reigned one month in the 39 year of Uzzia king of Juda, [2 *Reg.*15.13.]

Menachem the son of Gad, going from Tirza to Samaria, slew Shallum, wasted Tipsach with the borders thereof, and ript up all the women that were great with child, [2 Reg. 15.14,16.]

This Menachem, is by Sulpitius Severus in his 1 Book of his Histo. Sacra, termed here Manes; being the self-same name with Manes, or Manichaus, that grand heretique, in after times: the name of either importing as much as Parecletus, or a Comforter.

The year of the World.		Reigns of the Kings of Judah.	Reigns of the Kings of Israel.		The Julian Period,	The year before Christ.
3246. 4.	The 14 Jubile, in which the prophet Isaiah saw and beheld the glory of the Lord, sitting in his throne and compassed about with a guard of Angels; singing, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabaoth, the people of the Jews, growing from this time forward, more & more obduurate and blind every day than other; lest they should understand the words of the prophets, which were sent unto them, and should be converted and healed, [Esay 6. John. 12. 40, 41.] This vision of the prophet Isaiah, befel in the last year of king Uzzia, [Esay 6. 7.] after whom being buried in the cities of David, and in the burying place of the kings; but a part from the rest, because of his leprosie, succeded his son Jotham, in the 20 year of Peka, king of Israel, and reigned 16 years in Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 15. 7. 32, 33. 1 Chron. 26. 23. and 27. 1. 8.] Jotham, fought a battail against the Ammonites, and overthrew them, whereupon they became tributary to him, by the space of three years, [2 Chron. 27. 5.] under him and his two successors, Micah the Morashite, together with Isaiah, and Hosea, executed his prophetical function, [Mic. 1. 1.] In his time also, as Josephus lib. 9. Antiq. cap. 11. al. 12. affirmes, did Nahum the prophet foretel, the subversion of the Assyrians, and city of Ninive, which came to pass 100 and 15 years after, whereas by that reckoning, he should rather have gathered, that Nahum prophesied in the time of Achaz, the son of Jotham.				3056	758

yet in the fourth, the Bactrian souldiers falling over to him, he set upon his enemies by night, at unawares, and beat them out of their camp, and when Sardanapalus put over all the command and charge of the army, into the hands of Salæmenus his wives brother, he also being twice routed by the conspirators, lost himself, and almost all his army. And when Ninive it self came to be besieged, Sardanapalus sent three of his sons and two daughters; with a great treasure into Paphlagonia, to one Cotta, Governour of that province; and withal, dispatched away messengers, and commissioners into all parts, to levy Souldiers, and provided all necessaries, to endure a siege, *Diod. Rome, according to the reckoning of Fabius Pictor, the most ancient of all Roman writers, and according to the accompt kept, of the secular games, of all others most religiously observed by the ancient Romans, began to be built by Romulus a little before the beginning of the 8 Olympiad, on the feast of their goddess Pales, upon the 10 day of April, though the feast of Pales, according to Varro his accompt, be ful five years more ancient than it is by Fabius, his saying; of which day, yet the Poet Ovid speaking, saith,

Urbs oritur (quis tunc hoc ulli credere posset?)
Victorem terris impositura pedem.

In the third year of the siege of Ninive, the river overflowing with continual raines, came up into a part of th ecity, and foundering the wall thereof 20 furlongs in length, bare it down; which Sardanapalus perceiving, caused a huge pile of wood to be made in his palace court, set it on fire, and therein consumed himself with his concubins and eunuchs, and all his riches, and the palace it self to ashes.

The conspirators entering, by the breach which the water had made, took the city, and proclaimed Arbaces for their king, Diod. lib. 2. and Athena. lib. 12. out of Ctesias. And so the kingdom of the Assyrians came to destruction, when from the beginning of Ninus his reign, they had held all the upper Asia 520 years, as Herod. in his first book, c. 95. affirmeth affirmeth. This kingdom therefore now falling to be divided; Arbaces, whom Strabo calleth Orbacus; but Velleius Paterculus nameth Pharnaces, having freed his country-men the Medes, from the Assyrian yoke, enabled them to live in after-times, according to their own laws; as Herodotus, in the book afore-mentioned, affirmeth. Belesis, who in holy writ, [Esay 39. 1. 2 Reg. 20. 12. is called Baladan: and by Agathias, lib. 2. Histo. out of Bion and Alex. Polyhist. Belessas, or Beleussus, and by Nicol. Damascenus, in his Eclogs, set forth by Hen. Valesius, Namnybrus; but by Hipparchus, Ptolomæus, and Censorinus is called Nabonassarus, held the kingdom of Babylon 14 years.

Now from twelve a clock, of the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thoth, to wit, from the twenty sixth day of Feb. being with us Wedensday, evening, in the year 747. before our vulgar christian account, all Astronomers with one consent, deduce the Calender of Nabonassar.

Meles in Lydia reigned 12 years, [Euseb. Chron.] of whom more is to be seen in Herod. lib. 1. cap. 84.

Ninus the younger, held the kingdom of the Assyrians (reduced now to the old bounds, and the Empire thereof quite extinguished in Sardanapalus) 19. years: as Eusebius in his Greek Chron. out of Castor the Rhodian, who in many large Volumes explained, τὰ χρονικὰ ἀγνοήματα, (i.) errours in Chronologie. This Ninus, for better lucks sake, seemeth to have assumed the name of the first founder of the Assyrian kingdom. His own, and original name being (as Eliam, lib. 12. Histor. Annal. telleth us) Thilgamus: and in the Scriptures, Thilgath-Pilneeser, [1 Chron. 28. 20.] and Tiglath-Pileser, [2 Reg. 15. 29. and chap. 16. 7. 10.]

Achaz succeeding his father Jotham in the very end of the 17 year of Peka, the son of Remalia, reigned 16. years in Ierusalem, [2 Reg. 16. 1, 2. 2 Chron. 28. 1.]

When, towards the end of the reign of Iotham, God began to stir up Resin the King of Syria, and Peka the son of Remalia against Iuda, [2 Reg. 15. 37.] The house of David, at the report of his approaching, with all the people of Iuda, were sorely affrighted; as apprehending a sudden and final destruction from them. But unto Achaz in his fear, God, by Esay the Prophet

Digitized by Google

Prophet sent a gracious message, with a promise of deliverance to him, and destruction to his enemies: And for a sign of his deliverance (when the incredulous King, being bidden to ask what sign he would, would ask none) God made him a promise of a Virgin, that should bear Immanuel; who both in regard of his person, should be θεάνθρωπος, God and man: God with us, or dwelling in our flesh; and also in regard of his office, whereby, as the onely Mediatour of God and man, [1 Tim. 2. 5.] he should bring to passe, that God should be with us, [Esay 8. 10.] gracious and propitious to us, and a very present help in trouble, [Psal. 46. 1, 2, 7. with Rom. 8. 31, 32.] which advertisement was most befitting the businesse then in hand, both in regard that all promises of God in Christ, are Yea and Amen, [2 Corin. 1. 20.] to be fulfiled generally in him, and for him: and besides, for that, the land of Judea, by a special priviledge, was to be the land of this Immanuel, [Esay 8. 8.] wherein, as pertaining to the flesh, he was to be born, not onely of the Jews, but also of the very house of David; and that, according to the foretelling of Jacob, [Gen. 49. 10.] before the Scepter should depart from Juda, (i.) before Judea should wholly leave off to be a Common-Wealth, ruled by a Kingly government; and therefore at that time, the destruction or abolishment of the house of David, or nation of the Jew, was not to be feared; which misery sixty five years after, betided the nation of the Ephraimites, as had been foretold them, by the Prophet Esay, [chap. 7. 8.]

As for the utter and final destruction of those Kings who had then banded themselves against him, the Prophet was commanded to foreshew it, by bringing forth Shear Jashub his son: and to tell him (after he had declared that great Mystery or Oracle of a God-bearing Virgin, by the motion of his finger, or some other gesture) that butter and honey he should eat, and be nourished thereby, until he came to such an age, as to know the good from the evil; for that before that time, both those Kings should be destroyed each out of his own land, [Esay 7. 3, 15, 16.] And whereas it fell out at the same time, that Esay his wife, a Prophetesse, bare him another son: by Gods appointment, his name was called Maher-shalal-hash-baz, importing, that the

Assyrian

Assyrian should make haste, and take away the spoile: and should plunder both Syrians and Israelites, before the child should be able plainly to pronounce, My father, or My mother. And so the sons of the Prophets were made to serve for signs and documents from God to the Israelites, [Esay 8. 3, 4, 18.] After these prophesies uttered, Rezin and Peka, joyntly came up to besiege Jerusalem, wherein Achaz then was: but could not take it, as was told beforehand that they should not, [Esay 7. 1, 7. 2 Reg. 16. 5.] But this wicked Achaz, was no sooner delivered out of this imminent danger, but he forsook God his Deliverer: For he forthwith walked in the wayes of the Kings of Israel, and set up the Idolatrous worship of Baal; offered incense in the valley of Ben-Hinnon, and made his own son to passe thorough the fire, and offered sacrifice in the High places, and upon the Hills, and under every green tree, [2 Chron. 28. 2, 3, 4. 2 Reg. 16. 3, 4.]

3263. 6. So when Achaz forsook God, God also forsook him: wherefore Rezin and Peka, dividing their forces, overcame him, which both joyned together, they could not do. For God gave him over both into the hands of the Syrians, who, having smitten him, carried away a great multitude of his people captive to Damascus, and also into the hands of the King of Israel, who made a great slaughter of his people, [2 Chron. 28. 5.]

2. 19. Peka slew of the men of Juda, 120. thousand in one day, all valiant men of war; Zichi also a mighty man of the Tribe of Ephraim slew Maaseia the Kings son, and Azrikam, the Steward of the Kings house, and Elkana who was next the King in authority. The Israelites also carried away captive out of Juda and Jerusalem, two hundred thousand women, boyes, and maides, and made a vast spoile of their goods, and carried away all to Samaria: but, upon the counsel of Oded a Prophet of God, they released all that multitude of prisoners, and restored them their goods in the presence of their Princes and whole congregation of Samaria, who entreated them kindly, & caused them to be conveyed safe to their brethren at Jerico, [2 Chron. 28.] 3973. 741.

At the same time, Rezin subdued Elath, which King Azarias, or Uzzias had recovered to Juda, and built it anew, and placed his Syrians therein to dwell, [2 Reg. 14. 22. 2 Chron. 26. 2. 2 Reg. 16. 2.]

3264. 6. Moreover the Edomites invaded Juda, and carried from thence many Captives. 3. 20. 3974. 740.

The Philistines also whom King Uzzia, whiles he trusted in God, had subdued, [2 Chron. 26. 6, 7.] now brake in upon the cities of Juda, in the low countries and south parts thereof, and dwelt therein; for God gave them over to the spoile, for Achaz his sin: and because he had drawn away Juda, to forsake the Lord, [2 Chron. 28. 17. 18, 19.]

But Achaz took all the gold and silver, that was found in the Lords house, and in the Treasury of the Kings house, and sent it for a present to Tiglath-Pileser King of Assyria, desiring him to come and deliver him

When Achaz implored the aide of the kings of Assyria, (for so it is said, [2 Chron. 28. 16.] in the plurall number, by a usual enalage, or change of the number, Psal. 105. 30. Jer. 19, 3. and him from the kings of Syria, & Israels hands: & he thereupon came and took Damascus, and carryed away all the inhabitants thereof to Kire, & put to death Rezin, the king of Syria, [2 Reg. 16.7,8,9.] fulfilling therein the prophesie as well of Isaiah, [c. 7.16. & c. 8.4. & c. 9.11.] as of Amos; who long before had fore-told the ruine of the kingdom of Damascus, in these words, I will send a fire upon the house of Hazael, which shall consume the palaces of Benhadad, and I will break in pieces the bars of Damascus, and root out the inhabitants of the valley of Aven, and him that beareth the scepter out of the house of Eden, and the people of Syria shall be carryed away into Assyria, saith the Lord, [Amos 1. 4, 5.] And so the kingdom of Damascus, and with it, that of Hamath, of which, as then being in a most flourishing estate, mention is made, [Amos 6.2. and of Aradus, Jer. 49. 23. Esay 10.9. and 36.19. and 37. 12,13.] which was begun, in Rezon, [1 Reg. 11. 23, 24.] ended in this Rezin, which continued for ten generations, as Nicol. Damascenus, cited by Josephus, lib. 7. Antiquit. c. 6 affirmeth, see before upon the year of the world 2960.

But when Achaz went to meet Tiglath-pileazer at Damascus, and to congratulate him, for his great victory there obtained, he there saw the great altar; the fashion whereof he forthwith took, and sent to Uria, the priest, that he might make the like of it, in Jerusalem, on which, upon his return thither, he both offered himself, and also caused the people to offer their sacrifices, removing the brazen altar, a far off from the fore-part of the house, that it might not stand between his altar, and the house of the Lord, [2 Reg. 16.]

and 25.22. and 3 Esay. 1, 52.) against Peka, Tiglath Pileser, came up, and led away the people of Gilead or Peræa, to wit, the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasses, unto Chabor and Haram, and Neher-gozan; And then passing over Jordan, possessed himself of Galiee, and carryed away all the inhabitants of Nephthaly, which Ben-hadad had left, together with the men of Galilee into Assyria, [1 Chron. 5.26. and 2 Reg. 15.29.] which place compared with [1 Reg. 15. 20.] that place of [Esay 9.1.] seemeth to be expounded.

When Achaz had now made himself a servant to the K. of Assyria, he then found, that he had received more hurt than help from him, [2 Chr. 28.20, 21.] which the prophet a little before had intimated to him, by that allegory of his, saying, The Lord shal shave off the hair of thy head & feet, with an hired razor, from beyond the river, even the king of Assyria, and it shall also consume the beard, [Esay 7.20.] wherefore also Achaz turned the entrie without, which led from the kings house to the house of the Lord, for fear of the king of Assyria, [2 Reg. 16.18.] that is, as Tremelius understands it, for fear lest the king of Assyria, should assault him

Hosea, the son of Ela, having murdered Peka, the son of Remalia, got the kingdom into his own hand, in the 20 year, from the time that Jotham began to reign over Juda, [2 Reg. 15.] that is, in the fourth year of the reign of Achaz, yet by reason of stirs and tumults, which arose thereupon, he could not presently enjoy it: but that state continued in confusion, and in a kinde of Anarchy, for the space of 9 years.

thereof: as likewise he forewarned the Moabites of a great calamity to befal them within three years after, [Esay 15. 1. and 16. 14.] of the fulfilling of which prophesies, look what we shall hereafter say upon the years 3280. and 3284.

Athaz dying, was buried in the city of David, [2 Reg. 16. 20.] but not among the Kings, [2 Chron. 28. 27.]

c. Ezechias, (his father being dead, and he now at his own disposing) toward the later end of the first year of his reign, in the first month. Abib, opened the doores of the Lords house, which his father had caused to be shut up, [2 Chron. 28. 24.] and commanded the Priests and Levits to sanctifie themselves, and then to cleanse the Temple, [2 Chron. 29. 3, 4.]

And they taking courage hereupon, upon the first day of the first moneth, (Apr. 21. upon the Sabbath-day) sanctified themselves. And then, according to the Kings command, came to cleanse the house of the Lord; and upon the eighth day of the same moneth, (28 Apr. being also upon the Sabbath-day) entering into the porch of the Temple, they sanctified the house of the Lord eight dayes; so that upon the sixteenth day of the first moneth (6 of our May, being Sunday) they finished that work, [2 Chron. 29. 15. 17.]

The next morning, King Ezechias early in the morning, (May 6 being Munday) called together all the Rulers of the City, and went up into the house of the Lord; wherein, together with the people, by the ministery of the Priests and Levites, he offered many sacrifices upon the Altar of the Lord, with great joy and gladnesse, [2 Chron. 29. v. 20. 36.]

But because the Passeover could not be kept at the same time when that meeting and the cleansing of the Temple was appointed, because the number of the Priests then sanctified was not sufficient, and the people was not gathered together from all parts to Jerusalem, according to the law, [Numb. 9. 10, 11.] therefore was the Passeover appointed to be kept, in the second month, whereof notice being given to the people from Beersheba even to Dan; not onely the Jewes, but some also out of the Tribes of Asher, Manasses and Zabulon, (the rest of the Tribes laughing at such warning given) came together in Jerusa-

And when they had finished all things, then all the Israelites, which were there present, about the end of the said second moneth, went forth throughout all the cities of Juda, and brake down the Images, & cut down the groves, and destroyed the High places and Altars, throughout the whole land of Juda and Benjamin, and even throughout Ephraim and Manasses, until they had finished the work they went about: which done, the Israelites returned every man to his own home, in their several countries [2 Chron. 31.1.]

But Ezechia went further, and brake in pieces the very brazen Serpent, which Moses had set up, [Num. 21.9.] because unto those dayes the children of Israel had burnt incense to it; and in contempt thereof, by a diminutive terme, called it Necushtan, (i.) a little piece of brasse. And in like manner, taking order that the Priests and Levites should serve every of them, in his office, and by turn; he also provided them of victuals and maintenance, by setting on foot again the law of first-fruits, and tithes, [2 Chron. 31.]

Whereupon, in the third month, every man brought in, who should bring fastest, their first fruits and tithes, and delivered them to the Priests, [2 Chron. 31.5,6,7.]

3279. 4. In the seventh moneth, wherein the gathering of the fruits of the whole year was finished, [Exod. 23. 16.] the bringing in of the first fruits and tithes, was fully compleat and ended, [2 Chron. 31.7.] and officers were appointed by Ezechia for the just distribution of them, [2 Chron. 31.] 3989 725

In the second year of Mardocempedus, or of Merodach, there was seen another eclipse of the moon in Babylon, in the 28 year of Nabonasar, upon the 18 day of the month Thoth, at midnight (to wit, in the beginning of the 9 of March, according to the Julian Calender, upon Saturday) and 176 daies, 20 houres and a half after, a third eclipse of the moon, upon the 15 day of the month Phamenoth (in the end of the 1. of September, being Sunday) three houres and a half before midnight, Ptolomeus lib. 4. magn. Syntax, cap 6, and 7. 3994. 720.

3285. Seuechus the Ethiopian, Sabacons son, reigned in Egypt, 14 years, [African,] who seemeth to be Sethos, Priest unto Vulcan: of whom Herodotus, in his second book, c. 141. maketh mention. 3995. 719.

3286. Candaules having shewed his wife to Gyges a Courtier of his, the son of Dascylus, in an unseemely manner, was by him (his wife setting him on thereto) murthered; and he thereby got, not only her, but with her the kingdom it self of Lydia also, for his labour, which is mentioned by Archilocus, of the Isle of Paros, who lived at the same time, in a Trimeter Iambus of his; and so the kingdom of Lydia fell from the race of the Heraclidæ into the stock of the Mermnades: wherein it continued by the space of 170 years: of which Gyges himself reigned eighteen in it; Herod. lib. 1. Now that this Gyges was but a bond-slave, appeareth by that saying of Cresus his grandchild in Xenophon, Instit. Cyri. l. 7. Τῶν ἐμῶν προγόνων ἀκούω τὸν πρῶτον βασιλεύσαντα ἅμα τε βασιλέα καὶ ἐλεύθερον γενέσθαι. (i. e.) I understand that the first of my Ancestors that here reigned, was made a king and a free man both at once: and Plato in his 2 de Repub. saith, that he was master of the kings cattle, and his name Gyges, in the eastern dialect seemeth to have been גוג (i. e.) Gug, or Gog. 3996. 718.

3287. Gyges having thus gotten the kingdome, sent sundry great offerings to Delphos, made war upon Miletus and Smyrna: and took the City of Colophos, by force, Herod. lib. 1. cap. 17. 3997. 717.

Eluleus king of Tyre, reduced under his obedience the Gitteans, which had revolted from him, making a voyage thither by sea. Against the Tyrians, Salmanasar king of Assyria marching with his army, invaded all Phenicia: yet shortly after, making a peace with them, he returned home again: and not long after, Sidon and Ace (called afterward Ptolomais) and Poletyrus or old Tyrus, with sundry other Cities, fell off from the Tyrians to the Assyrians; and when the Tyrians only now stood out against him, he returned a second time: in which action, the Phenicians furnished him, with sixty ships, and eight hundred Mariners: whom the Tyrians set upon with twelve ships only, and routed all that Navie, and took five hundred prisoners of them: whereby they got no small reputation at sea: But Salmanasar returning to besiege it, set guards upon the river, and conduits, which served the City, and cut them off: which hindered them from watering: which course being held against them five year together, forced them at last to digg wells within their Citie walls, and to live of that. This is delivered by Menander of Ephesus, in his Chronicles, translated into Greek, out of the Tyrian Annals, cited by Ioseph. 9. Antiq. cap. ult. where for Eluleus, Rufinus, an ancient Latine interpreter, calleth him Aylulens; and thence Scaliger taketh occasion to call him Elisæus; from whom yet I dissent in this, that he here saith that the Cyprians were by Menander called Kitteans: whereas he by the name of Gitteans, understood in deed the inhabitants of Gitta, or Gath knowen well enough by that name in the holy Scriptures, [2 Sam. 15. 18. and c. 21. 19.] compared with [1 Sam. 17. 4.] who were also subdued to Juda, by Esechia, in the very time of this Eluleus or Eliseus, as may be gathered out of Josephus: who saith that Esechia made war upon the Philistines, and having vanquished them, joyned all their Cities and Countrie, from Gath, to Gaza, to the kingdom of Juda: 9. Antiq. c. last save one: as also, it is clear out of [2 Reg. 15. 18. and 18. 8.] that Esechia did smite the Philistines as far as Gaza, and the territories thereof: but against the Tyrians, who at this time were grown proud and insolent by reason of their wealth and successe in wars, was uttered that prophecie by [Esaias, 23. 1.]

But when Salmanasar died, his son Sennacharib reigned in his stead, [Tob. 1. 18.] whom Herod. l. 2. calleth the K. both of Assyria, and Arabia too, perchance for that the Assyrians at at that time, together with Peræa, or the land of Gilead, and Hamath, or Ituræa held also a part of Arabia, either Petræa, or Deserta. For that Ivua, or Ava, which Sennacherib so much boasteth of, to have been conquered by him or his ancestors, [2 Reg. 18, 34. chap. 19. 13. Esay 37. 13.] was a country lying in the desert of Arabia; Fram. Junius affirmes, upon [2 Reg. 17. 24.] and the prophet Isaiah, foretelling the calamity which was to fall upon the Moabites, under Salmanasar, of which I speak before upon the year of the world 3278. and 3280. threatens them, that what ever they had laid up in store, the Assyrians should carry it away into the valley of the Arabians. Berosus also, in his History of the Chaldeans, cited by Josephus, lib. 10. cap. 1. saith, both that Sennacharib reigned in Assyria, and also that he made hot war upon all Asia and Egypt.

3291. Now that this war of his upon Egypt, lasted 3 whole years, and that Palæstina also joyned with him therein, I gather out of the 20 of the prophet Esay: where putting off his coat of hairy cloath (belonging to his prophetical function, as in Zach. 13. 4.) from his loynes, and his shoes from off his feet, he was commanded to walk up and down, naked and bare-foot 3 years together, for a sign and token to the Egyptians and Ethiopians; intimating, that that time once run out, they should in like manner, stript out of their cloths, and bare-foot, be led away into captivity and bondage, by the king of Assyria, which command the prophet is said to have received in the year, when Tartan being sent by Sargon, King of Assyria, besieged Ashdod and took it, [Esay 20. 1.] where, by Sargon, we must understand; Sennacharib himself: among whose commanders we find this Tartan to be named, [2 Reg. 18. 17.] and by Ashdod, that famous city Azotus, a city of the Philistins; whom we shewed before out of Josephus to have been subdued by King Ezekia. 4001. 713.

But when Ezekia had shaken off the king of Assyria's yoake (which his father Achaz had taken) and would no longer serve him, [2 Reg. 17. 7.] then in the 14 of his reign, toward the end thereof, Sennacharib, coming up against the kingdom of Juda, besieged their fenced cities, and took a many of them, [Esay 36. 1. 2 Reg. 18. 13. 2 Chron. 32. 2.] And when Ezekia perceived that he had a draught upon Jerusalem likewise, taking advice with his princes, he stopt up all the fountains that were about the city, and turned away the brook Gichon, which ran through, and overflowed the region thereabout, and then built up all that part of the wall, which Joas the king of Israel had demolished in the time of Amazia, and a vaumure without; and fortified the house of David, and provided himself of Darts and Targets in great abundance, and set captains and colonels over the people, and calling them together to him in the street, of the gate of the city, he made a very pithy and grave oration to them, perswading them to be of courage, and not to have any dread of the king of Assyria, nor of his army, [2 Chron. 32. 2, 8, 30.]

In those dayes, Ezekia fell deadly sick, and being told by Isaiah that he should dye, powring out his tears and prayers unto God, he recovered his health, and obtained a prelongation of his life and kingdom, for fifteen years, [Esay 38. 1. 5, 21. 2 Reg. 2. 1, 7. 2 Chron. 32. 24.] Whereupon he composed and set forth that song; wherein first he sheweth, the grievousnesse of his bodily sicknesse, with the trouble, and disquietnesse of mind, which he endured therein, and withall his prayer unto God thereupon; and then acknowledgeth the great benefit of his recovery received from God; and last of all, testifieth his faith in God, and promiseth to be everlastingly thankfull to him for the same. It is true, that in the scripture this is set down, after the story of the slaughter of Sennacharib, and his army; yet not precisely, but with a general annotation onely of the time, In those dayes. For that this fell out before his sicknesse, those words do plainly shew, I will add unto thy dayes fifteen years, and wil deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria, and I will defend this city, [Esay 38. 5, 6. 2 Reg. 20. 6.] Now if we will subduct, out of the 29 years which Ezekias reigned, these 15 years, we shal plainly find, that this slaughter of Sennacharib and his army fell out, in the later end of the 14 year of his reign.

Now the signe of Ezekia his recovery, which God at his request gave unto him, was that miraculous going back of the shadow of the sun, upon the diall of Ahaz; of which we read in Esay 38. 8. Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the Sundyal of Achaz, ten dayes backward, so the sun returned ten degrees; by which degrees it was gone down. For so Jerom renders the word מעלות which Jonathan the Chldee Paraphraser interprets, to be אבן־שעיא the stone of the hours, and renders it, by the hours and the clock, yet in his commentary upon this place, he observeth, that the Hebrew word signifieth, degrees. Which also in [2 Reg. 2. 9.] he thus expresseth, wilt thou that the shadow ascend ten degrees, or that it return back ten degrees? nor may we make light of the Greek interpretation of this place, as being more ancient than any of these, which saith, that by these words of βαθμῶν and ἀναβαθμῶν here used, no other thing is meant in this history, but the degrees of those scales or staires which were made by Achaz, seeing that it cannot be made appear, that till after their returne, from the captivity of Babylon, there was any observation or use at all of houres, among the Jews: and others also attribute the invention of the Gnomon in the diall among the Greeks, to men of a younger date as Anaximadder or Anaximenes, as I shall shew hereafter upon the year of the World, 3457. which yet that they received origanally from the Babylonians appeareth by that place of Herodotus, where he saith, lib. 2. cap. 109. Πόλον καὶ γνώμονα καὶ τὰ δυώδεκα μέρεα τῆς ἡμέρας παρὰ Βαβυλωνίων ἔμαθον οἱ Ἕλληνες. That is, The Pole, and the Diall, and the distribution of the day into twelve hours, all these the Greekes learned from the Babylonians.

But as concerning the retrogradation of the Sun, mentioned in, [Esay 38. 8. and Ecclesiastic. 48. 8.] as when the Sun stood still at the prayer of Joshua, the Moon also stood still at the same time, [Josh. 10. 12, 13.] so here also, it is manifest, that with the Sun, the Moon also, and all the frame of heaven was retrograde and went backward, and that there was as much substracted from the night, as there was added to the day. For albeit, that there was a miraculous alteration in the parts of the civil day, yet that by the divine providence, things were therein so ordered, that no hurt or hinderance did there by accrue to the constant and ever self-like motion and harmony of the heavenly bodies, is evident by those three lunary Eclipsis, of which I spake before, out of Ptolomie: the account whereof being cast up from these our times backward, yeild the same result of the times, as was formerly observed by the Chaldeans, and in the same manner, as if no such retrogradation or going back of the Sun had ever been.

Now in the beginning of the 15 year of Ezechia's reign, renewed, as it were, together with his life, Merodach, or Berodach Baladan, the son Baladan, the King of Babylon, sent messengers with Presents to him, to inform themselves of that prodigious and miraculous retrogradation of the Sun, which was made in the World. To whom when Ezechia out of pride and vain ostentation, had shewed all his Treasure and Pomp of riches; God presently foretold him of the captivity of Babylon, which was to ensue, in these words. Behold the day's come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried away into Babylon; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord: adding further concerning his sons, when as he had yet none born, that they should also be carried into captivity, in this manner. Thy sons also, that shall issue from thee, and which thou shalt beget, shall they take away, and they shall be eunuchs in the Palace of the King of Babylon, [Esay 39. and 2 Reg. 20. 12, 19.] Neverthelesse when Ezechia had humbled himself for his former pride, both he, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the fierce wrath of the Lord fell not upon them, in all Ezechia his dayes, [2 Chron. 32. 25, 26, 31.]

Mica also the Morasthite, prophesied to the people in Ezechia his dayes; That Sion should be plowed, and Jerusalem laid in heaps, and the mountain it self of the house of the Lord, as the high places in a forrest [chap. 3. 12. Jer. 26. 18, 19.]

Herodotus, lib. 2. cap. 141. telleth us, that Sennacharib invaded Egypt, with a vast Army, and made war upon Sethon, the Priest of Vulcan, a poor spirited King, and famous for nothing; but for being devoutly, or rather superstitiously addicted to the worship of his petty god Vulcan. Where he also addeth, that even in his time, there remained an image of his cut in stone, holding a mouse in his hand, and uttering these words in a label of letters;

Let every man that looks on me, Learn godly and devout to be.

which Hieroglyph the Priests there, for his, and their countries, and their own Priesthoods honour, expound in such manner, as if Setho, being both King and Priest, had by virtue of his piety and prayers to his god Vulcan, so far prevailed with him, as that when Pelusium, which stands in the very enterance of Egypt was besieged by the enemy, their horse-bridles, and buckles of their bucklers, were so gnawn in pieces by the mice, that the next day they were faine to run all away, with the losse of many of their men; but what ever the matter was at Pelusium, the undoubted word of the Prophet assures us, that the Assyrians, marched far into the very body of Egypt, and thence took and led away a great multitude of them captive.

In this expedition of Sennacharibs, I conceive, it was, that the foreteling of Nahum the Prophet against Nô, a great and strong City in Egypt, was fulfilled: The words of which prophesie, were these; yet was she carried away; she went into captivity, her young children also were dashed in pieces in the top of every street, and they cast lots for their honourable men, and all her great men were bound in chaines, [chap. 3. 10.]

3292. In the rest of Egypt also, was fulfilled what was spoken 3 years before by the Prophet, 4002 712
[Esay 24.] The King of Assyria shall carry away a great multitude of the Egyptians captive; and of the Ethiopians young and old prisoners, naked and bare-footed: neither do I see, why that should not be referred to the Jewes which is said in the two verses next following; viz. And they shall be ashamed of Ethiopia their expectation, and of Egypt their glory: and the inhabitants of this country shall say in that day: Behold such is our expectation, whither we flee for help to be delivered from tde King of Assyria, and how shall we escape?

For

For it was not for nothing, that the Assyrian messenger put them in mind of Egypt, saying, Now behold, you trust in the staff of this bruised reed Egypt, on which if a man lean, it will go into his hand and pierce it; for even so is Pharao, to all such as trust upon him, [2 Reg. 18. 27.] for we finde the same similitude used by God of the Egyptians and Israelites, in Ezekiel, 29.6, 7. and likewise in Esay, chap. 30. and chap. 31. many things, spoken against the vain hope which the Jews had of help from Egypt, and among the rest this also, Therefore, saith he, shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and your trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion, for the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose: therefore have I cryed concerning this, Their strength is to stay at home, [chap. 30. 3, 7.]

Sennacharib, returning out of Egypt into Palestine, besieged Lachish, and all his power with him, [2 Chron. 32. 9.] Ezekias sent unto him to Lachish, to buy his peace, and agreed with him for it, at a certain price; wherefore draining all his own treasure, whereof he had formerly been so proud; as also the treasury of the temple, he paid him 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold; but he having received the money, stood not to his word, but sent Tartan, who had now taken Azotus, and Rabsari's, and Rabsheca with a great army, from Lachish to Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 18. 14, 17.]

These coming to Jerusalem, stood at the cundit, of the upper pool, upon the high-way of the fullers field, and when they called out to speak with the king Eliakim, the son of Hilkia; which was over the houshold, and Shebna the scribe, and Joach the son of Asaph, the Recorder, went fourth unto them. And when they would not deliver up the city, as was desired, Rabsecah then cried out, that Ezekia did all in vain rely upon God for help, and that he himself came not thither, but as he was sent from God; and having reviled the God of Israel and Ezekia, his servant with many reproachfull languages, he moved at last the people, to mutiny and to fall over to his master the king of Assyria. And this they speak aloud, and in the Hebrew tongue; that the people which then stood upon the wall might hear and understand what they said; to frighten and perplex their minds, that in that tumult they might assault and take the city, [Esay 36. 2 Reg. 18. from v. 17. to the end of the chapter, 2 Chron. 32. 9, 18.]

Ezekia hearing thereof, rent his clothes, and putting on sackcloth, went into the house of the Lord, and withal, sent Eliakim and Shebna, and with them, the elders of the priests, clothed likewise in sackcloth unto Isaiah the prophet, to pray him that he would ask counsaile of God, in this sad case, and power forth his prayers unto him for help, and the prophet bade him be of good comfort; for that the king of Assyria, should hear a flying report, and thereupon should break up his siege, and get him gone into his own country, and there be slain with the sword; all which forth-with came to passe, [Esay 37. 1, 17. 2 Reg. 19. 1, 7.]

Rabshekah, when he could not prevail, returned to Sennacarib, whom he found risen from before Lachish, and besieging Libna, [Esay 37. 8. 2 Reg. 19. 8.]

Tirhaka king of Ethiopia, did not invade Egypt, and Syria, as Scaliger, without all ground, in his notes upon Eusebius, p. 72. and in his Isagogical Canons, pag. 311. would have it; but rather, he sent forces to assist and help the Egyptians and Jews; for the Scripture is clear, that he came forth to fight against Sennacharib, [Esay 37. 9. 2 Reg. 19. 9.] This Tirhaka, Strabo lib. 1. and 15. calleth, Tearcon the Ethiopian: and further reporteth out of Megasthenes, a writer of the affairs of India, that he passed over into Europe, and went as far as Hercules his pillars.

Sennacharib therefore hearing a report of Tirhaka his approach, being ready to remove to Libna, sent his minatory and rayling letters unto Ezekia, speaking therein of the God of Israel, as of the gods of the nations, the work of mens hands, which Ezekias opening and spreading before the Lord in his Temple, with many tears powred forth, craved aide and deliverance from God, against the Assyrians, and received an answer from God by Isaias the prophet, that God would defend that city, and that the king of Assyria should not so much as come before it, but should return by the way he came; [Esay 37. 9, 35. 2 Reg. 19. 9. 2 Chron. 32. 17, 19, 20.]

The very self same night after these things passed at Jerusalem, and a few dayes, after his victory atchieved against the Ethiopians; which to have fallen out much about this time, some gather out of the 18 and 20 chapters of Isaiah, God sent his Angel, and destroyed every man of valour, every commander, and chief man in the Assyrian army, and the next morning there were found one hundred fourscore and five thousand dead carcases lying on the ground: whereupon Sennacharib with shame, brak up, and returned into his own land, and rested him at Ninive; where it came to passe, that as he was at his devotions, before his god Nisroch, Adramelich and Sharezer slew him with the sword; which done, they fled presently into the land of Ararat, or Armenia; and Esor-haddon his son reigned in his stead, [Esay 37. 36, 37, 38. 2 Reg. 19. 35, 36, 37. 2 Chron. 32. 21.] All which had been fore-told by the prophet Isaiah, [c. 38. and in chap. 31. 9. also,] as some conceive.

In

In the first chap. of the book of Tobia, there are these things found which belong to this story; That Sennacharib, when he came fleeing out of Judea, for the very hatred which he bare to the Israelites, slew many of the Jewes, and that Tobit, or Tobia the elder, stole away the dead bodies, and bestowed burial on them; and that being thereof accused to the King of Ninive, he was faine to get him gone from thence, and to hide his head elsewhere for a certain time: and that he was plundred and spoiled of all his goods, having naught left him to trust unto, save onely Anne his wife, and Tobias his son. That after 45 dayes, or as the Greek copy hath it, before 55 dayes, Sennacharib was murdered by his sons; and that they fleeing away into the mountains of Ararat, Esarchaddon his son reigned in his stead, being wrong named in sundry copies; in some Achirdon, in some Sarchedon; and that the new King set Achiacarus, the son of Hananeel Tobits brother, over all his fathers accounts and his own: insomuch, that he was not onely his Steward and keeper of his accounts; but was also cup-bearer, and privy seal unto him, and was the second man after the King.

Ezekias had his son Manasses, by Hephziba, after the prolonging of his life 3 years, and 12 before his death.

When the Medes had hitherto now lived without a King, and Dejoces would not attend the judging of their causes and controversies any longer, and thereupon ensued nothing but spoilings and robberies in all places; the people finding the inconveniences of an Anarchie, or want of a King, whereof the least was not, that the Assyrian taking hold of this occasion, had possessed himself of many cities and places in Media; as I noted before upon the year of the World, 3283. they submitted all with one accord to Dejoces, 150. years before Cyrus began his reign: as Herodotus in his first book averreth; whom, giving off Ctesias in this point, both Dionysius, Halicarnasseus, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in the beginning of his Roman Histories, do follow. Though Diodorus Siculus, in his second book: whether thorough failler of memory, or false copying, hath here put Cyaxaris for Dejoces; who is said to have been elected King over the Medes, about the second year of the 17 olympiade, according to Herodotus: For subducting 150. years from the beginning of Cyrus his reign, which as he supposes, falls in with the beginning of the 55 olympiade, and consequently with the midst of the year, 4154. of the Julian Period: it followes that the 1 year of Dejoces the first King of the Medes must be placed upon the 3 year of the 17 olympiade, and the middle of the 4004. year of the Julian Period; allowing the later end of the second year of the same olympiade, to have been taken up and spent in the transaction of the businesse it self, and election made of the new King; which first Epocha or point of the beginning of this new kingdom of the Medes to have been most rightly assigned and set down by Herodotus, the precise times of every Kings reign, compared with the Eclipse of the Sun, which befel in the reign of Cyaxares, here underneath, in the year of the World, 3403. to be spoken of, will manifestly declare.

The fifteenth Jubilie, which was the middle-most of all the rest, and the most joyfully 4005 709
3295. kept, next to that of Solomons at the dedication of the Temple; both for the fresh memory
4 of so great a deliverace, and also for the great prosperity of the place ensuing thereupon: So that many brought offerings and gifts to the Lord at Jerusalem; and rich presents to the King himself; for he was magnified after this among all nations, and prospered in whatever he undertook, [2 Chron. 32. 23, 27, 30.]

And God himself did so rule, and govern the people it self of Juda, after such their delivery, that (according to his own promise made) they took root downward, and brought fruit upward, [2 Chron. 32. 22. Esai. 37. 31, 32.] Moreover the consideration of the Jubilie is necessary for the understanding of that sign of Gods mercy given the year before unto Ezekia: You shall eat, saith God, this year, that which groweth of it self, and the second year, that which springeth of the same; and in the third year, sow ye, and reape ye, and plant vineyards, and eat of the fruit thereof, [Esai. 37. 30. 2 Reg. 19. 29.] for because the last years
c. harvest was either gathered by the enemy which roved all the country over, (according to Gods threatning, Levit. 27. 16. Deut. 28. 33. Jerem. 5. 17.) or by them spoiled and troden underfoot; necessary it was for the people to live that year upon that which grew of it self: and this year by reason of the Jubilie, it was not lawful either to sow or reape, which otherwise, no sabbatical year intervening, might well have been done: seeing the Assyrian Army being destroyed by the Angel, there was nothing to hinder them. But the year following, when there was neither enemy to fright them, nor sabbatical year to withhold them, they might fall securely to their husbandry as at other times.

3304 ~~3305~~. Apronadius reigned likewise there 6 years, Ibid. 4014 700.

3306. Ezechias was buried in the upper part of the sepulchers of the posterity of David, and all Juda, and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, did him what honour possibly they could in his death, [2 Chron. 32.33.] After whom came his son Manasses, and reigned 55 years, [2 Reg.21.1.] He again set up the High places, which his father Ezechias had pulled down: he built altars to all the host of heaven in the the two courts of the house of the Lord: and made his son passe the fire in the valley of the Son of Hinnom; used Divinations and Sorceries and Soothsayings: and set up a molten Image in the house of the Lord; making Juda and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go astray, and do worse than all the Nations, whom God had driven out before the face of the Israelites, [2 Reg. 21.2,11. 2 Chron. 33. 2,9.] and moreover shed much innocent blood; insomuch that he filled Jerusalem therewith: besides his own sin committed, in making Juda to sin, and to do that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, [2 Reg. 21. 16. and 24. 4.] In which shedding of innocent blood, the death of the Prophet Isaiah is principally remembred, whom he caused to be cut in two pieces with a wooden saw; as the Babylonish Talmud, in their Treatise יבמות and Justin Martyr in his Coloquie with Tryphon, Jerome upon Isaiah, [c.20. and 57.] and others of our men, report, who expound that word ἐπρίσθησαν, [Heb. 11.37.] i.e. Were sawed in pieces, as meant of the Prophet Isaiah: For all which, God threatned that he would stretch out over Ierusalem, the line of Samaria, and the plumb of the house of Achab: and that he would wipe Ierusalem, as one useth to do, when he wipes a dish, and turneth it upside down, [2 Reg. 21.13.] 4016. 694.

3310. Rigibelus reigned over the Babylonians one year, [Ptol. Reg. Can.] 4020. 694.

3311. Mesissimordacus reigned there likewise 4 years, Ibid. 4021. 693.

3316. There was a vacancie of a king in Babilon 8 years, Ibid. 4026. 688.

Dejoces enlarged the dominions of the Medes, as far as the river Halys, 128 years before the end of Aastyages his reign, as may be gathered out of Herodotus, lib. 1. c. 130.

In the 23 Olimpiade, Herostratus Naucratites a merchant of Egypt, coming to Paphos in the Island of Cyprus, is said to have bought there a litle image of Venus, of the bignesse of the palm of a mans hand, and of very ancient workmanship, and that by the power thereof, being miraculously delivered out of a main danger at sea, by virtue of that image, he consecrated the same at Naucratis in the Temple of Venus, with great solemnity; as we find in Atheneus, who was himself a town-born child of the same place, in his 15 book Deipnosophist. But if we will rather believe Srabo, lib. 17. there was no such town as Naucratis then built in Egypt: nor till afterward that it was built by the Milesians, in the time of Cyaxeris king of Medes, and of Psamyticus king of Egypt, who lived at the same time with him.

3317. Troubles growing in Egypt; there was there a vacancie of a king for 2 years, [Diod. Sic. lib.1.] 4027. 687.

3319. After which Egypt was ruled by an Aristocracie of twelve men, which governed that kingdom by Common Council and advice; which government, is by Herod. l. 2. c. 147. and Diod. Sic. l.1. said to have lasted 15 years; whereunto Tremellius is of opinion, that that burthen of Egypt, spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, [c 19.] refers where [v.5,6.] speaking of the drying up of the river Nilus, this is also foretold, They shall want of their waters, to run into the sea, so that their river shall be dryed up, and turning away their waters, they shall empty and dry up their chanels fenced with banks: which out of Herodotus, Tremellius thus expounds, These 12 petty kings, by the labour of this miserable people, shall strive to over-rule the very works of nature, and shall turne away the waters of Nilus; even to lay the channels thereof dry, that they might finish, their pond or lough of Marios with their Pyramides and Labyrinth, only for their lust and pleasures sake. But Scaliger in his Canon. Isagog. understands it, that there should be there so great a drouth, that their river Nile, in the summer season, should not rise 4029. 685.

rise nor flow, nor water Egypt as it used to do; and refers this prophesie to the former times of Soii or Sabbacon.

The race of the babylonish Kings failing after those 8 years vacancy, Esarchaddon 4033 681
3323. the King of Assyria, reduced them under their former yoke of his obedience, and held
6. that kingdom 13 years: as we learn out of Ptolomeis, Can. Reg. For that this Assaradinus is the same with our Esarchaddon, appears, not onely by the vicinity and likenesse of the name, but also by the consent of holy Scripture, which intimates to us, that he was King both of Assyria and Babylon at the same time; as we shall see anon, in the year of the World 3327.

3324. Ardys the son of Gyges, reigned in Lydia the space of 49 years: he took Pryene by force, and invaded Miletus, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 15.] 4034. 680.

3327. In Sicily, the City Gela was built, and Phaselis in Pamphilia by two brothers, Antiphemus and Lacius, [Euseb. Chron.] who consulting the Oracle at Delphos concerning a place to plant in; were answered, that the one should saile westward, and the other eastward, as Stephanus Byzantinus in the word Gela, reports, out of Aristenetus his first Commentary of Phaselis. And Heropythus in his book of the Borders of the Colophonians, treating of the building of Phaselis, saith that Lacius, who transported a colony thither, gave unto one Cylabra, a shepherd, whom he met driving his flock to feed, the price of the ground whereon he built his city, in certain poudred provisions, which he required. But Philostephanus in his book entitled, Of the Cities of Asia, delivereth more fully, that Lacius, a man of Argos, one of them which went with Mopsus (the founder of the city Colophos) and whom some call Lindius, brother to Antiphemus the builder of Gela (which Lindius, is also said to have been of Rhodes by Herodotus lib. 7. and by Thucidides lib. 6.) and that being sent by Mopsus with certain other men, by the Oracle and bidding of Mantus, Mopsus his mother, for that the poopes of his Ships were in a tempest split about the Chelidonian Isles, he could not arrive till late at night: and that there he bought the plat of ground whereon he built his city, as Mantus had foretold, giving certain salt meats for it unto Cylabra the owner of it, such as out of all their ship-provisions he most desired. [Athena Deipnosoph. lib. 7.] 4037. 677.

This year also was fulfilled the prophesie spoken by the mouth of the Prophet Esaiah, [chap. 7. 8.] in the beginning of the reign of Achaz, within sixty and five years Ephraim shall be broken in pieces, so that it shall be no more a people. For although the greatest part of them were carried away by Salmanasar 44 years before, and the kingdom utterly abolished, yet among them which were left, there was some shew of a government. But now they left off to be any more a people, by reason of the great multitude of forreigners which came to dwell there; in comparison of whom, the small remainder of the Ephraimites were counted as nothing; for, that they were not utterly extinct in their own country appears, out of the story of Josias, [2 Chron. 34. 6, 7, 33. and chap. 35. 18. with 2 Reg. 23. 19, 20.] But there were ever now and anon, new colonies or companies sent out of Babel, Cuth, Hava, and Sepharuaim; which possessing Samaria by way of inheritance, dwelt in all the cities thereunto belonging, [2 Reg. 17. 24.] And that this was so done by Esarchaddon King of Assyria (who was also called, Asnapper the Great, and magnificent) is easie to be understood by the confession of the Cuthites, mentioned, [Ezra 4. 2, 10.]

At which time also, as it should seem, and in the same expedition, whereby these things were done in the land of Israel; some of the chief Commanders of the Assyrian Army, made an inrode into Judea, and there took Manasses the King, as he lay hid in a thicket, and binding him with chains of brasse, carried him away captive into Babylon, [2 Chron. 33. 11.] which calamity so falling upon Judea, some think to have been foretold, by the Prophet Isaiah, where he saith, within sixty five years Ephraim shall be so broken in pieces, that it shall be no more a people. And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria, is the son of Remaliah: And if you will not believe, you shall not be established, [chap. 7. 9.] (i.) as Jacobus Capellus hath noted in his Chron. you your selves also shall be broken in pieces. Where he addeth further, that the Jews also in Seder Olam Rabba, and the Talmudists, cited by Rabbi Kimchi, upon, [chap. 4. Ezekiel] do deliver, That Manasses 22 of his reign, was carried away captive into Babylon; and that he repented him of his sin 33 years before his death: after which the Scripture witnesseth, that God again restored him to his liberty and kingdom, [2 Chron. 33. 12, 13.] For that his captivity lasted not long; may be gathered by this, that taking no notice thereof, it is recorded that he reigned 55 years in Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 21. 1. 2 Chron. 33. 1.]

The new inhabitants of Samaria, when as, at their first coming thither, they served not the God of Israel, were troubled with Lions: whereof when the King of Assyria was enformed, he took order that one of the Priests, which were brought from thence in the captivity should be remanded thither; and he coming thither, made his residence at Bethel, and there taught them how to worship God indeed: but all after the manner of Jeroboams appointment. But when together with the Calf which they found there, they worshipped also their old idols, they are said to have feared God, and not to have feared him; for that there is little difference between worshipping of many gods & no God at all, [2 Reg. 17. 25. 33. 41.] And this was the beginning of that strangenesse which grew afterwards between the Samaritans and the Jews, [Ezra 4. 1. Neh. 4. 2. John 4. 9.]

3334. Psammiticus Saits, the son of Pharao Neco, which was done to death by Sabbacon the Ethiopian, and one of those twelve tyrants of Egypt, having at length got all the power into his own hands, reigned there 54 years. Herod. lib. 2. cap. 152. and cap. 157. whereunto that prophet of Isaias seems to point; where he sayes, And the Egyptians will I give up into the hands of Lords, which shall lord it cruelly over them, till a fierce king shall come to rule them, [Esay 19. 4.] for Psammitichus, who was sent away, and confined in the Fenne countrey near the sea, hiring souldiers out of Arabia, and a number of pirates of the Iones and Carions, which roved about that shore, with such Egyptians as sided with him, in a main battle; fought near to memphis, overthrew the rest of those domineering Lords, and the Ionians and Carions for their good service, had a place assigned them, to inhabit in, somewhat about the cityes of Bubastis, and Pelusium, which stood upon that mouth or outlet of the river Nile, which was from thence called Στρατόπεδον, (i. e.) the souldiers, or armies field; and from that time forward, the Grecians and other foreiners, were alwayes welcom into Egypt, Herod. lib. 2. Diodor. Sic. lib. 1. The same Herodotus also reporteth, that this Psammiticus took in by force, a great city in Syria called Azotus, after 29 years siege. ib. cap. 157. to wit the city of Ashdod, which as I shewed before upon the year of the world. 3391. was taken by Tartanes commander of the king of Assyria his army in one year, and which was so ruined by Psammitichus, that, as the prophet Jeremy saith, there was but a remainder of it left in his dayes, [Jer. 25. 20.] 4044. 670.

3336. After Assaridinus, or Esarchaddon, the Empire of Assyria and Babylon both, was governed by Saosduchinus 20 years, [Ptol. Can. Reg.] This man in the book of Judith, written in the Chaldee language, by some Jew living in Babylon, is called Nabuchodonosor, as by a name common to all kings of Babylon; who yet is there also called, the king of Assyria; and is said to have reigned in the great city of Ninive, [Jud. 1. 1.] where neverthelesse, Franc. Junius, a famous man for learning, would have it understood of him, whom the scripture calleth Merodach-Baladan, the grand-father of that Nebucadnetzar, who was the father of that great Nebucadnetzar, by whom king Manasses was taken prisoner, and carryed to Babylon, and at last released. For (saith he) this man was first king of Babylon, and was afterward made king of Assyria, succeding in that kingdom, after Esarchaddon the Great, when his brothers being guilty of parricide, were deemed unworthy of the kingdom: whereupon all Asia fell on fire, with a war which lasted a long time after. And verily this succession of Asar-Adon Merodach, Ben-Merodach, and Nebucadnetzar, first and second, is taken onely out of Anianus, that false Metasthenes. For in truth, Merodach was neither grand-father of Nebucadnetzar or rather Nabopolassar of Nebucadnetzar the great, nor was at first a trustee onely of the king of Assyria, and afterward came himself to be king of Assyria and Babylon both, as Junius hath well observed. Nor did he ever succed Esarchaddon the great, in any kingdom of his, seeing that this Mardocempadus, or Merodach left off to reign, eleven years, before ever Manasses came to be king, and that 42 years after his death, Assaradinus or Essarchaddon left Saosduchinus to succeed him, as wel in the Asyrian as in the the Babylonish kingdom, as we formerly made to appear, out of Petolomies Canon, Reg. which if Junius, a man of no less modesty than learning, had seen, no doubt, he would have altered his opinion in this point, whereof I thought good in this place to put the reader in mind, to the end, that out of a thing which never was, he should not think, that sense or exposition to agree with the propheey of Ezekiel, [c. 31. 11. or v. 18.] as he distinguisheth them, to wit, That Esarchaddon the Assyrian, was put down, or thrust out of his kingdom, by Berodach Baladan, and that therefore, all fell off from him, and many of them fled to the king of Babylon, as in the sentence following, So that now, the land of Assyria, was most shamefully troden under foot, and brought into contempt of all men, ver. 20. 4046. 668.

3339. c. Meshullameth the daughter of Hazuzi, of Jotba, bare unto Manasses his son Ammon, who was 22 years old when he began to reign, [2 Reg. 21. 19.] 4049. 665.

3344. a. Was the 16 Jubile. 4054. 660.

3347. Nabucadonosor, king of Assyria, in the 12 year of his reign, is said to have overcome Arphaxed the king of Medes, the founder of the city Ecbatan, in the great plain of Ragau, near to Euphrates, and Tigris, and Jadason, in the champion country of Erioch king of the Elicians, (for so we read in the first chap of the book of Judith; which Jerom, at the request of Paula and Eustochium translated into Latin,) but whoever it was that published that book in Greek, with many alterations and additions of his own, first tells us, that Nabuchodanosor, in the 12 year of his reign, fought a battaile, with king Arphaxad in a great plain, near unto Ragau, wherein were present, all that inhabited the hill-coun- 4057. 657.

tries, and all that bordered upon the river of Euphrates and Tigris, and Hydaspes, and that dwelt in the plaine of Arioch King of the Elymeans. But afterward, as forgetting himself, tells us, that he fought this battaile against Arphaxad, in the seventeenth year; and that having gotten the better of it in this fight, he spoiled all them of Ecbatan, and that having taken Arphaxad in the hill countries of Ragau, he thrust him through with his own darts, and at length, having done all his businesse, as his heart could wish, he returned to Ninive, and therewith all his army kept a feast, and banquetted himself and them, by the space of 120 dayes; where it is to be noted, that Dejoces his death, according to Herodotus, fell in with the 12 year of Saosduchinus: which is a great argument, that Saosduchinus and Dejoces are none other, than they who in the book of Judith are called by the names of Nabuchadonosor and Arphaxad. For the opinion of Fr. Junius hath no ground at all for it, whiles, seeking to reconcile the succession of the kings of Media, which is nothing but a meere device and forgerie of Ctesias a very fabler, and of a supposed Metasthenes, with Herodotus, who is entitled the father of histories, he will needs divide Media into two parts, giving one of them to Dejoces, who is here called Arioch, as is noted in [Judith, 1.6. and in Jer.49.34.] and assigning the other to Artecarmus (whom Ctesias calleth Articam, and who is here called Arphaxad) who, as he saith, established the seat of his kingdom at Ecbatan, to the end, that having so strong a place to trust to, he might the better withstand both Dejoces, and all other enemies that should assault him: whereas, if any such division had been made of Media (as never any was) both the name of Arphaxad and the kingdom of Ecbatan, should have been given, not to Arioch, nor to Articarmes, but to Dejoces: for that Arphaxad was the founder of Ecbatan, the book of Judith hath it: and that Dejoces was, Herodotus and others affirme, but that Arioch or Artecarmes built it, no man ever wrote.

After Dejoces, Phraortes his son succeeded; and reigned 22 years: Herodotus, lib. 1. c. 102.

Nabuchadonosor, or Saosduchinus king of the Assyrians, the next year after the overthrow of Arphaxad or Dejoces (who in Judith 1.1. according to the Chaldee copie, is said to be the 13 king of Ecbatan but in the Greek, the 18) upon the 22 day of the first month, entered into a deliberation how to subdue Nations and Countries to his dominion; making Holophernes General of all his armies; who when he came before Bethulia, al. Beth-Hoglam, a City of Judea, and had closed it up with a siege, had there his head taken off by Judith a woman of the tribe of Simeon; who after the death of her husband Manasses, which dyed in the time of barly harvest, had spent 3, or, as the Greek copy hath it, 4 years in widowhood in that City, [Judith 2.8, 13.]

3349. — 4059. 655.

Isthemus and Borysthenes were this year built in the Country of Pontus, so was Lampsacus in Hellespont, and Abdera in Thrace, Euseb. Chron. to wit, Borysthenes by the Milesians of Ionia, Lampsacus by the Phoceans, Abdera by the Citizens of Clazomene: Solinus c. 10. tells us that Abdera was first built by Diomedes his sister: and that afterward falling to decay it was new built and enlarged by the Clazomenians, in the 31 Olympiade, which ended the last year before this. The conductor of which Colony, was Timesius a Citezen of Clazomene, as we have it in Herodotus, lib. 1. c. 168. who yet addeth this, that he being beaten off by the Thracians, was not able to go through with the work.

3355. c. Amon had his son Josias by Fredida, the daughter of Hadaia a Boscathite, who was eight years old when he began to reign, [2 Reg. 22. 1.] 4065. 649.

3356. c. After Saosduchinus succeeded Chyladanus both in the Assyrian and also in the Babylonish kingdome and reigned 22 years, Cano. Reg. Ptolom. Alexander Polyhistor calleth him Saracus, which name, as well as that of a Saracen signifies a Robber, or a Spoiler. 4066. 648.

Grinus the son of Esanius, king of the Island of Thera, was commanded by the Oracle of Delphos, to go build a City of Lybia: which lying dead a long while, because no man there, knew where Lybia was, it is said, that it rained not in that Island for 7 years after: and that all the trees there, save one, perished in that drought. Herodotus lib. 4. cap. 150. 151.

3361 c. King Manasses returning this year out of his captivity, having in part restored the true worship of God, which he had formerly so much defaced, dies: and was buried in the garden of his own house, [2 Chron. 33. 2 Reg. 21. 8.] and as we may well think, according to his own appointment by his last will or testament, as if repenting him now at last of his former evil doings, he deemed himself unworthy to lie among his own royal ancestors. [Tremelius.] 4071 643

3363. After him his son Amon reigned 2 years; who forsaking the Lord God of his forefathers, offered sacrifice, to all the graven Images, which his father had set up, and worshipt them: but never repented him thereof, as his father did; but sinned more than way, than ever he had done, [2 Reg. 21. 19, 28, 21. 2 Chron. 33. 21, 22, 23.] 4073. 641.

This impious Amon, was murthered by his own houshold servants, in his own house; and was buried with Manasses his father, in the garden of Uzza: and the people slew all that were of the conspiracie against him, [2 Reg. 21. verse 23, 24, 26. 2 Chronicles 33. 24, 25.]

And unto him succeeded his son Josias, a child of 8 years old, and reigned 31 years [2 Reg. 22. 1. 2 Chron. 34. 1.]

driven by a tempest into a place called Platea, an Isle of Lybia: and sent him a second time with some of their own country-men, to spie out that Isle: These leaving Corobius there with provision for certain months, returned with all speed, to let their country-men know what they had found: But not returning from thence to Platea, according to the time appointed, it fortuned that a ship of Samos, wherein was Master, one Coleus, coming out of Egypt, put in there, and left Corobeus a years provision more for him and his company, and then putting to sea again; and being hurried with a strong wind, was set quite out beyond Hercules his Pillars into the main Ocean; and came unto Tartessus in Spain, Herod. l. 4. c. 151. 152.

The Thereans, out of their seven townes taken by lot, so many as should serve for that Colonie, sent them away to Platea, in two ships, under the command of one Battus, otherwise called Aristoteles, or Aristeus, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 151. 152.

Thales the son of Examius, was this year also born at Miletus in Ionia: in the 35 Olympiade: in the first year thereof: as Laertius reports out of Apollodorus his Chronicle.

The Cimmerians, being turned out of their dwellings by the Scythian Shepheards, called Nomades, passed out of Europe into Asia, and keeping on their way by the sea side, came at length to Sardes, where they took all the City save the Castle at what time Ardys the son of Gyges there reigned, [Her. l. 1. c. 15. & 130. and in his 4 book, c. 1. and 12.]

The Thereans, when they had dwelt in Platea now two years, leaving one of their com-swer was made them, that they were not yet come to the City of Lybia, whither they were bid to go, wherefore returning again to Platea, and taking in him whom they had there left, they sate them down in a place in the continent of Lybia, over against the Isle of Platea, called Aziristus; environed with most pleasant hills, and a river running under it on either side, [Herod. l. 4. c. 157.]

In that place near adjoyning to the gardens of the Hesperides, and the greater Syrt, or quick sand, the earth happening to grow moist, with a shower of rain of pitch, or sulphure there presently grew up an herbe called Sylphius or Laser. (i.e.) Beniamin, as the Cyreneans saye: which fell out seven years before the building of their city: [Theophrast. in his History of Plants, l. 6. Plin. in his natur. Hist. lib. 19. c. 3.]

Phraortes king of the Medes, dyed at the siege of Ninive with a great part of his army.
3369. After whom came his son Cyaxares, who reigned 40 years: in the beginning of his reign 4079. 635.
he purposed to revenge his fathers death, and making first all Asia, as far as the river Halys, fast unto him, he began his war against the Assyrians: [Herod. lib. 1.]

Josias, at the 16 year of his age, had a son called Eliakim, of Zebudda the daughter of Pe-

a. 23. 36.]

Yet he, when he came to be sixteen years of age, and though then a father, yet but a child, began to seek after the God of his father David, [2 Chron. 34. 3.]

Cyaxares overcame the Assyrians in battel, but when he went to besiege Ninive, a vast army of the Scythians fell upon him, to wit, those Scythians who having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, pursued their point, & departing from the lough of meotis, left the mountain Caucasus on their left hand, and entered media, under the conduct of their king Madois the son of Protothya, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. lib. 2. c. 1. and lib. 7. c. 20.] which was none other, than Indathyrsus the Scythian, which breaking out of Scythia, went over the belly of all Asia, till he came into Egypt; as Strabo, in the entrance of his Geography, reports out of Megasthenes, and Arrianus in his book, of the affaires of Judea, being of the same name with that Indathirsus, against whom Darius the son of Hystaspes afterward made such an unlucky voiage, as we read of in Herod. l. 4. c. 76. 126, 127. Here then the Medes being overthrowen in battel by the Scythians, lost the soveraignty of Asia; which the Scythians held for 28 years after, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. and lib. 4. c. 1.] To which Tremellius and Junius refer that prophecie of Nahum, [c. 2. 5.] He (to wit, Cyaxares, besieging Ninive) shall reckon up his great men; but they shall fall in their perambulation: to wit, in the perambulation of the Scythians; whose coming at this time into Asia might well be termed a perambulation, or sodain passing through, rather than any settled government or kingdom in Asia; as those who in the space of 28 years over-ran, possest, and lost Media, Assyria, and all Asia, They shall hasten to his wall, as if they would be his Protector, (i.e.) They shall come hastily to Ninive, as if they had delivered it out of the hand of Cyaxares, and would deliver it.

In this year was born unto Josias, Shallum or Jehoachaz, by Hamital the daughter of 4081 it seemeth, being, for good lucks-sake, changed into Jehoachaz, which otherwise had been the same with Shallum the son of Jabesh, who, having reigned not past one moneth, was murdered by Manahemus, [1 Reg. 15. 13, 14.] for of four sons which Josias had, mentioned, [1 Chron. 3. 15.] it is manifest, out of [Jeremy 21. 11, 12. compared with 2 Reg. 23. 30, 31.] that this Shallum is last named; not Johannanes the first born, as some have imagined; for that Jehoachaz was not the first-born is easily gathered, because it is said, that he was anointed by the people, [2 Reg. 23. 30.] because the first born of kings, were not wont to be anointed, upon whom the kingdom by common right descended; and also, by his age of 23 years, of which he is said to have been, at the time of his anointing: seeing that when his brother Eliakim, was at three moneths end set in his place, he is said to have been 25 years old, whereby it is manifest, that he was elder than this Jehoachaz, and so Josephus, in his tenth book of Antiquities, cap. 6. al. 7, affirms.

3373. Sadyattes the son of Ardyis, reigned in Lydia 12 years, Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 16. 4083. 631.

Those Scythians, having gotten all the upper Asia, went straight into Egypt, unto whom, when they were come as far as Syria Palestina, Psamitichus the king of Egypt came in person, and what by entreaty, what by gifts and presents, wrought so far with them, that they went no further that way. But when in their return they came to Askalon, which is in Syria, the greatest part of the army passing a long without hurt doing, some straglers coming in the rear, robbed the Temple of Venus Urania, whose posterity were ever after striken with the Emerodes, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 105.] But this year, which was the second of the 37 Olympiad, those Scythians invaded Syria Palestina; as Eusebius in Chron. notes, as also that Sinope, was this year built; which being the chief city, in all the kingdom of Pontus, was built by the Milesians, as Strabo in his 12 book saith, but by Macritius of the Isle of Coos, as Phlegon says, cited by Stephanus de Tribibus, in Sinope. But sure enough it is, that the Cimmerians, coming into Asia, when they fled from the Scythians, built Chersonesus, in the place, where Sinope a city of the Grecians now standeth, saith Herod l. 4. c. 12.

The men of Thera, in the 7 year after they were seated, and had dwelt in Aziristus, by the perswasion of the Libyans, removed from thence, and went to a place called Irasa, and there seated themselves, near to a fountain, which was called after Apolloes name, [Her. lib. 4. cap, 158.] and there Battus, having built a city, which was called Cyrene, in the second year of the 37 Olympiade, reigned 40 years, and after him his son Arcesilaus, 16 years, with those of the first plantation onely; but afterward in the reign of Battus the second Arcesilaus his son, there went thither a great multitude of other Greeks, stirred up thereto, by the oracle of Delphos, at what time Apryas reigned among the Egyptians, [Herod. ib. cap. 159.] which concurrence of the reign of this Egyptian king, sheweth, that what I have said of the time, when the city of Cyrene was built, is much truer, than what others have variously written of it.

3374. c. Josias in the 12 year of his reign, began to cleanse Juda and Jurasalem from that filth of Idolatry, wherein they had so long lain, and from the high places and groves, and altars of Baal, with the images which were openly placed on them, destroying their graven and molten images, and burning the bones of their priests upon their own altars, and and then proceeding to their cities of Manasses, Ephraim and Symeon, as far as Nephthaly, he threw down all the altars and groves, and graven or carved images; and all their statues, which stood without doors, did he demolish and deface, throughout all the land of Israel, [2 Chron. 34. 3, 7.] 4084. 630.

3375. c. Jeremias, in the 13 year of king Josia, was called by God to his prophetical function; but refused to take it upon him: til being called thereto the second time, & strengthened withall by sundry promises, and signs belonging to the office and function of a prophet, he was bid to fore-warne the Jews, of the calamitie, which was to be brought upon that place, by the king of Babylon, [Jer. 1. 2. 17. with c. 28. 3.] to whom was also joyned the prophet Zephany, and others, all who sought to move that rebellious people, to repentance, but could not, [Zeph. 1. 1. Jer. 25. 3, 4, 5.] 4085 629

Prusias, or Prusa was built in Bythinia, [Euseb. Chron.] 626

3378. Nabopolasur of Babylon, who was made General of the army by Saraco, al. Chinaladanus king of Assyria and Chaldæa, and Astyages, who was made Governour of Media, by his father Cyaxares, entering now into affinity, by Astyages, his giving his daughter Amyitis in marriage unto Nebucadnesar the son of Nabopolasar, joyned their forces together, and took the city of Nineve, and therein Saraco the king, (as we gather out of a fragment of Alexander Polyhistors (misunderstood by Georgius Symelius, who cites it in Grac. Scalig. p. 38, 39.) And as we also find in the end of the book of Tobit, in the Greek copie, that Nabuchodonosor, al. Nabopolasur, and Assuerus: al. Astyages, called also Assuerus, [Dan. 9. 1] whiles Tobit the younger was yet living, who when Salmanasar took Samaria, being together with his father, by Salmanasar carryed away into Assyria, is said to have lived to the age, of 127 years, whereas 95 years passed, from the captivity of Israel, unto this time, and so, Josias yet reigning, (as Jerom also, in his commentaries upon the prophet Jonas affirmes) Nineve was destroyed, and the propheeies both of Nahum and Esay, concerning the destruction of Ninive, were fulfilled, whereof as of a thing 4088. 629.

already come to pass and done, there is a most elegant description in the 31 ch. of Ezekiel.
Saracus therefore being now dead, Nabopollasar took into his hands the kingdom of Chaldæa, as Polyhistor, expressely sayes; which he held by the space of 21 years, as Berosus in his third book of the Affaires of Chaldæa; and Ptolomy, in Reg. Can. affirms.

3379. Sadyattes king of Lydia, invaded the territory of the milesians, with his army, and continued that war for six years space. 4089. 625.

3380. d. Josias in the 18 year of his reign, gave charge to Hilkia the high priest, that with the money which had been collected, he should repaire the house of the Lord, and he, falling in hand therewith, found the original book of the law, which was at the first laid up in the side of the Ark of the covenant, [Deut. 31. 26.] and which seemeth to have been missing ever since the beginning of Manasses his reign: and having found it, sent it by Shaphan the scribe, to the king. Josias, having heard the book read all over to him, asked counsaile thereupon of Hulda the prophetesse; who foretold him, that that kingdom should certainly be destroyed; yet not whiles he lived; [2 Reg. 22. 3. 20. 2 Chron. 34. 8, 28.] whereupon the king calling to him the elders of Juda and Jerusalem, with the priests and prophets, caused that book of the Law to be read over before all the people, renewed the covenant, between God and the people; and again, cleansed the city from idolatry, and throughly restored the worship of God, [2 Reg. 33. 1, 14. 2 Chron. 34. 29, 30.] demolished the altar and high place, which Jeroboam the son of Nebat had set up, having first burnt the bones of the dead upon the altar, as had been expressely foretold it should come to passe, 350 years before, [2 Reg. 13. 2.] And when he had taken away the altars which the kings of Israel had built in the cities of Samaria, and had slain all their priests, and burnt dead mens bones upon them, he then returned to Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 23. 15, 20.] And from this solemn renewing of the covenant, and general reformation of religion, joyning therewith, that inevitable decree of desolation, which was to ensue, for the sins of the people, is deduced the Epocha or, beginning both of the 30 years, spoken of in the first of the prophecie of Ezekiel, and also of the 40 years of the iniquity of Juda, [c. 4. 6. of the same book.] 4090. 624.

3381 Josias, in the same 18 years of his reign, toward the end thereof, 14 day of the first moneth (our May 4. being munday) in the presence of all Juda and Israel, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, kept the feast of the passeover, with more solemnity, than ever had been done by any of the kings of Israel or Juda in former times, [2 Reg. 23. 21, 22, 23. 2 Chr. 35. 1. 19.] to conclude, he took away all witches and sooth-sayers, all Images and dung-hil gods, and all the abominations, which were found in the land of Juda, & in Jerusalem, that he might performe all the words which were written in the book that was so found by Hilkia the priest, in the house of the Lord, [2 Reg. 33. 24. with Deut. 18. 9, 10, 11.] 4091. 623.

3383 Toward the later end of the 5 year of Nabopolassar; (which is the 127 from the Epoch of Nabonazar,) upon the 27 day of the moneth Athyr, of the Egyptians, drawing on to the 28 thereof, the moon entred into an Eclips at Babylon, beginning 5 measured hours after midnight; Ptol. Syntax. p. 125. in the Greek edition, to wit, 22 of April, according to the Julian Calender, falling on a Saturday, or the 27 of Athyr, drawing to an end; which was our Friday, for that is Ptolomies meaning, when he saith, that it was from κζ εἰς τὴν κη (i. e.) from the 27 to the 28, being in all, six measued hours after midnight of the 27 day, to the sun-rising, when the 28 day was to begin. 4093. 621.

3384. Hammutula bare unto Josia, after Shallum, or Jehoachaz, Mattania also, who was afterward called Sedechias, for he was 21 years old when he began to reign, [Jer. 21. 2 Reg. 24. 17. 18.] 4094. 620.

Xenophanes Colophonius, chief of the sect, of the Eleatic discipline in Philosophy, ἐγένετο, (i.e.) was begotten as Elius Empiricus saith, in his first book, contra Mathematicos, c. 12. or ἐγεννήθη, as is more rightly related out of Apollodorus, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1 Strommat. (i.e.) was born, in the 40 Olympiade.

3385. After Sadyattes, his son Halyattes, the younger reigned in Lydia 57 years, of which he spent the first 5 years in prosecuting the war which his father had commenced against the Lydyans, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 17, 18, 25.] 4095 619

3387. c. Jehojakim son of Josias, had a son, by Nehesta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, called Jehojakim, al. Jeconia, who was 18 years old when he began to reign, [2 Reg. 28. 8.] 4097. 617.

3388. Neco, the son of Psammitichus, reigned in Egypt 16 years, [Herod. l. 2. c. 159.] who in the scripture is Neco or Pharao Neco, [2 Chr. 35. 24. 2 Reg. 23. 29. Ier. 46. 2.] This man began from the Nile, into the gulf of Arabia, in which work he spent the lives of 120 thousand Egyptians. But giving that work off in the midst of it, he sent certain Phænicians, to saile round about Africa, and they setting saile out of the gulf of Arabia, or the red-sea, went into the southern sea; and compassing about the coast, came at length, into the streit of Gibraltar, and so returned into Egypt, in the third year after they set out, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 158. and lib. 4. cap. 52.] 4098. 616.

3390. In the 12 year of the war between the Lydians and the Milesians, when the Lydian army had burnt the harvest of the Milesians, as commonly every year they did, it happened, that the flame, driven by force of the winde, caught in the Temple of Minerva in Assesus, and burnt it to the ground, and when at the return of the Army, Halyattes, was 4100 614.

fallen sick, and lay long of it, at length, he sent to consult the Oracle at Delphos, and had answer made him by the prophetesse there, that untill he had repaired the Temple, which his men had burnt, he should get no answer there. Thrasibulus, understanding what answer was made at the Oracle, by Periander the son of Cyphelus, tyrant at Corinth, with whom he was very inward; took order that at the coming of Halyattes his Ambassadors about that matter, all the Milesians should dispose themselves to all kind of feasting and merriment: whereupon Halyattes supposing that there was no want of any thing, but rather great abundance of all provisions; made a peace & a league of friendship with them; and instead of one temple which was before, he built up two temples of Minerva at Assesus: and having thereupon recovered his health, sent rich presents and offerings unto Delphos, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 19. 20, 22, 23, 24. with Polyanus, lib. 6. Strateg.] 4103 611

3393. Was the 17 Jubilie. ~~4102. 612.~~

4. 6. Anaximander Milesius, the son of Praxidemus, was born in Ionia. See hereafter in the year of the World, 3457. 4103. 611.

3394. 6. Neco king of Egypt, by Gods command went against the king of Assyria, who at that time made war upon him, to besiege Carchemish upon the River Euphrates, [2 Reg. 23. 29. 2 Chron. 35. 20, 21, 22.] or, as Josephus hath it; to fight against the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrown the Empire of the Assyrians, [lib. 10. Antiq. ca. 6.] And indeed that Carchemish, in the time of Sennachrib did belong to, and was possessed by, the Assyrians, appears in [Esay 9.] but that kingdom being ruined; it returned into the hands of the Babylonians: And as the king of Persia, having overcome Babylon and Assyria, [Ezra 6. 22.] was called king of the Assyrians; so here the king of Babylonia, having now gotten Assyria, was likewise called king of Assyria: besides that, Heathen authors also tell us, that Babylon was in former times part of Assyria, and the holy Scriptures teach us, that the kingdom of Chaldea was founded by the king of Assyria, [Esay 23. 13. See Num. 24. 22. Esay 52. 4. Nehem. 9. 22.] 4104. 610.

Iosias, unadvisedly engaging in this war was slain, [2 Reg. 23. 29, 30. 2 Chron. 32. 22. 23.] in the valley of Megiddo, which belonged to the tribe of Manasses, [Jos. 17. 11. Iudg. 1. 17.] to which that story of [Herod. lib. 2.] refers, where he saith, Σύρισι πεζῇ ὁ Νεκῶς συμβαλὼν ἐν Μαγδόλῳ, ἐνίκησε· μετὰ δὲ τὴν μάχην, Κάδυτιν πόλιν τῆς Συρίας, ἐοῦσαν μεγάλην εἷλε. (i.) Necos falling upon the Syrians with an army of foot, overthrew them in Magdala, and after the fight took Cadytis a great city of Syria: where learned Scaliger noteth, that this Kadytis was Kadesh, mentioned in [Num. 20. 16.] and conceives, that Magdala and Megiddo, stood near together: but because Magdala was the more noted place of the two, therefore that fight was said to have been there: as the battel fought by Alexander against Darius at Gaugamela, is commonly said by Writers to have been fought at Arbela, because Gaugamela was an obscure place. But what will we say, if Magdala and Megiddo were all one? and mean the place from whence that other Mary took her surname of Magdalen; for certain it is, that in [Mat. 15. 39.] where we read Magdalam, the Syrian renders it, Mageda: and the old Latine translation, Magedan; a name not much varying from Magiddo.

The good King being thus taken out of the world, whose life onely kept off the Babylonish captivity from that nation, [2 Reg. 22. 20.] a world of miseries growing on upon it, the last years Jubilie, was turned this year into lamentions: so that it grew almost into a common proverb, The lamentation of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo, [Zacha. 12. 11.] For not onely the whole people which was then living wonderfully bewailed the death of Josias; but even in after-time, a publick mourning for him was voluntarily kept, as if it had been ordained by a law: the Prophet Jeremy also, in rememberance thereof, wrote his mourning Song of Threnes, or lamentations, [2 Chron. 35. 24, 25.] wherein bewailing the calamities which were shortly to befall that people, as if he had then presently beheld them, in a most passionate manner, and pointing, as it were, with his finger, at the death of Josias; as at the source and original of all ensuing miseries, he useth these words: The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, is taken in their pits: of whom we said, under the shadow of his wings we shall live among the heathen, [Lament. 4. 20.] So that we may very justly question the first verse, or proeme of that book; which we find in the Greek and vulgar Latine translation: but contrary to Jeromes minde, prefixed before the Threnes or Lamentations of Jeremy; to wit: And it came to passe after that Israel was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem laid wast, Ieremy the Prophet sate down and wept, and made this lamentation in Ierusalem, and sighing and howling, out of the bitternesse of his heart, said: which whosoever made, should have remembred that saying of the Wiseman, Add not to his words, that he blame thee not, and thou be found a liar, [Prov. 30. 6.] There was also a second Song of Lamentations for the miserable condition of the kingdom of the Jews, after the death of Josias, composed by the Prophet Ezechiel, and appointed to be sung, [Ezech. 19. 1, 14.]

After the death of Josia, the people, fearing least the King of Egypt should invade the kingdom in the vacancy of a king, anointed his youngest son Shallum or Jechoachaz, to be their king: And he presently fell to doing of that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: even as his forefathers had done, [2 Reg. 23. 30, 31, 32. 2 Chron. 36. 1.] See before in the year of the World, 3371.

Neco at his return from his voyage into Assyria, removed Shallum from the throne, when he had reigned onely 3 moneths, and made Eliakim his elder brother King in the roome of his father Josias, changing his name into Jehojakim, [2 Reg. 23. 31, 32, 34. 2 Chron. 36. 2, 3, 4.] that thereby he might testifie to the World, that he ascribed the victory by him gotten against the Assyrians to the Lord Jehovah onely, as he formerly professed that it was he by whom he was sent against him, [2 Chron. 35. 21, 22.] and then imposing a tribute of one hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold, upon the land of Juda: he put Shallum or Jehojakim in fetters at Ribla, and carried him away with him prisoner into Egypt, where also he ended his dayes, [2 Reg. 23. 33, 34, 35. 2 Chron. 36. 3, 4. Ezech. 19. 3, 4.]

The Prophet Jeremy, going by Gods appointment to Shallum, the new Kings Palace, earnestly moved both him, and his Courtiers, and all the people, what with promises, what with threats from Amighty God, to a newnesse of life: foretelling them, that Shallum or Jehojakim should be carried away captive into Egypt, saying, weep not for him that is departed (meaning Josia) nor make lamentation for him; but weep for him that is to depart: (that is Shallum) because he shall return no more to see his native soile, [Jer. 22. 1, 2, 10, 11, 12.]

3395. a. In the beginning of the reigne of Jehojakim, Jeremy, commanded by God, went and stood in the court of the Temple, and there exhorted the people (assembled out of all the cities of Juda; to bow themselves there before the Lord; (it being then the feast of Tabernacles, wherein all the males out of the cities were bound to appear at Jerusalem, Deut. 16. 16.) to repentance; and when they would not, he denounced the judgement of God against them, saying, That that House should become as Shilo: and that city should be accursed among all the nations of the earth: Whereupon, he was presently apprehended by the Priests and Prophets, and all the people that were then in the court; and accused as a man worthy of death: but was acquitted and set at liberty by the publick judgement of the Princes and Elders, [Jer. 26. 1, 2, 19.] 4105 609

3305 Uria also the son of Shemaria, of Kiriath-jearim, prophesied against Jerusalem, and the land of Juda. agreeablely to the sayings of the Prophet Jeremy; and when Jehojakim the King sought to put him to death, he fled into Egypt. But the King sent after him Elnathan the son of Achor, and others with him who overtook him, and brought him back to the King, and he put him to the sword, and threw his carcasse among the vilest sepulchres of the common people; yet Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, who had formerly been a man of great authority with king Josia, [2 Reg. 22. 12. 2 Chron. 34. 20.] stickled so well for the Prophet Jeremy, that he was not delivered over into the hand of the people to be put to death, [Jer. 26. 20. 24.] 4105. 609.

To these I might adde the Prophet Habakkuk; to whom, when he complained of the stubbornnesse of the Jews, God made this answer: That he would shortly send the Chaldeans into Judea; and further declared his purpose concerning that matter, in these words, I will do a work in your dayes, which you will not believe when it shall be told unto you: For behold I will stir up the Chaldeans, a firce nation, and a swift: which shall walk thorough the breadth of the land, to possesse a land which is none of theirs as their own inheritance, [Habakkuk 1. 5, 6.]

In the beginning also of the reigne of Jehojakim, Jeremy also foretold that Sedechia should be king of Juda, and Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon; and that he should subdue the neighbouring nations to his dominions, [Jerem. 27. 1, 11.]

3397. When the Governour of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, had revolted from Nabopolassar king of Babylon, father to Necho, king of Egypt, after the taking of Carchemish; Nabopolassar sent against them his son Nebuchadnesar (having first associated him in the kingdom) with a great army: and that this was done in the later end of the third and beginning of the fourth year of Jehojakim king of Juda, is gathered by comparing the [1 cap. v. 1. of the Prophet Daniel, with the cap. 25. 1. of Jeremy.] 4107. 607.

3397 When Nebuchadnesar was associated with his father in the kingdom, the things which he was to act, were presently revealed unto Jeremy: the first whereof was the overthrow of the Egyptians; first at the River Euphrates, then in their own country, and that Nebuchadnesar should make himself master of it, [Jer. 46.] The first whereof came to passe almost immediately; Pharao Neco his forces, which he left at Carchemish being cut off by Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon, in the 4 year of Jehojakim, [Jer. 46. 2.] The second was not till after the taking of Tyre, in the 27 year of the captivity of Jeconia, [Ezek. 29. 17, 18, 19.] 4107. 607

In the self same 4 year of Jehojakim, which was the first of Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon; the Prophet Jeremy reproving the Jewes, for not harkening to the word of the Lord, which from time to time he had spoken to them, from the 13 year of King Josia, even to that present 4 year of Jehojakim; this, saith he, is 23 years, and for that they had shewed themselves stubborne and refractory to the admonitions and exhortations tions of himself, and all the other Prophets which the Lord had sent unto them: and then again told them of the coming of Nebuchadnesar upon them, and of their being carried away captives to Babylon, and that captivity to last 70 years long: which terme

6. Judea first, then the other nations there mentioned every one in his order, were to serve the King of Babylon: and that at last the kingdom of Babylon it self, should be destroyed, and the land of Chaldea exposed to desolation, [*Ier.*25.1,3,11,12.] of which 70 years mention also was long before made by the Prophet Esaiah, though more obscurely, when he spake of the destruction of Tyrus, [*Esai.*23.15,17.]

In the 4 year of Jehojakim, Baruc the son of Neria wrote in a book from the mouth of the Prophet Jeremy, all the words of the Lord which he had spoken to him concerning Israel and Juda, from the time of Josia until that day: and he read them in the house of the Lord, in the audience of the men of Jerusalem, and of all the Jews which were there assembled out of all their cities, in the day of the fast, [Ier. 36. 1,8.] to wit, of that solemn fast which was yearly kept upon the 10 day of the 7 moneth, [*Levit.*16.29. & c.23.27. & *Num.*29.7.] five dayes before the feast of Tabernacles; wherein all the males out of all the cities of Judea, were to appear at Jerusalem; as I have shewed before in the year of the World 3395. As for Baruc himself, who was extreamly amazed and afflicted in his soul, with the horror of these direful judgements which he had written, the Prophet comforted him, by the word of the Lord; over this calamity which was to be brought upon all flesh by the Babylonians, and assured him of his own life, in the middest of all these troubles, [*Ier.*45.1,5.] whereunto also perhaps all those consolatory speeches contained in 30 and 31 chapters of the same Prophet, and promises made concerning the restauration of the Church, may be referred.

The Rechabites, of the posterity of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, [2 Reg. 10. 15.] when Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon approached now unto Judea, for fear of the host of the Chaldeans and Syrians, leaving their tents (wherein, by the rule of their forefather Jonadab, they were wont to remain and dwell) came into Jerusalem [Ierem. 35. 11.] whence (seeing they speak of the present time; so we do now remain in Jerusalem) we gather, that the matter of this chapter which concerns the Rechabites refusing to drink wine, was in agitation, at what time the city was besieged round, by Nebuchadnesar, [Dan. 1. 1.]

God therefore gave up Jehojakim the King of Juda, into the hands of Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon, with part of the furniture of the House of the Lord, [Dan. 1. 2.] to wit, in the 9 moneth called Cisleu: as may be collected out of the anniversary fast, which in remembrance, as it seemeth, of this calamity, by a received custom of the Jews, [*Zachar.*7. 3, 5. and chap. 8. 19.] was kept in this moneth, [Jer. 36. 9.]

Nebuchadnesar put Jehojakim at first in chaines, to carry him away to Babylon, [2 Chron. 36. 6.] but afterwards, upon submission, and his promises of subjection, he left him in his own house: where he lived his servant 3 years. From which entering of the King and people of the Jewes into the subjection and service of Nebuchadnesar, are the 70 years of the captivity of Babylon to be reckoned, which were foretold by the Prophet Jeremy, [Ier. 25. 11. and c. 29. 10.]

Nebuchadnesar gave order to Ashpenash the over-seer of the eunuches, or pages, that he should carry from thence of the children of Israel, both of the blood-royal, (as was expressely foretold by Esay the Prophet to Ezechia it should come to passe, Esay 39. 7.) as also of the noblest families, the choicest boyes, both for beauty and wit, that he could find: which being by his care educated 3 years in the language and sciences of the Chaldeans, might be thought afterward fit to stand before the King, and serve in his Palace: among whom of the tribe of Juda, were Daniel, who was Beltshazar, Hananiah, who was Shadrach, Mishael, who was Meshach, and Anania, who was Abendego: every of them having his name changed at the discretion of the overseer, or master of the Eunuchs, [Dan. 1. 3, 7.]

Now after those Scythians of whom I spake before, had taken their pleasure in Asia 28 years, Cyaxares and the Medes feasting them, and making them all drunk upon a certain day, cut all or the greatest part of their throats, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 106.] Besides which, certain other Scythians of the Nomades or Shepherds, being driven out of their own country by a contrary faction, had been entertained by Cyaxares, and by him imployed, partly in hunting, partly in the educating of children: who being roughly and basely used by him, and also, as it seems, repining at the general massacre of their other country-men, killed one of the boyes which they had taken to educate and instruct; and dressing the flesh of him for venison, set it before Cyaxares and his guests to eat: which done, they fled away speedily to Halyattes the King at Sardes, and put themselves under his protection; whom when Cyaxares demanded to be given up unto him, and Halyattes refused to deliver them; there grew thereof a war between the Medes and Lydians, which lasted five years, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 73. 74.] As for the Cimmerians of whom I spake before in the year of the World, 3368, Halyattes himself drave them out of all Asia, [Herod. ib. ca. 16.]

3399. a. In the 9 moneth of the 5 year of Jehojakim, there was a ſolemn faſt before the Lord 4109 605 proclaimed to all the people at Jeruſalem, in rememberance, as it ſeemeth, of the taking of the city by the Caldeans the year before in the ſame moneth. Where Baruc ſtanding at the gate of the Houſe of the Lord, read all the words of the Lord, which he had taken from the mouth of Jeremy the Prophet, out of a book, in the audience of all the people, who were then aſſembled at Jeruſalem out of all the cities of Juda; whereof the Princes being advertiſed by Micah the ſon of Gemaria, called Baruc unto them; heard him read the ſame book, and for fear of the King, adviſed Jeremy and him, to hide themſelves out of the way: But the King himſelf, having heard ſome part of the book read unto him, firſt cut the book thorough with a pen-knife, and then hurled it into the fire, that was in the chimny, and burnt it, [Jer. 36.9, 25.] in memory of which deteſtable act of the King, the Jews to this day keep a faſt, upon the 7 day of the 9 moneth called Caſlu.

And Jehoiakim, having burnt the book, gave order to Jerochmeelie his ſon, and to Seraia the ſon of Azriel, and to Shelemia the ſon of Abdiel, to apprehend Baruc the Writer, and Jeremia the Prophet: But God hid them, and againſt that impious King thou written therein, that the King of Babylon ſhall ſurely come, and ſhall lay waſt this land, ſo that there ſhall no man nor beaſt remaine therein? Therefore thus ſaith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim King of Juda; There ſhall none of his ſit upon the throne of David; and his carcaſſe ſhall be thrown out and expoſed to the ſcorching of the day, and freezing of the night; and I will puniſh the wickedneſſe of him and of his ſeed, and ſervants: and I will bring upon them, and upon the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, and upon all the men of Juda, all the evil which I ſaid I would bring upon them: to wit, in that book, which they had burnt. Afterward by Gods appointment, Baruc wrote again from the mouth of the Prophet Jeremy, the ſame words, which he had written in the former, adding many like things thereto, [Jer. 36. 26, 32.]

Nebuchadneſar, following the point of his victory gotten, took from the Egyptian all that ever he poſſeſſed, between Egypt and Euphrates, ſo that from thence forward, Neco was faine to keep himſelf within his own bounds of Egypt, [2 Reg. 24, 7.] Mean while his father Nabopolaſſar, falling into infirmities, in the land of babylon, died: when he had reigned 21 years. Which no ſooner came to Nebuchadneſars eare, but he giving order for the bringing away of the captives, as well of the Jews, as others; Syrians, Phœnicians, and Egyptians, to Babylon, with the army and baggage; poſted with a ſmall company the neareſt way thorough the deſert, and came to Babylon before them; who being received as ſole Lord, of all his fathers large Dominions, he diſpoſed the captives, when they were brought, here and there, by way of colonies as he thought fit. [Beroſus lib. 3. of the affairs of Chaldea,] of the veſſels alſo, and other furniture of the Temple Nebuchadneſar, took away with him to babylon what he thought fit: and diſpoſed of them in the temple of his god, [Dan. 1. 2. 2 Chron. 36. 7.] to wit, Belus; whom he called his Progenitor; as Abydenus in his Aſſyrian Hiſtory, and Broſus alſo tells us, that he did wonderfully enrich and adorne that Temple, with the ſpoile which he had taken in that war.

The remainder of the Scythians, which had eſcaped the ſlaughter of the Medes returning home, were met by a great army of luſty young-men, which had been begotten on their own wives, in their long abſence, by their ſlaves: with theſe they fought many a ſharp battel: but at laſt, laying aſide their ſwords, they took every man a whip in his hand, as more proper for the correction of ſlaves, and thereby made them all to flee. [Herod, in the beginning of his 4 book.]

3401. a. Jehoiakim, when he had lived 3 years in ſubjection to the King of Babylon, according to his allegeance, fell off and rebelled againſt him, [2 Reg. 24. 1.] 4111. 603.

Daniel and his three followers, when, refraining the diet provided them of the Kings allowance, they dined onely of pulſe and water; yet were they found to look more lively and fair of complexion, than the reſt which did eat of the Kings fare. And when at the three years end, they were brought to Court to attend the King, they appeared in all matters of knowledge, wiſdom, and ſciences, which the King was pleaſed to ask them in, far and far, to excell, all the Magi, and Aſtronomers that were in his kingdom, [Dan. 1. 5, 20.]

In the ſecond year of his kingdom, or of the Babyloniſh Monarchie, begun by his father Nabopolaſſar, Nebuchadneſar, dreampt his dream, of the great Image, made of divers mettals: and forgetting his dream, what it was, would needs know of his Magi and Aſtronomers, both what his dreame was, and alſo what it meant: and when they could not ſatisfie him in ſo unreaſonable a demand, he commanded them all to be put to death. But Daniel, when he ſaw the execution preparing, and underſtood the cauſe thereof, moved the King to forbear a while; and joyning in prayer with his fellowes unto God, obtained both the dreame it ſelf, and alſo, the interpretation thereof to be revealed to him. He therefore declared to the King what his dream was, and alſo the four Monarchies which were in their order to ſucceed, which was the thing ſignified by that Image which he saw in his dream: whereupon the King enriched him presently with great gifts, and made him governour of all the Province of Babylon, and chief over all the wisemen thereof; and moreover at his request, made his three fellowes, Shadrach, Misach, and Abednego, principal officers in all that Province, [Dan. 2. 1, 49.]

3403. d. In the beginning of the sixth year of the war between the Medes and the Lydians, the victory enclining neither way; there fell out an Eclipse of the Sun, which Thales the Philosopher of Miletus had foretold the Ionians of. At which, both the foresaid armies seeing the day grown dark like the night, left off fighting, and afterward, by the mediation of Syennesis of Cilicia, and of Labynitus the Babylonian (which was Nebuchadnesar) they made a peace between themselves; and Halyattes gave his daughter Ariena, to Astyages the son of Cyaxeres to wife, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 74.] And that this Eclipse so foretold by Thales, fell out at the very instant, when Cyaxeres the father of Astyages and King of the Medes and Halyattes Cresus his father, and King of the Lydians, were in fight together, is confirmed by Endemus, in his Astronomical History; and Pliny also, speaking thereof, and giving the reason of the Eclipses of these two great stars, lib. 1. cap. 12. saith in this wise; Apud Græcos investigavit primus omnium Thales Milesius, olympiadis 48 anno quarto, prædicto Solis defectu qui, Alyatte Rege, factus est, U. C. an. 170. (i.) Among the Grecians, the first that found it out, (to wit, the reason of the Eclipses) was Thales the Milesian, who foretold the Eclipse of the Sun, in the 4 year of the 48 olympiade, which was in the reign of Alyattes, (for so the old copy reads it, not of Astyages, as the vulgar edition hath it) 170. years after the building of Rome. Clemens Alexan. lib. 1. strom. placeth this fight of Cyaxares, and Eclipse of the Sun, about the 50 olympiade; wherein he is far wide of the opinion of Endemus, whom he cites for it; for both the time assigned, as well by him as by Pliny, suites not with Cyaxares, but with Astyages his reign; and also out of Ptolomies, Sun and Moon-Tables, which are the same with those of Hipparchus, it appeareth plainly that the Sun was eclipsed in the 4 years of the 44 olympiade, to wit, in the 147. of Nabonasar, on the 4 day of the Egyptian moneth Pacon, (or 20 day of September, according to the Julian Calender, on a Sunday,) 3 hours 25 minutes before noon: And this Eclipse was of 9 digits, and continued almost two hours. 4113. 601.

3404. c. Psamnis the son of Neco reigned in Egypt 6 years. [Herod. lib. 2. cap. 161.] 4114. 600.

The Phocenses, setting saile out of Ionia, built Marseilles, upon the coast of Liguria in Italy 120. years before the sea-fight at Salamis: as Marcianus in his Periegesis reports out of Timeus; to wit, in the first year of the 45 olympiade, as both Eusebius delivers in his Chronicle: and Solinus in Polyhistor, though this latter confounds this first plantation of the Phocenses made in the dayes of Tarquinius Priscus, with their latter under Servius Tullus; whereof more hereafter in the year 3461. But the story of the wedding which gave occasion of the building of this City, is more at large set out by Atheneus, lib. 3. out of Aristotle, where he speaks of the common-wealth of the Marseilians, and by Justin in his 43 book out of Tro. Pomp. who relates the same thing, though differing in the names of the persons concerned therein.

Nebuchadnesars army consisting of troupes and companies of Syrians, Caldeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, going against Jehoiakim, wasted all Judea, [2 Reg. 24. 2.] leading away from thence 3023. prisoners, an. 7 of Nebuchadnesar, [Jer. 52. 28.].

Astyages or Asuerus, [Dan. 9. 1.] had issue by Ariena, (whom he married the year before,) his son Cyaxares; who was also called Darius, the Mede, and who was 62 years old when he succeeded Belshasser, (who was slaine) in the kingdom of the Chaldeans, [Dan. 5. 30, 31.] But Astyages, in the life time of his father, married Mandanes his daughter, borne of his former wife, to Cambyses son of Achemenes, King of Persia (as Xenophon sayes in his first book of the education of Cyrus) who derives his pedigree from Perseus; and of these two, the year following, was borne Cyrus: so that we may in no sort believe Ctesias, who contrary to Herodotus and Xenophon and others, agreeing with them, will in no wise have it, that Astiagas (for so he calls him) was any kin at all to Cyrus.

3405. c. Jehoiakim being taken prisoner by the Chaldeans, was thrown out without burial, that is, was buried like an asse: his carcasse being tugg'd and drawn out of the gate of Jerusalem, according as was foretold by the Prophet, [Jeremy 22. 18, 19. and chap. 36. 30.] though in reference to the common course of nature, he also may be said to have slept with his fathers, as he is, [2 Reg. 24. 6.] 4115. 599.

After him came his son Jehoiachin, who was also called Conias and Jeconias, and reigned 3 moneths and ten dayes in Jerusalem; and he also did what was evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Jehoiakim had done before him, [2 Reg. 24. 8, 9. 2 Chron. 36. 8, 9.] Against him therefore a most dreadful decree went out from God, in the end of the 22 of Ieremy, and as an Act to be entered of record, concluded in this wise. Write this man childlesse, a man which shall not prosper in his dayes; for none of his seed shall prosper to sit in the throne of David, nor reign any more in Juda, [Ier. 22. 30.] concerning which matter, more is to be read in Christophorus Helvicus his book of the Genealogie of Christ.

And at this time alſo, the propheſie of Jeremiah contained in the chapter following, [*c.*23] ſeemeth to have been uttered.

In the ſame year, after the ſending of the former army, came up the ſervants of Nebuchadnezar king of Babylon, to beſiege Jeruſalem. And when Nebuchadneſar himſelf came before the City, whiles his ſervants beſieged it: Jehojachim the king, with his mother Nehuſhta, a woman of Jeruſalem, and his ſervants and officers, with all his Courtiers, came forth to the king of Babylon: Him the king of Babylon took; in the 8 year of his reign over Babylon: and taking from thence all the treaſure, both of the Temple, and of the kings houſe, he brake in pieces all the golden veſſels and furniture, which Salomon had made for the Temple of the Lord; as the Lord, [Iſai. 39. 6.] had foretold; and the k. carried away king Jehojachim, unto Babylon; with his mother, and his wives, or women, and his Courtiers, and out of all Jeruſalem, the Magiſtrates, and every man of ſtrength, to the number of ten thouſand men: and all Carpenters and Smiths; leaving none behind him at Jeruſalem, beſides the poorer ſort of people: and out of other parts of the land, he carried away 7000 men of able bodies, and of Smiths and Carpenters, ten thouſand, all ſtrong men, and fit for the wars; all which were carried priſoners into Babylon, [2 Reg. 28.8,16. 2 Chron. 36. 10. Jer. 24. 1. and c. 29. 1, 2. Ezech. 17. 12.] among which captives, one was Mordecai of the tribe of Benjamin, the ſon of Jairus, [Eſth. 2.5,6.] and Ezechiel the prieſt, the ſon of Buzi, an other: Who therefore in his prophecie reckons the time all along from the beginning of this captivity, [Ezech. 1.2, 3.] which he alſo terms his own baniſhment, [c. 40. 1.] An Epiſtle ſaid to be Jeremiahs, is ſent to thoſe that were appointed to be carried away to Babylon, to beware of the Idolatry, which they ſhould ſee uſed in Babylon, [Baruc. 6.]

Whiles the king of Babylon thus raged in Judea, God prepared a worme, which in due time, ſhould eat out this ſpreading tree; the cry of this poor people entering into the ear of the Lord: O daughter of Babylon, waſted with miſery, happy ſhall he be that ſhall reward thee, as thou haſt ſerved us, who ſhall take thy children, and daſh them againſt the ſtones, [Pſal. 137.8.] For in this very year, was Cyrus the Perſo-Median born; whoſe father was a Perſian, and his mother a Mede, as I ſhewed before; of whom this very Nebuchadneſar, at the houre of his death, as Aby-denus hath it, uttered this prophecie, There ſhall come a Perſian Mule, who ſhall make uſe of your Devils, as his fellow-ſouldiers, to bring you into bondage: as alſo was foretold by that Oracle given to Crœſus,

When a mule King, ſhall to the Medes be borne, &c.

Which the Pythian Prieſtes interpreted to be meant of Cyrus, which was to be borne of a father and a mother of two divers Nations, a Perſian and a Mede: Herod. l. 1. c. 55. and 91.] but above all moſt plainly and truly our Iſaiah foretold, [c. 11.1,2.] that the Babylonians alſo ſhould have a time wherein to endure their hell of ſlavery; and that their children ſhould one day be daſht againſt the ſtones before their eyes, [c. 13. 16.] and that theſe miſerably captivated Jewes, ſhould one day be reſtored to their liberty; calling their deliverer ſo many years before by his proper name of Cyrus, [Iſa. 44. 28. and 45.1.] God himſelf giving the reaſon, of this his ſo unuſual a revelation, in theſe words; For my ſervant Jacob, and for Iſrael my choſens ſake, have I called thee by thy name, and given thee a ſurname, though thou haſt not known me, [Iſa. 45.4.]

As for the age of this Cyrus, we are beholding to Tully for it; who in his 1 book de Divinatione, cites it out of one Dionyſius a Perſian writer, in this manner; The ſun (ſaith Dionyſius) appeared to Cyrus in his ſleep, ſtanding at his feet, whom, when Cyrus thrice endeavoured to take in his hands, the ſun ſtill turned aſide, and went away: and the Magi, who are counted as wiſe and learned men among the Perſians, ſaid, that by his thrice offering to take hold of the ſun, was portended to him that he ſhould reign thirty years, which came to paſſe accordingly, for he lived to the age of ſeventy years, when he began not to reign till he was forty: From which dream perhaps, ſo expounded by the Magicians, Cyrus took his name; for, as Cteſias rightly ſayes, Cyrus in the Perſian language, ſignifies the ſun: So doth Plutarch, following him, in the life of Artaxerxes; and ſo doth Chur or Churſhid, in the Perſian Poets, as it is ſaid, unto this day. And out of this place of Tullies, compared with [Dan. 5.31.] it appears that Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares the ſon of Aſtyages, Cyrus his uncle, was born before him, and is therefore by Xenophon, in his book entitled, of the Inſtitution of Cyrus, lib. 6. brought in, ſpeaking in this manner, Ἐπειδὴ παρὼν τυγχάνω, καὶ πρεσβύτερός εἰμι Κύρου, εἰκός με ἄρχειν λόγου, (i. e.) ſeeing I am here preſent, and am elder than Cyrus, it is fit that I ſpeak firſt: And in the fourth of the ſame book, Cyrus writing to Darius, uſeth theſe words, συμβουλεύω δέ σοι, καίπερ νεώτερος ὤν, (i. e.) I adviſe you, though I be the younger of the two.

Nebuehadneſar, made Mattania, Jechonia his uncle and ſon to Joſia, king in Jeconia his ſtead, changing his name into Sedechia; which ſignifieth the Juſtice of the Lord; [Jer. 37. 1. 2 Reg. 24. 17.] for whereas he had made a covenant with him, and had taken an oath of allegeance from him, and Sedechia, had taken an oath by God to performe it, [2 Chron. 36. 13. Ezech. 17. 13, 14, 18.] by the impoſition of this name, his purpoſe was to put him in mind of the juſt judgement of God, in caſe he ſhould break it.

Sedechias reigned full 11 years in Jeruſalem, and did evill in the ſight of the Lord his God

God; nor did he humble himself before Jeremy the prophet, who spake unto him in the name, and from the mouth of the Lord; but stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart, that he might not return to the Lord God of Israel, [Jer. 1.3. and chap. 32.1, 2. 2 Reg. 24.18.19. 2 Chron. 36.11, 12, 13.] yea, all the chief of the priests, and the people of the whole land sundry wayes transgressed the law, polluting the house of the Lord, which he had sanctified in Jerusalem; nor would they hearken to the word of the Lord, which he spake unto them by the mouth of his prophet Jeremy, and other prophets, but despised them, and mockt the messengers, which God sent unto them, till the fire of Gods fury brake forth against his people, for that there was no remedy to heal them, [Jer. 37.2. 2 Chron. 63.14, 15, 16.]

After Jeconia was carryed away, God by a vision of two baskets of figs, signified to Jeremy, the carrying away of the new king Sedechia, and the remainder of the people, [Ier. 24.1, 2.8, 9.]

In the beginning of Sedechia his reign; the prophecie concerning the Elamites, both of their fall and riseing again, was uttered by the prophet Jeremy, [Jer. 49.34, 39.] For Nebucadnezar had taken from Astyages, the whole province of Elemais, with the city Susa, the Metropolis thereof, and which was seated upon the river Ulaie or Ulie; and annexed it to the Empire of Chaldæa, [Ier. 25.25. with Dan. 8.1, 2.] But afterward, these Elemites combining with the Medes, against the Babylonians, [Esay 21.2.] when Belshasar was destroyed, recovered their state again, under Cyrus, the anointed of the Lord; and their chief city Susa, was made by Cyrus, the seat of the Persian kingdom, as Strabo in his 15. book teacheth us.

When Embassadors came from the several kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon to Jerusalem, to visit the new king Sedechia, God willed Jeremy to deliver unto every of them chains and whips, to be presented to their several masters, and commanding them withall to submit themselves to Neubchadnezar; nor to give ear any longer, to their wizards and star-gazers, who advised them to the contrary: he advised also Sedechia, to hold him fast to the king of Babylon, and to beware of false prophets, and both by threats and promises, perswaded all sorts of the people, to submit unto, and obey the king of Babylon, [Ier. 39.]

After the carrying away of Jechonia, and the other captives, Sedechia sent Elhasham, the son of Shapsan, and Gemaria the son of Helkia, to Nebuchadnezar in Babylon; and by them also Jeremias gat a letter to be carryed, which he had written to the Elders, and Priests, and Prophets, and the rest of the people, which had been carryed from thence by Nebuchadnezar, king of Babylon; in which letter, the prophet instructeth them, how to demean themselves in that condition of captivity, wherein for the present they were; and comforts them, with a gracious promise of deliverance, at the expiration of the 70 years, and foretells them, of the grand calamities, which were to fall upon them, whom they had left behind them in Jerusalem, and of the miserable end which Ahab, the son of Kolaia, and Sedechia the son of Mahaselia, the two false prophets should come unto, [Ier. 29.1.2, 23.]

3406. Shemaja, sent letters, as it seems, by Sedechia his messenger, when they returned to him from Babylon, unto Zephania, (who was the second chief priest, 2 Reg. 25.18.) and the rest of the priests at Jerusalem, against what the prophet Jeremy had written in his to them: which being read in his hearing, he presently denounced a heavy judgement from God upon him, [Ier. 29.24, 32.] At what time also it seemeth, were uttered those notable prophecies of his, concerning the kingdom of Christ, and restauration of the church contained in the two following chapters, [30. and 31.] 4116. 598.

3407. This year was born Cræsus, the son of Halyattes, king of Lydia, begotten upon his wife, a woman of Caria, for it appeareth, that he was 35 years of age, when he began to reign, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 26. and 92.] 4117. 597.

3408. d. In the 5 moneth of the 4 year of Sedechia, Hananias a false prophet, prophecied, that at the end of two years, all the vessailes, and furniture of the house of the Lord, and Jeconia, and all the people, which were carryed away to Babylon, should returne and be brought home again: and when Jeremy gain-said him, he took a yoak of wood, from about his own neck, and brake it, saying, Thus shall the Lord break the yoak of Nebuchadnezar, within two years precisely, from off the neck of all the Nations: whereunto Jeremy replyed, That God, in stead of that wooden yoak, would lay an Iron one upon the neck of all these nations, under which they should bow, and serve the king of Babylon, [Ierem. 28.1.14.] 4118. 596.

3409. a. Hannania the false prophet, in the seventh moneth dyed, according to the fore-telling of Jeremy, Astyages, after the death of his father Cyaxares, reigned over the Medes 35 years, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 130. Dan. 9.1. and Tobit 14.17.] where he is called, Ahasuerus, or Asuerus. 4119. 595.

c. God by his prophet Jeremy, foretold that Babylon, and the land of Chaldæa should be over-run and wasted by the Medes and Persians: and re-comforts his own people with the sweet promises of their deliverance, [Ierem. 50. and chap. 51.]

Sedechia, in the 4 year of his reign, went, or rather, in his own stead, sent Seraia, the son of Neria, the son of Maaseia, prince of Menucha, to Babylon, to whom Jeremy delivered the foresaid prophecies, of the destruction of Babylon, written in a book to be first read, and then to be thrown into the river Euphrates, [Ier. 51.59.] with whom his brother Baruc, son also of Neria, the son of Moaseia, [Ier. 32.12.] Jeremy his pen-man, is thought also to have gone to Babylon.

d. Baruc is said to have read all the words of his own book, in the audience of Jeconia, the son of Jehojakim, and of all the captives, that were then dwelling with him at that time in Babylon, in the 5 year, (to wit, after Jeconia, his being carryed away to Babylon) in the 7 moneth, at the time when the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire, (Baruc. 1.2,3,4.] even in the same moneth, as it is thought, wherein, Jeconia giving himself up to the king of Babylon, Jerusalem was taken, and perhaps begun in part, to be set on fire by the Chaldeans: for I cannot assent to Severus Salpicius, who (grounding himself perchance upon this text) saith, that at this very time, Nebuchadnezar entered Ierusalem with his army, and laid both city and walls, Temple and all, eaven with the ground, in his first book of his Sacred History, yet the former guesse of Fran. Junius, concerning the quenching of the fire, and having the city, is somewhat more tolerable, than that of our Seminary priests at Doway is, where they say, that the whole time of the taking of Ierusalem, lasted eleven years before it was wholly burnt: to wit, from the time, when it was taken under Jeconia, till the time it was taken under Sedechia, and this book was written in the fifth year of that interval of time. But Hugo Grotius thinks, that the first writer thereof, here meant, the fifth year, after the carrying away of Jeconia, but that the rest of the burning of Ierusalem, was added afterward, by some other hand, who was of opinion, that Baruc never went to Babylon, till after the consuming of Jerusalem by fire, which fell out in Sedechia his reign.

In the beginning then of the 30 year, from that solemn renewing of the covenant, and restauration of the worship of God, in that memorable year, the eighteenth of Josia his reign, which falls in with the fifth year of the carrying away of Iehojachim, al. Ieconia, in the beginning thereof, in the fifth day of the fourth moneth, (upon the 24 of our Iuly, falling upon a Saturday) was the first vision from God shewed to Ezekiel, being then, among the rest of the company, carryed away to Babylon, by the river Chebar, called by Strabo and Ptolomy, Chaborra, [Ezek. 1.1,2,28.] and from hence was he sent, to execute the function of a prophet among the Iews of the captivity, unto whom, dwelling at Thel-abibi, near the river Chebar, when he was come, he sate him down, as a man besotted, for 7 dayes space: after which time, God again put him in mind of his charge, both with promises, if he undertook it, and with threats, if he refused; and then confirmed him, with a new sign shewed unto him; gave him courage and boldness by his word and ratifying his vocation by a new command, [Ezek. 2.& 3.]

The prophet is commanded to make a draught of the siege of Ierusalem, in a table of slate, and to lye a long upon one side 396 dayes, which was to be a type or prefiguration, of so many dayes, that the siege of the city of Ierusalem should last, and of so many years, of the iniquity of the house of Israel, [Ezek. 4.]

Psammis king of Egypt, returning from his journey which he had made into Ethiopia, shortly after died, and to him succeeded his son Apryes, who reigned 25 years, [Herod. lib 2. cap. 161.] and is the same, who in the scripture is called Pharao Hephra, [Ier. 44.30.] He with an army every way well furnished, having made an incursion upon the Isle of Cyprus, and upon Phœnicia, took Sidon by main force, and the rest of that country, by the very dread and terror of his name, and after a main victory gotten at sea, over both Cyprians and Phœnicians, returned into Egypt, with a huge spoile taken from them, [Diod. Sic. lib. 1.] And it is reported of him, that he was altogether of opinion, that no God was able to put him besides his kingdom, so sure he thought he had made it, [Herod. 2 cap. 169.] which in [Ezek. 39.3.] (as Tremelius hath noted) is in that allegoricall Prosopopeia, most elegantly expressed, The river is mine own, for I have made for it my self.

c. Ezekiel, when he had laien 350 dayes upon his left side, turned him on his right, and there lay 40 dayes more, which were for a type of as many years of the iniquity of Juda, [Ezek. 4.6.] to which we must also refer what is said in the fifth chapter, of the same prophecy, with the two chapters following.

a. In the sixth year of Jeconia his going into captivity, and fifth day thereof, (which was the 22 of our Septem, falling upon a Wednesday) God carrying away Ezekiel by the spirit, to Jerusalem, in a vision there, shewed him the infinite Idolatry there used; and the plagues which were to befall that city for the same, [Ezek. 8.1. and c. 9, 10, 11. ib.]

According to his foretelling, Pelatia, the son of Benaja died. God comforts the godly in their captivity in Babylon, by the sanctification of his presence, and with his evangelical promises for the time to come. The vision vanishing, the prophet is brought back by the spirit, to his people in Chaldea, and there declares to them, all that God had shewed him, [chap. 11.13, 25.]

God both by typical signes, and also in plain words foretels Sedechia his flight by night the the putting out of his eyes, his leading into captivity, his dying in Babylon; the carrying away of the Jews into captivity, and the calamities which they were to endure before their going, [Ezek. 12.] to which year also the seven following chapters belong: out of which we further understand, that Daniels name was at that time grown very famous for the continual prayers which he made for the people of the captivity, [Ezek. 14. 14, 20.] and that Sedechia, not regarding the covenant and oath which he had sworne, rebelled against Nebuchadnesar, [c. 17. 15, 17.]

In the 7 year of Jeconia his captivity, 10 day of the 5 month (27 of our August, being sunday) Ezechiel reproved the Elders, which came and requested him to aske counsel of God, for their grosse hypocrisie: and then foretells them of the calamities that were to come upon all flesh; pronounces Gods judgements upon the Idolaters, and gives sweet comforts to the godly, [Ezek. 20. 1.] to which the three chapters following, seem also to appertain.

After Battus the founder of the kingdom of Cyrene, succeeded his son Arcesilaus, and reigned 16 years, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 159.]

This fell out to be a sabbatical year; wherein the men of Jerusalem, hearing that Nebuchadnesar approached with his army, proclaimed liberty to their servants, [Jer. 34. 8, 9, 10.] according to the law, [Exod. 21. 2. Deut. 15. 1, 2, 12.] For Nebuchadnesar marching with his army against Sedechia, and having wasted all the country, and taken their strong holds, came now before the very walls of Jerusalem, [Joseph. Antiq. l. 10. c. 10.] For he had taken all the Cities of Juda, saving only Lachish, Azeka, and Jerusalem: all which, he besieged with all the forces which he could make out of all the lands of his dominions, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

But the siege of Hierusalem began not till the middest of winter, for in the 9 year of the reign of Sedechia upon the 10 day of the 10 month, (answering to our 30 of January, falling upon a thursday,) Nebuchadnesar with all his army came before Jerusalem: raising forts round about it, [2 Reg. 25. 1. Jer. 39. 1. c. 52. 4.] For a memorial whereof, not only during the captivity, [Zach. 8. 19.] but even unto this day there is a yearly fast kept among the Jews.

Upon the very self-same day, was the siege of Jerusalem, revealed by God to Ezechiel, being then in Chaldea; and the utter destruction thereof, represented to him by the type a seething pot; and his wife died that day in the evening; for whose death he was charged not to mourne: thereby signifying the grievous calamity of the Jewes, which was to surpasse all expressions of grief by mourning, [Ezech. 24. 1, 2. &c.]

Jeremiah the Prophet was commanded by God to foretell the utter destruction and burning of Jerusalem by the k. of Babylon, to Sedechia: and that he should be carried away prisoner to Babylon; and that there he should end his daies, and yet be honourably enterred, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

The Prophet for so saying, was by Sedechia clapt up, in the court of the prison of the kings house, where in the tenth year of Sedechia and beginning of the 18 year of Nebuchadnesar, having a promise of his delivery, made him by God, he recovered the land of Hanameel, his uncles son, by right of redemption, [Jer. 32. 1, 16.] and all things then came to passe which he foretold, and are conteined in the 32 and 33 chapters of his Prophecie.

Pharaoh Hophra, al. Vaphris, coming with his army out of Egypt, to relieve Sedechia, the Chaldeans raised the siege from before Jerusalem; and Sedechia sent messengers to Jeremiah (who upon the raising of the siege was set at liberty, and not yet cast into the dungeon, as afterwards he was,) to pray him to make intercession to God for the deliverance of the people; but the Prophet returned him answer, that those succours out of Egypt, should into Egypt returne again, and that the Chaldeans should returne to Jerusalem, and take the City, and destroy it by fire [Jer. 37. 3, 10.]

They of Jerusalem seeing the siege raised, and themselves quit of that fear, presently took back their Hebrew servants again, whom they had formerly set at liberty according to the law; and made them serve as before, contrary to their covenant; for which, as for a most impious and barbarous act, Jeremy reproved them; and to cry quittance with them for it, proclaimed a liberty to the sword and pestilence and famine, against them, telling them withall, that the Chaldeans, should come again to the siege, and should take their City, and destroy it with fire, [Jer. 34. 11, 22.]

But while the Chaldeans were away to encounter the Egyptian army, Jeremiah purposed to save himself by flight; but was prevented by the Princes, and taken and scourged, & cast into the Dungeon, which was in Ionathans house, & there lay a long time, [Jer. 37. 11, 16.] Nebuchadnesar, at his going against the Egyptians in the 18 year of his reign, took 832 men which had fled out of Jerusalem to him, for safegard, and sent them all away prisoners to Babylon, [Jer. 52. 29.]

Pittacus of Mitylene, one of the 7 wise men, was sent against Phrynon, sirnamed the Pancratiast, i. e. a man excellent in all feats of chivalrie, and the Olympionicest, i. e. one that had won the bell in the games at Olympus; and at that time, General of the Athenian army, and had taken two towns, Sigeum and Achilleum, from the Lesbians, with a Navie to Troas; in which battel, the Athenians, having gotten the victory, took the Target of Abræus, the Poet of Mitylene, who in flying had throwen it away, and hung it up in the temple of Minerva in Sigeum: Phrynon afterward challenged any man that durst encounter him to a single combat. Pittacus undertook him, and with a little net which he had hid privily under the hollow of his targer, caught him by the head, and so slew him with his three-forked Spear; forwhich service, when the Mitylenians offered him a large proportion of land, he desired no more of it, than so far onely as he could throw his Spear; wherein he afterward built a temple, which from him was called Pittacium. This story seems to be mangled and is imperfect in Herodotus, [lib.5.ca.95.] but that defect in him, is supplyed by Plutarch, in his book entitled, De malignitate Herodoti, (i.) of the envy, or spightfulnesse of Herodotus, together with [Strabo, lib. 13. Polyenus, lib. 1. Festus, in the word, Retiarius (i.) a fighter with a net: and Diogenes Laertius, lib. 1.] who tells us, that the Mitylenians for that service made him their Prince, or Soveraign, of their own accord, 20 years before he died: which, as he there saith, was in the third year of the 52 olympiade: and which upon a due account I chuse rather to place in the 3 year of the 57, than with Eusebius, upon the 2 year of the 43 olympiade: though that seems more to favour his opinion, because in the Catalogue of the Stadionicests, (i.) of those which gat the prize in running, Phrynon, is said to have gotten it in the 36 olympiade. Neither yet was the war ended by this duel; but the matter of their quarrel being referred by both parties to Periander of Corinth, who was also reckoned an other of the seven Wisemen of the world; as to an indifferent Arbitrator, he ordered, that each party should hold what they had then in their possession: (i.) that the Mitylenians should keep the Town of Achilleum, and the Athenians Sigeum, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 94. 54. Strabo lib. 13.] which Periander, as Laertius in his life, out of Sosicrates shews, died, 6 years after this, and before the 49 olympiade; which bewrayes Herodotus his error in his account of times, where he makes this peace so made between the Athenians and Mitylenians, not to have been till toward the latter end of the Pisistratidæ, or successors of Pisistratus in the government of Athens.

3415. In the 10 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, and on the 12 day of the 10 moneth, (upon our Feb. 1 falling upon a Sunday) Ezechiel uttered his prophesie against Pharao 4125. 589.
b. and all Egypt: that he should prove but a staffe of reed to the house of Israel; for he had all in vaine already attempted to relieve them, and first for Pharao Hophra or Apryes himself, that he should have an overthrow given him in the Desert of Lybia by the Cyrenæans, (as we shall see anon in the year 3430. of the World) and then for Egypt it self; that it should be miserably wasted by the Babylonian; and that, that desolation should last 40 years, [Ezech. 29. 1, 16.]

c. When Nebuchadnesar had routed the Egyptian army, he presently returned to the siege of Jerusalem about the 15 day of the 3 moneth, to wit, 30 dayes before he took it: as we may gather out of that type or representation of, [Ezech. 4. 5, 8.] But then Ieremia, being consulted with by Sedechia, told him that he must be given up into the hands of Nebuchadnesar: and he then, at Ieremies humble suite, commanded him to be removed out of the Dungeon of the prison in Ionathans house, into the court of the prison; and that he should have a rowle of bread daily out of the bakers street, so long as there was any bread left in the city, [Ier. 37. 17, 21.]

d. The siege continuing, Sedechia sent again to Ieremy; but he still sent him the same answer, that both King and people must fall into Nebuchadnesars hands: that they who would stay in the city should perish, either by the sword, or by famine, or by pestilence: but they that would go out, and submit to the King of Babylon, should have their lives saved; and be glad with that, [Ieremy 21.]

For this answer, the Princes cast Ieremy into Malchias his Dungeon, which was in the court of the prison; from whence, yet he was delivered by the help of Ebed-Melech, one of the kings Eunuchs, and was again consulted by the king; and when he still continued in pronouncing judgment against the Land of Iudah, he was still kept in the Court of the prison, till the very taking of the City. [Iere. 38.] Where he assured Ebed-Melech, in the Name of the Lord; that he for his own part, should be free from all harme and danger in that general calamity, [Ier. 39. 15, 18.]

3416. In the 11 year of the carrying away of Ieconias, in the first day of the first moneth; 4126 588
e. as it seemeth, not of the 5 moneth, as Tremellius and Pradus would have it, (for that would fall upon the 12 year of Jeconia his carrying away to Babylon) God, by Ezechiel, foretold the city of Tyrus, which much rejoyced in the wretched condition into which Jerusalem was fallen, by the power of Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon, that she also should perish by the same hand, and in so dreadfull a manner, that all who had seen her former wealth and bravery should be amazed thereat: Foretelling the like misery to befall the Sidonians, their neighbours, to the glory of God, and good of his Church; concluding this whole prophesie with this assurance to her, [Ezech. 26. 1. and from thence to the end of the 18 chapter.] In all which prophesie this is also to be noted; that at that time the fame of Daniels wisdom was grown so great, even in forreigne nations, that they used to say, by way of a proverb; as wise as Daniel, from whence it was that God upbraiding Ithobolus King of Tyre, with his pride and arrogancy of his minde; Behold, saith saith he, thou art wiser than Daniel; no secret can be hid from thee, [Ezech. 28. 3.]

In the same year, the 7 day of the 3 moneth, (our 26 of April, upon a Tuesday) God revealed his will to Ezechiel, of sending and arming Nebuchadnesar against Pharao, to the ruine of Egypt, [Ezech. 30. 20, 26.]

In the same year also, upon the first day of the 3 moneth, (June 19. falling upon a Sunday) God declared that the Egyptian, could no more avoide his determination, than the Assyrian had done before him, [Ezech. 31.]

In the latter end of the 11 year of Sedechia, [Ier. 1. 3.] 9 day of the 4 moneth (27 of our Iuly, upon a Wedensday) when the famine grew strong in Ierusalem; the Citie was broken up, and the Caldeans entered it, [2 Reg. 26. v. 2, 3, 4. Ier. 39. v. 2, 3. and c. 52. v. 5. 6. 7.]

The City being taken, Sedechia, and all the men of war, fled away by night: but the Caldeans pursuing after them, tooke Sedechia, and brought him prisoner to Ribla, where Nebuchadnezzar lay, and where having seen his children slaughtered before his eyes, he had then his eyes put out, and being clogged with chaines of steel, he was carried away from thence to Babylon, [2 Reg. 25. v. 4. 7. Ier. 39. v. 4. 7. and chap. 52. 7, 11.] fullfilling therein the prophesies foretold of him, that with his eyes he should see the King of Babylon, [Jer. 32. 4. and chap. 34. 3.] but Babylon, he should not see, though he was to die there, [Ezech. 12. 13.]

Upon the 7 day of the 4 moneth (being of our August 24. Wedensday) Nebusaradan, Captain of the Guard, sent by Nebuchadnesar, made his entry into the city, [2 Reg. 25. 8.] and having spent two dayes in making provision, upon the 10 day of the said month, (our Aug. 27. falling upon the Sabbath) to which time perhaps he had purposely put off the execution of that his charge; he set fire on the Temple, and on the Kings Palace, and upon all the Noble-mens houses, with all the rest of the houses in Jerusalem, and burnt all down to the ground, [Jer. 52. 13. with chap. 39. 8.] though our Country-man Tho. Lydiate, thinks that fire was set on it, upon the 7 day; but not burnt down till the 10. In rememberance of which calamity, the fast of the 5 moneth was ordained to be kept, [Zach. 7. 3, 5. and chap. 8. 19.] which is observed by the Jewes unto this day: though kept by them, upon the 9 day, and not the 10 of the moneth Ab. But the Temple was destroyed in the 19 year of Nebuchadnesars reign, [Jer. 52. 12. 2 Reg. 25. 8.] in the latter end thereof, in the beginning of the first year of the 48 olympiade, in the 160 year, running of Nabonasars account, 424 years, 3 moneths and 8 dayes, from the time that Solomon laid the first stone thereof.

Upon the same 5 moneth, [Ier. 1. 3.] all the walls of Jerusalem being razed to the ground, all that were left in the City, and all that had formerly fled over to Nebuchadnesar, and all the common people of the City, with all the treasure of the King, and of his Nobles, and furniture of the Temple, did Nabuzaradan carry away unto Babylon, [Ier. 93. 8, 9. ca. 52. 14, 23. 2 Reg. 25. 10, 17. 2 Chron. 36. 18, 19, 20.] And thus was Juda carried away out of her own land, [Ier. 52. 27. 2 Reg. 25. 21.] 468 years after David began to reign over it; from the dividing of the 10 Tribes, from the Tribe of Juda, 388 years, and from the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, 134 years.

The Sixth Age of the World.

THe basest sort of the people of the land of Juda, and such as were nothing worth, Nebuzaradan left there, to dresse the vineyards, and to till the ground; over whom the King set Gedalia the son of Ahikam, a man of the same country, to govern them, [Ier. 39. 10. and chap. 42. 16. 2 Reg. 25. 1, 22, 23.] but without any badge of Regality, or Kingly title: because, as Severus Sulpitius, in his sacred History, saith, To have some preeminence over a few miserable boors, or paisans, was not reckoned to be any dignity at all.

Seraia the chief, and Sephania the secondary Priests; and the three Keepers of the gate of the Temple, and other principal men, Nebuzaradan took and carried them to Riblah, to Nebuchadnesar, and there were they put to death, [Ierem. 52. 24, 27. 2 Reg. 25. 18, 21.] but Jehosodake the son of Seraia, and who after him came to be high Priest, was carryed away prisoner to Babylon, [1 Chron. 6. 15.]

Jeremy being bound with chaines, was carried with the rest as far as Rama towards Babylon, and had there his irons knock't off, and was set at liberty, and had his choice given him whether he would go on to babylon, there to be honourably entreated, or stay in the country with that miserable crue, which was left behind; and he chusing to stay, was sent back to Gedalia the governour; who made his residence at Mizpa, in the Tribe of Benjamin, with money in his purse, [Ier. 39. 11, 14. and chap. 4. 1, 6.]

The captains and companies, which upon the first taking of the city, fled away by night, [2 Reg. 25. 4. Jer. 52. 7.] and were scattered over the country, and all the Jews, which had fled to the Moabites and Ammonites, and other nations adjoyning, returned after a while, to Gedalia, into their own countrey, where they gate good provision of Wine and Oyl, and other summer fruits to subsist withall, [Jer. 40. 7. 12. 2 Reg. 25. 23, 24.]

Ismael, the son of Nethania, of the race of the kings of Juda, being suborned by Baalis king of the Ammonites to kill Gedalia, came to him with ten resolute fellows to Mizpa, and were familiarly entertained by him, and he gave no credit to such as disclosed their treacherous intent unto him, which turned to his own destruction, [Jerem. 40. 13, 16.]

3417. a. In the 7 moneth, therefore Ismael with his ten companions, taking their opportunity, wickedly murdered Gedalia, and such Chaldeans and men of armes, as at that time he had about him at Mizpa, [Jer. 41. 1, 2, 3. 2 Reg. 25. 25.] In remembrance whereof, the Jews keep a fast unto this time, upon the third day of this moneth Tizri. And a day or two after, the same Ismael slew 80 men more, which clad in mourning apparel, brought offerings and frankincense from Sichem, Shilo, and Samaria to the house of the Lord, now lying in her own dust; and these, having drawn them by a sleight to Mizpa, they slew there in the open streats, and threw their carcases into king Aza his well, [Ier. 41. 4, 9.] 4127 587

As Ismael returned with the kings daughters, and the rest of the people which was left at Mizpa, his prisoners, to the king of Ammon, Johanan the son of Kareo, met him with a band of men; took away from him all his prisoners, and set them at liberty, and Ismael, with eight men onely in his company, fled to the Ammonites, [Ierem. 41. 10, 15.]

Johanan, and all his captains, with the rest of the people remaining about Bethlehem, for fear of the Chaldeans, had a purpose to flie into Egypt, [Ierem. 41. 16, 17, 18.] But went many of them to Jeremy, desiring an answer by him from God thereupon, and he from God, after ten dayes, brought them an answer, exhorting them all in his name, not to stir out of their own countrey : assuring them, if they stayed, of Gods protection there, and that no harme should betide them from the Babylonians, but if they went into Egypt, they should there, every man of them perish by sword, by famine, by sundry kinds of death. But the common sort, according to their old custom, of never obeying wholsome counsaile, nor Gods commands, went into Egypt; and, because needs they would have it so, Jeremy and Baruc the son of Neria, went thither with them; and when they were come as far as Taphnes, Jeremy there, declared to them in a figure, the destruction of Egypt, even by Nebuchadnezar, of whom they were now so much afraid, [Jer. 42. and 43. with Severus Sulpicius, in his Sacred History, lib. 2.]

b. In the 12 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, the 5 day of the 10 month, (our 25 Ian. being Wedensday) when tidings came to Ezekiel of the taking of Jerusalem, the prophet foretold of the utter destruction, which should befall the last remainder of the Israelites, (after those others which went into Egypt) even to those which remained in their desolate countrey, [Ezek. 32. 1. 16,]

In the same 12 year, in the first day of the 12 moneth, (March 22. being Wedensday) Ezekiel uttered his prophecy, concerning the grivous plague and affliction, which Nebuchadnezar should bring upon the land Egypt, [Ezek. 33, 1, 16,]

And upon the 15 day, the same prophet foretold, of Pharao, and all the tag and rag of Egypt, that they should be brought down as low as hell, with the rest of the uncircumcised nations, [Ezek. 32. 17, 32.]

Jeremy also prophecied of the destruction, which should follow the Israelites, at Migdol, not far from the red sea, [Exod. 14. 2.] at Taphnes, al. Daphne-Pelusium, at Noph; al. Memphis, and in Pathros, a countrey in Egypt : and for a sure sign of their own misery, gave them Pharao, al. Apryes, king of Egypt himself, whom they should see brought to all extremities before their eyes, [Ier. 44. 1. 30.]

Obadias the prophet uttered a prophecy against Edom, which shamefully insulted over the calamity of the Jews, when Jerusalem was destroyed, and the like did Jeremy, [49. 7. and Ezek. 25. 12,] and the authors of the Psalms, [79. and 137.] which wrote all about the same time.

3418. Cyrus, when he had lived 12 years, or somewhat more with his father in Persia, being sent for, with his mother Mandane, by his grandfather Astyages, came into Media, [Xenophon, lib. 1. of the Institu. of Cyrus.] 4128. 586.

3419 ~~4419.~~ Tyrus, (Ithobalus then reigning there) was besieged 13 years by Nebuchadnezar, as Josephus reports out of Philostratus and other writers of the affairs of Phoenicia. [Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 11. & lib. 1. cont. Apion.] And in the compasse of those 13 years, it seemeth, that the neighbouring nations, as the Moabites, the Ammonites, and Edomites, were also subdued by Nebuchadnezar, according to the foretellings of the prophet, [Ieremy in his 27, 48, 49. chapters, and of Ezek. cap. 25.] 4129. 585 ~~544~~

3420. Whiles Nebuchanezar lay before Tyre, which borders upon the land of Israel, [Jos. 19.29.] in the 23 of his reign, Nebuzaradan, captain of his guard, carryed away all the remainder of the Jews and Israelites together unto Babylon, to the number of 745 persons, [Ierem. 52. 30.] In which extreme depopulation, which left the very ground, untill the 390 years of the iniquity of Israel, distinct from Juda; and the 40 years of the iniquity of Iuda by it self, foretold by [Ezekiel 4. 5, 6.] were accomplished; and fully ended. 4130 584.

3421. When Cyrus was now almost 16 years of age, Evil-merodach, the king of Assyria his son, being about to marry a wife, called Nicotris, made an inroad, with a great army of horse and foot, upon the borders of Media, there to take his pleasure, in hunting and harrowing of the countrey: against whom Astyages, and Cyaxares his son, and Cyrus his grandchild; who then first began to bear armes, marched out, met with him, and in a battail of horse, overthrew him, and drave him out of his borders, [Xenophon lib. 1. of the institution of Cyrus.] 4131 583

Cyrus afterward, was called home, by his father Cambyses; when as yet he had one year to spend at Schoole, as Xenophon in the same book tells us, to which also that hath reference, which Athenæus, in his 14 book Dipnosoph. reports out of Dion; that Cyrus, when he had served Astyages, first, as one of his halbardiers, and then as one of his armour bearers returned into Persia, and that at the same time Angares a musician, when Astyages feasted his friends, sang them a song, wherein he said, That a fierce wilde beast, more fierce than any boar; was let go, and sent into a fenny countrey, and that he should reign over all those provinces, and should with a handful of men, maintain war against great armies, &c. and that thereupon, Astyages would fain have called back Cyrus again, but could not get him.

3422. Cyrus, when he had spent 17 years among boyes, spent ten years more among the youths, [Xenophon lib. 1. of the Instit. of Cyrus.] 4132. 582.

3424. In the 50 Olympiade, wherein Epitelides, the Lacedemonian, wan the race in running, certain men out of Cnidos, not Rhodes, and brooking the rough carriage, of the kings of Asia, agreed together, to make a plantation of themselves, some where else: and making one Pentathlus a Cnidian, (who deduced his pedegree from Hippotas, the son of Hercules,) they went for Sicily, at the time, when they of Egesta, and Selinunte, were in war each against the other: where Pentathlus taking part with the Selinuntians, was slain; and the rest, making Gorgus, and Thestor, and Epithirsis; all men of Pentathlus his linage and kindred, their captains, set saile again, and seated themselves 4134. 574.

Arcesilaus, when he had reigned 16 years, in Cyrenaica, left to succeed him his son Battus, surnamed Eudæmon; unto whom a huge multitude of Grecians, advised thereto by the Oracle at Delphos, repaired; wasted first the lands of the bordering Lybians, and then parted it among themselves: whereas before, the plantation made in Cyrene consisted onely of those, which came from the Isle of Thera, with their first founder Battus,

In the 25 year of the captivity of Jeconia, in the beginng of that year, (i. e.) in the first moneth thereof (as Jonathan the Chaldee Paraphrast expoundeth it) upon the 10 day of the moneth (our April 30. upon a Tuesday) 14 years after the destruction of Jerusalem, Ezekiel had a vision, of the restitution of the Temple, City, and Kingdom of the Israelites; portending the restauration of the Church by Christ, with the greatnesse, honour, and excellence thereof, [Ezekiel 40. 1. to the end of the chapter.] 4140 574

The Lybians, being put out of their lands and countrey, by the inhabitants of Cyrenaica, put themselves under the protection of Apryes king of Epypt: and he gathering a great army together, sent them against the Cyrenians, and the Cyrenians, pitching at a place called Irasa, near the fountain called Thestis, so routed the army of the Egyptians, that few of them were left to return again into Egypt, whereupon the Egyptians grew angry with Apryes, and revolted from him; supposing that he purposely sent them to that break-neck service, to be rid of them, that so he might the more easily, domineer over the rest that were left, [Herod. lib. 4. cap. 159, lib. 2. 161. *Diodor. Amasis, (being that Saits, so much spoken of by Plato in his Timæus) was sent by his father to appease this mutiny of the people; but they took and made him king, in his fathers stead. And Apryes, having sent a noble person, named Paterbanes to call back Amasis, at his return, cut off his nose and ears, because he brought him not with him. Upon which unworthy act of his, all fell off from him to Amasis his side, [Herod. lib. 2. cap. 162.] 4141, 573.

who governed them 10 years, as Iosephus affirmes out of the Annals of the Phenicians, [lib.1. contra Apion.]

In the 1 day of the 1. month of the 27 year of the captivity of Jeconia, (21 of April, upon tuesday with us,) God promised to give all Egypt to be Nebuchadnezar to be spoiled, in recompence of his long labour; endured in the taking in of Tyrus, [Ezech.29. 17,20.]

Cyrus having now attained almost the full age of 27 years, was taken out of the rank of the striplings, and reckoned among the number of full men, according to the discipline, and use of the Persians, [Xenophon, l. 1. of the Institution of Cyrus.]

Nebuchadnesar laying hold of the rebellion in Egypt, and peradventure solicited by Amasis to asist him against his Father Apryes, invaded Egypt with his army; and having gotten it into his hands, even from Syene, to the end thereof: made havock as well of the Egyptians, as of the Jewes which dwelt among them, killing some, and leading away the rest into captivity, according to the several prophecies of Jeremiah, [c. 43.44, 46. and Ezech. 29.30,31.]

Pharaoh Hophra, al. Apryes, being forced to retire into the Country of Thebais; Nebuchadnesar, as it should seeme, made Amasis his Viceroy, over all Egypt, though Herodotus knew not this: for as Scaliger well observeth in his notes, Ad Fragmenta: The Priests of Egypt, which informed him, of such things, as he desired to be satisfied in, told him so much only as made for the honour of their Nation, but concealed the rest, which bewrayed their cowardise and slavery, and paiment of tribute to the Chaldeans.

3434. Nebuchadnezar, having finished his conquests, returned to Babylon: and there, as he lay at ease, and in all kind of jolity in his own house, had that remarkable dreame, of the great Tree, (whose destiny was to be cut down) represented to him, the meaning whereof, when he could not learn by his wisards of Chaldea, the Prophet Daniel unfolded to him, [Dan. 4.] 4144. 570

Nebuchadnezar new built Babylon, in a wonderfull magnificence and beauty; building a whole new City without the old, and enclosing all, with a treble wall, made of brick: and in favour of his wife called Amyrtis, (of whom I spake in the year of the world, 3374) a woman of Media, and King Astyages his daughter, made that famous and so much renowned garden, borne upon pillars: of which Berosus; He built (saith he) that garden, called, the hanging Garden, because his wife desired the pleasure of the hills, as having been brought up in Media: And Q. Curtius; It is said (saith he) that a King of Syria, reigning in Babylon, built this great work at the importunity of his wife, whom he dearly loved; and who out of a desire she had to enjoy the pleasure of hills and woods, in that low country of Babylon, set her husband upon it, to imitate the genius or spirit of Nature it self, by the amenity and pleasantnesse of this work.

But who so will know more of the infinite magnificence, and sumptuousnesse of this work, must read the Fragments which are left, of Berosus and Abydenus, the former of which, blames the Greek writers, who attribute this work to Semyramis, whereas indeed, this, and those other vast and magnificent structures, were the proper works of this Nebuchadnezar; as Josephus, in his first Book contra Apion, reports out of him. And the later saies plainly that those vast walls, with the brazen gates thereof, reckoned among the miracles of the world, and which remained to the times of Alexander the great; were built by this Nebuchadnezar, as we find in Eusebius, in his ninth book, De Evangelica Preparat. And Clitarchus, and others, which attended Alexander in that voyage, say that the compasse of that wall, was 365 furlongs, according to the number of the dayes of the year, [Diod. Sic. l. 1.] and that every furlongs length thereof, was built and perfected in one day, as Q. Curtius, lib. 5. c. 4. reports.

3435. Twelve whole months were no sooner past, but Nebuchadnezar, growing proud, and boasting of the magnificencie of his buildings, fell distraught of his wits, and being put from his house and home, spent seven years in the woods and fields among beasts, [Daniel 4. 32,33.] 4145. 569.

Apryes, gathering an army out of Ionia and Caria, to the number of thirty thousand soldiers, to assist him for their hire, fought with his son Amasis, at Memphis: but being routed and taken prisoner, was kept for a while in the City of Says: and not long after strangled, according to the prophecie of [*Jer.*44. 30. and reported by *Herod.lib.*2.163.and 169. and by Diod.Sic.lib. 1.]

After his death Amasis reigned 44 years, as Herod. reporteth, *lib.*3. c. 10. but, which the Priests would not be known of to Herodotus, paied tribute all that while to the king of Babylon.

3442. a. Was the 18 year of Jubilee. 4152. 562.

Nebuchadnezar at the end of 7 years, after his humble acknowledgment of the power of God, was restored both to his right wits and kingdom also, and thereupon publickly proclaimed Gods great grace and mercy shewed upon himself, and his power over all Nations, [Dan. 4.]

And having himself foretold concerning the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, as Abydenus (quoted by Euseb. l. 9. Prapar. Evang. c. ult.) reports out of the relation of the Chaldeans, departed this life, when he had reigned about 20 moneths co-partner in the kingdom with his father, and 43 years by himself alone.

After him came Evil-merodach, his son in the 37 year of the captivity of Jehojachin, or Jechonia: about the 25 day of the 12 moneth (our April 15. upon a Tuesday) on which he gave order for the enlarging of Jeconia, [Jer. 52, 31.] and two dayes after he took him out of his prison-clothes, and setting him above all the Princes of his Court, reckoned him among the number of the Kings friends; so that all his life time after he did eat at the Kings table, [2 Reg. 25. 27, 28, 29.]

In Lydia Cresus, after the decease of his father Halyattes, reigned 14 years, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 86.]

After King Baal, the King of Babylon governed Tyrus by Judges: the first of which was Ecnibal the son of Baslach, whom Scaliger calleth (עכנו־בעל בן מצלח) and he ruled there 3 moneths: then Chelbes, the son of Abdeus, whom he also calleth (חלבש בן אבדי) and he ruled there 10 moneths; as Josephus reports out of the Phoenician Annals, in [his 1 book. cont. Apion.]

3413. Abbarus (אבבר) the High Priest judged the Tyrians 3 moneths: and after him, Mitygonus and Gerestratus (מות־גאון יגר עשתורת בני עבר אלים) governed them 6 years, [ib.] 4153. 561.

To Croesus living at Sardes resorted all the wise and learned men of Greece; and among them, Solon the law-maker: who had with him that so much renowned conference of the incertainty of mans life, and of all humane felicity therein, [Herod. lib. 2. from the 28 chapter to the 33.] There is extant a short Epistle of Solons to Croesus, in the end of Solons life, in Laertius; wherein he sayes, that he was sent for by Croesus, what time Pisistratus governed in Athens. Æsope a Phrygian borne, that famous composer of Fables, was at the same time sent for by Croesus, to come to him at Sardes; and was held in great esteem by him: And he condoling with Solon in a letter, for that he was uncivily turned away by Croesus, onely for the freedom of speech, which he had used to him; and telling him withal, that Kings must have, ὡς ἥκιστα, ἢ ὡς ἥδιστα (i.) either very few, or very pleasing words used unto them; wrote back in answer thereto, That Kings must have, ἢ ὡς ἥκιστα, ἢ ὡς ἄριστα: (i.) either very few, or very honest things spoken to them. [Plutarch in the life of Solon.]

Æsope going from Sardes, to Delphos, was there most unjustly sentenced to die; and accordingly was thrown down the rock there, called Phædrias, about the 54 olympiade, as Strabo; to wit, toward the end of the 4 year of that olympiade, if the precedent times be rightly calculated. The revenge of which foule murder, so often threatned by the Oracle there, was taken afterward by Judmon, grandchild to that Judmon of the Isle of Samos; whose slave, together with Rhodope of Thracia, that famous strumpet, Æsope sometime had been, [Herod. lib. 2. ca. 134.]

Solon, leaving Croesus, went into Cilicia, and there built a city, and from his own name, called it Solos: wherein he planted certain Athenians, who in processe of time, having corrupted the native language, were said Σολοικίζειν: (i.) to commit solœcismes in their speech; as Laertius in his life reporteth: which yet is more properly said of the Solii in Cyprus, than of the Solenses in Cilicia; as Solon in his elegies written to Philonyprus the King, recorded by Plutarch, in the life of Solon, shewes: where Plutarch also tells us, that this petty king of Cyprus, who made use of Solons wit and counsel, in some affairs of his own; removed a little town formerly called Epea, into a lower ground more fit and useful for habitation, and in honour of Solon, called it Solos.

After Solons departure, Croesus, who deemed himself the happyest man alive; found by sad experience, that all Solon had told him, of the instability of mans life, and felicity thereof, to be too true: for presently after he had a dreame, wherein he saw his son Atys thrust thorough with a Spear: a true token of a violent death, which was estsoones to befall him; which whiles he sought by all care and diligence to prevent, and was now busie about a marriage for him, one Adrastus a Phrygian borne, and of the Kings blood there, who having slaine his own brother against his will, was by his father Midas, the son of Gordius, (not that old Midas, the son of Gordias King of Phrygia, whose Epitaph made by Homer and set upon his tombe, Herodotus in the life of Homer recounteth) bannished, and came to Sardes, there to receive his expiation from Croesus his hand: Croesus having expiated or cleansed him, committed to him over and above, the care and charge of his son Atys; who at that time, was sent unto by the Mysians, and requested to come and help to kill a boar of a vast bignes, which wasted the corn and other country commodities growing about the hill Olympus, not without the destruction, many times, of the husbandmen themselves. Where Adrastus aiming at the boar with the point of his Spear, goared Atys, and so against his will slew him. But when Croesus had pardoned him the fact as done unawares, he slew himself upon the tombe of the diseased. Croesus having thus lost his son; passed two whole years in continual dueil, and mourning for him: from which yet he was forced in the end to rouse himself, for fear of Cyrus, his growing then into power; and by whom indeed, he was afterward despoiled of all, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 34. chapter to the 46.] whereof also you may see, made upon him: and at last, was murdered by Nerigliſſoros his ſiſters husband, when he had reigned little more than two years: as Beroſus tells us, [lib. 3. of the Chaldean affairs, cited by Joſephus lib. 1. contra Apion:] and becauſe we read that Jeconia King of Juda, had a daily ſtipend and allowance made him for his diet and entertainment by him, ad diem mortis ſuæ, omnibus diebus vitæ ſuæ (i.) to the day of his death, all the dayes of his life, [Jer. 52. 34. 2 Reg. 25. 30.] therefore it is moſt probable, that Jeconia himſelf died alſo much about the time that Evil-merodach died.

a. After Evil-merodach, came he that murdered him, Nerigliſſorus (נרגל לשר) and reigned 4 years, [Beroſus ib.]

In the kingdom alſo of Media, upon the deceaſe of Aſtyages, [Tob. 14. 17.] called Aſſuerus, ſucceeded his ſon Cyaxares, Cyrus his mothers brother: as Xenophon ſayes, [lib. 1. of the Inſtitution of Cyrus: to wit, in the beginning of the firſt year of the 55 Olympiade 31 years before the deceaſe of Cyrus: which Cyaxares, Daniel calleth Darius the Mede, ſon of Aſſuerus.

Whereupon Cyrus was by his father Cambyſes, and the council of the kingdom, made General of the Perſian army, and ſent away into Media with 30000. ſouldiers, and one thouſand Commanders, all of equall authority under him: as Xenophon, [in his 1 book of the Inſtitution of Cyrus ſayes:] and there, when he came, was he alſo made by his Uncle Cyaxares, who had ſent for him, General of the Median Forces, and the management of the war againſt the Babylonians, wholly committed unto him. And from this time are the 30 years of his reign or principality reckoned, toward the end of the 1 year of the 55 Olympiade, from which period Julius Africanus in the third book of his Annals, out of Diodor. Sic. Thallus, Caſtor, Polybius, Phlegon, and other Chronologers, counts the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and is to that purpoſe quoted and juſtified by Euſebius, [in his 10 *book de Præparat. At the ſame time, to wit, in the Spring-ſeaſon, in the cloſe of the ſame year of the ſame olympiade, Solon, taking leave of Philocyprus the King, and of his Solians, thought to return to Athens: as we find by his elegies, mentioned as before in Plutarch; but being ſurpriſed with a ſickneſs, he there took leave of them, and of all the world beſides; and died in Cyprus, being fourſcore years of age: as Laertius writeth, in the year when Hegeſtratus was Archon or Preſident of Athens, in the ſecond year of Piſiſtratus his domination there: as Plutarch relates out of Phanias the Epheſian.

Laborosoarchodus (לבו־רצר־כר) son of Neriglissorus, a man far riper in wickednesse than in age succeeded him in the kingdom of Babylon, and reigned 9 moneths, [Berosus.]

Balatorus (בעל טור) reigned in Tyre, among other Judges one year, [Phœnici. Annal.]

Gobrias, (whose onely son, that new king of Babylon, in his fathers life time, had in a hunting match, vilanously slain,) with his friends, revolted to Cyrus, [*Xen. l.*4.]

And now came Cyrus to invade the countrey of Babylon it self, and appeared before the walls of the city, and there challenged the new king, to a duell, or single combat. Gadatas, a noble man, and one, whom this new king had gelt, upon a jealousie he had of him with his wife, fell over to Cyrus, and Cyrus, when the Babylonians in revenge thereof, sallied out and spoyled his lands, set upon them, and routed them; But the Cadusii, whom Cyrus had appointed to bring up the rere of his army, making an on-set unawares of Cyrus, upon a countrey lying near the city, were cut off by the king of Babylon; who issued out upon them: and Cyrus having first revenged the death of these his men; came to agreement with the king, to hold truce with the Paisants or Plowmen on both sides, and the war to go on between the Soldiers onely. And then, passing beyond the city, took in three forts of theirs, then returned to the confines of Assyria and Media, from whence he set forth upon this journey. And thither, upon his invitation, came his Uncle Cyaxares unto him; and was there by him honorably received and entertained in the pavilion of the king of Assyria that was, to wit Neriglossorus, and the winter approaching, they there entered into a consultation, for things necessary to maintain the siege, if need should be, [Xenophon lib. 5. & 6. in the beginning thereof.]

3449. After Laborosoarchadus, Nebuchadnezars grandchilde by his daughter, who was made away by his subjects, for that excesse of vilany, which appeared in his actions; succeeded the grandchild of the same Nebuchadnezar, by his son Evil-merodach, called by Berosus (נבו־ניט) Nabonidus, but by Herodotus, Labynitus (לבו־ניט) by Abydenus Mabannidochus, and by the prophet Daniel, Belshasar, al. Baltazar, who reigned 17 years, as Berosus in his third book of his Chaldee History, and Ptolomei in Can. Reg. tells us. 4159. 555.

In the first year of this kings reign, Daniel had the vision shewen him of the 4 beasts, signifying the 4 monarchies of the world, and of God, delivering over all power and soveraignity to the son of man, [Dan. 7. 1.]

Balatorus, the petty king of Tyre deceasing; one Merbolus (מר־בעל) was sent for from Babylon, and reigned there 4 years, [Phœnic. Annal.]

3451. In the 3 year of Belshaser; the vision of the Ram and Goat, foreshewing the destruction of the Persian Monarchy by Alexander, and the great misery which Antiochus should bring upon the people of God, was shewed to Daniel, living then at Susa, in the province of Elam, upon the bank of the river Ulai, [Dan. 8. 1, 2.] which river Environs the Castle of Susa, and parts the provinces of Susa and Elimais, (i. e.) the Shushanchæans from the Elamites, as the inhabitants of those two provinces are distinguished by [Esra 4. 9.] and as Plinie lib 6. c. 27. teacheth us, from whence we learn, that at this time the province of Susa, was not in the hands of the Medes or Persians, but of the Babylonians, under whom Daniel then lived, as I noted before in the year of the world, 3405. 4161. 553.

Now Berosus tells us, [in his third book of his Chaldee History, quoted by Josephus, lib. 1. cont. Apion.] that those walls about the river of the city of Babylon, (which were but begun by Nebuchadnezar) were fully finished with brick, laid with a kind of slime, or liquid brimstone. For his mother Nicotris, a witty woman, foreseeing a storm ready to fall upon Babylon from the Medes, to hinder them in their passing the river by boats into Babylon, turn'd the river Euphrates, which of it self ran straight along, with a swift course, and drawing it through many winding channels, which she had cut for that purpose, made it withal to run more slowly than formerly it did; and then raised a huge damme upon each side of the river, and up the river from the city ward, digged a vast pond, into which she turned the river, so that she left the old channel of the river drie, which done, she then fell to work, and fenced the banks of the city within, with her brick walls, and the water-gates thereof, answerable in every point to the walls, which were made on the farther side of the channel, round about the city, she built also a bridge of stone in the midst of the city, and having all done, then she turn'd the river out of the pond, into his right channel again, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 185, 186, 188.] The magnificence of which stone-bridge (which joyned to the kings houses, that stood on each side the river) Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, [lib. 1. cap. 18.] describing, saith, that it was built by a Queen; that came out of Media; whence we gather, that as Nebuchadnezar himself took Amyitis himself, so likewise his son, Evil-merodach took to wife this Nicotris out of Media.

3453. Merbalus deceasing, the king of Babylon set one Hirom (חירום) Merbalus his brother in his place; who reigned there 20 years, [Phœnic. Annal.] 4163. 551.

Crœsus, being made General of the confederate army of the Babylonians and others, passed the river Halys, which parted the dominions of Media and Lydia, without a bridge, by the skill, and industry of Thales the Milesian Philosopher, and came into Cappadocia: and there took the City of Pteria; and all the Cities thereabout, utterly destroying the Syrians, who had deserved no ill at his hand: for that the Cappadocians were called Syrians by the Grecians, is testified by Herodotus, [lib. 1. c. 72.] Cyrus, having first sent to the Ionians, to feele their pulse; and to try whether he could draw them over from Crœsus or no, fought a pitcht battel with Crœsus, and it fell out to be a drawn battel between them; But the next day Crœsus, because Cyrus came not on upon him, returned to Sardes; where he meant to hang up his sword for that winter, and the beginning of the next spring, to march against the Persian again. In the mean while, he sent all his Auxiliaries to their own homes: and employed Embassadours to such as were in league and friendship with him, among whom were the Lacedemonians; giving order to all, to come to the Randezvouz at Sardes, upon the fifth month after: But when Crœsus had thus sent away, and scattered his army, then fell Cyrus upon him with all his forces; upon which suddain and unexpected approach of his; Crœsus, though much troubled, yet he went forth to fight with him, with such of his Lydians as he had about him, trusting principally in his troups of horse. Cyrus to crosse him in that designe, placed his camels in front against them; the very smell of which beast, a horse cannot endure; and therefore all the horse of Crœsus presently turned taile, and carried their riders away with them; But the Lydians left their horses, and ranged themselves in battalion on foot: yet at last, many being slain on either side, they betook them to their heeles: But the Persians pursuing the point of this their victory, followed them to Sardes; which after 14 dayes lying before it, they took. Crœsus was condemned to the fire, but coming to the place of execution, and there crying out, O Solon, Solon, (whose wise counsell, concerning the instability of humane condition he had formerly so much despised) Cyrus thereupon not only spared his life; but took him also into his privie counsell, Cyrus took care then of the funerals of Abradatos the king of Susa (who having fallen off from the king of Babylon to him, was slain in the battel) and of Panthea his Queen, who seeing her husband lying dead, slew her self over his dead body: and made them a huge and sumptuous monument, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 75 cap. to the 90. with Xeno. Polyan. in his strатag. lib. 7. in Cyrus and Crœsus: and Solinus in Polyhist. lib. 1.] where he saith that Cyrus made his entry into Sardes, in the 28 Olympiade, to wit, in the 1 year thereof, as Eusebius hath it in Chron.

Crœsus, sending his shackles for a present to Delphos, complained all in vain, that he had been cheated by the Oracle there, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 90, 91.] When the men of Ionia and Eolia, would fain have submitted to Cyrus, upon the same conditions, that they had formerly lived in under Crœsus, Cyrus refused them; granting that only to the milesians, who fearing what might fall, had formerly made their peace with him, [Herod. lib. c. 141. 143. 169.] The rest of the Greek Nations, fortifying each of them their own Cities, sent Pithermon of Phocea, with other Embassadors, to the Lacedemonians, to crave aide of them: which though they refused to send, yet they sent their Embassadour Lachrines to Cyrus, to forewarn him not to touch any of the Greeks in Asia; and he sent them word again, that he would shortly make them leave off caring for the Ionians, and the rest of the Greeks in Asia, and look to themselves at home, [Ibid. cap. 141. 152. 153.]

Thales the Milesian, gave them all advise to hold a Common Council at Teos, which was a City, seated in the very heart of Ionia, [Herod. Ib. cap. 170.] whiles Cyrus remained at Sardes, and there made his provision of Ramms and other Instruments of battery, purposing to raze the walls of all that stood out against him, the Carions sent and craved his help to compose a war which was grown among themselves. He sent thither Adusius, a Persian, with an army, in which service, the Cilicians and Cyprians very willingly followed him. Adusius put an end to their difference, yet so, as he left sufficient garrisons of his own, in the Cities of either party, [Xenoph. lib. 7. Instit.]

In the 58 Olympiade, toward the end of the 1 year thereof, Thales the Milesian Philosopher, died, as Laertius reports out of Sosicrates, and Anaximander his countryman first observed the Loxodromie, or biassing motions of the stars, in the Zodiac, as Pliny, out of other authors sayes, [lib. 1. cap. 8.] though Plutarch in his 2 book, de Placitis Philosophorum, hath more rightly informed us that that point of Astronomy was not unknown to Thales the Milesian, Anaximanders master: And that he himself, in the 2 year of this Olympiade, at the age of 64 years, died, Laertius tells us, out of the Chronicle of Apollodorus the Athenian, of whose Mathematical inventions, he further addeth out of Phavorinus, that he first invented the making of the Dial, and set it up in Sparta, in a place, fit to receive the shadow of the sun; as, saith he, Phavorinus reporteth in his Varia Historia: adding further, that he also invented the Horoscopes; for the finding out the equinoctials and Solstices for the Dial, to find out the houre of the day by, is one thing, and the Horoscope, or instrument whereby to observe the Equinoctials, and the Tropicks, or the summer and winter winter solstice, is another: though Pliny attributes the invention of the Dial and Clock to Anaximenes his scholar, and fellow citizen, [lib. 2. ca. 76.] in these words; This rule and reason of shadows, which we use to call Gnomonical, or Dial-work, was first found out by Anaximenes, Anaximanders scholar: and he was the first that set up a Sciathericum, (i.) a Dial to shew what's a clock, in Sparta: vid. sup. in the year of the World, 3291.

Anaximenes the son of Eurystratus succeeded Anaximander in his schoole at Miletus; as Clemens [Alexandri. in his 1 book of his stromat.] shewes: but Pythagoras, when both his masters, Anaximander and Anaximenes were dead, went into Egypt; as Thales had advised him to do: being commended to Amasis King of Egypt, by a letter from Polycrates of Samos, as Laertius in his life reporteth: which Amasis, it seemeth, the Egyptians surnamed Semnesertem. For that in his reign, Pythagoras came into Egypt; Pliny in his 36. book, cap. 9. sheweth: and there he continued 22 years, conversing with the Priests, and from them it was that he learned his skill and knowledge in Astronomy and Geometry; and was catechised or initiated in all their rites and ceremonies, as saith [Iamblichus, in the life of Pythagoras, ca. 3. and 4.] for therefore also was he circumcised by them, that being admitted into the secrets of their religion, he might the more freely partake of the mystical philosophy of the Egyptians: in the attaining whereof, he was principally beholding to one Sonchedes, the Arch-prophet among them, [Clem. Alexan. lib. 1. strom.] This Sonchedes, I take to be him of Sais, with whom Solon had formerly much conversed, as Plutarch in his life reporteth. And from them it was, that Pythagoras learned his Metempsuchosis, or transmigration of souls out of one body into another, as Diodor. Sic. reporteth: and being used to their books, and diving into their writings, concerning former times, he thence pickt out the observations of innumerable by passages, saith, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. c. 7.]

Hystaspes and Adusius, joyning together, conquered all Phrygia bordering upon the Hellespont; and took the King thereof, and brought him prisoner to Cyrus, [Xenoph. Instit. lib. 7.]

Cyrus committing Sardes to the keeping of Tabalus a Persians borne, and delivering the treasure of Crœsus, and the rest of the Lydians to Pactyas a Lydian borne, returned towards Ecbatan, and took Crœsus along with him, little regarding how matters went in Ionia: but no sooner was Cyrus gone from Sardes, but Pactyas forthwith perswaded the Lydians to revolt from Cyrus, and from Tabolo, the Governour there; and laying out the Kings treasure, to hire souldiers from other parts, drave Tabolo into the Castle and there besieged him very straitely: whereof when Cyrus was advertised upon the way by the advice of Crœsus, he sent back Mazares a Median, with a part of his army; who disarming the Lydians, brought them to follow a more idle course of life, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 153. to the 157. chap.] and so a Nation formerly famous for laboriousness, power, and chivalry, falling into effeminancy and luxury, lost their courage, and all kind of virtue, as saith [Justin. out of Trogus, lib 1. ca. 7.]

3459. Mazares redemanded Pactyas of the Cumæans, unto whom he was fled out of the Castle. The Cumæans consulted the Oracle at Branchis, and received from thence an answer, That they should deliver him up: yet they not willing, either to give him up to be 4169. 545.
slaine by the Persians (being much diswaded therefrom by Aristodicus the son of Heraclides, a man of great authority among them) or by keeping him, to draw Cyrus his displeasure upon their city to their own destruction, they sent him away safe to Mitylene. And when the Mitylenians were ready to give him up, the Cumæans again sent a Ship to Lesbos and there took him in, and conveyed him to Chios: and the Chii drew him by force out of the temple of Minerva there, and delivered him up to Mazares: and had in reward therefore Atarneum a place in Mysia, lying over against Lesbos given them, [Herod. lib. 1. from cha. 157. to cha. 160.] though Plutarch seeks to justifie both the Mitylenians and the Chii in this point, in his book, of the malignity of Herodotus, upon this ground, for that a more ancient Historian than he; to wit, Caron of Lampsacus, tells the matter simply in this wise. Pactyas hearing of the approach of the Persians Army, fled first to Mitylene, and then to Chios, and there Cyrus took him.

Mazares having gotten Pactyas into his power, marched presently against those, who with him, had assaulted Tabalas: and in part subdued the inhabitants of Priene, partly wasted the country lying upon the Mæander, and gave both it, and the city of Magnesia for a prey to his souldiers, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 161.]

3461. Harpagus, who was a chief man about Cyrus, went with his army against Ionia, and fought with them (as Eusebius in his Chron. upon the 2 year of the 59 Olympiade noteth) for Mazares dying of a disease, Harpagus (whom some erroneously call Harpalus) was made General in his place. And he coming into Ionia, fell presently to entrenching round about, and blocking up their cities where ever he came, and thereby took Phocæa, the chief city of all Ionia, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 162.]

The Phocæans, abandoning the city, which they could not hold, shipt themselves, their wives and children, and put over into Chios: whence returning upon an occasion

casion offered, to Phocæa, they there put to the sword all the garison, which Harpagus had there left to keep it: and from thence set saile again, and came to the Isles of Oenusæ; and from thence sailed to the Isle of Cyrnus, al. Corsica, where 20 years before they had made a plantation, and there bult a city called Alalia: where when they had staid five years, and made all the neighbouring countries weary of them, by their robbing and spoyling the Italians and Carthaginians, set out a navy of 60 ships, and had a sea fight with them; wherein the Phoceans, having gotten the victory: but lost much blood in getting it, and 40 of their ship, removed themselves to Regium in Italy, and there built the city Hyela, afterward called Velia in the territory of Oenotria, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 164. 167.] Thucides also, [lib. 7. of his history] confirms it, that the Phocæans, which built Marseillus, gave the Carthaginians an overthrow at sea, for, that one part of them built Velia, and another Marseilles, in the time of Servius Tullus king of the Romans, more than 600 years after the coming of Æneas into Italy, is testifyed by Hyginus, quoted by A. Gellius [lib. 10. Noct. Attica, cap. 6.] and of this colony of the Marseillians, Isocrates also in his Archidamus maketh mention; see before in the year of the world, 3404.

But to return to Harpagus, the Teians also, when he had intrencht himself round about their city, got them on shipboard, and sailed away into Thrace, and there built them a city called Abdera, the foundations whereof Timesius, a man of Clozomenæ had laied, as was noted before, in the year of the world, 3349. But the rest of the Ionians, all save the Milesians, who had before-hand made a league with Cyrus, being vanquished one after another, fell into Harpagus his hand, and being suffered to live every man in his own countrey, paid what was imposed upon them, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 168, 169.] yet Bias of Priene, chief of all the wise men of Greece, when, though thus afflicted, they would needs assemble in their old Common Councel of Ionia, called Panionium, counselled them, that they should rather make a common navy, and sail away, to Sardinia, and there make a common city for all Ionians to inhabit in, for, saith he, by this means, you shall be free from this slavery, and live happily, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 170.]

3464. c. Cyrus, when he had now brought into his subjection, all the continent westward, forthwith made war upon the Assyrians; and marched with his army, against Labynitus, al. 4174. 540.
Nabonidus their king, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 178, 188.] whereof a fame was spred, and came to the Babylonians ears, two full years before the city was besieged, [Jer. 51. 46.] for when Cyrus was upon his march toward Babylon, he came to the river Gnides, which falls into the Tygris, which for want of boats, he could not passe. And while he stayed there, one of the white horses, which were consecrate to the son, going into the river, was there by the violence of the river swallowed up, and drowned, which Cyrus, taking very grievously, surceased his journey for Babylon, for that time, and fell to work upon the river, which he drew out into 360 several channels, so that, (as he had threatned to make it) a woman might passe over it, and never wet a knee in it: in which work, he spent all that summer, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 189, 190, 202. with the fifth book, cap. 52.]

3465. b. In the year following, Cyrus went on his way to Babylon; where, in a pitch field, fought between these two great Lords of the world, Cyrus and Belshasur, or Nabonidus: the 4175. 539.
Chaldeans being put to the worst, retired to the city, resolved to endure a siege, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 130. Jerem. 51. 27, 28, 30.] which they made light of; both because they had above 20 years provision in it, and also because they thought there were many in Cyrus his army, who bare more good wil to them, than to the Persians, [Herod. lib. Xenophon. Instit. lib. 7.]

Cyrus caused presently a vast trench, both for breadth and deapth, to be cast round about the wall of the city, casting up the earth ever toward his own army, and making store of bulworks all along; for guards to be upon, and dividing his whole army into twelve parts, ordered, that every of them, should watch his moneth by turne, [Xenophon. ib.]

which this Belshasars mother Nicotris, had formerly digged; as I shewed before: and then opening the mouths of this and that other ditch, which he had newly cast about the city, let out the river into them, and so made the channel thereof, which was not above two furlongs broad, passable for his men. [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 190, 1901. Xenophon Institut. lib. 7. with Jeremy 59. 32. 36.]

Cyrus passing now the river with his army, guards up the water-gates, and scaling every where the rampiers, got into the city, upon a festival day, whiles all men there, were busied in their banquets, [Id. ib. with Jerem 51. 39, 57.] And so vastly big was that city, that, as the inhabitants reported, when the skirts of it were surprized, and taken by the enemy, they who dwelt in the heart of the city, never heard thereof, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 191.] to which that of that Jeremy, 51. 31. hath reference, where he saith, that post upon post, and messenger upon messenger shall run to tell the king of Babylon, that all the skirts of the city were possessed by the enemies.

At

At the same time, Belshasar purposing to feast all his nobles, caused to be brought forth all the vessels of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezar his father, or grand-father (for that he was his sons son, may be gathered out of Jer. 27. 7.) had brought away from Jerusalem, to the glory of his Idols, and dishonour of the true God: and God, on the other side, by sending a hand to write upon the wall of the room, where Belshazar sate, drinking, the number of years which the Babylonish Empire was to continue, and that it had been now weighed in the ballance, and was found too light; and was therefore to be transferred to, and setled upon the Medes: evidently declared, what present destruction was to fall upon him. But when his wizards of Chaldea, could not read the writing; his Queen advised him to send for Daniel; who, when he came, both red the writing, and also gave him the interpretation of it, and for his pains, was publiquely proclaimed, the third man in the kingdom, [Dan. 5.] But whereas the kings wives are said to have been present at the banquet, [verse. 2. 3.] and the Queen to have come in afterward, [verse 10.] this is to be understood of the Queen-mother, Nicotris, for that she was the mother of this last king of Babylon, we have already shewen out of Herodotus.

In the same night, that this banquet was made, was Belshasar the king of the Chaldeans slain, [Dan. 5. 30.] by the soldiers of Gobryas, and Gadatas, [Xen. lib. 7. Instit.] and so the Babylonish kingdom came to an end, as had been sundry times foretold; as by Esay, [chap. 13, 14, 21, 34, 46, 47. Habakkuk, chap. 2. and Jerem. cap. 25. 50, 51.] and the Empire translated to the Medes and Persians, [Daniel 5. 21. chap. 6. 8. 12, 15.]

Darius the Mede, son of Assuerus, al. Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, took upon him the kingdom, delivered to him by Cyrus the conquerer, [Dan. 5. 51. and chap. 9. 1.] for whom Cyrus had set apart the kings house, and all his palaces in Babylon, to the end, that if upon occasion he should come thither, he might have a Palace of his own to lodge in, [Xenophon. Instit. lib. 8.] and the Angell, in this first year of his reign, is said to have confirmed and strengthened him in his kingdom, [Dan. 11. 1.] after which he reigned 2 years.

Cyrus, having set all things in order at Babylon, returned through Media into Persia, to his father Cambyses, and Mandana his mother, who were yet living, and from thence, returning again into Media, married the only daughter and heir of Cyaxares, and for dowry had the whole kingdom of Media, given him with her: and, the marriage finished, he presently went his way, and took her with him: and coming to Babylon; from thence sent Governors into all his Dominions; Megabyzus into Arabia, Artacaman into Phrygia the greater, Chrysantas into Lydia and Ionia, Adusius into Caria, Pharnichas into Phrygia Hellespontiaca, al. the lesse; but into Cilicia and Cyprus, and Paphlagonia, he sent no Persians to govern them; because they seemed voluntary, and of their own accord to have taken his part against the king of Babylon: yet he made even them also to pay him tribute, [Xen. Instit. lib. 8.]

Now all the countries, which he subdued by the forces of Media, of which himself was General, Cyrus ever professed that he laid them to the dominions of Cyaxares, [Xen. l. 5.] and therefore it is most likely that at the former meeting in Council, he made that distribution of the Governments by his advise, for as Xenophon [lib. 8.] saith of Cyrus, It seemed good unto him, to set Governours over all the Nations which he had subdued: So the Prophet Daniel, who, as it seemeth, went at this time with Cyrus from Babylon into Media, saith of Cyaxares, It seemed good to Darius, to set over the kingdome, 120 Governours, that they should be over all the Kingdom, [Dan. 6. 1.] yet over all the Governours he made three Over-seers, the principal of which was this Daniel: whereupon it was that the rest, stirred up by a spirit of envy against him, put into the kings head, to make a Decree, that for 30 daies space, no Petition should be made to any God or man, but to himself only: which Decree, when Daniel had broke, by making his prayer unto God; he was cast into the Lyons den; and thence delivered without hurt done at all unto him: and then Darius, having cast those plotters against Daniel into the same Lyons den, published that memorable Decree through all his dominions, that every man therein, should reverence, and stand in awe of Daniels God, [Dan. 6.]

3467. Toward the end of the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede, to be reckoned from the subversion of the Babylonish Empire, began the 70 year of the Babilonish captivity of the Jewes, which began under Jehojakim, in the first year of Nebuchadnesar, which was the last of those years of their calamity specified by [Jer. 29. 10.] Thus saith the Lord, when the 70 years shall begin to be finished in Babylon, then will I visit you, and perform that my good word unto you, and will bring you again to this place, and when you shall call upon me to depart from thence, and when you shall pray unto me, then will I hear you. Upon consideration of which very time, now so near approaching, it was that Daniel powred out that most fervent prayer, for the remission of his own sins, and of his peoples; and for that promised deliverance out of their captivity: whereupon the Angel Gabriel brought him an answer, not only for this, but also concerning the spiritual deliverance of the Church, to be 4177. 537.

wrought at last by the death of the Messias, uttering that most famous and memorable prophecie of the 70 weeks, [Dan. 9. 22, &c.]

Cyrus having spent one whole year with his wife in Babylon, gathered thither his whole army, in which there are said to have been counted, one hundred and twenty thousand horse, two thousand iron Charriots, and six hundred thousand foot Souldiers; which having furnished with all necessary provisions, he undertook that voyage, wherein he is said to have subdued all Nations, inhabiting from Syria to the red Sea, [Xenophon, Instit. lib. 8.]

3468. Cyrus, his father Cambyses being now dead in Persia, Cyaxares in Media, held all the 4178. 536.
a. Empire or Monarchie of the East in his own hand: from which year, both Xenophon, 8. Inst. reckons the 7 years of his reign, and the holy Scripture, out of the Records of the Medes and Persians, reckoneth this first year: for it teacheth us, that in this year came forth that renowned Edict of his; Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, Into my hand hath God given all the kingdoms of the earth: in which year, the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity (foretold by Jeremiah, and according to the prophesie of Isaiah uttered of him by name, c. 44. 28. and 45. 13.) being now expired, he gave leave to all the Jews, dwelling wheresoever in his dominions, to return into their own country, and commanded such as did returne, to fall in hand with the re-edifying of the Temple of God; prescribing, or rather at their request, granting to them a power to build it to such a bignes; which had he prescribed, and they (as needs they then must) observed the frame thereof had been far greater, than that of Solomons was; which now it was not, [Haggai, 2. 3.] And he allowed the charge thereof, out of the kings treasure, and restored all the vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezar had brought from thence, [2 Chron. 36. 22, 23. Ezra, 1. 1, 2, 7. and 5. 13, 14. and 6. 2, 5.]

Of the Jews therefore which returned to Jerusalem, Cyrus made Sehoasar the Captain, or his Lievtenant, and into his hands did Methridates the Treasurer, by Cyrus his command, consigne all the vessels belonging to the Temple, to be carried to Jerusalem, [Ezra. 1. 7, 11. and 5. 14, 15.] Now that his Chalde name, or that by which he went in Court, was in Hebrew, Zerubbabel; appears out of [Ezra 3. 8, 10. compared with chap. 5. 16.]

c. The Jews thefore prepare for their return into their countrey, the poorer sort, have allowance made them to defray their charges upon the way, [Ezra 1. 5, 6.] Now the number of the children of the province, or poor people of the Hebrews, born in Chaldea, which with their Captain Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, al. Salathiel, and their high priest, Jehu, al. Jusua, the son of Josadak, returned out of that captivity, amounted to 42360. besides proselytes, man-servants, and maid-servants, to the number of 7337. [Ezra 2. 1. Nehem. 6. 67, and c. 12. 1. 9.] Now the particular sums cast up in Ezra, make onely 29818. and in Nehemiah, 31031. neither of which make up the full sum of 42360. and yet either of them, in the foot of each of the cathologues, of 42360. is said to have been the number of the whole congregation, [Ezra 1. 64. and Nehem. 7. 66.] wherefore to make up the full sum of 42360. the Hebrews in their great Chron. tells us, that we must cast in those of the other tribes of Israel, which came up out of the captivity with the Jews. For even at the last extirpation of the Jewish state, there was a remainder, of the other ten tribes, [Acts 26. 7.] not onely of the dispersion. [James 1. 1.] and at Jerusalem, [2 Chron. 9. 3. Luke 2. 36..] and other cities of Juda, [2 Chron. 11. 16. with c. 31. 6.] but also of those who kept still upon their old lands; for Salmanasar swept not all away out of all the tribes, as I shewed before in the year of the world, 3227. out of the History of Josias: but he left a remnant of them, in their own countrey, which was afterward, together with the Jews, and Benjamites, and Levites, carryed away by Nebuchadnezar unto Babylon, and were now dismissed and sent back again by Cyrus. After which, as in the first year of Cyrus, all the Israelites, are said to have dwelt in their own cities, [Ezra 2. 70.] so in the sixth year of Darius, they are said to have been present, at the dedication of the Temple, and to have offered there 12 hee Goats for the sin of all Israel, [Ezra 6. 16, 17.] and when Christ preached the Gospel in Galilee, [Matth. 14. 1[illegible]] that prophecie of Isaiah, is said to have been fulfilled of the people of Zabulon and Nephthaly, who saw a great light.

The chief men of their fathers families, coming to Jerusalem, offered every man according to his ability, toward the restauration of the Temple, to the sum in all of 61000 drachmahs of gold; and 5000 pounds of silver, and 100. Priests robes; and both priests and Levites, and the rest of the people, dwelt every man in his own city, [Ez. 2. 68, 69; 70.]

3469. On the first day of the seventh moneth, in the feast of trumpets, the Israelites came all 4179 535
a. as one man out of their several cities to Jerusalem, and there built the altar, and every morning, and every evening offered the dayly sacrifice unto God, and upon the 15 day of the same moneth, kept the feast of Tabernacles, and moreover, provided for materials and workmen toward the building of the Temple, as Cyrus had given them leave to do, [Ezra 3. 1, 7.]

c. 3469 In the second year after their return from Babylon, in the 2 moneth (called Jair) they appointed Levits to oversee the work of the House of God; and laid the foundation of the Temple, with the great lamentation of the old men, who 53 years before had seen the old Temple standing; but with the great rejoycing of the younger sort who saw the new one now going up, [Ezra 3. 8, 13.] 4179. 535.

The Cuthæans, the old enemies of the Jews, who had heretofore been planted in Samaria by Esarchaddon, cunningly offered to joyn with them in the building of the Temple; but being refused, they crossed the Jews all they could in the work, and discouraged the people from proceeding therein, [Ezra 4. 1, 4.]

3470. 4. This was the first sabbatical year, kept by the Jews, after their return from the captivity of Babylon.

The Samaritans, by the means of certain Courtiers about Cyrus, whom they had bribed for that purpose, disturbe the Jews in their work of the Temple, [Ez. 4. 5.] from whence, as it seemeth, proceeded that 3 weeks mourning of the Prophet Daniel: In which, he continued his fasting, which was begun about the 3 day of the 1 moneth, in the 3 year of Cyrus, thorough all the time of the feast of Easter, [Dan. 10. 1, 4.] after which, upon the 24 day of the 1 moneth, that vision of the Kings of Persia, of Alexander the great, and his successors, and their kingdoms was shewed and revealed unto Daniel, as he stood upon the bank of Hiddikel, or the River Tigris: all which is contained in the 3 last Chapters of Daniel: which as may be collected out of the close thereof, was the last vision that ever he had, and that but a little before his death. 4180. 534.

3473. Amasis, as it seemeth, fell off from Cyrus; and the people of Egypt carried away formerly by Nebuchadnesar, after 40 years compleated there, were now sent back again, by Cyrus into their own country: and so were they restored to their old kingdom, in the later end of Amasis his dayes: a kingdom old and ancient indeed, but the meanest of all others, and of no long continuance in one stay, [Ezek. 29. 11, 16. Jer. 46. 26.] For that Cyrus had Egypt in his possession appears, both by Xenophon, [8. Instit. Cyr.] as also in the Prologue to his whole work: and that it was afterward subdued by his son Cambyses, all Authors agree; from whence we gather, that in the intermediate time, they enjoyed their own liberty. 4183. 531.

But by this occasion of Amasis his revolt from Cyrus, perchance also it came to passe, that when Hirom had stood King of Tyrus full twenty years, (who was the last King mentioned by Josephus, in his Catalogue of them) he was put out, and in stead of men of their own country, such as hitherto they had been governed by, as the Egyptians had been by Amasis (for the very Punic names of those Kings, shew them all to have been of the same country) they had Governours set over them of other nations.

3475. Cyrus being now 70 years of age dyes, having lived from the time that he was first made General of the Median and Persian armies, full 30. years: and after the taking of Babylon, 9 years, and after his full Monarchie, 7 years, and one or two moneths over. Of the manner of his death, Authors much differ, Herod. [lib. 1. ca. 214.] Justin out of Trogus [lib. 1. c. 8.] and Valer. Max. [lib. 9. c. 10.] say that he was slain in a fight, against the Massagetæ or Scythians: and that his head was severed from his shoulders by Tomyris their Queen, and by her thrown into a tub full of blood, and he bid there to satiate himself with blood, which he had so much thirsted after in his life time. Diod. Sic. lib. 2. sayes, that when she had taken him prisoner, she crucified him, Ctesias [lib. 11.] saith, that in a battel against the Derbicans, a people bordering upon Hircania, being himself wounded in the thigh by a certain Indian, he slew Amorræus their King, and his two sons; and 3 dayes after died himself. Johannes Malela of Antioch, out of a forged book, attributted to Pythagoras of Samos, sayes, that he was slain in a Sea-fight, against the Samians. But [Xeno. Instit. lib. 8.] reports that he died his own death quietly, in his own country of Persia; adding among many other things, that he gave order to his sons, that they should wrap his body neither in gold nor silver, but in plain moulds, and bury him out of the way: yet that they should call all his friends, Persians and others to his Monument; and having there presented them with what ever was fit to be given them at the Funeral of a fortunate man, should so dismisse them: but that his tombe was made him at Pasarges, is delivered by those who wrote the noble Acts of Alexander the great, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arrianus, and by Aristobulus, whom Alexander sent expressely to see it cited to this very purpose by Strabo [lib. 5.] of his Cosmographie, where he recites also this inscription found upon his tombe; O man, I am Cyrus, who founded the Persian Monarchie, and was King of Asia; and therefore envy me not that I have a Monument. As for that Greek Epitaph, upon him written, if any man will believe it, in Persian characters, reported also by the same Strabo, out of Onesicritus, 4185. 529.

Ἐνθάδ᾽ ἐγὼ κεῖμαι Κῦρος βασιλεὺς βασιλήων,

Here Cyrus I do lie, who King of Kings was high.

It is of the same stamp with that other cited by Lucian, out of the same Onesicritus in his discourse, De Longævis, or of long-lived men, that Cyrus missing at last those friends of his his, which his son Cambyses had made away, when he had lived an hundred years, died for grief.

Cyrus left his kingdom to his eldest son Cambyses, and to his younger son, Tanaoxaras, al. Tanyoxarcas, whom Herodotus calls Smerdis, Justin out of Trogus calls Mergis; he left, as Ctesias saies, the seignories or Commanderies, of Bactria, Choromnea, Parthia and Caramania, but as Xenophon, [Instit. lib. 8.] of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusians.

In the entrance of the kingdom of Ahasuerus (for by that name is Cambyses known in the language of the Scriptures) the Samaritans, who had hitherto sought secretly to undermine the Israelites, now openly framed a direct information in writing to the king against the inhabitants of Juda and Jerusalem, [Ez. 4. 6.] for they knew very well, what difference there was between the father and the sons nature and disposition; for that Cyrus was naturally kind and loving to those that were under him, and the other furious by nature, and suddain in his resolutions, as Diod. Sic. rightly observeth of him, in his Excerpta, published by Hen. Valesius, [p. 238, 249.] with Herodotus: [l. 3. c. 89.]

3477. a. This was the 2 Sabbatical year held by the Jews after their returne from Babylon. 4186. 528.

3478. Cambapheus an Eunuch, who could do all in all with the king of Egypt, by the means of his cousin germane, Isabat an Eunuch likewise, who could do also as much with Cambyses king of Persia, betrayed the bridges, passages and other things to the Persian, upon promise made him, that he for his pains, should have the Government of Egypt, conferred upon him, [Ctes. lib. 3. Persicorum.] 4188. 526.

In pursuance whereof, Cambyses gathered an army: whereof his land companies consisted, as of sundry other Nations, so among them, of Grecians, out of Ionia and Eolia in Asia; but his sea forces principally of Sidonians and Cyprians, who had freely submitted to him; Polycrates also, the king or tyrant of Samos, furnished him with 40 sail of ships, all men of war, and into them he put all such as he suspected for enemies at home, desiring Cambyses that he would spend them there, and never send them home again, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 1. 19. 44.]

Phanes of Halicarnassus, a chief man among the aides of Egypt; and well versed in their affaires, but one that bare a hate to Amasis, seeing Cambyses preparing war against Egypt, fled over to him: and disclosed to him many secrets of the land of Egypt, and finding Cambyses much troubled how he should passe through the desarts that lay in his way, for want of water, advised him to send to the king of Arabia, to obtain leave to pass through his country; [Id. ib. cap. 4. & 7.] for against his will, there was no passing for him, to the borders of Egypt, [Ib. c. 88.]

3479. b. The king of Arabia, making a league with Cambyses, by the messengers that were sent unto him, sent all his camels loden with borachoes or lethren baggs full of water to the places by which Cambyses with his army was to passe, and there attended his coming, [Id. ib. c. 9.] 4189. 525.

Cambyses coming with his army into Egypt, found Amasis newly dead, when he had reigned 44 years, [Id. ib. c. 9. & 10.] Diod. Sic. lib. 1. Biblioth. tells us, that he died, when Cambyses began his war in Egypt, in the later end of the 3 year of the 63 Olympiade; after whom, his son Psammenitus, (whom Ctesias calleth Amyrteus) reigned 6 months, [Herod. l. 3. c. 14.] in whose reign it rained at Thebes, which in the upper parts of Egypt is taken for a great prodigie, [Id. c. 10.]

The Persians, having passed those sandie dry desarts of Arabia, sate down upon the edge of Egypt, [Ib. c. 11.]

But Cambyses coming at last to besiege Pelusium, caused cats and dogs, and sheep, and birds called Ibides, and all kinds of living creatures, which the Egyptians worship for gods, to be placed in the front of his army; whereat the Egyptians being troubled, for fear of hurting their own gods, forbare shooting at the enemy, and so Cambyses taking Pelusium, got an entrance into, and a footing in Egypt, [Polyenus in the 7 book of Stratag.]

They that came to assist the Egyptians, as the Grecians and Carians, in hatred of Phanes who had been a chief instrument in conducting this forreign army into Egypt, slew his sons, whom he had there left, before his eyes, and drinking up their bloud, fell a skirmishing with him, [Her. l. 3. c. 11.]

After a sharpe encounter, where in many were slain on either side, the Egyptians fled; [Id. ib.]

Cambyses, sent a Persian Herald up the river in a ship of Mitylene, to Memphis, whither the Egyptians in great disorder and confusion were fled, to exhort them to render themselves; but the men of the city sallied out upon the ship, took hir, brake or burnt hir, and having cut all the men in her, into gobbits, brought them into the city; and afterward endured the siege for some short time, [Id. lib. 3. c. 13.]

Arcesilaus, son of Battus the Lame, and of Pheretima his wife; yeelded up Cyrene to Cambyses, and submitted to pay him tribute, [Id. l. 4. c. 165.] for they of Cyrene, and the Barcei, and the Lybians, bordering upon Egypt, terrified with his successe against their neighbours neighbours the Egyptians, rendred themselves unto him, and sent their presents to Cambyses and Cambyses took what came from the Lybians gratiously, and in good part, but those of the Cyrenians, not so, because they were so small, for they sent him onely five hundred pounds, which he took, and threw among the Souldiers, [Id.lib.3.cap.13. and cap.91.]

Ten dayes after he had taken the walls of Memphis, he had thought to try the patience of Psammenites, whom in contempt of him, he had with other Egyptians, committed to prison, in the suburbs of the city, sending his daughter with other maidens of the prime nobility of Egypt, with pitchers on their arms to the river, to fetch him water, and sending his young son, with two thousand more of the same age, and all principall noble mens sons with ropes about their necks, and bridles in their mouths, to be shamefully put to death: all which was done, in revenge of those Mitylenians, whom being sent in a ship to Memphis, they had murdered the kings Judges, having so ordered, that for every Mitylenian then slain, ten of the chief of the Egyptians should be put to death, and among them, in the first place, Psammenites his own son, whom Cambyses would have saved, but, when it was too late. But the father himself lived afterward with Cambyses, without violence, or other wrong done too his person: till at last, being convicted of stirring up the people to a new rebellion, he drank bulls blood, and died, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 14, 15.] though Ctesias saies, that he was sent away prisoner, to live in Susa.

Cambyses marching from Memphis, came with his army before the city Sais; where coming into the palace of Amasis, against whom he undertook this war, he caused his body to be haled out of his vault, and to be brought before him, and causing his carcase to be whipt with scourges, and all kind of reproach, and contumely to be used upon it, then caused it to be consumed with fire, [Herod.lib.3.cap.16. and Diod.Sic, in his Excerpta; publish-ed by Hen.Valesius, pag.249.]

Cambyses having thus conquered Egypt, in the 5 year of his monarchy; he reigned in it 3 years, [Jul. African. and Euseb. in Chronic. Græc. pag. 17.] having slain fifty thousand of the Egyptians in fight, and sent away seven thousand of them prisoners to Susa, [Ctes.]

Iamblicus reporteth, that Pythagorus was among the rest then also taken and sent away to Babylon, where he conversed with the Chaldeans, [Iambli. in his Life,] and another writer of his life, namely Malchus, al. Paphyrius, saith, that at Babylon, he not onely conversed with the other Chaldeans, but applyed himself also to Zabratus, and that he was by him purified and cleansed from the sins of his former life. This Zabratus is thought by some, to have been that Nazaratus of Assyria, whom Alexander, (Polyhistor I think) in his book of Pythagoricall opinions, makes to have been Pythagoras his master, and some others mistaking the matter, judge to have been the prophet Ezekiel, as Clement of Alexandria, [lib. 1. Strom.] relateth. But this sheweth, that he did converse with the wise-men of the Jews in Babylon, for that he made use of many of their opinions afterwards, in the course of his Philosophy, as Hermippus, in his first book of Pythagoras, quoted by Josephus (lib. 1. cont Apion.) and in his first book, of Law-makers, cited by Origen, (lib.1. cont. Celsum.) reporteth, And no lesse doth Aristobulus the Jew, a Peripatetic Phylosopher, in his first book to Phylometor, as we find in Clemens of Alex. lib. 1. Strom.) and as Euseb. (lib. 13. Præpar. Evangel.) affirms; and upon the same ground believes, that the books of Moses were translated into Greek, before the Persian Monarchy began: whereas it is far more likely, that he gat that part of his learning and knowledge, by conversing with the Jews in Babylon; for that Pythagorus had familiarity and discourse with them also, appeareth by Pyrphier in his Life, out of Diogenes, ἐν τοῖς ὑπὲρ Θύλης ἀπίστοις (i.e.) of the incredible relation made of Thule.

3480. Cambyses also was about to prepare a navy, to go against the Carthaginians: but gave it off, for that the Sidonians, upon whom he was most to rely, for that kinde of service, refused to go against their own Colony and kindred: mean while, he sent for some of the Itchthyophagites, from the city Elephantina; who of all others in those parts, were most versed in the Ethyopian language; and sent them for so many spies, to the Ethyopians called Macrobii; because they are generally very long lived, and inhabit, the lower parts of Africa, bordering upon the southern sea; yet under colour of carrying presents to their king, and to see The Table of the Sun. The king of Ethiopia in the presence of those, whether Embassadors or spies, took his bow, and bent it; and then unbent it again, and so gave it them, to carry it to Cambyses, and bad them tell him, that when his Persians should be able so easily to bend such bows as those, he should then, and not before begin to get him an excessive great army, and come fight with the long lived Ethiopians, [Herod. lib. 3. from chap. 17. to chap. 25.] 4190. 524.

Smerdis, al. Tanyoxarces, Cambyses his full Brother, assaying to bend this bow, came within two fingers bredth of the noch, which none other of all the Persians could do, for very envy whereof, Cambyses presently dismissed, and sent him away into Persia. [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 30.]

P Cambyses

Cambyses in a rage, gave order out of hand for a voyage into Ethiopia; without provision made of corn, or other victual: nor re-counting with himself, that he was to go to the furthest end, as it were of the world, but like a bedlam-man, so soon as he had heard what his Ichthyophagites had said, marched away instantly with all his own foot, commanding the Grecians to stay behind, [Id. ib. cap. 24.]

When he was come as far as Thebes in Egypt, he there culled out about 50 thousand men of his army, and sent them to rob first, and then to burn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, and to make slaves of all the inhabitants of the place: but himself marched forward towards Ethiopia, [Id. ib. Diodor. Sic. in his Excerpta, published by Hen. Vales. pag. 249.]

In that voyage, Cambyses subdued the Ethiopians, which bordered upon the lower parts of Egypt, which inhabit the city Nisa, and keep holy-dayes to Bacchus, [Herod. l. b. 3. c. 97.] and there, unto Saba the chief house or palace, of the king of the Ethiopians, and the Island wherein it stood, he gave the name of Meroes, in memory of Meroe, who was both wife and sister to him. [Strabo lib. 17. of his Geogr. Josephus. l. 2. Antiq. cap. 5. al. cap. 10.] for she accompanied him into Egypt, and there died, and her he had married, a thing strange, and never heard of before in Persia, and not long after, he married his elder sister also, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 31.] called Atossa; who after his death was married also, to Magus, and after him to Darius Hystaspis, [Ib. cap. 68. and 88.]

The army which went from Thebes against the Ammonians, having travelled seven dayes journey over the sands, came at length to the city, Oasis, (which city was inhabited by those Samians, which were of the Escrionian tribe) and from thence, to a countrey called Beatorum insula, (i. e.) the Isle of the happy ones, and as they marched from thence, over the sandy plains, and were at dinner, in the mid-way between Oasis, and Ammonia, it is said, that there arose, a mighty strong winde out of the South, which brought those moveable sands upon them, and overwhelmed them all. [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 26. Just. lib. 1. cap. 9.] Plutarch in the life of Alexander, saith, that there were 50 thousand men lost in the land, that time, (i. e.) that the whole army that went, every man of them were drowned in that deludge of quick-sands.

As for the Army which went forward with him against the Ethiopians, they had not gone five dayes march, but all provisions fail'd them: and a little after they had no horses left them to eat, and when still they went on, and came to the sands, they were then fain to cast lots, and to eat up one another, which when cambyses saw, he returned, and came back to Thebes, having spent a multitude of his army, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 25. Seneca, lib. 2. cap. 30.] of his natural questions, of whom Lucan also speaking, saith,

And mad Cambyses, marching toward the East,
Came to the long-liv'd Ethiopians:
And wanting food, his own men up did eat;
And yet the Head of Nilus never found.

Cambyses returning to Memphis, discharged his Grecians; and shipt them there to be gone, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 25.] But when he there saw the Egyptians keeping holy-day, because their god Apis had appeared to them, he conceiving they had done it for joy of his disastarous voyage, sent for Apis to be brought unto him, and ran his own sword into him, commanding all his priests to be scourged with whips, and the rest of the Egyptians, which were found keeping holy-day, to be slain by his souldiers. Apis being so wounded by him, pined away in the Temple, and died, and the priests took the body of the beast, and secretly buried it, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 27, 28, 29.]

For this cause, the Egyptians say, that Cambyses, being not otherwise overwell in his wits, fell stark mad; which appeared first in causing his own brother to be kill'd: for having sent him away, formerly into Persia, (as was said before) he now dreampt, that a messenger came to him from thence, who told him, that Smerdis, sitting in the regal throne, touched the Heavens with his head: wherefore being astonished with this dream, he forthwith dispatched away Prexaspes, who was most intimate with him of all the Persians, to kill his brother Smerdis, and he accordingly coming to Susa, caused him to be murdered, having drawn him forth, as some say, upon a hunting match: but as others report, that having toaled him along, as far as the Red-sea; he there threw him in, and drowned him, [Ib. cap. 30. and 36.] But Justin out of Trogus, lib. 1. cap. 9. saith, that this charge was committed to Cometes, one of the Magi, and that he murdered not this Merges, for by that name Smerdes goes in him (until after Cambyses was dead; Ctesias, purposely (as his manner was) dissenting from Herodotus tells us a quite other tale; That Spendahates, one of the Magi, having been scourged by Tanyaxares, that is, by this Smerdis his command, accused him to Cambyses, of seeking to make himself king; And that by the advise of this Spendahates, he

he was sent for out of Bactria into Egypt, and was there made to drink Bulls blood, and thereof died; and that he him self was sent back into Bactria, and there, because he was in all lineaments of face and body, very like unto him, ruled all, as if he had been very Tanyoxarces, or Smerdis himself.

3481. After Harpagus, Oroetes a Persian born, being made Governour of Sardes, and of all the Provinces of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, by Cyrus, is said to have sent a messenger to Polycrates of Samos, to ask him about a certain matter; and that Polycrates then happening to be lying upon his bed in his chamber (Anacreon the Teian, that excellent Lyric. Poet of Ionia, and who, as Clem. Alexand. sayes, was the first inventor of Love-Songs, sitting by) vouchsafed the messenger not so much as a look, much lesse an answer. And Oroetes resolving to be revenged of him for this affront, sent one Myrtus a Lydian born, the son of Gyges, in an other message; to tell him, that himself for fear of Cambyses, would faine flee over to him, with all his treasure. Polycrates giving over-hasty credit hereto, to hasten the matter, went himself unto him, carrying one Democedes, a Physitian of Crotona in Italy, along with him; and when he came as far as Magnesia toward him; there Oroetes took and crucified him: letting the Samians who came with him go: the rest, and among them this Democedes, he took and made his bond-servants, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 126. to 127.] But Valer. Max. [lib. 6. cap. ult.] relates, that he was crucified by Orontes (for so he calls him, with Tully, lib. 5. de Finibus) Governour under King Darius, upon the top of the mount Mycale; to wit, in that fore-land of Ionia, which looks toward Samos: where as yet Darius at that time, was but one of the guard to Cambyses, and of no such high place or authority among the Persians: as appears out of, [Herodot. lib. 3. cap. 139. and cap. 140.] where he saith, that in Cambyses his expedition into Egypt, Syloson the brother of Polycrates, presented him with a most rich robe publickly at Mempsis, whence came the proverb; Sylosons robe: and he also sayes, that Polycrates came to that foul end, at what time Cambyses was scarce his own man in Egypt, [ibi. ca. 120.] and with him agrees [Pliny lib. 33. ca. 1.] where he saith, that this fell out in the 230. year after the building of Rome, which according to Varro his account; and which for the most part he followes, falls upon the 64 Olympiade. | 4191. 523.

Cambyses seeing his wife Meroe take on, as she did, for the death of her brother Smerdis, dispatched her out of the way, too, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 31. 32.]

In the 7 year of Cambyses, the 225. year of Nabonassers callender, upon the 17 day of the moneth Phamenoth, with the Egyptians, (16 day of our July) one hour before midnight, the Moon was seen eclipsed at Babylon, [Ptol. in his, Mag. Syntax. lib. 5. c. 14.]

Cambyses shot Prexaspes his son, who was his cup-bearer thorough with an arrow: and the day following, caused 12 principal men more of the Persians who had done no hurt at all, to be buried alive, with their heads downward. He gave order also, that Croesus, who had sometime been King of Lydia, onely because he had in a fair and friendly manner admonished him not to do such things, to be put to death. But repenting him soon after, he was glad that execution was not done upon him; neverthelesse he put them to death who were appointed to do, and had not done it. Many like mad prankes played he, both upon Persians, and also upon other friends of his, while he remained at Memphis: he opened many of their Sepulchres to see the bodies of those who lay buried in them; going upon a time into the Temple of Vulcan, he laughed exceedingly, and jeered at his image there; and another time going into the temple of the Cabirie, whether it was not lawfull for any to have acxesse, but for the Priests onely; and having spent many a jest upon the images which he saw there, he caused them all to be consumed with fire, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 34. to ca. 38.] The rest of their temples, partly he burnt down, partly he pull'd down, and partly he defaced, and mangled; as also he did their Obelisks, [Strabo lib. 17.]

Cambyses was answered by the Oracle of Butis, whither he had sent, that he should die at Ecbatane; which he understood of Ecbatane in Media, where all his treasure lay.

 But

But as he lay at Ecbatane in Syria, the messenger brought him word, what the commandment of Patizithes was: who hearing of the conspiracie that was against him, presently leapt to horse, purposing in all haste to march with his army to Susa, against the conspirators; but as he was leaping, his sword fell out of his scabbard: and ran into his thigh. Upon the twentieth day after which accident, he sent for the Nobles of Persia to come unto him, unto whom he made known both the slaughter of his brother, and the treason of the Magi, against himself: requiring them by no means to suffer the kingdom to return to the Medes, (for the Magus was a Median born as may be gathered out of Herodotus, lib. 3. cap. 73. and cap. 126.) and soon after, his wound festering, he died, when he had reigned only 7 years and 5 months, [Herodotus, lib. 3. from cap. 62. to 66.] Josephus tells us that in his return out of Egypt, he dyed at Damascus, [lib. 11. Antiq. cap. 3.] putting Damascus instead of Herodotus his Ecbatane in Syria. Ctesias will have it, that he came as far as Babylon; and that there he took his wound, and died of it; writing of his death, and the foregoing signes and presages thereof in this manner.

When Cambyses was offering sacrifices, and the beasts throats were cut, there came no blood out, at which he was much amazed, and Roxane bare him a boy without a head, and that amazed him much more, and the Magi told him, that this portended, that he should leave no successor of his own behind him. His mother also appearing to him in a dream, seemed to threaten him destruction, for his brothers death, which troubled him yet more than all the rest, and that when he was come to Babylon, and there sate whitling a litle stick with a knife, to spend the time, he by chance hurt therewith a muscle in his thigh, whereof he dyed the 11 day after: [Ctesias.] But at his departure out of Egypt, he left Aryander to govern it, in his stead.

When Cambyses was now dead, little thought the Persians that they had got a Magus to be their king: but that his brother indeed, had succeeded him in the kingdom, especially, when Prexaspes stood to it, that he never kill'd him, nor was it in truth safe for him now to confesse that he had killed a son of Cyrus with his own hand, [Herod. l. 3. c. 66.] and the matter it self was therefore the more easie to be concealed, because among the Persians, it was ever held for a point of state, to have the person of the king seldom seen abroad [Justin. l. 1. c. 9.] and so it came to passe, that this Magus, bearing himself for Smerdes, Cyrus his son, as being of the same name, and very like him, held the kingdom seven whole months quietly, which served to make up the 8 year of Cambyses his reign. But during that time he spared for no cost, to shew all kind of bounty and munificence to the subjects in all parts, insomuch, that when newes came afterward of his death, all Asia, and all nations save the Persians, much lamented for it, for the dispatching away courriers into all parts, he proclaimed three years freedome from paying of tribute, and service in the wars and this de did, so soon as ever he took the title upon him, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 67.] and he took moreover Atossa Cyrus his daughter, and all the rest of Cambyses his wives to himself, [Ib. c. 68. 88.]

Ammianus Marcellinus, [lib. 23.] out of ancient books reporteth, that after Cambyses his death, 7 Magi took the management of the kingdome of Persia into their hands: which number, Valer. Max. also in his [9 book, c. 2.] reteineth. But of them there were two chief, named by Herodotus, [lib. 3. c. 61. 78.] Patizithes, whom Trogus calls Cometes, and his brother, who only bare the name of king, as in the person of Cyrus his son: and is called by Herodotus, Smerdis, by Eschylus, Mardus, by Ctesias, Spendabates, by Trogus, Oropastes, and in the Scripture, Artachshashta.

To this Artachshashta it was that letters were brought from the Samaritans, to forbid the further building of Jerusalem, as of a city, which they blazoned for a rebellious and wicked place, and which it it went on to be built, would never pay tribute to the kings of Persia [Ez. 4. 7, 16.]

3483. 4. Artachshashta, by his letter, forbade the building of Jerusalem, until he should give further order, by vertue of which inhibition, the Samaritans taking courage, came flying to Jerusalem, by strong hand, made the Jewes give off their building, not of the City only, but also of the Temple, for which neverthelesse, they had Cyrus his expresse order to finish it: But as they had been hitherto often interrupted in that work, so now they wholly gave it off, till the second year of the reign of Darius, [Ez. 4. 17. 24.] 4193 521

Whiles this Artachshashta held the kingdom, Oroetes the Persian continuing at Sardes first reproached Mitrobates, Governor, of Dascylium in the continent of Asia, for not having gotten the Isle of Samos, into his hands, and annexed it to his government, in Polycrates his life time, and afterward took both him and his son Cranapes, both men of good esteeme among the Persians, and slew them: committing sundry other outrages, and among the rest, caused a messenger, which came to him from Darius, because he told him something that pleased him not, to be murthered, [Herod. l. 3. c. 126.]

Ctesias tells us, that Isabates the Eunuch, who had the charge of carrying the Corps of Cambyses into Persia, disclosed all the plot, and fraud of the Magi to the army, & that being therefore pursued by them, he fled for safegard to a Temple, and there they took off his head: but Herod. saies, that 8 months after Cambyses his death, the matter was brought first to light by the cunning of Otanes the son of Pharnaspes, and afterward, more fully manifested by Prexaspes; who being himself in a certain Tower, called the people to him, and from thence declared to them, and acknowledged that he himself, being forced thereto by Cambyses his command, had murdered his Brother Smerdes the son of Cyrus, and that they were the Magi which then ruled all; and having so said, he threw himself thence down headlong among them, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 68. and 75.] As for the discovery made by Otanes, and destruction of the Magi, Justin out of Herodotus, and Trogus Pompeius, sets it down in this wise.

Ostanes (which is that Otanes) saith he, by a messenger enquired of his daughter (which was one of the concubines, or harlots of the King) whether it were indeed Cyrus his son that was King: she answered, that she her self knew not, nor could possibly tell how to learn it out of any of her fellows, because they were all kept apart in several lodgings one from the other. Then he advised her when her turn came to lie with him, to feel his head, as he lay a sleep; for Cambyses, or (as Herodotus hath it) Cyrus had caused the Magus his eares to be cut off. And being afterward assured by his daughter, that the King had no ears, he made the Princes of Persia acquainted therewith: and having drawn them into a conspiracy against the mock-king, bound them all with an oath unto it. There were seven of them onely in this conjuration: who instantly, least by delay repentance might befal any, and so the thing come to be disclosed; carrying every man a dagger under his coat, went directly to the place where the King was, and killing such as stood in their way, at last came where the Magi were assembled: nor were they wanting to their own defence; for they slew down right two of the conspirators, (or rather wounded them onely, as Herodotus hath it) but they were all laid hold on by the more in number: among which, Gobryas having one of them about the middle, when his fellows could not come at the Magus to kill him, for fear of hurting Gobryas himself; he bade them kill the Magus thorough his body. But yet as good luck would, they killed the Magus, and did him no hurt, [Justin lib. 1. ca. 9.]

The names of these 7 Persians (whom Jerome upon Daniel 11. verse 2. would needs call the Magi) were these. Onophas, Idernes, Naradobates, Mardonius, Barises, Artaphernes, and Darius, the son of Hystaspes: as Ctesias hath it: But in Herodotus, these. Otanes, Hydarves, Megabyzus, Gobryas, Aspathines, Intaphernes, and Darius: which Darius was then newly arrived there from Susa, where his father Hystaspes was Governour. But both Ctesias and Herodotus tell us, that the Persians ever after kept a yearly Festival upon the day wherein the Magi were thus destroyed.

Six dayes after the Magi were made away, those 7 Persians met in counsel, and advised together, what form of government they should now set up in Persia. Otanes advised for an Aristocracy; Megabyzus, for an Oligarchie; but Darius, perswaded by all means for a Monarchie; and when this last opinion, for the supream power to be settled in one person, had carried it by the major part of voices; Otanes resigned all his right to the other six, upon condition that neither himself, nor any of his should ever be subject to any of them or theirs: whence it was that his family onely among the Persians were left free, and not subject to the Kings command further than themselves listed: provided that they brake no law of the Persians: and because he was the first that set this wheele a going, and drew the rest into the action; therefore they thought fit, to heap all kinds of magnificence and honour upon him and his posterity. And among the rest, to have him every year presented with a Median Robe. But for the Election of a new King, they came to this agreement among themselves, that every of them should get on horse-back a little before sun-rising, and whose horse happened first to neigh after the sun was up, he should be King in Cambyses room: which when the horse of Darius the son of Hystaspes, by the craft and subtilty of Oebaris his Quiry happened to do presently: all the rest leapt off their horses, and adored Darius, crying, God save the King, [Herod. lib. 3 from ca. 80. to ca. 88.]

Nor yet were they lesse mindful of their own priviledges and immunities, than Otanes had been; for this they had common to them all: First that both Otanes and the rest, should come to Court when they pleased; and have free accesse to the Kings person, without sending in word that he was there to speak with him, unlesse he were in bed with the Queen, [Id. ib. ca. 84. and ca. 118.] And secondly, that they might weare every man his turbant, in a different fashion from all other men. For whereas the King onely and his heir apparent, might wear their turbants upright: (as Seneca hath it, lib. 6. De Beneficiis ca. 31. and so hath Plutarch in the lives of Themistocles and Artaxerxes) and the rest of the Nobility wear them hanging backward; it was now granted to them and their posterity, that they should wear them pointing forward; because when they went about the slaughter of the Magi, they used this fashion as a token or sign between themselves, [Plutarch in his Precepts of government.] For Darius had given this as a sign for each to know another by in the dark: that they should turn the buckle that fastned their turbants behind, and wear them in their fore-heads, [Polya. lib. Strateg. 7.]

But this, as it seemeth, was the grand priviledge to them granted; that although the King had, as it were, a perpetual Dictatorship in himself over them, yet they every man in his turn, should have a kind of a tribunitian power with him ; to which opinion or imagination of mine own, there are three considerations moving me. First, for that these conspirators foreseeing that they should prove burdensome (and wherein I pray more than in this way ?) to Darius, they bound him with an oath (which is most religiously observed among the Persians) that he should never do any of them to death, either by poison, or sword, or by any violent way, or by starving them ; as Valer. Max. [lib. 9. ca. 2.] affirmeth. Secondly, for that Eschylus, who was in the fight against the Persians at Marathon names two Kings, successively between the slaughter of the Magi, and Darius his reign; to wit, Maraphis and Artaphrenes. Of whom the first seemeth to be him whom Ctesias calleth Mardonius, and the other Artaphernes. And lastly, for that in Ezra, in the edict of Darius, in the second year of his reign, for the rebuilding of the Temple, we find Artacshasta, also called by the name of King of Persia, [Ezra 6. 14.] to have given his consent thereto, in his 2 year of his reign; for the rebuilding of the Temple ; we find Artachshashta also called sometime King of Persia, [Ezra 6. c. 14.] to have given his consent thereto: by whom it is hard to understand any other than Artaphernes.

In the beginning of his reign, Darius took Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, who had formerly been married to his own Brother Cambyses, and afterward to the Magus, and made her his wife, purposing to establish his kingdom the better, by matching into the Royal Stock : that so the kingdom might not seem translated to another family, but rather returned into Cyrus his house, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 88. and lib. 7. ca. 2. and Justin out of Trogus lib. 1. ca. 10.] And as himself was first called Ochus, as appears by [Valer. Max. lib. 9. ca. 2.] (i.e.) אחוש yet afterward taking the Regal ורוש addition upon him, with the kingdom of Cambyses, took also his surname to him; so I conceive, that both he was that Achash-verosh, al. Assuerus, which in the Story of Esther, is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, over one hundred twenty and seven Provinces ; and that this his chief wife Atossa, was none other than Vashti, of whom there is so much mention made in the same book.

Oroetes continued still Governour at Sardes, and kept a thousand Persians for his guard about him. But Darius sending his royal letters by Bagæus the son of Arton to the souldiers there, caused him to be dispatched out of the way ; whose goods being all brought as confiscate to Susa ; there came also a long with them, Democedes, whom he had made his slave, a Physitian of Crotona, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 127, 128, 129.] as was said before.

It fell out afterward that Darius, as he was a hunting fell from his horse, and with the fall, wrencht his foot, and strained it very sorely ; which whiles the Egyptian Chirurgeons sought to bring right again, and used much violence in the cure, they made him that he could not sleep for seven dayes. Upon the 8 day this Democedes was brought unto him, all poor and ragged, and shackled, as he was ; he with such Greek fomentations as he used, quickly brought the King to sleep again : and in short time recovered him. Whereupon he was rewarded with rich gifts by the King and his Wives ; and dwelt in a goodly house in Susa : and sat at Table with the King, abounding with all things that his heart could wish: save onely that he could not return into Greece again ; and moreover when Darius would have hung up his Egyptian Physitians, because a Grecian could do more in his cure than they all, he obtained their pardon of the King : And whereas there was a certain Fortune-teller of Elis, which came in company with him, and had followed Polycrates to Magnesia, and was brought to Susa, among the rest of Oroetes his slaves; he got him also to be set at liberty, [Herod. ib. ca. 129, 130, 132.]

It fell out afterward that Atossa, daughter to Cyrus, and Darius his chief wife, had a Cancer in her breast : and being lanced, it spread further and further ; and when Democedes had cured her of that sore, he prevailed so far with her, as to move the King to make war upon Greece. Upon whose perswasion, Darius presently called to him fifteen choice men, all Persians; and commanded them to follow Democedes, and by his directions to view all the Maritine places of Greece, and bring him back again with them to him. These when they were come into Phoenicia, and from thence to Sidon ; fitted themselves there of shipping, and other provisions, and sailed into Greece, and viewed all the Sea-coasts of Greece, and drew it into Maps: and were the first Persian spyes that ever came into Greece. And then having taken a view of the most celebrious cities and places in the heart of Greece, they passed from thence to Tarentum in Italy, from whence Democedes stole away to Crotona where his own home was, and there marrying the daughter of Milo Crotoniates, that famous Wrestler ; would not return any more to Darius, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 133. to ca. 138. with Athenaus, lib. 12. Deipnosoph. and Ælian. Var. Histor. lib. 8. ca. 17.

3484. This was the third Sabbatical year held by the Jewes, after their return from Babylon.

a. c. Mardocai the Jew, is said to have had a dream in the Greek additions of [Esth. ca. 11.] upon the 1 day of the month Nisan, in the 2 year of the reign of Artaxerxes the great (for so Assuerus al. Darius the son of Hystaspes, is there called) concerning a River signifying Esther, and two Dragons portending himself and Haman, [cap. 10.] 4194. 520.

In

In the second year of king Darius, which was in the 65 Olympiade, Haggai the prophet reproved the idlenesse of the Jews, in setting forward the building of the temple, declaring to them, that that long sterilitie of the ground, and other plagues which continually fell upon them, between the first and third Sabbaticall years, were all for their great neglect in that work, and earnestly perswaded them to mend that fault; whereupon Zerobabel, the governour of the Jews, and Joshua the High priest, and all the people took the work in hand afresh, and provided materials necessary for the building, upon the 24 day of the same moneth, [Hag. 1.1, 15.]

3485. a. Upon the 21 day of the 7 moneth, the same year Haggai animated the Jews, to go on with the work, with a promise of Gods presence, and blessing upon them in it, and although the beginnings of this present structure seemed base and despicable in the eyes of such, as had seen the glory of the former 169 years before; yet he told them, that if they considered that blessed, and so much desired Messias, which after a time, to wit 516 years from thence, should there first be manifested, and the peace which should thence be propagated to all nations, they must acknowledge the glory of this Temple, far to excell the beauty of the former, [Hag. 2.1.9.]; 4105 519

In the 8 moneth of the same 2 years of Darius, Zacharias the son of Barachias exhorted the people to repentance, [Zach. 1.1, 6,]

On the 24 day of the 9 moneth of the same second year, about the middest of the space between seed time, (which immediately followed the end of the sabbatical year,) and the harvest, the Temple began to be reared, by Zerobabel, and Joshua the high priest, with the assistance of Haggai and Zachary the prophets, upon the foundation, which had been formerly laid, [Ezra 5.1, 2. Hag. 2.10, 18, 19.]

Upon the same 24 day, the two last prophecies of Haggai, were revealed to him, the one of the cessation of those plagues which hitherto had followed them: the other of the subversion of sundry kingdoms; and the exaltation of Zerobabel, [Haggai 2. 10.23.]

b. 3485 Tatnei, governour of the countries of this side the river, and Setharbozhaius, and the Apharsakites, their associates coming to Jerusalem, endeavour to hinder them in the work of the Temple; asking the chief of the Jews, by whose command they dit it: and they answering that they did it by virtue of Cyrus his edict, went on stoutly with their work, [Ez. 5.3, 4, 5.13, 16.] For whereas by the Laws of Medes and Persians, the commands and grants of their kings ought to be perpetual, and unalterable, [Dan, 6.8, 12. Esth. 1.19. & c. 8.8.] it was therefore lawfull for the Jews to proceed in the work; without expecting any new order thereupon. 4195. 519.

Their enemies, by a letter certifie this answer to Darius, desiring that search might be made in the records at Babylon, whether there were any such grant made by Cyrus or noe, and desire to know the kings further pleasure therein, [Ezra 5. 5, 17.]

The work being thus interrupted, and the scarcity concontinuing in Judea, because the corne was not yet ripe, upon the 24 day of the 11 moneth Sebat, in the second year of Darius, the prophet Zachary had a vision, of horsemen galloping up and down over the face of the whole earth, being now all at rest and quiet, whereupon, in the hearing of the prophet, God made a good and gracious answer, with many comfortable words to the Angel, which entreated God to cease his anger and fury, which had been so hot against the people of the Jews, and Jerusalem, and cities of Juda, now these 70 years, [Zach. 1. 7. chap. 12.13.] the beginning of which 70 years is to be reckoned, from the coming of the Assyrians, to the last siege laid unto Jerusalem, (of which more above in the 3415. year of the world) [Jer. 34.1. with Ezek. 5.12, 13.] whiter also is referred, all that which is spoken, [Zach. 1.] and in the three chapters following, as also, all that exhortation which is read, [*chap.*2.6, 7.] sent to the Jews remaining still in Babylon, that they should go out of her with all speed, pointing to that calamity, which a while after Darius brought upon Babylon when he took it.

Ehe edict of Cyrus, for the re-building of the Temple, which was found at Acmethæ, al. Ecbatan, in the province of the Medes; together with a second command, in favour of the Jews from Darius himself, was sent to Tatneis and his fellows; wherein it was given them in charge, that they should not onely not hinder the work of the Lords house, but also should, set it forward, by furnishing the expense thereof, out of the kings tribute; and moreover; to supply the necessary charge of the daily sacrifices, to be offered by the priests at Jerusalem, which command of the king, being forthwith put in execution, the Jews encouraged by the prophesies of Haggai and Zachary went on roundly to the finishing of the work, [Ez. 6.1, 14.]

But I conceive that at this time, Artachshashta, whom Ezra 6.14. joyneth with Darius in this edict, as partaker with him in the power of the kingdom, was one of the 7 princes of Persia, which slew the Magus: to wit, he whom Eschilus, (in Persis) calls Artaphrenes. Hellanicus, (as his Scholiast terms him, Daphernes, Cresias Artaphernes, and Herod. Intaphernes. He therefore, according to the priviledge granted by Darius, coming upon a time to speak with Darius, without sending in, to tell him that he was there, was kept out by the door keeper, and groom of the bedchamber, who told him that the King was asleep with the Queen: But he, supposing that they lied unto him, drew his Cimitre, and cut off both their ears and noses; and tying the reigns of a horse about both their necks turn'd them going: But when they presently ran in to the king, shewing him what they had suffered, and upon what occasion: the king estsoons, sent for the rest of the Princes, severally, fearing that this might happily have been done by the common consent of them all: but finding it was not, he caused both Intaphernes and all his sons, save only the eldest, whom he spared at his mothers petition, to be put to death: Herodotus relateth this matter [lib.3. cap. 118, 119.] as a thing acted presently upon the execution done upon the Magi; but Valer. Max; following other Authors, [lib.9, cap. 2.] tells us, that finding himself curbed by these Princes, put them all to death by a new devised kind of punishment: For saith he, making a lower room, and filling it with cinders, and bearing up the room over it, with one post, and having feasted and filled them with meat and drink, he put them all into that upper roome; and when they were all fast a sleep, taking away the post that bare it up, they all fell into the cinders, in the under roome, and there perished.

Now though it be not very likely that they perished in this manner, yet is it very credible, that putting them from the government of the kingdom, he eased himself of that yoak, which hitherto lay so heavy on his neck.

And from that time forward, Darius was a free and absolute Monarch; and he it is, that we, in the Scripture, find called by the name of Assuerus. This Assuerus therefore, in the 3 year, reckoned from the beginning of his reign, as he sate in his throne, in his pallace at Susa; to shew the glory of his kingdom, and magnificence of his state, made a feast for all the Governors, and great men of his dominions, which lasted 180 dayes long, [Est. 1.2,3,4.] now this city of Susa, as Pliny, [lib. 6. c. 27.] saies, was built by this Darius; or rather as Elian, [lib. 13. de animal. c. 59.] was embellisht with goodly and magnificent pallaces by him, and Herod. [lib. 5. c. 49.] tells us, that he made that the place of his residing and there kept all his treasure.

486. After this half years banquet was ended, there followed an other of seven dayes long; 4196 51 whereunto were invited all the dwellers, and whoever else was then present at Susa, from the greatest to the least. The men sitting with the King, in the court of the garden of the kings house, and the women within the pallace it self, with Vashti the Queen, (which to us, is Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus,) [Esth. 1. 5.9.]

Upon the last day of this feast; the king, being somewhat high flowen with drink, would needs shew the beauty of the Queen to the men, and sent for hir to come unto him: but she refused; and thereupon, by the advise of Memucan, one of the seven wise men, of the Medes and Persians, which knew the lawes and statutes of those countries (for these were the kings Judges, which judged in all causes arising among the Persians, and resolved all cases in point of law; of whom, Herod. [lib. 3. c. 14.31.] and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes maketh mention,) divorced and put her away, making moreover a law, that every man thereafter, should be Master in his own house, [Esth.1.10,22.]

Hereupon, there was enquiry made after all the faire damsels that were to be found in Assuerus his dominions, to find out a fit consort for the king, to reign in the stead of Vashti, which was divorced, and among others, Hadassa, a damsel of the Jewes, which was also called Esther; the daughter of Abichajile, a woman of Benjamin, was taken into consideration, [Esth. 2. 1, 8.]

487. In the fourth year of Darius, the fourth day of the ninth month, called Chisleu, when 4197 517
a. the Jewes, by Sharezer, and Regem-melech, consulted with the Priests and Prophets, concerning the fast appointed to be held upon the day of the destruction of the City and Temple of Jerusalem, God answered them, that those fasts of the fifth and seventh months which they had observed for seventie years space, were no wayes pleasing to him, and put them in mind of their obstinacie, and perseverance in their sins, which had brought that terrible desolation upon them, [Zach. 7. 1,14.] now from the said destruction, and the death of Gedalia (which gave occasion of that fast, held in the 7 month,) following two months after, to the very instant of this prophecie, we in our Chronologie, gather, that there were 70 years.

And in the eighth chapter of the same Zacharie, God tells them, that he would restore Jerusalem, and put an end to all their former miseries, and that he would change their fasts; as well that of the fourth moneth, on the ninth day whereof, the City was taken, as that of the fifth month, upon the tenth whereof, the Temple was burnt, and of the seventh month, wherein the remnant of the people, upon the murther of Gedalia, was scattered among the Nations, and of the 10 month, upon the 10 day whereof, the City, under Sedechia, began to besieged by Nebuchadnesar, into mirth; and would send joy and gladnesse, and liberty unto his people.

In

3489. In the 6 year of Darius, toward the later end thereof, on the 3 day of the 12 moneth, called Adar, was the structure of the Temple finished. The dedication whereof, the Israelites which returned out of the captivity, celebrated with great joy, and abundance of sacrifices, the Priests and Levites, every one in his place and office attending in the ministery of the Temple, [Ezra 6. 15, 18.]

And they also upon the 14 day of the first moneth, celebrated the first Passeover in the second Temple; keeping also the feast of sweet-bread seven dayes, with great joy; for that God had turned the heart of the king of Assyria toward them, [Ezra 6. 19. 22.] to wit of Darius, who having recovered Babylon, after 20 moneths siege, by the means of Zopyrus, was in full right, stiled now king of the Assyrians, no lesse than of the Persians, [Herod. lib. 3. in fin.] and Justin in the end of his first book.

3490. b. When Esthers turn came to be brought to the king Assuerus, she was attended on, from the Seraglia, to the kings chamber, by Hegaius the Eunuch, [Esther 2. 12, 15.] Ἐν μέρει γὰρ δὴ γυναῖκες φοιτέουσι τοῖς Πέρσῃσι, saith Herod. lib. 3. cap. 69. (i. e.) the women in Persia, come round in their turns, to their husbands beds.

But in the 7 year of Assuerus his reign, in the 10 moneth, called Tebeth; when Esther came unto the king, she found grace and favour in his eyes, above all the other damsels; insomuch, that he put the crown of the kingdom upon her head, and made her Queen in the stead of Vashty, [Esth. 2. 16, 17.] whence I gather, that as Vashty was Atossa, so Esther was she, whom Herodotus, calls the Virgin Artystona, and whom he sayes, that Darius loved above all his wives, and whose statue, he caused to be made of solid gold, [lib. 3. cap. 88, with cap. 69, lib. 7.] though I am not ignorant, that Hadassa, which was another name given to Esther, comes a great deal neater to Atossa, and that Herodotus makes Artistona, to have been Cyrus his daughter, and Atossaes sister, whether we should say, that Herodotus was not so wel skilled in the Persian genealogies, or that the Persians themselves, for very envy, concealed the name of Esther.

Assuerus in honour of his new spousals, made a most sumptuous feast for all his Princes and servants, and called it Esthers feast, wherein he eased the provinces of many taxes and tallages, and gave gifts answerable to the state and magnificence of so great a king, [Esther. 2. 18.]

Jubile 19.

3491. a. Hippias, the Tyrant of Athens, in the fourth year before his banishment from thence, fearing what might fall, began to look about for some forrein support, and to that end, gave his daughter Archedice to Æantides the son of Hippocles the Tyrant, of Lampsacus, the rather for that he perceived, that they were both gracious and in great esteem with Darius, [Thucid. lib. 6.]

3494. a. Haman, the son of Amadetha, an Aggagite, of the race of the Amalekites, malicing Mordecai a Jew, because he would not fall down and adore him as others did, resolved for his sake to be revenged of all his nation (which was ever indeed adverse to his, Deut. 25. 19.) and to root it out, for the executing of which purpose, that he might find out a successeful time, on the first moneth Nisan, in the 12 year of king Assuerus, he caused pur, that is, lots to be cast before him; for the knowing of the day and the moneth, wherein the Jews should be destroyed: and the lot fell upon the 12 moneth Adar, the last of the whole year, [Esther 3. 1, 7.] 4204. 510.

Then pretending some specious reasons to Assuerus, with the offer of ten thousand talents of silver, (which yet the king would not accept) obtained a grant from him to root out all the generation of the Jews, [Esther 3. 7, 11.]

Upon the 13 day of the first moneth, the kings edict was published in Susa, and copies thereof were dispatcht away by carryers into all the provinces of the kings dominions, that all Jews, without respect to sex or age; upon the 13 day of the 12 moneth Adar, should dye the death, [Esth. 3. 12, 15.] Hereupon Mordecai, Esther, and all the Jews, humbled themselves before the Lord, by fasting and prayer, [ib. chap. 4.] and in memorie thereof, their posterity to this day observe a solemn fast, upon the 13 day of the moneth Adar, which they terme, Esthers fast.

Esther goes to the king, in gorgeous apparrel, is graciously received by him; she invites the king once and again to a banquet, and Haman mean while is busie, in giving order for a gallows to be made, to hang Mordecai on, [chap. 5. ib.]

Assuerus, one night, when he could not sleep, would needs have some records red unto him, and among other things, it was there red unto him, how two of his servants, Bigthan and Teresh his door-keepers, had conspired his death, and that one Mordecai had revealed this conspiracy unto him, and thereupon gave order, that the author of this discovery should be highly honoured, and this to be done publiquely, and by whom? but by Haman himself his deadly enemy, [Esth. 6.]

And presently after this, Haman was himself hanged up, at the gibbet which he had provided for Mordecaie, [chap. 7.] Hamans house was given to the Queen; and Mordecaie her cousin-germaine, and who had brought her up, had daily honours bestowed upon him, [ca. 8. 1, 2, 15. ib.]

Upon the 23 day of the moneth Sivan, there was an edict published at Susa, and copies thereof sent away speedily by carriers, into the 127. Provinces, that the Jews upon the 13 day of the moneth Adar, which was the day appointed for their massacre, should have leave to stand upon their own guard, and to defend themselves every where, and to kill all such as should offer to assault them, and should moreover, have the spoile of such mens goods: whereupon both in Susa, and in all the Provinces there was great rejoycing among them, and divers of the people in several countries joyning themselves to their side, turned Jews, [ib. cap. 8. 9, 17.]

d. Hippias (twenty years before the fight at Marathon, in which he served on the Median party.) being now grown an old man; was thrust out of Athens by the Lacedæmonians, and the faction of the Alcmæonidæ there: and taking a passe from the Athenians, went first to Sigæum, and from thence sailed to Lampsacus, to his son in law Eantides, and from thence got him away to Darius, [Thucyd. lib. 6.] Now Pisistratus, Hippias his father, had committed Sigeum in Troas, to Hegesistratus his base son; and that was a receptacle now for Hippias, and afterward for others of the race of Pisistratus, in case of extremity to retire unto, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 65, 91, 94.]

3495. b. Upon the 13 day of the 12 moneth Adar, the Jews in all parts slew all those who were provided to slay them upon the same day, according to Hamans decree: In Susa it self, and the very Palace there, they slew 500. men, together with Hamans ten sons: and in the rest of the Provinces to the number of 75000. men: but medled not with one peny of their goods, [Esth. 9. 1, 16.]

Upon the 14 of the same moneth, the Jewes in the Provinces ceased from killing, and made merry among themselves: But they which dwelt in Susa, having another day given them by the King, slew therein 300. men more of their enemies; and hung the carcasses of Hamans ten sons, upon the gibbet, [ib. cap. 9. 13, 19.]

Upon the 15 day the Jewes that dwelt in Susa made merry and feasted themselves, [D. c. 9. 18.]

Mordecaie began the custom of keeping Holiday in remembrance of Purim, or Lots yearly, upon the 14 and 15 dayes of the moneth Adar: and this was established by Esther, [ib. ca. 9. 23, 30.] And this is the Jews Shrovetide, wherein they read over the History of Esther; and so often as the name of Haman comes to be read, they rap and make a noise with their hands or mallets, upon the deskes or settles in their Synagogues.

3500. In the Isle of Naxos, some of the richer sort were turn'd out by the meaner people; and they repaired to Aristagoras son of Molpagoras, and son in law, and cousin-germain by the mothers side, to Histiæus, Tyrant of Miletus; and whom Histiæus had left Governour there in his room, when Darius under a shew of Honour, had taken himself along with him into Susa: and Aristagoras imparting the matter to Artaphernes, son of Hystaspes, and brother to Darius, Governour of Ionia, residing at Sardes, perswaded him to possesse himself of Naxos, and Paros, and Andros, and the rest of the Cyclades, all depending of Naxos, to the Kings use; which being well liked of by Darius at Susa; he furnished out the next Spring, 200. Ships for that service, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 30. 31, 32.]

3501. c. Artaphernes, making Megabates a Persian borne, Darius his, and his own near kinsman, Commander in Chief of the Persian Army; gave him order with his Fleet of 200. sailes, to go to Miletus, and there to take in Aristagoras and the Ionian Army, which he did; and sailed from thence to Chios: where a jar falling between Aristagoras and Artaphernes, when they had spent four moneths in the siege of Naxos to no purpose: each returned home, nothing done, [Herod. ib. ca. 32, 33, 34.] 4211.

3502. b. Here end the 70 years from the taking of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezar, which is the just number of years of the bondage of that city, expressely foretold by the Prophet, [Esay 23. 15, 17.] from which time, it seems they lived in freedom from any forreign subjection, till the time it was again taken afterward by Alex. the Great. 4212.

Aristagoras fearing what might befall him, because he had not been able to perform what he had undertaken to Artaphernes for the taking of Naxos, and had not wherewithal to pay his army; began to think of revolting from the Persians. And it fell out in the very nick, that there came a messenger from Histiæus in Babylon, having his errand written in letters made with hot irons upon the flesh of his head, and now grown over with hair, by which Aristagoras was advised both himself to fall off from Darius, and also to put all Ionia in armes against him, if he could, [Herod. lib. 5. c. 35. Polya. Stratag. lib. 1.]

Aristagoras hereupon, having imparted this to his friends, perswaded them to side with him, though Hecatæus the Historian disswaded them by all means from rising in armes against the King of Persia: but all in vain; for the conspirators dispatched away

Iatrogaras to Myus to the army, which upon their return from Naxos, remained there, and by a stratagem, took all the principal Commanders of their Fleet. And Aristagoras, now openly revolting from Darius, made a fair shew of a kind of liberty to the Milesians, and took away the tyrants that were in some cities of Ionia; and then went to the Lacedæmonians to pray an aide of them; but received a flat denial at their hands, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 36, 37, 38, 49, 50, 51.]

3503. 4. In the 20 year of the reign of Darius, 246. of Nabonassars æra, upon the 28 day of the moneth Epiphus, according to the Egyptian Calender, (upon the 29. of our November) ending about midnight, there was an Eclipse of the Moon observed at Babylon, [Ptol. Mag. Syntax. lib. 4. ca. 9.] 4213 501

Hippias the son of Pisistratus being sent for from Sigeum upon a vain hope given him of being restored to his Principality in Athens, by the Lacedæmonians, returned from thence into Asia, and accusing the Athenians of many things to Artaphernes, did what in him lay to bring Athens under the subjection of Darius, [Herod. lib. 5. chap. 91. 96.]

The Athenians understanding that Hippias had defamed them to Artaphernes, sent their messengers to Sardes, to perswade the Persians there, not to give credit, nor to lend any ear, to those out-laws of the Athenians: But Artaphernes advised them, if they loved themselves, and their own safety, to call home, and receive Hippias again; But whiles they stood out, and refused to hearken to any such conditions, it fell out that Aristagoras the Milesian returning from Sparta, where he gat nothing but a denial, came to Athens, and there obtained of them 20 saile of Ships to aid the Ionians in their war against the Persians: whereof they made Melantho an eminent man in Athens Commander. [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 96. 97.] Which Fleet, as [Herod. ca. 98. ib.] hath well noted, was the beginning of all mischeif, both to the Grecians and Persians: for this was the beginning of all the wars which grew between the Grecians and the Persians, and which ended in the ruine of the Persian Empire.

Aristagoras, returning to Miletus, perswaded the Pæones, whom Megabazus the Governour of Thracia, had carried away from their own habitation upon the banks of the River Strymon into Phrygia, and by the command of Darius planted them there, to return into their own country; wherefore they taking with them their wives and children, gat away to the sea side, where some for fear, abode still: the rest putting over to Chios, from thence gat shipping, and came to Lesbos, and from thence to Doriscus: and from thence again, by land went away into their own country, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 98.]

3504. The Athenian Fleet arrived at Miletus, and with them came also five tall Ships of the Eretrians, for the Athenians sake. There Aristagoras staied himself, but sent his own brother Charopinus Commander over the Milesians, and Helmophantus Commander over the rest of the Ionians, against Sardes. The Ionians, in company with the Athenians and Eretrians, coming with their Fleet to Ephesus, left their Ships at Coresus, a Port of the Ephesians, and marched themselves in a body over-land to Sardes: and took and burnt it all, save the Castle which Artaphernes himself kept, not sparing the very temple of Cybele. But when the Lydians and Persians joyning together, made good the Market-place, thorough the middest whereof ran the River Pactolus, and there defended themselves against them; the Ionians for very fear left the place, and retired to the Hill Tmolus, thereto adjoyning, and from thence by night fled away to their ships: whereupon the Persians dwelling on that side the River Halys, gathering into a body, pursued them, and overtaking them about Ephesus: fought with them, and routed them; killing many, and among them Enalcidas Captain of the Eretrians; a man who had borne away the garland in many of their games, and highly commended by Simonides the Poet in his verses. They which escaped out of the battel, dispersed themselves into their several cities: and the Athenians abandoning from thenceforth the Ionian cause, though earnestly entreated thereto by Aristagoras, would no more appear in it, [Herod. from ca. 99. to ca. 103.] 4214. 500.

Onesilus, turning out his own elder brother Gorgus, King of the Salaminians, and forcing him to flee over to the Medes for succour, prevailed with the whole Isle of Cyprus to fall off from them; save onely those of Amathusa: But while he was besieging that city, tydings came of the firing of Sardes by the Athenians, to Darius: who thereupon growing wrath with the Athenians, gave order to one of his attendants, that as often as ever he sate at meat, he should three times remember him of it, and say, Sir, Remember the Athenians: and then, very improvidently sent away Histiæus, the brother of that Aristagoras, from Susa to Miletus as if of purpose to be afterward the ring-leader of the Ionian Rebels against himself, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 104. 105, 106.]

The Ionians entring into the Hellespont, took Byzantium, and other cities in those parts; and sailing from thence, drew over many of the cities of Caria to joyn with them in this war against the Persians; for the city Caunus, which hitherto stood off, and would not side with them, hearing now of the firing of Sardes, fell also to them, [ib. ca. 103.]

At Clazomenæ (which was of it self sometimes an Island, but now joyned to the continent of Ionia, by a neck of land, as [Strabo lib. 1.] sheweth) was borne Anaxagoras the the Philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, [Olym. 70.] as Diogenes Laertius sheweth in his life, out of Apollodorus his Chronicle.

Whiles Onesilus, lay with his army before Amathusa, news came to him, that Artybius, a Captain of the Persians was making toward Cyprus, with a very numerous army, whereupon he sent to crave aide of the Ionians, and they out of hand advanced toward Cyprus, with a great fleet. But the Persians putting over out of Cilicia, into Cyprus, landed there, their men, and marched by land to the city of Salamis, sending about the Phænians with the ships, to double the point of a Promontory in that Island, called, Claves Cyprus, (i. e.) the keys of Cyprus, and anon after, there followed a fight between the parties, both at land, and sea. And at sea, the Ionians, behaved themselves all very bravely that day, especially the Samians, and had the better of the Phænicians. But at land, while the rest were busie in fight, first Stesenor, Tyrant of the Curii, betrayed his fellows: and then presently the men of Salamis, who fought in chariots, did the like; whereupon the whole army of the Cypriots being routed, many of them were put to the sword; and among them Onesilus, the author of this war, and with him, Aristocyprus, king of the Solians, son of that Philocyphrus, whom Solon, at his being in Cyprus, so much extolled above all other Tyrants, in his verses. The Ionians hearing that Onesilus was slain, and the rest of the cities of that Isle besieged, and that Salamis it self had opened her gates to Gorgus, their old king, returned into Ionia, with all the haste they could make. But among all the cities of Cyprus, that of Solos stood it out longest, yet at seven moneths end, the Persians having undermined the wall round about, took it; and so the Cypriots paid dearly for their one years liberty, and were reduced to their former estate of slavery, [Herod. lib. 5. from cap. 108. to 116.]

3505. The Persian Lords at Sardes, who had married Darius his daughters, as Daurises, Hymees, and Otanes, pursuing the Ionians, who had been in the service against Sardes, after they had routed them near unto Ephesus, and driven them aboard their ships, parted the rest of the work among themselves, and took each of them, in hand what cities of theirs, they would subdue, [Herod. ib. 116.] Daurises for his part, undertook the parts joyning upon the Hellespont; and there took Dardanus, Abydus, Percotes, Lampsacus, and Pæson, every day a city: but as he was on his way from thence, to the city Parios, he understood that all Caria had revolted from the king, and joyned with the Ionians, wherefore he gave off that purpose, and marched away with all his army into Caria, [c. 117.] Hymees undertook the parts about Propontis, and coming thither, wan Cios in Mysia. But then hearing that Daurises was marched out of Hellespont into Caria, he left Propontis, and marched into Hellespont, [ib. cap. 122.] But Artaphernes, the Governour of Sardes, and Otanes the third of those undertakers, went against Ionia it self, and the countrey of Æolia, adjoyning thereunto. In Ionia they took Clazomenæ, and in Æolia, the city Cuma, [Ib. cap. 123.] which being so taken, Anaxagoras with his companions, consulted together, whither they might flie, in which counsaile, Hecatæus the Historian advised, first to transport into the Isle of Leros, and there to fortify for the present; and dwell till occasion were offered to return to Miletus. But Aristagoras his opinion was, to saile rather to a place called Myrcinus, a city among the Edons, (who dwelt upon the bank of the river Strimon) which his own Brother Histiæus had formerly built: wherefore committing the charge of Miletus to Pythagoras himself, with such Volunteers, as he could get, sailed from thence into Thrace, and possessed himself of the place, which he intended, [Ib, c. 124, 125, 126.] 4215. 499

Histiæus, the Tyrant of Miletus, dismissed from Susa by Darius, came to Sardes: where being upon his very first arrival, hotly charged by Artaphernes, as the author of all the rebellion in Ionia; he got away the night following to the sea side, and there finding a ship ready, sailed over into Chios; where the people supposing that he had been sent thither by Darius, of purpose to sollicite them against the Grecians, laid him in irons; but understanding shortly after, that he came in a contrary errand, they quickly set him at liberty: and he forthwith dispatched away letters to Sardes, by Hermippus, of Atarne, to perswade some Persians there, to a revolt. But Artaphernes having gotten knowledge of this practise, by the discovery of the messenger, put those Persians to death, wherefore Histiæus, failing of this purpose, obtained of them of Chios, to grant him a convoy back to Miletus. But the Milesians, as they were glad to be rid of Aristagoras, so they would by no means hear of taking another Tyrant in his room; insomuch, that when Histiæus, assaied to get privilie into the city by night, he received a wound in the thigh, given him by a Milesian; and so being cast out thence, he returned again to Chios, [Herod. lib. 6. in the beginning of it.

3506. Daurises the Persian, leading his army against the Carians, they met together, and made a body, at a place called Columna Alba, (i. e.) the white Pillars, near the river Marsyas, where Pixodorus the son of Mausolus, a man of Cyndya, who had married the daughter of Siennesis the king of Cilicia, gave them advice to passe over the river Mæander; and that having that river at the back of them, they should there abide the coming of the enemy, and fight with him, upon that advantage: but the contrary opinion carried 4216. 498.

ed it, that they should put the Persians to have the river at their backs, and force them to figh at that disadvantage, to the end, said they, that if they fled, having that river at their back, they should not be able to get away. At last therefore, the Carians and Persians came to a battail, near the river Marsyas, which was a very sharp one, and lasted long, and in which the Persians lost two thousand men, and the Carians ten thousand. But when the Carians fled at last to a place called Labranda to the Temple, of Jupiter the warlike, and were there in consultation what to do, whether to submit to the Persian, or to abandon Asia, the Milesians with their partakers, came to aide them: whereupon they took fresh courage, and fought again with the Persians which invaded them, and after a fight longer than the former, they fled again; in which they lost very many men, especially of the Milesians: after which great losses; yet the Cariaus, upon a new supplie, fought with them a third time; for hearing that the Persians, went about now to sack and ransack their cities, they lay in ambush for them upon their way, as they were marching to Mylassa, following therein the advice, of Heraclides Inabolius, a man of Mylassa, into which ambushment, the Persians falling by night, were all cut off, with their commanders, Daurisces, and Amorges, and Sismaces, and with the rest Myrses alsso the son of Gyges, was there slain, [Herodotus, lib. 5. from cap. 118. to 121.]

Hymees the Persian which led his army into the countrey of Hellespont, took in all the Æoles, which inhabited near the cost of old Troy, and the Gergithes, the remainder of those ancient Teucrians, and having done all, deceased himself, of a sicknesse at Troas, [Ib. cap. 122.]

Histiæus the Milesian, when he could not prevaile with the men of Chios, to let him have away their shipping, put over to Mitilene; where the Lesbyans by his perswation, let him have eight tall men of war, well and fully furnished, in which they sailed with him to Byzantium, and staying there, they intercepted certain ships of loading, of the Ionians, which came out of Pontus, all, except such as professed themselves willing and ready to serve Histiæus, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 5. and 26.]

Aristagoras, Histiæus his brother, lying with his army at the siege of Mircinus, a city of the Edones, was there slain with all his men by the Thracians, after they had taken his word, for their own safe passage, and leaving of the place, as Herodotus, in the very end of his fifth book delivers. But Thucidides, [lib. 4.] reckons from hence, 61 years, to the carrying of a colony of the Athenians, by Agnon the son of Nicias, and planting it in Amphipolis, which Diod. Sic. in his 12 book, saies, was done in the 85 Olympiade, to which period of times, we have here conformed our relation of the six years (ending the year following) of the rebellion of the Ionians against the Persians.

3507. There was now a huge preparation making against the city of Miletus, by land and sea, for the Persian Commanders, of all those parts, uniting their forces, set up their rest, to carry that place, what ever became of the rest. Among the Seamen their Phenicians, were the forwardest of all others, and with them were joyned the Cypriots, lately subdued by the Persians, and the Cilicians, and Egyptians, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 6,] of which danger thus hanging over their heads, mention seems to be made in those letters, which are attributed to Anaximines the Milesian, written to Pythagoras living then in Crotona, by Diogenes Laertius in his life: where, when he had spent 20 year, he went to Metapontus, and there ended his dayes, as Justin reports out of Trogus, [lib. 20. cap. 4.] to wit in the fourth year of the 78 Olympiade, [as Euseb. hath it in his Chron.] which takes up part of this, and part of the year following. 4217. 497.

The Ionian fleet consisted of 363 ships; the Persian of 600. Æaces the son of Solyson, the Tyrant of Samos and other Tyrants of Ionia, which having been thrust out by Aristagoras, were now in the Persian army, laboured what they could to draw over every man his countrey-men, and acquaintance from the Ionian to the Persian side. In a sea fight at Lada, which is a little Island lying over against Miletus, between the Phænicians, and the Ionians, of 60 ships that came from the Isle of Samos, and fifty slunk out of the fight, and returned home, so did 70 more of the Lesbian ships; and sundry other of the Ionians in like manner, onely there were 100 saile of the Isle of Chios, which fought it out very manfully, till at length having taken many of the enemies ships, and lost many of their own with what they had left, they returned home, some of which yet being hardly pursued by the enemie, ran themselves on ground, at the promontory of Mycale, and there gat to land, and travelling all night on foot, came safe to Ephesus, whiles the women there were celebrating their feast and sacrifices called Thesmophoria, to wit, in honour of their goddesse Ceres: whereupon the men of the city, supposing the Chians to have been theevs, come to spoil them at that time, fell suddenly upon them, and slew them. But Dionysius, captaine of three ships of the Phocæans, having taken three ships of the enemies, carried them, not into Phocæa, which he knew well enough was ere this seized on, and possessed by the enemies, with the rest of the Ionian territories, but furnished as he was, sailed directly into Phænicia; where lighting upon some ships of loading, and having taken out of them a great booty of monies, and other things, he set sail, and came away for Sicilie, [Herodotus lib. 6. from cap. 7. to 17.]

The

The Persians having thus mastered the Ionians at sea, fell presently to beleaguer Miletus, both by sea and land: and undermining the walls thereof with all kind of engins, they utterly overthrew and razed it to the ground in the sixth year after Aristagoras began his rebellion against the King of Persia, [Herod. lib. 6. ca. 18.] Some of the Milesians which escaped the fury of the sword with certain of the Samians, carried a colony of them that were left into Sicilie, [ib. ca. 22.] the rest were carried away to Susa: upon whom Darius inflicted no punishment more, than that he placed them in the City of Ampa, seated upon the Sea called the Red-Sea, where the River Tigris running under the walls thereof, falleth into the Ocean. The champion and low grounds lying near the city of Miletus, the Persians took to themselves, but the mountainous parts, they gave to the Carians of Pedasus to possesse, [ca. 20. ib.]

Upon the taking of Miletus, the Carians all were quickly taken in; some readily yeilding themselves, others upon compulsion, [ib. ca. 25.] Histiæus the Milesian, hearing what was become of his city Miletus, sailed presently with those Lesbians which were with him to Chios; which he easily subdued, being sorely weakened with that great loss which they had lately suffered at Lada: from thence with a strong party of Ionians and Eolians, he went to Thasus: but whiles he was besieging of Thasus, news was brought him, that the Persians were fallen upon the rest of Ionia; wherefore raising his siege from before Thasus, he sailed forthwith to Lesbos, with all his forces. And from thence, because he saw his men a little doubtful, he set saile again and came into the Province of of Atarnis: as if he meant onely to forrage as well there, as in the country lying upon the River Caicus, in the Province of Mysia. Harpagus the Persian then lay in those parts with a very considerable army: who setting upon Histiæus, as he came out of his ships, at a place called Malena, took him alive, and destroyed the greater part of his men. When Histiæus was brought prisoner to Sardes, Artaphernes, took and crucified him, and sent his head to Darius at Susa. Darius blamed them for their labour, in that they had not brought him alive unto him: and gave order that his head should be enterred, as a man well deserving of him and the Persian nation, [Herod. ib. ca. 27. 28, 29.]

The Persian Sea-forces, wintering about Miletus, went to take in the Islands bordering upon the continent, and in lesse than two years, took in and subdued Chios, Lesbos, Tenedus, and the rest, [Herod. lib. 6. ca. 31.] 4218. 496.

After the Islands, the Persian Captains, took in also, the Cities of the Continent of Ionia; and having them in their power, they chose out of them the most beautiful boyes and maids among them, and sent them to Darius; but set fire on the Cities with the Temples in them: And so the Ionians were thrice brought into bondage; once by the Lydians, and now twice by the Persians, [ib. ca. 31. 32.]

Those of Byzantium, as also of Chalcedon, which lies over against it, before the Phœnician Fleet came near them, left every man his habitation, and fled up into the remoter parts of the the Euxin Sea, and there built them a city, which they named, Mesembria, [ib. ca. 33.]

The Phœnician Fleet sailing from Ionia, subdued all that lay on the left hand of them as you go into the Hellespont: for what lay on the right hand in Asia side, was already subdued by the Persians in the Continent. Then went the Fleet and took in Chersonesus, and the cities thereof, all save the city Cardia: where till then, Miltiades the son of Cimon, had been tyrant, [ib. ca. 33. 34.] But when Miltiades sailed from Cardia with five tall men of War for Athens, the Phœnicians pursued him, and took one of his ships, wherein was his son Metiochus: who being sent prisoner to Darius, was by him honourably received; Darius also bestowed on him, both house and lands, and gave him a Persian woman to wife, by whom he had also many children, [ib. ca. 41.] 4219. 495.

Artaphernes Governour of Sardes, finding the Ionians at wars one with another; sent for some of each party to come before him, and made them friends upon certain covenants and conditions, and willed them upon failer thereof to go to law, and try out the right that way rather, than to spoile and butcher one another as they did, [ib. ca. 42.]

When Artaphernes had brought them to this, then laied he out all their country by Parasanges: for so the Persians call every division, containing 30 furlongs: and laid a certain tribute upon every such division, which they were to pay yearly to the King, much after the rate of what formerly was paied, saith [Herodotus lib. 6. cap. 42.] meaning that rate, which (as he had formerly written) Darius, when he came first to the crown, had imposed thoroughout all his Dominions, [lib. 3. cap. 89. 90.] and before he was Master of the Islands, [cap. 96.] In the narration whereof we may observe, that however, for the more easie levying of tributes, the 127. Provinces mentioned in Esther, were now by Darius reduced to 20 Governments, yet the bounds of that Empire were still the same; namely, India, and Ethiopia, whereof the one was of Cambyses his acquest, and the other of Darius himself: of whose revenue out of India, Herodotus speaking, saith in this wise. The Indians as they are a most populous nation, above all other men living that we know, so they pay tribute far more than any other nation doth, to wit, 360, talents of gold dust; and this is the twentieth part, or a Satrapie. But for as much, as we find that Darius at his first coming to the crown, was not possessed of the country of India, as may appear even by Herodotus himself, [lib.4,c.44.] it is therefore most likely, that at what time this book of rates upon lands was made by Artaphernes in Ionia, the like was done, all over the kingdom, by the Governours of the several provinces.

It would be considered then, whether that which is said in [Esther 10.] After this the king Assuerus imposed a tribute upon the firme land, and Isles of the sea; or, as it is in the vulgar latine edition, Rex vero Assuerus omnem terram, & omnes maris Insulas fecit tributarias, (i.e.) But king Assuerus made all the earth, and all the Islands of the sea tributary; hath not reference to this very time. For as Thucidides, [lib. 1.] tells us, (and Plato in his Menexenus confirmes as much) that Darius, by the meanes of his Phœnician fleet, subdued all the Islands lying in the Egean sea, so doth Diodorus Siculus, [lib. 12.] teach us, that they were all lost again by his son Xerxes, immediately upon his overthrow in Greece, and before the 12 year of his reign, after which it was, that the Scripture tells us, that Assuerus imposed this Tribute upon the Isles. For that in Xerxes his war against Greece, all the Islands which lay between the Cyanean Isles, and the two fore-lands, that of Triopium in Cnidia, and that other of Sunium in Attica, did send him in shipping; the same Diodorus Siculus in his said 12 book, testifieth; And that his successors, held none of them all, save Clazomene, (which was at that time, but a poore litle Isle, as Thucidides, [lib.8,] teacheth us) and Cyprus, is manifest by the tenor of Antalcidas his peace, recorded by Xenophon, [lib. 5. Hellenic.] Which to me seemeth a great argument, that Assuerus mentioned in Esther, can be none other than this Darius, whom for this, and other such like impositions laid upon the people, the Persians used to call κάπηλον (i.e.) a crafty Merchant or Huckster, as Herodotus observeth of him: Because that under Cyrus and Cambyses, his two Predecessors there was no talk of any tribute charged upon the subject: only they brought the king presents, [Herod.lib.3.cap. 89.] To which purpose it is also, that we read in the 15 book of the Epitome of Strabo: The first, saith he, that ever brought up paying of tribute, was Darius Longimanus: (mistaking the sirname of Artaxerxes the grandchild, and giving it to the grandfather) for before him, men paied their kings, out of that which every country yelded, as corne, horses, &c. And Polyenus, [Stratagem.lib.7.] Darius, saith he, was the first that ever imposed a tribute upon the people; neverthelesse, to make it the better to digest with them; he put his officers to rate it: which when they had laid on very heavily, he took off one half thereof; which they willingly paied, and took it for a great favour too, at the kings hand, which story is toucht upon also, by Plutarch in his Apothegmes of kings and Emperors.

3510. In the beginning of this spring, the king taking off all other commanders, sent Mardonius, the son of Gobryas, a young gentleman, and newly married to the kings daughter 4220. 494.
Artozostra: who coming to the sea side, in Cilicia, with a vast army, and provision accordingly, both by sea and land, sent away the rest of his forces, over land to Hellespont, but he with the navie, came into the parts of Ionia; and putting down the Tyrants, in the several Cities, restored to them every where their popular governments. He shortly after subdued the Thasy by his fleet, and the Macedonians, by his land army. His navie sailing from Thasus to Acanthus, and loosing from thence, whiles they sought to double the cape of the mount Athos, was afflicted by a mighty tempest; wherein he lost 300 of his ships, and upward of 20000 men; But whiles Mardonius with his land army kept in Macedonia, the Thracians, called the Brygi, fell upon his camp by night; in which on-set, they slew many of his men, and withal wounded Mardonius himself: but having subdued Macedonia, he left it, and returned into Asia.

3511. In the year following, Darius commanded the inhabitants of Thasus, who had been 4221. 493.
accused to him, for intending a rebellion against him, to demolish the walls of their City, and to send away all their shipping to Abdera: and then, to try whether the Grecians, would indeed stand it out, or come in and submit to him, he sent Embassadors into Greece, with order to demand Earth and Water of them, giving order neverthelesse to his tributary towns upon the sea cost, to prepare and furnish out fighting ships, and others, to transport horses in: many therefore, as well of the continent of Greece, as of the Isles thereunto adjoyning, gave him Earth and Water, and among them the inhabitants of the Island of Egina, and that with the first, [Herod.lib.c.46.46,49.]

3512. The Eginetæ therefore, as Traytors to Greece, were presently set upon, by Cleomenes, 4222. 492.
king of the Spartans; between whom and Demaratus his collegue in the kingdom, a strife arising, put Demaratus out of his place; who thereupon fled into Asia; and betook himself to Darius; by whom he was magnificently entertained, and had Cities, and territories bestowed on him, [Herod. lib.6.cap. 49,50.61,67,70.]

3513. In the 32 year of Darius, 257 of Nabonasar, the 3 day of the month Tybi (25 day of our 4223. 491.
April) half an houre before midnight, there was an eclipse of the moone, observed at Babylon, [Ptol.mag. Syntax lib.4. cap. 9.] Darius removed Mardonius from his charge, as a man that had not ordered matters well at sea, and sent others to take charge of the war against the Eretrians and Athenians, to wit, Datys, a Median born, and Artaphernes, (whom whom the Scholiast of Aristophanes calls Artabazus) Commander of the horse, the son of his brother Artaphernes. To these, as they lay encamped in a plain of Cilicia, near the sea, repaired all the sea forces, with their ships, as well for fight, as for transportation of horses; which the tributary Cities had provided and furnished according to order given: into which having put their foot and horse, they set sail, and went for Ionia, [Her. l.6.c.94,95.] with a fleet of 600 ships. Yet Plato in his Menexenus, counteth only 300 ships, and 500 thousand land soldiers: which number Lysias also holds to, in the Epitaph which he made, upon the Corinthian Auxiliaries; but Emilius Probus, in the life of Miltiades, sayes, there were in that fleet, 500 ships; 200000 foot, and 10000 horse.

The Persians, setting saile from Samos, came to Naxos, and set fire on all their houses, and Temples: But sparing Delos, they went to other Islands, from whence they took away both men to serve them, and also their children for hostages; which when the Carystii refused to deliver; they endured a siege, till at last they also were fain to surrender their City, and give up themselves to their enemies discretion, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 95, 96, 99.] 4224.

The Persians, having taken Eretria, after seven daies siege, and spent some few dayes in settling things there, sailed thence to the land of Attica, and wasted a great part thereof: and came at last, by the guidance of Hippias the son of Pisistratus into the field of Marathon; where they were all defeated by the men of Athens, and of Platea, under the conduct of Miltiades, who had gotten the soveraignty, or command of the Chersonesus, in Thracia: of their part were slain, 192 men: of the Persians, 6400. [Herod. l.6.c.101, 102.112.117.]

The Persians, being routed, fled to their ships, of which many were sunk, and many taken: in both the fights, the Persians lost 200000 men; Hippias also, sometimes the tyrant of Athens, died there, who had been the author and procurer of this war, [Justin out of Trogus, lib. 2.c.9.] The whole army of the Persians at this battle consisted of 300000, as Valer. Max. [lib.5.c.3.] saith, and Plutarch intimates no lesse in the beginning of his Parallels: Justin, and Orosius following him say, they were in all 600000 men: Emil. Probus in his Miltiades, sayes there were 100000 foot, and 10 thousand horse: of the Athenians there were 10000, and of their auxiliaries out of Platea; 1000, saith Justin with Orosius. Probus assures us, that the Athenians, with the men of Platea, and all, made but 10000. This insignious victory, was gotten by them, upon the 6 day of Boedromion, the 3 month in the Attic Calendar, after the somer solstice, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus, sayes; when Phanippus was Prætor or L. Chancelor of Athens: as the same Plutarch hath it in the life of Aristides: to wit, in the 3 year of the 72 Olympiade, 4 years before the death of Darius, as Severus Sulpitius, in 2 book of his Sacra Historia telleth us: and in the 10 year before Xerxes his passing over into Greece, (as Thucidides in his 1 book of his history, witnesseth; and Lysias in his Epitaph of the Corinthian Auxiliaries, hath it) and before the sea fight at Salamis, in the same month of Boedromion, 10 years compleat, as we find in Plato [3 de Legibus.]

Datis and Artaphernes returning into Asia, carried with them their captives of Eretria to Susa, [Herod. l.b. 6.cap. 119.] though Ctesias would have it, that Datis was slain in the fight at Marathon: and that, when the Persians desired to have his corps, the Athenians refused to give it.

Darius, when the Eretrian captives were brought unto his presence, gave order to have them placed in a part of the Cissian country, which is called Anderica, 210 furlongs from Susa, [Herod. lib.6. c. 119.] of whom a man may see more in Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, [lib.1.c.17.] 4225.

When Darius had spent now 3 years, in making greater preparations against Greece than before; in the fourth year the Egyptians revolted from him, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 1.] 4227.

When Darius was now ready to begin his war against the Egyptians, and Athenians both, he was, by the Lawes of the Persians, to declare his successor in the kingdome. 4229.

Artobazanes, whom others call Artemenes, or Ariamenes, his son by Gobryas his daughter, born to him before he came to be king, claimed the succession, by right of primogeniture, or as first born: But Xerxes, who was begotten and born, after Darius came to be king, and that of Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Monarchie, was declared to be king, in succession. [Herod. lib.7. cap.2, 3.] of which friendly contention between the two brothers, more is to be seen in Justin, out of Trogus, [l.2.c.10.] and in Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes, and in his Apoth gmes, and in his treatise περὶ φιλαδελφίας, (i. e.) of Brotherly love.

Darius, having declared Xerxes to be king in succession, when he was now ready to take his journey, nay rather when he was now putting over into Greece, as Diod. Sic. [lib. 11.] reporteth, in the year after the revolt of the Egyptians, at the later end thereof, departed this life, when he had reigned full 36 years, [Herod. lib. 7. c.4.]

Next

Next him came Xerxes, the 4 king of Persia after Cyrus: who trusting in his riches, (as they were indeed exceeding great) stirred up his own subjects, together with all his allies and friends, to make war upon the Grecian kingdom; according to the prophecy of [Daniel 11. 2.] though not moved hereunto at the first, so much by any desire of his own, as set on, by the perswasions and instigations of Mardonius, his Cousin Germain, of the Alevadæ, the kings of Thessaly, of the kindred of Pisistratus, and of one Onomacritus, a Sorcerer of Athens, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 5; 6.]

3520. Xerxes, in the very beginning of the second year, after the death of Darius, took a journey against his rebel Egyptians; whom when he had subdued, and brought into a harder state of bondage, than they had ever felt under his predecessors, he set his brother Achæmenes, the son of Darius to be ruler over them, [Herodotus lib. 7. cap. 7.] 4230. 484.

This year was Herodotus the Historian, the son of Lyxus, and Eryone born at Halicarnassus, in the province of Caria: for that he was 53 year old, when the Peloponesian war began, [A. Gellius lib, 15, cap. 23.] affirmeth out of Pamphyla, Now at that very time, Artemesia, the daughter of Lygdamis of Halycarnassus, upon the decease of her husband, obtained, (during the pupillage of her young son, whose name was Pisindelis, as may be gathered out of Suidas, in the word Ἡρόδοτος; (i. e.) Herodotus) the Tyranny which her husband held, and ruled over the Halicarnassians, the Coi, the Nisirians, and Calydonians: and she, a while after, came into Greece with five good figh ting ships, to the aid of Xerxes in his war there, [Herod. lib. 7, cap. 99.]

At Critalis in Cappadocia, all Xerxes his forces came into one body; and from thence he passed the river Halys, and came to Celæna, a city in Phrygia: where Pythius, a Lydian born, (whom yet Pliny [lib. 33. cap. 10.] makes to be a Bithynian) the son of Atyis entertained him, and his whole army, in a most magnificent and sumptuous manner: from hence passing by Anava, a city of Phrygia, and a Lough, out of which salt is made, he came to Colossæ, a city likewise of Phrygia, where the river Lycus running under ground, loseth it self, and from thence again, to a town called Cyndra, seated in the confines of Phrygia, and Lydia, and then passing the river Mæander, and passing by the city called Callatebus, he at length arrived at Sardes, from whence he dispatcht away his messengers into Greece, to demand of them earth and water, (i. e.) to require them to give themselves up into his power, [Herodotus, lib. 7. from the 26. chapter, to the 32.]

The Navy in this mean while, was at Eleus, in Chersonesus, from whence a part of the army went to dig thorough the neck of the mount Athos, which was twelve furlongs over; and were forced to this work, with Bastinadoes. The inhabitants also of the places adjoyning, were drawen into the work, and Bubares the son of Megabysus, and Artachæus the son of Artæus, both Persians, were appointed, to overlook the workmen, by whose industry at last that neck of land was cut through, and the sea let in, so broad, that two great ships with their oares out, might therein meet, and passe without falling fowl each of other, [Id. ib. cap. 22, 23, 24.] And another part of the army was occupied in making a bridge of ships over the Hellespont, where the sea from Abydus to the shoare, on the other side, is seven furlongs over: and when the bridge was all made, came a mighty tempest, and brake it all down again: at which Xerxes growing mad for anger, caused 300 stripes to be given to the Hellespont, and a paire of shakles to be thrown into the sea, to bind and fetter it withall: as for those, who were imployed in making of the bridge; he caused their heads to be smitten off: and then set others on work, to make the bridge stronger, [Id. ib. from chap. 33. to 36.]

In the beginning of the spring, Xerxes with his whole army, moved from Sardes, where he had quartered all that winter, marching toward Abydus; and as he was setting forth, the sun withdrew his light; there being no clouds to cover it, but a most clear air, and the day was turned into night, at which stupendious prodigy, Pythius the Lydian being amazed, (for that it was no natural Eclipse, the Astronomical tables easily declare) besought the King, that of his five sons, who were then in his army, he would leave his eldest out, to be a comfort to him in his old age: Whereat growing into a rage, he caused that eldest son of his to be cut in two, and his whole army to march between the parts of his body, [Id. ib. ca. 37. 38, 39.] 4233 4234

Hermotimus, who was an Halicarnassæan borne, and could do most of all the other Eunuchs with Xerxes, coming into the country of Atarne, in the province of Mysia, sent for Panionius, of the Isle of Chios (who was by his trade, a dealer in buying and selling of slaves, and by whom himself had formerly been gelt, and made an Eunuch.) with his wife and children to come unto him: and making the father to cut out his childrens stones, and then them to do as much to their father; he thought himself in some sort revenged for the wrong which had been done him in his eviration, [Ib. lib. 8. chap 105. 106.]

Xerxes his army going from Lydia to the River Caiicus, and the country of Mysia, from thence came into the country, where old Ilium, or Troy, stood; and as he lay that night at the foot of the Hill Ida, there fell a terrible tempest of lightening and thunder, which destroyed many of his army: after which they came to the River Scamander, which they quite drank up; nor was it able to satisfie the men and cattel of the army with water for their thirst; when Xerxes was there, he went up to see and view the old habitation of King Priame; and there he sacrificed to Minerva of Troy, 1000. Oxen: and the Magi that attended him offered cakes to the Worthies, sometimes, of that place. This done, a panick or sudden fright fell and seized upon his army by night: and he removing from thence in the morning so soon as it was light, came to Abydus, [id. lib. 7. cap. 42, 43.]

Here a toy took Xerxes in the head, to see all his army together; wherefore sitting in a Hall, which he had caused for that purpose to be there prepared, very sumptuous, and all of fair white stone; he there looking toward the sea, beheld all his Navy, and to the land-ward, all his land Forces at once, which whiles he beheld; he would needs also see a sea-fight: and when that fight was done, wherein the Phoenicians gat the prize, the King took great pleasure, both in the fight it self, and also in the number of his men. And when he beheld all the sea of Hellespont covered with his ships, and all the shoares and plains about Abydus with his souldiers; and withal considering the shortnesse of mans life, and that none of all those men should be alive at one hundred years end, he wept, [Id. ib. cap. 44. 45. and Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 13.]

Xerxes, sending away his Uncle Artabanus to be Vice-roy at Susa, and there look to his house and kingdom; prepared himself now, to passe over into Europe: so soon therefore as the sun was up, himself holding a golden vial in his hand over the sea, made his prayer to the sun, that nothing might hinder him in the conquest of Europe, till he had gone to the utmost bounds thereof: And having thus said, he flung both the vial, and a golden goblet, and a Persian cimitre, into the sea. These things thus done, he sent his horse and foot to passe over the bridge on the right hand, which was toward Pontus; but over that on the left hand, which was toward the Egean-sea, he made all the bag and baggage, servants, and carriages to passe: spending seven whole dayes, and as many nights in the transportation. When all was over, the Navy fell down out of the Hellespont westward, to a place called Sarpedons Foreland. His land army passing thorough Chersonesus to Agora, turned aside to a place called the Black Bay: where a river of the same name, or Black water, was not able to make all his army drink. Having passed this River, the army held on their march westward, till they came to Doriscus, which is the name both of a sea-coast or shoar, and also of a spacious field in the country, of Thracia, which the great River Hebrus runneth thorough: and there they camped, [Ib. from the end of chap. 52, to the beginning of 59.]

The Navy coming to this place, and being haled a shoar, Xerxes would needs again take a muster, first of his land Forces, and then of his sea. Of his Foot, Herodotus reckons 170 myriads, or 1700000. men, [chap. 60.] and of his Horse, besides Camels, and Chariots, 8 myriads, or 800000. Horse, [chap, 87.] Among the Commanders of his Foot, he mentions two sons of his, begotten of his Queen Artistona, (whom I conceive to have been Esther) and of them he makes, the one called Arsames, Commander of the Ethiopians, to the southward of Egypt, [chap. 69.] and the other, named Gobryas, Leader of the Maryandeni, and Ligyes, and Syrians, [chap. 72.] Diodorus Siculus reckoneth of his foot Forces 80 myriads, or eight hundred thousand men; not coming to

Herodo-

Herodotus his number of them by one half: and yet the number which Diodorus attributes to the Foot, that doth Ctesias allow onely to the whole Army of all sorts. viz. 80 myriads, besides the Chariots. Isocrates in his Panathenaica, saith, that in his army of Foot, there were 70 myriads, (i.e.) seven hundred thousand souldiers; which self same number, Elian, [lib. 13. ca. 3.] of his Various History alloweth, and no more, to the whole Army. Pliny counts them 788000. men, [lib. 33. cap. 10.] where yet for Xerxes, Darius his army is named. Justin, out of Trogus, and Orosius, following him, [lib. 1. ca. 10.] sayes, that Xerxes had of his own subjects, seven hundred thousand, and three hundred thousand Auxiliares from his friends. Emilius Probus, in the life of Themistocles, saith, that his Foot were seven hundred thousand men, and his Horse four hundred thousand.

His Ships for fight, were 1207. of which the Phoenicians furnished him, with 300. reckoning with them the Syrians dwelling in Palæstina: as Herodotus saith, [lib. 7. ca. 89.] adding that by the name of Palæstina, he meaneth all the sea coast of Syria, as far as the borders of Egypt, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] which also in another place he affirmeth to have been anciently called Syria Palæstina, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] and that the inhabitants thereof are all circumcised, [lib. 2. ca. 104.] for among other nations subject to the Persian Empire, the Jews also were one. And that he had of his country-men in this army against the Grecians, Josephus would faine prove out of those Verses of the Poet, [Chœrilus, lib. 1. cont. Apion.]

His camp a nation strang to see, did follow,
Who spake the language of Phœnicia;
And did the Hills of Solymi inhabit,
Near to a broad Lake which on them doth border:
Whose heads were rounded, and on their bald crownes,
Of a horse head the dried skin did wear.

by which the learned Salmasius also conceives the Jews were meant: in lingua Hellenistica Ossilegio; though Scaliger, [In notis suis ad fragmenta] and Cunæus, [lib. 2. De Rep. Hebra. ca. 18.] and that most learned Bochartus [in Geogra. Sacra Par. 2. lib. 1. ca. 6.] takes them as understood of Solymi in Pisidia.

But besides these men of War, Herodotus tells us, that he had 1207. Ships of burden, some of 30, some of 50 oares a piece, besides lesser vessels, and ships to carry horses in, to the number of 3000. [lib. 7. ca. 97.] Diodor. Sic. saith, there were above 1207. ships of War: for carriage of horses, 850. and 3000. ships of burden of 30 oares a piece: and the Poet Eschylus, in Persis brings in a messenger reporting the number of those ships in this manner.

I know that Xerxes ships a thousand were;
But full two hundred and seven ships he had,
Exceeding swift ones. So the fame doth go.

Now whether he means that the total sum of them was a thousand; and so the 207. swift ones a part of them; or whether both summes put together, make up the number of 1207. which agreeth best with the particular catalogue of the ships, which every nation contributed to this voyage, mentioned by Herodotus, and with the totals of them by him cast up, doth not very clearly appear out of the Verses themselves. Ctesias seems to favour the former opinion, and so doth Tully in the first of his Orations against Verres. Isocrates in his Panegyric, and Panathenaic Orations, agreeth with the later; and Lysius in his Epitaph, sets them down in a round summe, 1200. ships: adding, that there were over and above them, 3000. ships of burden: For to say with Justin, that there were ten hundred thousand ships of them, no doubt, cannot be right.

That in those 1207. ships which came out of Asia, there were 241400. men stowed, Herodotus collecteth, by placing 200. men in every bottom: besides 30 passengers in every one of them, of Persians, Medes and Sacæans, which make in all 36210. men. But to those other 3000. ships of burden, he allows 240000. men, by placing in each of them, 80 persons, one with another; those which had more bearing out those that had fewer in them. So that the whole Navy consisted of, 517610. men; to which if you adde the number of the land souilders, 1700000. Foot, and 800000, Horse, and the Arabians which had charge of the Camels, and the Lybians who intended the Waggons, amounting to about 20000. then will the whole number of them which followed Xerxes out of Asia into Greece, in all kinds, rise to the number of 2317610 thousand men, besides horse-boyes and other servants, hangers-on, and besides those which were imployed in furnishing the camp with corn and other victuals, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 184.]

Xerxes marching now from Doriscus into Greece, as he came to any country, took all that were fit, and made them serve him in the War, [Id. ib. ca. 118.] whereby his Navy grew greater by 120. ships; into every of which, putting as before 200. heads, his Sea-Forces were encreased 24000. men: and Herodotus thinketh that his Army by land, was likewise encreased 30 myriads, that is, 300 thousand men: though, Diod. Sic.

be of opinion, that they came to somewhat lesse than 200 thousand: and so the total of Xerxes his Army in European and Asiatic souldiers amounteth to 2641610 men. Now the number of horse-boyes, and foot-boyes, and of hangers-on, and the tarpailiaus in the corn-ships, and others, he thinks to be greater rather than lesse, than that of the souldiers came unto. So that if that former summe should be but doubled, the number of those which Xerxes carried by sea to Sepias, and by land to Thermopylæ, would come to 5283220 men; for as for the women which baked, and whores, and eunuchs, no man can tell the true number of them: no more can he of the horses and other beasts, of drought or burden, and Indian dogs with their keepers that followed the Gentlemen in the camp for their pleasure, so that it is no wonder, if so many rivers failed some bellies of so many as were there of all kinds to fill, [Id. ib. c. 185, 186, 187.] as Juneval saith, Statyr. 10.

We now beleeve that many rivers deep, and therefore the lesse wonder, if both Isocrates in his Panathenaic oration, and Plutarch in his Parallels, report, that Xerxes drew with him into Greece, 5000000. of men.
Did faile the Persian army, at a dinner.

And yet in all this great number, was there not a man found comparable to Xerxes himself, for the beauty and goodlinesse of his person; or one that might seem more worthy of that great Empire than himself, if we beleeve Herodotus, [lib. 7. cap. 187.] that, as Saul among the children of Israel, [1 Sam. 10. 23, 24.] so here, Xerxes might well seem to have had, εἶδος ἄξιον τυραννίδος, (i. e.) a feature fit for, and worthy of a crown. And yet if you speak of him as for a king, saith Justin out of Trogus, you will find cause to commend his wealth, (fore-spoken of by Daniel 11. 2.) rather than his wits, of which, saith he, there was such infinite abundance in his kingdom, that when whole rivers failed the multitude of his army, yet his wealth could never be exhausted: as for himself, he was ever seen last in the fight, and first in the flight, fearful when any danger was, but puft up with pride, when there was none.

Leonidus king of Sparta, with an army of 4000 Grecians, opposed himself against him and his whole army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, at the straits of Thermopylæ in Thessaly, so called from the hot springs of water, which there do rise, as appears by the Epitaph which was made upon them, recorded by Herod. [lib. 7. cap. 228.]

Μυριάσιν ποτὲ τῇδε τριηκοσίαις ἐμάχοντο
Ἐκ Πελοποννήσου χιλιάδες τέτορες. (i. e.)

Here gainst three hundred thousand Persians, Fower thousand Spartans fought it out and died. For Thirty Myriads make three hundred thousand; which are as many as Theodoret, [l. 10.] Θεραπευτικῆς giveth to that whole army, [Diodor. Sic. lib. 11.] in this very Epitaph, p. 26. in the Greek and Latin edition, for, τριηκοσίαις, (i. e.) for the 30 Myriades hath διακοσίαις, (i. e.) 20 Myriades, which make 20 hundred thousand; whereas yet, (p. 5.) he saith, that the whole army consisted of little lesse, than 100 Myriades, which is, of 1000000. (i. e.) of one hundred hundred thousand men, and speaking particularly of this fight at Thermopylæ, (p. 9.) he says, that 500 men there set upon 100 Myriades, (i. e.) one hundred hundred thousand men. And yet Justin relating the same story out of Trogus, [lib. 2. c. 11.] saith, that 600 men, brake into the camp of five hundred, or as in Orosius, of six hundred thousand men. And Isocrates in his Archidamus saith, that one thousand of them, went against seven hundred thousand of the Persians: But those whom Isocrates calls a thousand, Justin and Orosius, six hundred, and Diodorus, five hundred; are to be understood of those, who when the rest of the Grecians were sent away, stood it out to the last brunt, in which they all, together with their king Leonidas died; of which number, 300 were Spartans, the rest, thespians and Thebans, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 222, 224.] for whom amends was fully made by 20000 of the enemies then slain upon the place, [Id. li. 8. c. 24.]

While these things thus passed at Thermopylæ by land, sundry encounters and fights at sea happened also about Artemisium, a fore-land of Eubæa, [Id. ib. cap. 15.] Eurybiades, a Lacedemonian, was chief Commander or Ammiral of the fleet, which consisted of 271 ships, besides 9 others, of 50 oares a piece, of which 127 were set out by the Athenians, and Platæans, as Herod. saith, [ib. cap. 1.] whereas yet, Isocrates, in his Areopagitical oration, saith, that the Athenians furnished onely sixty of them: but Emelius Probus delivers, that the whole Grecian fleet consisted of 300 saile, and that 200 of them were of the Athenians, in this Themistocles, Herodotus, Diodorus, and Probus, all say, that this was a drawn battle on either side, though Isocrates in his Panegyrical oration, and Elian, [lib. 2, cap. 25. Varia Histor.] talk as of a great blow, which the Persians received in it; yet the day when this battel was fought, is said by Elian, to have been upon the the sixth of Thargelion, which was the second moneth, of the spring time, with the Athenians, agreeth not well with the relation of Herodotus, who [lib. 8. cap. 12.] saith, that this was done in the midst of Summer, to wit, near after the end of the spring, at what time the Olympic games, in the midst of all these troubles, were kept in Greece, [ib. c. 26.] to wit, in the 75 Olympiade; wherein, besides others, Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, in his Roman Antiquities, [l. 9.] saith it was, that Xerxes made war upon the Grecians.

Four moneths after his passing the Hellespont with his army, Xerxes coming to Athens, found it abandoned by all the inhabitants thereof; what time Callias was Prætor, or Lord Chancelor there, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 51.] In which year also, Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, a scholar of Anaximenes the Milesian, being but 20 years of age, was made publique reader of Phylosophy in Athens, as Laertius, out of Demetrius Phalereus in his Catalogue of the 50 Prætors, or Lord Chancellors of Athens, in his life reporteth, Phylosophy being then first brought out of Ionia, and planted in the city of Athens, as Clemens Alexan. [lib. 1. strom.] saith, to wit, at what time, Xerxes, when he had taken Athens, took also a multitude of books, which Pisistratus, and the Athenians had there stored up, and setting all the rest of the city, (save the Castle) on fire, sent them away into Persia, as A. Gellius [lib. 17. Noct. Attica.] relateth. In which exception yet of the Castle, I cannot easily assent unto him; since Herodotus saith plainly, that all that Acropolis or Citadel was burnt down, [lib. 8. cap. 53.] and so doth Ctesias; and Diodorus Sic. further affirmeth, that the Temple of Minerva, which was undoubtedly in the Castle, was then also ruined.

The further Xerxes marched into Greece, the more nations still joyned with him; the Melienses, the Dorienses, the Locri, the Bæothians, Caristians, Andrians, Tenians, and sundry other: whereby it came to passe, that his forces, by land and sea, were no less, at Salamis and Athens, than when he first landed at Sepias, and came to Thermopylæ, [Herod. lib. 8. cap. 66.] which those verses of Eschilus before mentioned, seem also to imply, where he tells us, that at the fight at Salamis, there were 1000. or 1207 ships of his, and that Ctesias sayes, that in that fight, the Persians had a thousand ships: not to speak of Plutarch in his discourse, De glor. Athen. (i. e.) of the glory of the Athenians, where he saith, that that victory of Themistocles at Salamis, was gotten with the losse of a thousand ships of the enemies. At which sea fight before Salamis, the Grecians fleet was far greater than when they fought at Artemisium, to wit, 380 talls ships of war, whereof there were in all but 16. from Sparta; but the Athenians had there 180. [Id. ib. cap. 42, 43, 44, 48, 62.] And with him, for the number of the Athenian ships, agreeth Plutarch, in the Life of Themistocles, not to trouble the reader here, with that place of Herod, [lib. 8. cap. 61.] nor of Diod. Sic. [lib. 15.] where, speaking of the Athenians, they say, that they had in it, 200 ships, πεπληρωμένας, (i. e.) fully manned and furnished; Eschylus sayes, that the whole number of the Grecian ships in the fight before Salamis, was but 300. besides ten other of an extraordinary bignesse: though Ctesias writes, that there were 700 of the Grecian fleet. There were lost in this fight of the Grecian ships, to the number of 40; of the Persian, 200; besides those which were taken with the men in them, as Diodor. Sic. [lib. 11.] hath it, whereas Ctesias reports, that the Persians in that fight, lost 500 ships. But Artemisia, the Queen of Halicarnassus, who came to aid Xerxes in this war, behaved her self most manfully in this fight; so that as in Xerxes, a man might see a womanly timourousnesse, so in her he might perceive, a most heroick courage, [Justin. lib. 2. cap. 12.] insomuch, that Xerxes himself upon this occasion was heard to say, That his men had plaid the women, and the women the men, in that service. [Her. l. 8. c. 88.]

And so it came to passe, that by the leading indeed of Eurybiades, the Lacedemonian, but the sage and prudent counsel, and great prowesse of Themistocles the Athenian; a victory was gotten at Salamis every way equal to that at Marathan: but in setting down the time when this battle was fought, Plutarch is found very divers and differing from himself. For in the life of Lysander, and in his discourse, of the glory of the Athenians, he placeth it as done in the 16 day of the moneth Munichon, (which is the first of the vernal months, with the Athenians; but in the Life of Camylus; as on the the 20 day of Boedromian, which was their third moneth in Summer. Tis true, in the Bay of Saron, which is otherwise called, the Bay of Salamis, as [Strabo in his eighth book] witnesseth, between the two Islands of Salamis an Egina, there was a nights fight at sea, between 10 Lacedemonian ships, commanded by Gorgopas, and 13 Athenian ships, commanded by Eunomus, near unto Zoster, a fore-land of the Isthmus of Attica, in the dayes of Artarxerxes memor, king of Persia, of which Xenophon, in his fifth book of his History of the Greeks, maketh mention in this wise. In a sea fight made by moon-light, Gorgopas took 4 tall ships of war, and drawing them after him, carryed them away to Egina: and the rest of the Athenian fleet fled home to their port of Piræum, but because as upon the 16 day of that Lunary moneth among the Athenians, upon which Gorgopas set upon that smal fleet of the Athenians, it happened to be the full of the moon, by the benefit whereof, the Athenian fleet saved it self, with the loss only of 4 ships, therefore did the Athenians as it seemeth consecrate that day ever after, to Diana, and kept it holy-day to her honour; whereupon it was, that Plutarch confounding this later sea fight, fought at Salamis, with that other, fought in the same place a-gainſt Xerxes, in that diſcourſe of his, of the glory of the Athenians, thorough error wrote of it in this manner: They conſecrated, ſaith he, the 16 day of the moneth Munichion to Diana, becauſe upon that day, after the victory gotten by the Grecians, the Goddeſs appeared full that night: for that the victory of the Greeks againſt Xerxes was gotten about the 20 day of Bœdromion, both Plutarch in a Treatiſe of his, Of dayes, quoted by himſelf in the life of Camillus declareth; and it plainly appeareth in Herodotus: for that at that time, the Eleuſinian Myſteries were celebrated by the Athenians, Herodotus plainly ſheweth, [lib. 8. ca. 65.] the chief day of which ſolemnity, was upon the twentieth of the moneth Bœdromion, on which the myſterious Pomp of Iacchus was openly ſhewed to the people, as appeareth out of the ſame Plutarch, in the life of Camillus above mentioned: whence alſo it was, that when Themiſtocles would ſtay his country-men from purſuing the enemies, after their defeate at Salamis, when they fled, uſed this ſpeech unto them: Now, ſaith he, let us ſtay in Greece, and take care of our ſelves and families, and look to the tillage and ſowing of our land, ſeeing the enemy is quite ejected out of it; and when the Spring comes on, then will we take a time to ſaile into Helleſpont and Ionia. Argument ſufficient, that the Perſians were vanquiſhed at Salamis, not in the beginning of the ſpring, but in the later end of ſummer.

After the fight Xerxes put to death certain of the Phenicians, which were the firſt that fled, and threatned the reſt of them with puniſhments anſwerable to their deſervings; for fear whereof, the Phenicians returned that day to Attica; but the night after, they put over all into Aſia, [Diod. Sic. l. 11. in the 1 year of the 75 Olympiade.] Many other ſhips alſo, fearing more the rage of the king, than the fury of the enemy, ſlunk away, every one to his own home, [Juſtin lib. 2. c. 12.]

Xerxes, terrified with this diſaſter at ſea, committed his ſons to Artemeſia the Queen, by her to be tranſported to Epheſus, with Hermotimus their Governour, [Herod. lib. 8. ca. 103. 107.]

Cleombrotus of Sparta, brother to Leonidas, which died at Thermopylæ, to ſtop the paſſage againſt Xerxes his coming by land into Peloponeſus, cauſed a wall to be drawn athwart the neck of land which is called, Iſthmus Corinthiacus, [Id. ib. ca. 71.] but whiles he was offering of a ſacrifice againſt the Perſians, the ſun in the firmament loſt his light, and grew dark: whereupon he withdrew his army which was imployed in that fortification, and ſhortly after died: unto whom ſucceeded his ſon Pauſanias, as couſin-germain and Tutor of Pliſtarchus, a child, the ſon of Leonidas deceaſed, [Id. lib. 9. ca. 10.] But the Prutenian account gives us an Eclipſe of the Sun of 8 digits and 32 minutes, upon the 2 day of October, after the Julian Calender, at one of the clock 39 minutes in the after-noon, in this year.

Themiſtocles, to ſend Xerxes packing the more ſpeedily out of Greece, ſent a feigned meſſage to him from Salamis, that the Grecians had a purpoſe to ſend a Fleet of Ships to Helleſpont, there to burn or break his bridge; which he no ſooner heard, but he provided with all ſpeed to get him gone out of Europe into Aſia, [Herod. lib. 8. ca. 110. Diod. Sic. lib. 11. in 1 year of 75. Olympiade: and Plut. in the life of Themiſtocles.]

Reſolving therefore to be gone, he ſent away his Fleet from Phalerus to Helleſpont, to keep the bridge there, for his paſſage: and himſelf with Mardonius, and his land army accompanying him, marched ſpeedily towards Theſſalie, [Herod. lib. 8. cap. 107. 113, 115.]

Mardonius coming with Xerxes into Theſſalie, choſe out of all his army, three hundred thouſand men, which he kept with him to go on with the conqueſt of Greece; and with them, becauſe the time of the year for keeping the field was paſt, he wintered in Theſſalia, [Ib. ca. 113. 114.] and herein with him agrees Juſtin out of Trogus, [lib. 2. ca. 13.] and Plutarch in the life of Ariſtides, though Diod. Sic. ſaith, that there ſtayed with him no leſſe than four hundred thouſand men.

In this meane while, the Lacedæmonians by the command of the Oracle at Delphos, ſent a Herald to Xerxes, to require reparation of him for the death of their King Leonidas: unto whom he returned this anſwer; that Mardonius ſhould pay them their due. After which, leaving Mardonius in Theſſalie, he haſted away to the Helleſpont; taking along with him a very inconſiderable part of his army for his guard: but left the reſt to be brought after him, by Hydarnes, [Herod. lib. 8. cap. 114. 115, 118.]

As for thoſe land Forces which he left behind him with Mardonius: firſt a famine, then a peſtilence, fell upon them; and ſo foule was the mortality among them, that the high-wayes lay ſtrawed with the dead carcaſes of them, and both birds and beaſts of prey, followed the army by the ſent, where ever they went, [Ib. ca. 115. Juſtin lib. 2. cap. 13.]

In Aſia, they that were called Archæanactidæ, held the kingdom of Boſphorus Cimmerius 40 years long, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12.] in 3 year of 85 Olympiade. Theſe had their beginning from Archæanactes of Mitylene; who is ſaid to have built Sigæum, with the ſtones digged out of the ruines of Troy, [Strabo. lib. 13.]

3525. a. Xerxes at 45 dayes end, came to the paſſage at Helleſpont, as ſaith Herod. [lib. 8. ca. 115.] Emil. Probus bates a third part of that time in the life of Themiſtocles: where he ſaith, 4235 479 saith, that upon the way wherein he spent six moneths, in going into Europe, upon the same he spent lesse than thirty dayes, in his return from thence into Asia.

Xerxes finding his bridge broken down with the rage of Winter-stormes; for very fear, put over in a poor fisher-boat: And truly it was a thing worth the sight, and a rare example of humane frailty and change of things in this world, to see him lie skulking in a little wherry, whom a little before, the whole Sea seemed too little to contain; and him distitute of a page to wait upon him under whose army, the very earth earstwhiles, seemed to groane for the burden of it, [Justin lib. 2. cap. 13.]

The land Forces also, which followed him under the conduct of Hydarves, coming thither, and finding the bridge broken down, passed over in boats to Abydus: and there finding more plenty of victuals than they had upon their way, what with gorging themselves with meat, what with change of water, they dyed by heaps; the rest accompanied Xerxes to Sardes, [Herod. lib. 8 c. 117.]

Xerxes, whiles he was upon the way to Sardes, sent Megabyzus to spoile the Temple of Delphos, but when he desired to be excused, Mattacus an Eunuch undertook it, and having done the errand he was sent in, returned to him; [Ctesias.]

News being brought to Susa, by the Courriers which were sent, that Xerxes had taken Athens, put the Persians into such a fit of mirth, that they strewed all the streets with mirtle boughs, and burnt frankincense in them: and set themselves wholy to sacrificing, and feasting: But when the second tidings came of his overthrow at Salamis; that put them into such a consternation of mind, that every man rent his garments, and filled all places with howlings and lamentations, [Herod. l. 8, c. 99.] which mourning of theirs, Eschylus hath described, and set out to the life, in Persis.

The fleet which remained, and the sea-men which were therein left, having wafted over the land forces, out of Chersonesus to Abydus, wintered at Cuma in Eolia; [Herod. lib. 8. c. 130.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnabazus, having accompanied Xerxes with 60 thousand souldiers to Hellespont, seeing him safely landed in Asia side; took his journey back again and staid about Pallene: seeing that Mardonius himself had taken up his winter quarter in Macedonia and Thessalia, and looked not after the rest of the army: and during his abode there, finding that the City of Potidea, with Pallene, had already revolted from the Persian, and Olynthus in termes to do the like, he clapt down before Potidea and Olynthus, and besieged them both at once, and having taken Olynthus, and put all the Bottiean inhabitants thereof to the sword, he committed the place to the keeping of Critobulus of Torona, a Chalcedonian born, [Id. lib. 8. c. 126, 127.]

When the Persians had now lain 3 months before Potidea, a huge tide of the sea, brake in upon them, in their trenches, which made them raise their siege; yet many of them perished with that inundation; and when others sought to save themselves by swimming, the Potideans went in boats, and knockt them in the head; those that escaped, Artabazus took, and carried with him into Thessalie to Mardonius, [Ib. c. 129.]

b. In the first of the spring, the remainder of the Persian fleet, which had wintered at Cuma, put over to the Isle of Samos, where some other of their fellowes had taken up their winter quarter. The greatest part in this Navie, were Persian and Median souldiers: and to them came shortly after certain Commanders, as, Mardoutes Fitz Bargeus, and Artanites Fitz Artacheus, who staying there, kept all Ionia from revolting, having a fleet of 300 sail, (reckoning in the Ionians that were with them) at their command, [Ib. c. 130.] But Diodorus saith, that they were no lesse than 400 sail, which lay then at Samos, waiting the motion of the Ionians; in this 2 year of the 75 Olympiade.

The Grecian fleet consisting of one hundred and ten ships, under two Commanders, Leotychides king of the Spartans, and Xanthippus an Athenian, went to Egina, where certain messengers came to them out of Ionia; to beseech them, all delay set apart, to come and relieve them in Ionia; and with much adoe, drew them as far as to Delos, thitherward, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 131. 132.] and yet Diodorus tells us, that having staid some certain dayes at Egina, they then, of themselves, sailed to Delos, with 250 tall ships of war.

c. Xerxes is said to have built both a Palace, and a Castle at Celene in Phrygia, Xen. in his Expedition of Cyrus, [lib. 1.]

Mardonius with his army came to Athens, not yet reinhabited, ten months after it was first taken by Xerxes: and there ruined and burnt down, what ever Xerxes had left standing, and thence marched into the countrey of Megare, which was the farthest place that the Persians were at westward, in all Greece, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 3. 13. 14.]

d. Whiles the Grecian fleet lay at Delos, messengers came to them from Samos, praying them to succour both themselves, and the rest of the Greek nation, which dwelt in Asia, against the Persians. Leotychides the king of Sparta, at a Council of war, resolved to set all the Greek Cities at liberty from the Persians: and they entering a league with the Samians, came with their whole fleet to Samos, and lay close under the Temple of Juno, provi-providing there for a sea fight, against the Persians; [Id. ib. cap. 89. 91. 95. with Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Commanders of the Persian navy, continuing still at Samos, and hearing that the Grecians were coming against them, and finding themselves not able to match them at sea; suffered the Phenician ships all to be gone; but with the rest sailed to Micale, which is a fore-land, or promontory in Ionia: where the land army lay, left there on purpose by Xerxes, to keep Ionia in order; consisting of 60000 men, under the command of Tigranes, who was the tallest and goodliest man to look to, of all the Persians: There, near to the Temple of Ceres, of Eleusis, they drew up their ships, and enclosed them with a rampart, which they fortified with stones and stakes, and such materials as the place afforded, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 95. 96.] and withal, sent to Sardes, and other places adjoyning; for more land forces: so that they made up a body of an hundred thousand men: making provision also, of all other things necessary for the war, [Diodorus, Lib. 11.]

In an encounter of the horse, near a place called Erythræ in Beotia, between the Grecians and Persians, a commander of the Persians called Masistius, but by the Greeks, Macisias, happened to be slain; for whom, great lamentation was made by the Persians, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 20. 22. 24. and Plutarch, in the Life of Aristide.]

The Grecians, under the conduct of Pausanias the son of Cleombrotus, routed the Persian army at Platea: which, as Ctesias saith, consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men. Emil. Probus, in his Pausanias, saith there were of them, two hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; and Plutarch in the life of Aristides affirms, that there were no fewer, than three hundred thousand: to which three hundred thousand, Herodotus addeth also, all the Grecian auxiliaries, which Mardonius had then with him in pay, which he guesseth to have amounted to fifty thousand, [lib. 9. cap. 311.] and Diodorus Siculus, to the 75 Olympiade, saith, that Mardonius, besides those which Xerxes left him, had out of Thracia and Macedonia, and other confederate places, above two hundred thousand souldiers, and that he had in all, an army consisting of five hundred thousand men: In the Grecian army, Ctesias reckons not above seven thousand and three hundred men; whereas Herodotus and Plutarch affirme, that of the Athenian party alone, there were no lesse than eight thousand men: and that the whole Grecian army consisted either of one hundred thousand fighting men: as Diodorus Siculus, Trogus, Pompeius, and Orosius, or of one hundred and ten thousand, as Herodotus, [lib. 9. cap. 29.] saies: of whom there fell in this battle, not above one thousand three hundred and sixty, as Plutarch in the Life of Aristides reports; though Diod. Sic. saith, there were slain of them in that fight, above 10000.

Mardonius the son in law, (not of Xerxes, as Emil. Probus, in the life of Pausanias hath it, but) of Darius, who was father to Xerxes, as I shewed before, in the year of the world 3510. General of all this army, was slain in this fight, by a stone flung at him, by Aimnestus, or Arimnestus, a man of Sparta, [Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 63.] Plutarch in the Life of Aristides, and Pausanias, [lib. 1.] for we may not belive Ctesias, who saies, that he was only hurt, and so got away for that time, and that being commanded afterward, to spoile the Temple of Apollo, he was there killed, with a storme of haile that fell upon him: though Justin out of Trogus, and out of Justin Orosius reports, that Mardonius, accompanyed with a very small number, escaped away thence, as out of a ship-wrack.

The Persian army, having lost their General, fled to a fortresse of theirs, made up of wood, and the Grecians, having forced it, slew therein above one hundred thousand of them, [Diodorus Siculus,] so that of three hundred thousand of them, there were not left full three thousand men; besides 40000 only, which fled away with Artabazus, [Her. l. 9. c. 69.]

Leotychides, who commanded at sea, coming to Mycale, dealt with the Ionians to fall off from the Persians, whom they served: and what with his own army, what with their help, he obtained there a most memorable victory; wherein he slew above 30 thousand Persians; besides Mardontes, who commanded them by sea, and Tigranes, who was General by land: but two other great Commanders of their fleete, Artayntes, and Ithramitres fled; the rest that escaped, betook themselves to the tops of the promontory of Mycale, [Id. ib. from c. 97. to 104. with Diod. Sic. l. 11.]

Both these fights fell out near to two Temples of Ceres of Elensis, and upon the same day of the same month: that at Platea in Europe, early in the morning; that other at Mycale in Asia, later in the afternoone; and so swift winged was fame in spreading the news hereof, that at so far a distance, and in so few houres space, the report of the victory at Platea, came to them at Mycale; the same day, before they began to fight there, [Id. ib. cap. 99. 130. with Justin lib. 2. c. 14.] though Diod. Sic. thinks (and that more probably) that Leotychides heard nothing at all of what was done at Platea, but cunningly cast cast abroad such a rumor among his souldiers, to put the more courage thereby into their hearts, by way of a stratagem. Now the day of these two battels [Elian. Var. Hist. lib. 2. ca. 25.] saith, was the sixth of the moneth Thargeleon, the 2 moneth in the Spring, with the Athenians; which Plutarch with more judgement saith, was in the moneth Boedromion, which was the 3 moneth in Summer; and that either upon the 3 day thereof, as [in the life of Camillus, and in his discourse of the glory of the Athenians,] or upon the fourth, as in [the life of Aristides:] and so this fight at Micale, was in the second year after Xerxes his first passage over into Greece, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 80.]

Hereupon all Ionia revolted from the Persian, [Herod. lib. 9. ca. 103.] together with the Eolians and Islands bordering upon both, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Greeks having set fire upon, and consumed the Persian ships and camps; returned to the Isle of Samos, and there entered into a consultation how to transplant all the Ionian nation (yea and the Eolian too, as Diod. hath it) out of Asia, (where they seemed to be too openly exposed to the danger of the Persian cruelty) into Greece: But the Athenians fearing least the Ionians, which were now a Colony of their own, would by this means become common to the rest of Greece; opposed it, and told them, that themselves, as tied to them in blood, would never be wanting to their defence; and therefore desired that they might continue still where they were in Asia, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. Diod. ib. in 2 year of 75 Olympiade.]

They of the continent of Greece, entered into a firm association and league with them of Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and other Islanders, who had joyned in this War against the Persian; and having plighted their faith each to other with a solemn oath, to continue firm in this association, and never to break the bond now made between them: sailed in a body towards Hellespont, and in their way thitherward, came to an anchor first at a Foreland called Lectium; being there taken short by a contrary winde: but the winde coming faire again, they passed on, and came to Abydus; and when they found the bridges there already broken down, which was the principal cause of their going thither, Leotychides with his men of Peloponesus returned home; but the Athenians with their Captain Xanthippus, and (as Thucidides saith,) with their associates out of Ionia and Hellespont, which had revolked from the Persians, passed over from Abydus into Chersonesus, and there besieged Sestos: now Artayctes, a Persian born, and a wicked man, was Governour of that province, appointed by Xerxes: and because that Town was fenced with a very strong Wall, therefore as well others of the neighbouring places; as Oebasus himself, a Persian born, who had laied up all the Flags and Stremers, and other furniture of the bridges at Cardya, left that place, and put himself into Sestos also, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. 113, 114, 115.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, who with 40000 men fled out of the battel at Platæa, hastened away thorough the countries of Phocis, Thessalie, and Macedonia, into Thracia; and cutting the nearest way over-land, came unto Byzantium: having left many of his men behind him in his march; which were either knockt in head by the Thracians, or died with hunger, and travel on the way: and from Byzantium he got shipping, and passed over into Asia, [Id. ib. ca. 65. 69, 76, 88.]

But those few which had saved themselves in the top of the rocks, in the Foreland or Promontory of Micale, repaired to Sardes, from whence Xerxes was not yet gone. In that journey, when Masystes, one of the sons of Darius Hystaspes, had charged Artayntes, one of the chief Commanders of the Fleet at Mycale, among other reproachful words, that he had carried himself basely in that service, and more like a woman than a man; and was therefore assaulted by Artayntes with his naked sword: Xenagoras of Halicarnassus stept in, bare off the blow, and saved Masystes from that present danger: and Xerxes, for so saving his brothers life, made him Governour of all Cilicia, [ib. cap. 106.]

But whiles Xerxes spent his time at Sardes, he there fell desperately in love with his brother Masystes wife; whom when he had often sollicited to adultery, and could not prevaile that way, he thereupon married Artaynta, hers and his brother Masystes his daughter, to his own son: Darius hoping to get his will of her the more easily by this occasion. Which done, and the wedding ended, he returned toward Susa, [Ib. cap. 107.] leaving part of his army at Sardes, to continue the War against the Grecians, [Diod. Sic. an. 2, of 75. Olympiade.]

3526. Xerxes in his flight burnt the Oracle of Apollo Didymeus in Branchis, as he did all the other Temples in Asia, save that at Ephesus; those of Branchis having, without resistance, delivered up the treasury of their god, went altogether along with him, fearing least, if they stayed behind, they should have been punished for sacrilege and treason both. [Strabo, lib. 14, with Solinus cap. 40.] Herodotus saith that Xerxes, going from Sardes, went to Susa: Diodorus, that he went to Ecbatane. Ctesias writeth, that he went from Babylon to Persia: Arrianus in his book of Alexanders Acts, affirmeth that coming to Babylon, he there demolished the Temple of Belus, and all other consecrated places; and with them, the Sepulchre of Belus; as Strabo, [lib. 16.] saith, who also 4236 478

 there

there tells us, that he took away the statue of Belus, made all of massie gold, of twelve cubits high; and when the Priests opposed it, and would not suffer it to be removed, he slew him also, as we read in Herod. [lib. 1. cap. 183.]

While the Athenians lay at the siege of Sestos, and, the Autumn coming on, could not take it, they fell into a consultation to leave it; but the people within, were so near driven with famine, that they were faine to boile their very bedcords and eat them; so that Artayctes and Oebasus, with many of the Persians, gat down the walls by night, and fled; which the inhabitants perceiving early the next morning, signified the same to the Athenians, and opened their gates unto them, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 116, 117.]

When there was now a great number of prisoners taken, what at Sestos, what at Byzantium by the Athenians, and their confederates in the army; the confederates, of their own accord, offered to refer the division and sharing of that prey, to Cimon, a young Gentleman of the Athenians, to be made as he should think good, and they would stand to it, who falling presently to work, set all the persons on the one hand, and all the cloaths and ornaments which they ware, on the other, and then bad them take their choice; saying, that the Athenians would content themselves, with that part which they left: their Associates, by the perswasion, of Herophytus of Samos, chose the cloaths and ornaments, as of far greater value, than the bare bodies of the prisoners, and left the bodies, as not made for labour, to the Athenians. But soon after, the friends and kinsmen of the prisoners, coming out of Phrygia and Lydia; redeemed those prisoners at a great rate, wherewith Cimon maintained the fleet four whole moneths after, and brought moreover a very considerable stock of silver and gold into the treasury at Athens. This act first gave a reputation of wit and wisdom unto Cimon among the Athenians; and they having gotten so much money by the bargain, laughed at their fellows, by whom they had formerly been laughed at, [Plutarch, in the life of Cimon, and Polyænus, lib. 1. Stratag.]

When Oebasus had gotten away into Thracia, the Thracians, called Absynthii, took him, and sacrificed him to their god Plestorus; and put his followers, some to one kind of death, some to another. Artayctes and his followers, they seized on at Egos potamus, and carryed him prisoner to Sestos: and by the sea side, where Xerxes had made his bridge, or as others say, upon a hill near the city Madytus, set up gibets, and there hung them up, stoning his own son first to death before his eyes. These things thus done, the Athenians returned into Greece, carrying with them besides moneys, the flags and streamers, ornaments of the bridges, which had been made over the Hellespont, purposing to hang them up as trophies in their Temples. And this was all that was done this year, [Herod. lib. 9. cap. 118, 119, 120.] Xanthippus leaving a garrison in Sestos, dismissed all strangers, and he with his own companies returned to Athens; and so the war of the Medes, as they call it, came to an end, after it had lasted full two years, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.] in the 75. Olympiade.

Bagapates the Eunuch, when he had continued sitting by the tomb of Darius 7 years, died. [Ctes.] 4236.

Megabysus accused his wife Amyris, Xerxes his daughter, of adultery; who blamed his daughter for it, very sharply, [Ctesias] whiles he himself lay wallowing all the while in adultery and incest both; for turning his lewd affection now from his Brother Masystes his wife, to their daughter Artaynta, whom he had now made his own daughter in law; he lay with her continually at Susa. [Herod. lib. 9. cap. 107, 108.]

Pausanias the son of Cleombrotus, who was sent General of the Grecians from Lacedemonia, to free such Greek cities, as were yet held by the garrisons of the Persians, with 20 ships out of Peloponesus, and 30 more from Athens, (Diodor. saith 50.) commanded by Aristides made a voyage into Cyprus, and there restored many cities, which were hitherto held by Persian garrisons to their native liberty, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diodor. Sic. in the 4 year of the 75 Olympiade.] 4237.

Xerxes celebrating his coronation day, gave to his Queen Amestris, who asked it of him for a boon, Masystes his brothers wife; whose paps, nostrils, ears, lips, and tongue he presently caused to be cut off, and so sent her home again; whereupon Masystes, conspiring with his own children, purposed to get him privily away with them into the province of Bactria, whereof himself was then Governour, and to raise both them and the Sacæ to a rebellion against the king, but was intercepted by the way, by Xerxes his Souldiers; and both he and his children, and all that were in his company put to the sword, [Herod. lib. 9. from chap. 108. to 112.] And that government of Bactria, Xerxes bestowed upon his own son Hystaspes, [Diod. Sic. in the 4 year of the 78 Olympiade.]

Pausanias, after his return out of Cyprus, went and took Byzantium: and then, without the privity of his associates in the war, sent the Persians whom he had there taken (some of them being Xerxes his neer friends and kinsmen; giving it out that they were fled) home to Xerxes, safe and sound, and all this businesse he negotiated, by one Gongylus an Eretrian born, whom also he imployed with letters unto Xerxes, wherein 4238.

he

he desired his daughter in marriage: and in lieu thereof he undertook and promised, to bring Sparta, and all Greece, into his subjection. Glad was Xerxes at this newes, and presently wrote back unto him by Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, whom for this purpose he dispatched away to the sea side; that at a shorter distance he might the more easily communicate his counsels with Pausanias: and therefore gave him the Government of the province of Dascylis, calling home Magabates, who was Governour there before. And when Pausanias upon these hopes grew more insolent than before, and began to live after the Persian garbe, and carryed himself more ruggedly and imperiously towards those who were in league with that State, the greater part of them, and especially the Ionians, and others who had been lately freed from their slavery under the Persians, fell all to the Athenians, and desired rather to serve under them, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

3529. Pausanias being hereof accused by the friends and associates of the Spartans, was presently sent for, to return home from Byzantium; where being found guilty and condemned for some private misdemeanors; yet was wholly acquitted from all suspition of treason against the State: Neverthelesse he was put from the Government of Hellespont; yet thither he went again without leave asking, in a ship of his own providing; to the end that under colour of prosecuting the war on the behalf of the Grecians in those parts, he might the better negotiate and drive on his own designes with Xerxes: and therefore when the Athenians would not suffer him to nestle in Byzantium, he returned not to Sparta, but staied at Colonæ in Troas: whereupon he was again accused at Sparta, that he held intelligence with the Persians, and that it was for no good, that he stayed hovering so long in those parts. Wherefore, being sent for again by the Ephori, so soon as he came, they threw him into prison: but upon a hearing he was again acquitted, [Id. ib.] 4239. 475.

3530. But when the Principality of Greece, in hatred to Pausanias was taken from the Lacedæmonians, and settled upon the Athenians: they under a colour of revenging the wrong done to the several countries by the common enemy, made a tax of what monies, and what ships, the particular cities should contribute against the Persians: whereunto the cities both of Greece, and of the Grecians in Asia, readily agreed for the common safeties sake. The first tax made, amounted to 460. (not as Diodorus hath it, 560.) talents: to be laid up in the Isle of Delos, as in the common treasury of all Greece, [Thucid. lib. 1 Diod. lib. 11. Justin lib. 16. cap. 3. Plutarch and Emil. Probus, in the life of Aristides.] 4240. 474.

Pausanias, being discovered by Argilius, his love-boy, to whom he committed his last letters sent to Aartabazus, was by the Ephori starved to death, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Emil. Prob. in the Life of Pausanias.]

3531. Artabazus, an Hyrcanian borne, Captain of the Guard, and one who was above all others of greatest credit and authority with King Xerxes, as his father Artasyras was before with Darius; conspiring with Mithridates an Eunuch, Chamberlaine to the King, (Ctesias calls him Spamitres or Aspamitres) who was his intimate friend and near kinsman, being let into the bed-chamber with his seven sons, all robustious young men, by night, slew Xerxes as he lay in his bed: and in the deep of the night, went speedily to Artaxerxes, told him that Darius, (who was the eldest of the three sons of Xerxes) had killed his father, that he might the sooner come to the Crown, (which Elian. lib. 13. cap. 3. delivers, as if it had been so indeed:) but by this false tale, he perswaded Artaxerxes, to set the Kings Guard upon his brother Darius: and they slew him, [Ctesias, Diod. Justin lib. 3. cap. 1.] 4241 473

Thus by Artabanus his means, Artaxerxes came to the Crown. Ctesias, who was a man of a milde disposition, and full of magnanimity withal: surnamed Longimanus, because his right hand, was longer than his left. [Plutarch in the beginning of the life of Artaxerxes.] But the 7 first moneths of his reign, are by Euseb. in his Chron. attributed to Artabanus: because that for so long, he ruled all things, as it should seem, in Artaxerxes his name; for though Diodorus intimates, that Artabanus himself was presently done to death, after his murders committed upon Xerxes and Darius; yet that there was some time passed between, appears by the more full narrations of the matter, both by Ctesias, and also by Justin.

Themistocles of Athens, being suspected of the conspiracy with Pausanias for the betraying of Greece into the hands of the Persians, was searched for, and had he been taken, had out of all doubt died for it: and therefore he fled out of Greece, and came to Pydna (a Town lying in the Thermaic bay of Macedonia) & there finding a Merchant's ship going into Ionia, put himself aboard her. But by tempest, she was carried into the middest of the Athenian army, which lay at the siege of Naxos. But the Master of the Barque being well fee'd by Themistocles, lay a whole night and a day at an anchor without the Athenian Fleet; and so when the tempest was over, came safe to Ephesus, [Thucid. lib. 1. Emil. Prob. in the life of Themistocles. Polyan. lib. 1. stratag.] Plutarch reports that he came to Cuma, and there found that many Sea Captains laid waite to take him, especially Ergoteles and Theodorus, for that Xerxes had promised 200. talents to whosoever should bring in his head : and therefore, he conveyed himself privily from thence, and came to a little town called Egas in Eolia : and there lay close for a few dayes, in the house of one Nicogenes, a very wealthy man in those parts, and one who was very well acquainted, and familiar, with divers of the kings nearest attendants : Diodorus calls him Lysitheis, and sayes further, that he was a man of so very great wealth, that when Xerxes passed that way, he feasted both him and all his army, in a very bountiful manner. By this good Host's means, he was put into a close waggon, such as the kings, and other great mens harlots used, among the Persians to be carryed in: and that he came safe into Persia, both Plutarch and Thucidides agree ; though Thucidides onely saith, that he went also the way from the sea side into Persia, in the company of a certain Persian : now Herodotus tells us, that from Ephesus to Sardes, it is 3 dayes journey, and from thence to Susa 3 moneths, [lib. 5. c. 50, 53, 54.]

Artabanus purposing now to destroy Artaxerxes, as he had formerly done his father and brother ; disclosed his intention unto Megabyzus, whom he knew to be malcontent, for the jealousie he had conceived of his wives disloialty, Amytis, sister unto Artaxerxes himself : and they sware secrecy each to other : but Megabysus, presently went and disclosed the matter to the king ; who thereupon put Artabanus to death, and then also came to light, his practises concerning the death both of Xerxes, and also of Darius. And then Aspamitres, or Spamitres the eunuch, who was of counsel with him in both, was put to a most bitter death, by certain racks, and other engines in a boat (described more at large by Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes) [Ctesias.] For Megabysus, Justin puts Becabasus, as consort with Artabanus in this plot ; and sets out the manner of Artabanus his death in this wise. Artaxerxes, saith he, fearing the number of Artabanus his children, commanded all the army to be ready in the fieldt he next day, for that he would take a view of them, both how many they were, and also how every man could stand to his armes, wherefore, when Artabanus was there present in armor, Artaxerxes said, that his own corselet was a little with the shortest for him, and that he would change with Artabanus : and when Artabanus at his command, had put off his corselet, Artaxerxes ran his naked body thorough with his sword; out of which measure of his corselet, we may well learn, by the way, that Artaxerxes, was not at this time so very a boy or child, as Justin makes him, but that he was at mans estate; and so old, as that the Scripture tells us, that in the seventh year of his kingdom, he was grown a father, [Ezra 7. 23.]

After Artabanus his death, there was a battail fought between his friends, and the other Persians, wherein three of his sons were slain ; and Megabysus, on the other side, sorely wounded, whereat both Artaxerxes himself and his sisters, Amytis, Megabysus his wife, and Rhodogyne, and his mother Amestris, much grieved ; and hardly at length was Megabyzus recovered by the great skill and industry of one Apollonis, a Physitian, or Chirurgion, of the Isle of Coos : But hereupon all Bactria revolted from Artaxerxes, and another Artabanus was there made Governour, between whom and them, a field was fought, where they parted upon eaven terms, so saith Ctesias : where yet those words, ἐ δ στρατηγεῖ ἄλλος Ἀρτάπανος or Ἀρτίβανος, are ambiguously spoken ; for either it may be meant, as I have here expressed it, according to the construction thereof made by Hen. Stephanus ; that there was another Artabanus made Governour of Bactria, in stead of the former, or that there was at this time another Artabanus, formerly Governour of that province, differing from him that was lately put to death; if we take the later sense, then this revolt of the Bactrians must be referred to a later time ; but if the first, then to the present. For that at this present, Hystaspes, Xerxes his son, was Governour of Bactria, we learn out of Diodor. Sic. and that he was the middle brother between Darius, and Artaxerxes, we find in Ctesias : and every man may think, that it stood with a great deal of reason, that Hystaspes seeing his younger brother Artaxerxes preferred before him in the kingdom, would stir up, not onely the Bactrians, whose governour he then was, but also all his other friends, for the recovery of his right.

Eusebius in his Chron. noteth, that in the fourth year of this 76 Olympiade, (upon which we now are) it was, that Themistocles fled to the Persians, which suteth well enough with that which is delivered by Thucidides ; who placeth the coming of Themistocles to Artaxerxes, between the siege of Naxos, and that famous victory gotten over the Persians, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon by Cimon the Athenian ; and withall, maketh the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes, to fall in with the same time, for he saith, That Themistocles sent letters to Artaxerxes, νεωστὶ βασιλεύοντα, (i. e.) when he was come newly to the crown, wherein he both craved his favour, and offered him his service against the Greeks: from whence we may fully discerne the true beginning of Artaxerxes his reign, which was almost full nine years sooner, than it is commonly said to have been.

Plutarch out of Phanias reports, that Themistocles was brought to Artaxerxes his presence, by Artabanus, a Colonel ; and out of Eratosthenes that he obtained this favour at that Colonels hand, by the means of his Lie-by ; which was a wench of Eretria : but doth not explain, what Artabanus this was: whether he, who affecting the kingdom, was slain by Artaxerxes; or that Artabanus to whom Xerxes, seven years before, when he went into Greece, committed the Government of his kingdom. For if he mean the first, then Themistocles his coming to Artaxerxes, must needs be within the first seven months after his coming to the crown; according to Euseb. his account: but if any other, than his coming to the king, might also have fallen upon any other month of the same first year, which will very well also suit with that place of Thucidides above mentioned; where he said, that he was brought to Artaxerxes, when he was newly come to the crown. Now that it was the office of the Colonel, or Chiliarch, being the second officer in the kingdom, to bring such as were to be admitted to the presence of the king, appeareth plainly by Emilius Probus, in the Life of Conon; and by Elian, [lib. 1.] Varius Histor. [cap. 21.]

When Themistocles, was thus graciously received, and welcomed by the king, a new danger grew upon him by the means of Mandane a daughter of Darius Hystaspes: for she having lost all her children in the sea-fight before Salamis, and not being able to prevaile with the king, tried and sollicited all her friends and great men about the Court, and at last stirred up the common people it self, to be revenged of this Themistocles, for the hurt he had done them in that battle. And when they all in a hurry came flocking into the Court, Artaxerxes told them fairely, that he would refer the whole matter to the judgment of his Lords: and so, by appointing a long time, for the preparing and hearing, and determining of this great cause, he found the means to deliver Themistocles, out of the peoples hands, for the present, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

3532. In the second battel, between the Persians and the Bactrians, by reason of a strong tempestuous wind, sitting in their faces, Artaxerxes got the victory of them, and reduced them wholy to his subjection, [Ctesias.] 4242. 472.

Themistocles, when he had spent a whole year in learning, as well as possibly he could the Persian tongue, and withal, was grown perfect in the lawes and customes of the country, and then coming to his trial, did not only quit himself from all objections made against him, but grew moreover into such favour with the King, as no Grecian was ever in before: for he not only used to carry him abroad with him a hunting, but also to call him to his private delights and recreations at home, insomuch, that he was admitted to the presence of Amestris the kings mother, and conversed familiarly with her. He bestowed on him also, a Persian wife, of noble parentage, excellent for beauty, and goodnesse of disposition; besides servants to attend upon him, cupboards of plate of all sorts, and all other things, not only for his necessary use, but even for delight and pleasure, [Thucidides, lib. 1. Diodorus Siculus, lib. 11. Plutarch in the Life of Themistocles.]

When Demaratus the Lacedemonian, who returned out of Greece with Xerxes, was fallen into the kings high displeasure, for that he came riding into Sardes in his Chariot, wearing his turbant upright, upon his head, in a kingly fashion; upon the mediation, and entreaty of Themistocles, he asswaged his anger, and grew friends with him again: [Plut. in Them. with Sen. lib. 6. de Benefic. 31.]

Themistocles being made Governor of the province of Magnesia, returned into Asia; [Thucid. lib. 1.]

In his return, he escaped a great danger, intended toward him, by the lying in wait of Epyxius, a Persian, Governor of the Upper Phrigia, and the Pisidians, and he escaped it by the forewarning of Dindymena, the mother of the gods, in a dream which he had, as he lay sleeping at noone: in memory whereof, he built her a Temple at Magnesia: and made his own daughter Mnesiptolema to be consecrated Priestesse to her, Plutarch in Themistocles: or, as some will have it, his wife; as in Strabo, [lib. 14.]

But that Themistocles might appear in Asia, with the greater lustre, the king gave him, besides the government of the province of Magnesia, the very city of Magnesia, upon Meander, which paid the king yearly, fifty talents, to find him bread for his Table; and Lampsacus in Hellespont, to buy him wine to his meat; and Myus, at the mouth of Meander, for his second course. Neanthes Cyzicenus, and Phanias and Atheneus, [lib. 1. c. 27.] adde two Cities more, in the country of Troas, to wit, Percotes and Palescepsis, to furnish him with cloaths, and carpets, [Thucid. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Plut. and Emil. Prob. in the Life of Themistocles.

3533. Cimon the son of Miltiades, who was General in the field at Marathon, being now himself made General by the Athenians against the Persians, set out of the Pyreum at Athens, with 200. fighting ships: which afterward, what out of Ionia, what out of other parts, he encreased to the number of 300. and with this Fleet he set saile for the coast of Caria: where all the sea towns, which had been at any time heretofore planted by Grecians, presently revolted to him from the Persians. The rest which were possessed by the natives of the country, & held by the Persian garrisons, he set upon, and took them all by pure force of war. Having thus dispatched the errand he came on, in Caria, he passed 4243. 471.

into Lycia: and in like manner took in all there too; and when as upon their submission to the Athenian government, he demanded shipping of them, his Navy was forthwith exceedingly much encreased, [Diod. lib. 11.]

The Persians listed what men they could out of other the Kings Dominions, for land service; but for shipping, they sent to the Phoenicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians. The chief Commander of all the Persian Fleet, when it came together, was Tithraustes, a bastard son of Xerxes, [Id. ib.] Ephorus saith, that he was Admiral of the Fleet, and Pherendates Commander by land: But Callisthenes saith, that Ariomandes the son of Gobryas, commanded the army, [Plut. in Cimone.]

3534. After the Athenians had subdued Naxos, as Thucidides, in his first book teacheth us. They and their confederates under the conduct of their General Cimon, in one and the same day, put to flight the Persians, both in a sea-fight, not far from the Isle of Cyprus, and also in a fight at land, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia, the 3 year of the 77 Olympiade: as [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.] reporteth; who was of opinion, (and so was Justin, lib. 2. in fine,) that Xerxes was yet living: contrary to what Thucidides affirmeth, who yet of all other, lived nearest to that time. And therefore Eusebius is in the righter, who placeth this great victory in the 4 year of Artaxerxes; with this further note upon it: Cimon obtained this victory by sea and land against the Persians, near the River Eurymedon; and so the war with the Medes ended. For from the beginning of Artaxerxes reign (as we have put it according to Thucidides his account) his fourth year fell in with the third year of the 77 Olympiade, here mentioned by Diodorus, though Eusebius missorting the first year of his reign, with the first year of the 79 Olympiade, must of necessity in consequence thereof, have placed his 4 year, with the 4 year of the same Olympiade. But the best way will be, to set down this whole matter in order as we find it in Diodor. and Plutarch, thus. 4244.

When Cimon had heard, that the Kings Captains had taken up their Station with a great army by land, and a fleet by sea, in the coast of Pamphylia; he to keep the sea, that they might not come within the Chelidonian Islands, went with 200. saile from Cnidus and Triopium, and came to the city of the Phaselites, who were Grecians: and because they would not receive his Navy into their Port, nor fall off from the Persian, he fired their country, and assaulted their city. Neverthelesse, at the intercession of those of Chios, who were in the Fleet, a peace was made, upon condition that they should pay down ten talents ready money, follow Cimon, and partake in the war against the Persians, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.]

Then Cimon, understanding that the Persian Fleet hovered about the coast of Cyprus; set presently sail towards them, with 250. ships against 340. of theirs: Diod. Though Ephorus saith that the Persians were 350. and Phanodemus 600. strong: yet these did nothing worthy of so great a Navy; but they that were next the land, abandoned their ships, and fled to land, to the army that there was ready ranged in battel aray: the rest were set upon by Cimon, taken, and put to the sword, [Plutarch.] Thucidides saith, that they took all the Phoenician ships, to the number of 200. and sunk them every one, [Emil. Probus in the life of Cimon] saith that, he overcame and took all the Fleet of the Cyprians and Phoenicians, to the number of 200. saile. Diodorus, that the Athenians having sunk many of their ships, took 100. with the men in them prisoners, and that the rest when the souldiers were fled out of them into Cyprus, came all empty into their hands: which yet to have been taken full of souldiers appears by those Verses, which the Athenians made and offered to their god; found both in Diodorus, and also in Aristides his 2 Platonic Oration.

> For these when souldiers all were kill'd at land,
> An hundred Ships of the Phoenicians took,
> All full of men.

Plutarch also in his little discourse of the Athenian glory, saith that Cimon brought from Eurymedon about 100. ships of war of the Phoenicians. But Diodorus affirms, that he took not onely more than 100. but also full 340. ships, that is, the whole Persian Navy, and 20000. men in them.

Nor was Cimon satisfied with this victory at sea; but presently put over with his Fleet, and set upon the land army of the Persians in Asia which he saw ranged upon the shoar, near the mouth of the river Eurymedon; which the better to effect, he put all his own souldiers, into the enemies bottoms, which he had taken, and clad them all in Persian attire; whereupon they conceiving them to have been their own ships, hailed them as friends. Cimon therefore, so soon as the night came on, (and it was very dark without moon-shine,) landed his men, who breaking suddainly into the enemies Camp, slew all they met with, and killed one of the two chief Commanders, Pherendates, the kings brothers son, as he lay in his pavilion; and after a while made them (all amazed as they were with this sodain onslat,) to betake them to their heeles, [Diodorus.] And of this Stratagem,

Polyenus

Polyænus, [Lib. 1.] maketh mention, saving that by a mistake, he saith, that Cimon so landed his men in Cyprus, and not in Pamphilia; and so doth Julius Frontinus, in the end of his 4 book: where Conon is found written instead of Cimon.

Cimon moreover took 80 of the Phænicians ships, riding near Hydrus, and were not in the fight, nor had heard any incling of it, [Plutarch.]

3535. This year Cimon setting saile from Athens, with four tall men of war, took 13 ships 4245. 469. of the Persians, in the Chersonese of Thracia, and driving out thence, both Persians and Thracians, possessed the place for the Athenians; and so wrought the matter, that in all Asia from Ionia to Pamphylia, there was not any body of a Persian army to be seen, [Plut. in the Life of Cimon.] And thence it came to passe, that Pericles, who this year began to have the principality at Athens, with 50 ships, and Ephialtes with 30 more, sailing beyond the Chelidonian Islands, in the sea of Pamphylia, saw never a sail of any Persian fleet all the way, as Plutarch out of Calisthenes reporteth: and Isocrates, in his Panathenaic, sayes, that neither a Persian man of war, durst appear nearer Greece, than the port Phaselis, nor any company of them by land, over the river Halys: yet Diod.
writes, that the Persians seeing the encrease of the Athenian power fell to building of ships faster than ever.

patent, and was therewith sent by Artaxerxes the king and his seven counsellours to settle the Jewish Common-wealth, and to reform the Church at Jerusalem; by which patent, it was again made lawfull, for all Jews that would, not onely to go themselves, but also to send or carry with them what gold or silver, either the king and his nobles, or the Jews themselves would offer to their God: there were also thereby given all sorts of furniture for the Lords house, and order given to the Tresurers beyond the river, to supply them with all other necessaries, out of the kings exchequer; and that all that attended any way upon the service of the Temple, should be free from tributes and all the people was suffered, to live according to their own laws, [Ezra 7. 11, 26.]

In the seventh year of Artaxerxes, the first day of the first moneth, Ezra, with a great multitude of the Jews, set out from Babylon, [Ezra 7. 6, 7, 9. chap. 8. 1, 14.]

Ezra and his company spent 3 dayes at their Tents at Ahava; till the Levites, which were wanting, came unto them: when all were come together, Ezra commanded a solemn fast to be kept, and prayer to be made unto God, to prosper them in their journey, and consigned all the gold and silver, which was consecrated to God, into the hands of 12 choyse men of the Priests, and to as many of the Levites, [Ezra 8. 13, 30.]

b. Upon the 12 day of the the first moneth, they removed from the river Ahava, and upon the 10 day of the 5 moneth, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes his reign, they arrived at Jerusalem: and there rested themselves three dayes, [Ezra 7. 8, 9. chap.
8. 30, 32.]

Upon the 4 day of the 5 moneth, the gold and silver which they had brought, was weighed out, and with the other furniture was laid up, in the house of the Lord: and they which returned offered also their sacrifices unto God: which done, the kings edicts were presented to the Governours and rulers beyond the river; who, thereupon, shewed all favour to the people, and house of the Lord, [Ezra 8. 33, 36.]

mentation for the same, Shecanias advised Ezra to move the people, that they would binde themselves by a vow to God, to put away their heathenish wives, and the children which they had by them: which was done accordingly, [chap. 10. 1.]

Warning was given to all such, as were returned out of the captivity, that they should appear at Jerusalem within three dayes, upon a great penalty to those, which should then be found absent. Wherefore all the men of Juda and Benjamin, coming together in the court of the Temple, the 20 day of the 9 moneth, and there quaking, what with the horror of the thing they came about, what with the bitternesse of the weather; Ezra commanded them every male to separate himself from his heathenish wife, who readily consenting thereunto; and desiring further, that Judges might be appointed to see that order put in execution: there were forthwith appointed two out of the order of the Priests, and two adjuncts more out of the Levites to assist them, in taking the cognisance of cases of this nature, [chap. 10. 7. 15.]

ed, [c. 10. 16, 17.

d. Themistocles died of a naturall death at Magnesia, or as others will have it, of poyson voluntarily taken, when he saw, that he could not perform what he had undertaken to the King, for the subduing of Greece, [Thuc. lib. 1.] Cicero saith in his Lælius, that he killed himself, 20 years after the death of Coriolan; which according to Dionysius Halicarnassæus his reckoning, falls in just with the 3 year of the 78 Olymp. upon which year
there

there is this note put by Eusebius in his Chron. Themistocles, saith he, whom his own worth had made the conqueror, his countries injuriousnesse made the General, of the Persians: Neverthelesse, that he might keep himself from going in hostile manner against it; he appointed to offer a sacrifice, at which, taking a bowle full of the bulls bloud, he drank it off, and so fell down, as a noble sacrifice of piety, dead before the Altar; which so memorable a departure of his out of this life wrought this effect, that Greece should never need another Themistocles after him. Against which manner of his death, yet Tully in his Brutus, makes Pompo Atticus to argue in this wise: For as you now, saith he, tell us a tale of Coriolan, so Clitarchus and Stratocles do the like of Themistocles; for of whom Thucidides, who was an Athenian himself, and nobly born, and an excellent man, and who lived not long after him, saith only that he dyed, and that he was privily buried in some place in Attica, and that there was some suspition, that he made away himself by poison; of him these men write, that when he had sacrificed a bull, he took of the blood of him in a basin, and quaffing it off, fell down dead in the place: Though indeed before the writing of this History by Thucidides, the Athenians themselves had heard it from Aristophanes, in Equitibus; which Comedy he wrote and taught in Athens, the 7 year of the Peloponesian war, when Stratocles was Pretor, or L. Chancelor of Athens, that he died with drinking of bulls bloud.

3540. Jubily, 20. 4250 4249. 465.

3544. Inaros the son of Psammeticus king of Lybia (not a Lydian as Ctesias hath it) going from Marea, a City bordering upon Pharus, turned away the greater part of Egypt, from the obedience of Artaxerxes; and being made and proclaimed king by them, sent for the Athenians, from Cyprus, who by chance were there at that time, imploied in a war, with two hundred sail of ships, partly of their own, partly of their allies and friends, [Thucid. lib. 1.] 4254. 460.

Artaxerxes hearing of the Egyptians revolt, presently gathered an army out of all his dominions, and rigg'd up a Navie, sparing for no pains nor cost therein, Diodorus Siculus, 2 year, 79 Olympiade, forerunning here in Thucidides his more exact accompt, by two ful years.

Artaxerxes purposed to go himself in the head of this army into Egypt: but upon his friends disswasion, he gave that off, and sent his Brother Achemenes in that voiage with 400 thousand foote, and 80 sail of ships, [Ctesias.] and Diodorus agreeth with him for the sending of Achemenes General in this Egyptian war: but saith that he was Darius his son, and Artaxerxes his own great Uncle; and he gave him 300 thousand horse and foot, wherewith to go upon that service; meaning hereby Achemenes the son of Darius Hystaspis, and Atossa, unto whom Xerxes had formerly committed the kingdom of Egypt, which himself had subdued, to be governed, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 7. & 97.]

3545. Achamenes, al. Achamenides, coming into Egypt, sate down with his army upon the bank of the river Nile; and having refreshed his army a while, after their long march, prepared to give them battle: They on the other side, having gotten together what forces they could make out of Egypt and Liba; lay still, waiting for the coming of the Athenians, [Diod. Sic.] 4255

The Athenians, coming from sea; and entering the mouth of the Nile, quickly made themselves masters of the river, [Thucid.] Inaros, together with Charamitis, who was Ammiral of a fleet of 40 ships, sent from Athens, got a victory at sea; wherein of 50 Persian ships, they took 20, with all the men in them; and sunk the other thirty, [Ctesias.] But Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the whole Athenian fleet which lay before Cyprus, and consisted of 200 saile, came at this time into Egypt; not forty ships only, as Ctesias said.

Inaros, with his own Egyptians, and this supply of the Athenians, fought also a battel with the Persians by land; wherein for a while the Persians, by reason of their overpowring multitude, had the better; but when the Athenians came and made a strong impression on them, and made the wing which they encountered with, to retire, many of them died in the place; and the rest of the Persian army betook themselves to their heeles: in which flight, there was a huge slaughter made of them, [Diodor.] for of 400 thousand men, which Achemenides brought into the field, there fell that day, together with himself, 100 thousand: for he died of a wound which he received from Inaros his own hand, and his body was sent to Artaxerxes, [Ctesias.] Herodotus also makes mention [lib. 3. c. 12. and lib. 7. c. 7.] of one Achemenes a son of Darius, and of other Persians, slain by Inaros a Lybian, son of Psammitichus, in a place called Papremes.

The Athenians following the chace upon the Persians, took two parts of Memphis, and assaulted the third part also, called the white Wall, whereinto the Persians and Medes were fled: [Thucid. and Diod.] 3546. Artaxerxes, hearing of this great overthrow, dispatched away presently, Megabasus a Persian, to Sparta, with a masse of money, to stir up the Pelopone- 4256.

Peloponesians to a war against the Athenians, thinking that this would draw home the Athenians out of Egypt. But the Lacedæmonians would none of his money, nor yeild to any of his demands: which the King perceiving, he called Megabazus home again with the monies which were left; and commanded Megabyzus the son of Zopyrus to provide himself for a journey into Egypt. [Id. ib.] to wit, that Megabysus, who was formerly General in Xerxes his army; as [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 82.] and married Xerxes his daughter, Amytis: as Ctesias, the son of that Zopyrus, who recovered Babylon to Darius the son of Hystaspes: as Herod. in the very end of his third book saith.

3547. Artabazus and Megabyzus designed Commanders for the war in Egypt, carryed with them out of their own country, horse and foot 300. thousand men, [Diod.] but Ctesias saith onely 200. thousand. 4257. 457.

When they were come into the part of Cilicia and Phœnicia, the Commanders thought fit there to rest a while, and to refresh the army after so long a march: meane while they command the Cilicians, Cyprians, and Phœnicians to rig up and provide the Navy: and they in a trice provided 300. sail of tall ships, which were forthwith furnished with sea-men and souldiers, with store of ammunition, and all things fit and necessary for a sea-fight. Diod. Admiral of which Fleet was appointed Oriscus, [Ctesias.]

In making of which preparations, and in training and exercising their men in arms, and making them apt and serviceable for the war, they spent almost a whole year; mean while the Athenians presse the siege of the Fort of White-wall in Memphis: But when the Persians within manfully defended it, and the Athenians saw no possibility of taking it by assault; yet they lay before it all this year, [Diod.]

3548. The Persian Commanders in Asia having all things fitted, march from thence thorough Syria, and Phœnicia, with their land Army; their Navy of 300. saile coasting them still as they went: Until at last, they came to Memphis, [Diod.] where to those two hundred thousand which they brought with them, there joyned three hundred thousand more of those which Achæmenides had left in Egypt. Between these and the Egyptians there was a stout battel fought, and many fell on either side; but most of the Egyptians. At length Megabyzus with his own hand wounded Inaros in the thigh: whereupon he fled, and put himself into a most strong hold, called Byblus, in the Isle of Prosopitis in the river of Nile; and with him the Grecians which were left, and not slain with Charamites their General; and all Egypt besides save onely that Fort of Byblus, followed the part of Megabysus. [Ctesias.] 4258. 456.

Megabysus having driven all, both Egyptians and Grecians out of the field, and out of Memphis, and shut them up all in the little Isle of Prosopitis; continued the siege of them there, one yeare and six moneths. [Thucid lib. 1.]

3550. In the 20 year of the reign of Artaxerxes, in the 9 moneth called Cisleu, Nehemias being then at Susa, where the Kings of Persia used to keep their Winter-quarter: as Athenæus [Deipnosoph. 12.] teacheth us, having received news how ill matters went with the Jewes at Jerusalem, namely, that the wall thereof was broken down, and the gates consumed with fire; fell to mourning, and fasted and prayed to God, that he would remit the sins of his people, and give to himself grace and favour in the sight of the King, [Nehem. 1. 1, 11.] 4260 45.

6. In the same 20 year of the King, in the moneth Nisan, when the time came that Nehemiah in his turn was to attend upon the King; (for he was one of the Cup-bearers to him) and both King and Queen, (whom I suppose to be her whom Ctesias calls Damaspia) took notice of his sorrowful and dejected looks; he opened the cause thereof unto them, and obtained from the King a grant, not onely to be Governour of all Judea; but also to rebuild Jerusalem, [Neh. 11. 1, 6.] and from this time, begins the account of Daniels 70 weeks, [Dan. 9. 24, 25.]

Nehemiah furnished now with a Commission, and equipage from the King, in spight of Sanballat the Horonite of Moab, and of Tobia the Ammonite, the Governour of some place thereabouts; comes to Jerusalem, begins the work, and answereth them who laughed at him for undertaking so idle a businesse as that was, [Nehem. 11. 7, 20.]

The Persian Commanders in Egypt, laied the channel of the river which compassed the Isle of Prosopitis dry, turning the water another way by ditches, which they cut; and so left the Athenian ships aground: and now was Prosopitis no longer an Island, but joyned to, and made a part of the Continent. As soon therefore as the Egyptians saw the Athenian ships, in what case they were, they took a fright, and presently, not careing what became of them, made their own peace with the Persians: and the Athenians for their parts, seeing themselves thus deserted by the Egyptians, and their ships made uselesse, set them all on fire, that the enemy might not gain them. The Persians therefore now passing the channel on dry foot, entered the Island, and by a fight at land took it neverthelesse, seeing the excesse of valour in the Athenians, and remembring what losses they had formerly received by them, were content to come to a fair agreement and composition with them, that they should all, (and there were six thousand of them) depart out of Egypt, with bag and baggage; and return home when they would, [Thucid. Diod. Ctesias.]

And thus the fortunes of the Athenians in Egypt, where they had spun out the war six years, came to nothing: and Egypt returned into Artaxerxes his power and obedience again, all save Amyrtæus, who was king of those which dwelt in the fen countries of Egypt; for him they could not take in, both because of the vastnesse of the fen it self, and also for that the inhabitants thereof were a most warlike nation, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

d. Eliashib, the son of Joiakim, the son of Jehu (or Jehoshua) the High Priest, and the rest of the Jews, every one in his place, fel in hand very stoutly with the building of the wal of Jerusalem, [Nehem. 3.] beginning on the fourth day of the fifth moneth Ab. as is gathered out of chap. 6. 15. ib.

Sanballat and Tobias, with the Samaritans, and other enemies of the Jews, first fell a laughing and scoffing at this new work: but when they saw the wall half up, they left their mocking, and laid their heads together, and consulted how to destroy the builders, which when Nehemias understood, he first praied to God, and then began to order his men, all in a military way; and so put by the purpose and practise of their enemies, [chap. 4. ib.]

Nehemias, upon the complaints and outcries of the people, taketh an order to have them all freed, the slaves of their bondage, the debtors of their debts; and those that had pawn'd or mortgaged their lands or goods, of their forfeitures; and himself to give an example in so good and charitable a work, released his own debts, and all engagements of lands or goods made unto him, and eased the poorer sort of publique taxes, and contributions, and gave liberally of his own unto them that wanted, [chap. 4. ib.]

But Nehemias was not onely in danger from Sanballat, and other enemies abroad, but also from false prophets and false brethren at home, which sought to hinder the work no lesse than the other did. All which difficulties well overcome, the wall in fifty two dayes was finished, to wit, upon the 25 day of the sixth moneth called Elul, do their enemies at home and abroad, what they could to the contrary, [chap. 6. ib.]

The dedication of the wall was performed with much celebrity, and great joy, [Neh. 12. 27, 43.]

Then did Nehemiah take into consideration the several offices belonging to the house of the Lord, appoints Governours over the city, and orders the guards thereof; and calling their congregation together, takes a note, of all that had returned out of the captivity, that out of them a number might be selected, to people and store the city now it was built, with inhabitants: all which, every one according to his ability, made their several offerings unto God, [Neh. c. 7.]

When 50 saile of Grecian ships were sent into Egypt, to serve in their room, who had been there so long already, it fell out, that they knowing nothing of what had happened to their countrey men there, came to anchor at Mendesium, which is one of the mouths of Nilus. There as they lay, the Persians sat upon them from the land, and the Phenicians by sea, and destroyed the greatest part of them; few escaped to carry news into Greece. And even of that great army which was there before, few returned into Greece again, but were lost as they passed thorough the deserts of Lybia, to get unto Cyrene. And this was the end, which that great voyage of the Athenians into Egypt came unto, [Thucid. lib. 1.] 4261

3551. In the feast of Trompets, the first day of the seventh moneth, when all the Jews came together at Jerusalem, the Law of God was by Ezra red and expounded to them, at the hearing whereof, when they were all sorely grieved, and fell a weeping, they were heartned up by Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites, and by them perswaded to keep that feast, with meriment and joy of minde, [Nehem. 8. 1, 2, 12.]

Upon the second day of the same moneth, Ezra, was consulted withall, by the Elders of the families, and by the Priests and levites, concerning certain doubts arising upon the reading of the Law, and it was enjoyned them to keep the feast of Tabernacles, [Nehem. 8. 13, 14, 15,] abroad in the fields, and in booths made of boughs, according to the Law, [Lev. 23. 40.]

Upon the 15 day, and the six dayes following, the feast of Tabernacles was celebrated with great care and devotion, and for seven dayes together, the law of God was read in their ears, and the eighth day also was kept very solemnly, according as was prescribed, [Levit. 23. 36.] Neither was there the like feast of Tabernacles kept from the dayes of Josua the son of Nun, unto that time, and there was great joy made at it, [Ib. 17. 18.]

Of which the Jews in their greater Chronicle, [cap. 30.] speak in this manner; It may be said that he compareth the return of the children of Israel into the land, in the dayes of Ezra, with that of their first entring into it in the dayes of Joshua: and as in the dayes of Joshua they were bound to tithes, to the years of Shemita, or Remission, and to Jubilies, and to the hallowing of their walled towns: so now in their return in the time of Ezra, they were in like manner obliged to the law of Tithes, of the years of Shemita or releasings, of Jubilies, and to the hallowing of their walled Cities; and they rejoyced greately before the Lord.

Upon the 24 of this moneth, the Israelites which returned, separating themselves from all strangers, made publick profession of their repentance, [Nehem. 9.] and renewing their covenant with God, bound themselves to the observation of the Law of God and of his Worship, [chap. 10.] and in special of that Law, [Levit. 25.4. Deut. 15.1, 2.] concering the tillage of their land, and exaction of debts: and of letting their land rest every seventh year, [Nehem. 10.31.]

The chief Heads of the people seated themselves all at Hierusalem; the rest cast lots, according to which every tenth man, should inhabit and have his dwelling in the holy City. [Nehem. 11. with 1 Chron. ca. 9.]

c. Megabyzus, leaving Sartamah Governour of Egypt, returned to Artaxerxes with Inarus, and certain of the Grecians in his company; having given them his word, that they should have no hurt done unto them; which Artaxerxes himself carefully observed and performed toward them, though grievously incensed against Inaros for having slain his brother Achæmenides. Insomuch, that when his mother Amestris (instead of which, the name of Amytis is here crept into Ctesias) desired vengeance to be taken of Inaros, and the Grecians, and even of Megabyzus himself; her son in law the King, denyed her request, [Ctesias.]

3554. The Athenians send Cimon their General with a Fleet of 200. sail of their own, and their confederates into Cyprus: of which sixty went away into Egypt to Amyrtæus, who continued still in the fenny country of Egypt: the rest besieged Citium a City in Cyprus, [Thucid. lib. 1.] At this time Artabazus and Megabyzus commanded the Persian Army; the first of which Artabazus lay with the Fleet consisting of 300. sail, about Cyprus: the other with his land Forces, which amounted to the number of 300. thousand men, remained in Cilicia, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12. in the 3 year of 82 Olympiade] 4264.

Cimon sent certain messengers to the Temple of Ammon, to consult the Oracle there, about some secret matter, [Plutarch in the life of Cimon.]

3555. In the siege of Citium in Cyprus, (as Thucidides saith) Cimon died; either of a natural disease, (as Emil. Probus hath it) or, as others, of a wound which he received in a fight against the enemy. Being ready to depart this life, he advised those that were about him to conceale his death, and to get them gone with all the speed they could. And it fell out, that neither friends nor foes knowing any thing of his death, all the Greek army returned home safe, under the conduct, (as Phanedemus speaketh) of Cimon when he had been a whole moneth dead; But they who were sent to consult the Oracle, having received no other answer, but that Cimon was already with him: returned to their fellows in Egypt, and understood by them that Cimon died, at that very time, when that answer was made unto them, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.] 4265.

When the Grecian army returned out of Egypt, they which lay before Citium in Cyprus, being sorely pressed with famine, raised their siege from thence, and sailed to Salamis in the same Isle: where they fought with the Phœnicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians, both by sea and land. In the sea-fight, they sunk many ships of the enemies Navy, and took a hundred bottomes, with all the souldiers and Marriners in them: and the rest they pursued as far as unto Phœnicia it self: But the Persians with such of the ships as were left, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyzus with the army lay. And the Athenians making thitherward with all possible speed, landed their men upon the open shoar, and set upon the enemy. In which fight, Anaxicrates who commanded the Fleet, behaving himself in most manful wise, died a most noble and heroick death. The rest having gotten the victory, and made a great slaughter of their foes, returned to their ships; and came home all in company with those, which were upon their way returning out of Egypt, [Diod. Sic. in the 3 and 4 year of the 82 Olympiade,] as he stands corrected out of Thucidides. But Elian writeth, that the Athenians lost in Egypt 200. tall men of War, and in Cyprus, 150. with all their tackle, ammunition, and furniture, in them, [Elian. Variar. Histor. lib. 5. cap. 10.]

Artaxerxes, hearing of the loss of his men in Cyprus, advised with his Council concerning this war; and in the end it was resolved, that it was for the good of that kingdom, that peace should be made with the Grecians. Therefore the King wrote his letters to the Captains and Commanders in Cyprus that they should at any hand, and upon any terms come to a treaty, and conclude a peace with the Grecians. Hereupon Artabazus and Megabyzus dispatched away messengers to Athens, there to treat of a peace; and when the Athenians had consented to the conditions by them proposed, they also sent commissioners on their part with full power and authority, the chief of which was Callias, the son of Hipponicus, [Diod. in the 4. year of the 82. Olympiade.] At which time also the men of Argos, sent their messengers to Susa, to know of Artaxerxes, whether he thought the league and friendship which they had heretofore made with his father Xerxes, did continue still; or whether they were held by him as enemies. To whom Artaxerxes returned this answer, that the league continued by all means, and that he held no City more friend to him than that of Argos was, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 151.]

The peace between the Athenians and their confederates on the one side, and the Persians on the other, was concluded on, upon these conditions, That the Grecian cities, in all Asia, should enjoy their own liberty, and rights. That no Persian Governour, should at any time come within three dayes journey of the Sea: that there should no ship of war, of either side be found riding out, between Phaselis, and the Cyanean Ils: or as Plutarch expresseth it, That the king should not have any beaked ship, or man of war surging in all the sea, between the Cyanean, and the Chelidonian Islands.

Now when the King and his Council of war had subscribed to these articles, then the Athenians also, took their oath, that they would not in hostile manner invade any of the kings Provinces, [Diod. ut sup.]

It is said also, that they built an altar in memory of this peace, and that they heaped many honours upon Callias, who had been the contriver and procurer of it, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.]

3556. Artaxerxes tired out with the importune sollicitation of his mother, which for five years space she continually used unto him, at length gave up Inaros the Egyptian king, and the Greeks that came with him into hir hand; whereupon the Queen caused the body of Inarus to be so rackt, and stretched out, and wreathed several wayes, that he hung upon three several crosses at one time: as for the Grecians she caused fifty of them (for she could catch no more) to have their heads smitten off. [Ctesias.] Thucidides saith that Inarus king of Lybia, was taken by trechery and crucified; yet Herodotus telleth us, that his son Thammyras, by the favour of the Persians, held the Principality in Egypt; which his father had held before him, [lib. 3. c. 15.] 4266.

Megabyzus, being sorely grieved for the death of Inaros and those Grecians, asked leave that he might go to his own government in Syria: and had under hand sent away thither, the rest of the Grecians which had escaped; and he following after, so soon as he came thither revolted from the king: and gathered an army of 150000 men, [Ctesias.]

3557. Against Megabyzus was sent Osiris, with an army of 200 thousand men: they fought and in the fight, Osiris wounded Megabyzus with a dart in the thigh, two inches deep: and he likewise wounded Osiris with a dart, first in the thigh, and then in the shoulder; with which Osiris fell from his horse; but Megabyzus took him about by the middle, and saved him, many of the Persians fell: and the two sons of Megabyzus, Zopyrus and Artipsyus, fought valiantly that day: so that Megabyzus had the better of it, and having gotten in the end a full victory, had great care of Osiris and sent him to Artaxerxes, who demanded him at his hands, [Ctesias.] 4267.

3558. Against Megabyzus was sent another army, whereof was general Menostanes, or Menostates, son to Artarius, Governor of Babylon, and brother to king Artaxerxes; who met and fought, and Megabyzus wounded Menostanes in the shoulder: and also in the head; yet was neither of those wounds mortal: but upon those wounds received, he and all his whole army left the field and fled, and Megabyzus obtained a most glorious victory, [Ctesias.] 4268.

Artarius, first by messengers, then Artoxares the Eunuch, a Paphlagonian born, and Amestris, the Queen mother, perswaded Megabyzus, to come to an agreement with the king: and with much a do could Artarius himself, and Amytis his wife, and Artoxares, who was now 20 years of age, and Petisas, Osiris his son, prevaile with him to come unto the king: and when he was come, the king sent him word, that he freely pardoned him all his by-past offences. But when a while after, the king went a hunting, and there a lyon set upon him, and Megabyzus, seeing the lyon raised upon his hinder feet, slew him with his spear; the king growing wroth with him, because he had done it, before he himself had given the lyon any blow, commanded his head to be taken off: yet upon the intercession of Amestris, & Amytis & others, his life was spared, and he sent away and confined to a certain Island, called Cirta, in the read sea: Artoxares also, the Eunuch, for having oft-times spoken liberally to the king, on the behalf of Magabyzus was bannished into Armenia, [Ctesias.]

3559. Herodotus, when he had read his books at Athens, before the Council there; was much honoured for them, as saith Euseb. in his Chron. where Scaliger noteth, that Herodotus wrote his books, before his going into great Greece; not in great Greece it self, as some imagine, following herein Pliny, and we shall see more in the year subsequent. 4269.

But

But I observe, that in these his books, mention is often made of the Peloponesian War, both in [the 7 book cap. 137. and in the 9 book cap. 72.] In the former of which is related a thing done in the 2 year of that War; and in the later, a thing acted in the 19 year thereof at Decelæa: full 33 years after the time consigned by Euseb. to the reading of his books at Athens. See more after in the year 3596. and 3597.

3560. In the first year of the 84 Olympiade, when Praxiteles was Prætor or L. Chancelor of Athens, 12 years before the Peloponesian war began; the Athenians sent a Plantation or Colony of theirs into Great Greece, to rebuild a certain decayed City there, called Thurii: which Colony was carried thither by Lysias, a youth, at that time, of 15 years of age, and no more, [Plutarch and Dionysius Halicarnassæus in the life of Lysias the Orator] And Herodotus being then 41 years old, who though he were born at Halicarnassus in Caria; yet obtained he the surname of Thurius afterward διὰ τὸ κοινωνῆσαι τῆς Θουρίας ἀποικίας, (i.e.) because he was one who had his part in carrying that Colony or Plantation to Thurii: as Strabo saith in his 14 book. Now this 84 Olympiade fell in with the 310. year of the nativity of Rome, according to Varroes account. In which year Pliny saith, that Herodotus compiled his History at Thurii in Italy, [lib. 12. cap. 4.] as we touched in the precedent year. 4270. 444.

3562. In this year all wars were laied asleep throughout Asia, Greece, Sicily, Italy, Gaule, Spain, and almost all the World over, [Diod. Sic. 3 year of the 84 Olympiade.] 4272. 442.

Nehemias, when he had governed Judea 12 years, (i. e.) from the 20 year of the reign of Artaxerxes, to the 32 of the same, returned to the King, [Nehem. 5. 14. and chap. 13. 6.]

In his absence Eliashib the Priest, which was over the Chamber of the House of God, having contracted affinity with Tobia: had prepared him a fair chamber in the court of the temple: in which chamber, were formerly wont to be laid up and kept the hallowed Gifts and Tithes. And the son of Joiada the son of Eliashib the High Priest, (who was a different man from Eliashib, of whom I spake before) became son in law, and had married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite; which disorders, with sundry others which had crept in, in his absence, Nehemias upon his return to Jerusalem with a new Commission, quickly redressed, and severely punished, [Nehem. 13.]

3563. Megabyzus when he had lived now full five years in banishment; fled out of the Island where he was confined, and faining himself to be a Pisagas, (i. a Leper in the Persian language, and one to whom no man might approach) came home to his own wife Amytis: and what by her, what by Amestris the Kings mother, was in the end reconciled to the King: who thereupon made him sit at table with him, as he had done in former times: and when he had lived 76 years he died; for which the King grieved very sorely. [Ctesias.] 4273. 441.

3564. In this year began a war between the Samians and Milesians, about the city of Priene, (i.) the sixth year in the beginning thereof, (Thucidides hath it) after the 30 years peace and league made between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians: and in the 4 year about the middest thereof, of the 84 Olympiade as Diodorus noteth. Now Priene was a City in Caria, which the Samians and Milesians, each laid claim to as their own: the Milesians finding themselves too weak at blowes, drew unto their party some of the Samians, who desired an alteration of things in their own State; and with them repaired to Athens, and there complained of the injurious carriage of the Citizens of Samos: whereupon the Athenians sent unto them, requiring them to surcease their armes, and to come and debate the matter in difference, before them at Athens. Which when the Samians refused to do, Pericles prevailed to have open War proclaimed against them: and all this in favour of his wench Aspasia, that famous Courtisan, and one whom he doted on, not so much for her beauty, as for her wit; and because she was the daughter of one Axiochus, who was a Milesian borne. The Athenians therefore sending a Fleet of 40 sail, under the command of Pericles, easily took the City of Samos, and changed the Aristocraty thereof into a democratical kind of Government. 4274. 440.

But presently after, Pericles was returned from Samos, there arose among them a terrible sedition: some striving to maintain the new establisht popular Government, and others holding that the old Aristocratical was the better. They therefore who disliked the Democratical, conspiring with the chief men of the city, sent into Asia, to Pissuthnes the son of Hystaspes Governour of Sardes; and having made a confederacy with him, obtained of him a company of 700. souldiers; with which putting over in the still of the night into the Isle of Samos: they there joyned with other of their consorts, who attended their coming, and so altogether surprized and took the Town, and professing themselves open enemies to the Athenians, took the whole Garrison of them that there was, with the Captain and Officers, and sent them all for a present to Pissuthnes: which done, they forthwith march against Miletus, having drawn the inhabitants of Byzantium also into their confederacy against the Athenians.

The

The Athenians hearing of the revolt of Samos, dispatch away thither sixty saile of ships, well furnished; whereof sixteen went partly towards Caria, to encounter the Phœnician fleet in those parts, and partly into Chios and Lesbos, to take in aides from thence, the other 44 vessels continued with Pericles the Ammiral and his 9 collegues. The Samians hereupon recall their 20 saile of ships, which they had sent all full of souldiers to assault Miletus, and joyning to them 50 saile more, fought with the 44 ships of the Athenians, near an Island called Tragia, and had there the worst of it. From whence the Athenians, having a supply of 40 saile more from home, and 25 more by way of aid from Chios and Lesbos, went and landed with their forces, in the Isle of Samos, and getting the better of it there also, they possessed themselves of the Haven, and having drawn a treble ditch about the city by land, they barred up the Haven with their ships.

A few dayes after, Pericles understanding by letters out of Caria, and Caunus, that the Phænician fleet, was coming towards him, to the relief of Samos, he, leaving a part of his army to maintain the siege, took with him 60 saile out of the Navy; and went to encounter them, with all the speed he could possibly make, and with him went Stesagoras with five ships of Samos, and others, to meet with the Phænician Navy.

The Samians taking advantage of the absence of Pericles, by the perswasion and leading of Melissus, the son of Ithogenes; a singular Philosopher, suddenly sallied out upon the Athenian camp, which was neither fenced nor manned, as it ought to have been; and having sunk the ships which kept the Haven, fought with the land forces in the open field, and routed them; and hereby, having an open sea, for 14 dayes space, they freely imported and exported, what they would, without impeachment.

Pericles, hearing what had befallen his men at Samos, made back thitherward, as fast as conveniently he could, encreased his fleet; and when Thucidides, Agnon—— and Phormio, were come to him with 40 saile, and Tlepolemus and Anticles, with 20 ships more from Athens; and those of Chios and Mitylene had sent him 30 saile, with these great forces, he set upon Melissus, and overthrew him in the field, and then fell to besiege the town it self by land and sea, as afore, and harassed them with frequent assaults on every side: insomuch, that some say, those engines of Battrie, as Rams, and Vines, and Galleries, were there first invented, by one Artemon, of Clazomena: which Artemon the Engineer, Ephorus the Historian doth unskilly confound with Artemon Periphresus, of whom Anacreon the Poet, in his verses (recited by Athenæus lib. 12.) maketh mention, [Thucid. lib. 1, Diod. Sic. in the 4 year of 84 Olympiade, and Plut. in the life of Pericles.]

3565. After 9 moneths siege, the Samians gave up the town, which was forthwith dismantled, they gave hostages also for their fidelity in time to come, they gave up all their shipping, and paid for the expense of the war, according to an enstalment then made. Those of Byzantium also came in, and submitted to the Athenian government as before, [Thucid. lib. 1.] 4275.

3566. Spartacus succeded Archæanactides, in the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimmerius, [Diod. the third year of the 85 Olympiade.] 4276

3571. Spartacus died, whom Diodorus Siculus, in the 4 year of the 86 Olympiade, affirmeth then to have reigned 17 years; and in the 3 year of the 85 Olympiade, he affirmeth him to have reigned 17 years, when as yet the interval between these two Olimpic years assigned by him, the one to the beginning, the other to the end of his reign, make up but five, or at most (both parts being included) but six years of his reign; after him succeded Seleucus. 4281.

3572. At Athens, in the year when Apseudes was Archon or President, and in the last year, almost compleat of the 86 Olympiade, Meton observed the summer solstice, to be upon the 21 day of the Egyptian moneth, Phamenoth (or the 27 day of June, according to the Julian Calendar) in the morning, [Ptolomy, in his Mag. Syntax lib. 3, cap. 2.] and thereupon framed the Cyclus Punaris, or the circle of the moon, which we call the Golden number, of 19 years, [Diod. Sic. the fourth year, of the 85 Olympiade, deducing the begining of this Cycle, from the new moon next following that Solstice, or the 15 day of July, according to the Julian account. 4282

3573. Arcesilaus was kill'd by the Cyrenians his own subjects; and was the 8 king in that state. And the man which in the 3 year of the 73 Olympiade, wan the 31 Pythian race with his chariot; and which is so much renowned for it by Pindarus, in his 4 and and 5 Ode. whom when his son would have succeded, he was put by, by the Syrenians; whereupon he sailed into the Hesperides, or western Islands, and there died: and so that kingdom of Cyrenia, which had stood 200 years, four of the name of Battus, and four of the name of Archelaus, enterchangeably succeding each the other therein, according to the oracle at Delphos, reported by Herod, [lib. 4. cap. 163.] came to an end, [Scholiast. Pind. in Od. 4. Pythion.] 4283.

The

The 1 year of 87 Olympiade drawing to an end, when there were but two months left of the Prætorship of Pythodorus of Athens, in the beginning of the spring, began the war which is called the Peloponesian war, between the Lacedemonians and the Athenians: wherein the Nations inhabiting all along the coast of Asia, sided with the Athenians; as the Carians, the Dores, the Ionians, those of Hellespont, and all the Islanders adjoyning, except those only, which inhabited the two Islands of Melos, and Thera: But both parties sent their Embassies to Artaxerxes, to crave his aide, [Thucid. lib. 2.]

In the beginning of this war, there flourished 3 noble Historiographers, Hellanicus, of the age of 65. Herodotus 53. and Thucidides 40 years old; as A. Gellius, in his 15 book, cap. 23. reporteth out of Pamphilia, [lib. 11.] of which Thucidides wrote the full history of this war, to the 21 year thereof; diligently setting down all things done therein, by winters and summers: beginning every summer from the first of the spring; and every winter from the first of Autumne.

In the first summer of this war, there fell so great an enclipse of the sun, that the stars appeared in the firmament, [Thucid. lib. 2.] which bred a great terror in all mens minds as a sad and great prodigie in the world, But Pericles, seeing the Master of the ship wherein he was, overtroubled thereat, cast his cloak over his eyes, and asked him whether he were afraid at that? or whether he thought it portended any great matter or no; and when he said, no: why, replyed Pericles, what difference is between this covering of the sun, and that, save only, that, that which causeth this darknesse, is greater than my cloak? [Plutarch in the life of Pericles:] and thereupon entered into a discourse concerning the eclipses of the sun and moon, and their motions, by which they come, according as he had heard and learned from his Master Anaxagoras; and perswaded his fellow citizens, not to trouble themselves, with a vain and needlesse fear, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 11.] And that this year also, upon the 3 day of August, at 5 a clock in the after-noone, the son was eclipsed at Athens, to about the quantity of 10 digits, the Astronomical account plainly demonstrates.

3574. A fearful plague, beginning first in Ethiopia, and thence spreading it self into the parts 4284. 430.
of Lybia and Egypt, and especially into the regions of the Persian dominion, came at last, and lay very sore upon the City of Athens in the 2 year of this war; [Thucid. l. 2.] where he setteth down historically, the kind and manner of this plague; as he might well do, having himself been taken with it, and oft in company with those who were sick thereof: and what he doth historically; that doth Hippocrates as a Physitian, as living then in Athens, and was imployed in the curing of sundry persons, afflicted therewith, [lib. 3. Epidem. Sect. 3.] but poetically, Lucretius, who lived many ages after, hath set it forth, and painted it to the life.

In a town of the Colophonians, called Notium, upon a sedition raised among themselves, Itamenes and his Median soldiers, being called in by one of the sides, came and possessed himself, of the strongest part of the town, [Thucid. lib. 3.]

In the later end of this summer, Aristeas, the son of Adimantus a Corinthian, and the Embassadors of the Lacedemonians, Aneristus, and Nicolaus, and Patrodemus, and Timagoras of Tegrea, and Polis of Argos, in his own name, taking their journey into Asia towards Artaxerxes, to entreat of him aide of men and mony for the war, took Thrace in their way, and came to Sitalces the king thereof, the son of Tereas: But when they thought to passe the Hellespont, and to go to Pharnaces the son of Pharnatacus, hoping by him to be convoyed and brought to Artaxerxes, they were betrayed by Sadocus, the son of Sitalces the king, and Nymphodorus of Abdera, the son of Pytheus, and were all taken and carried to Athens: and the Athenians without judgment, or hearing them so much as speak, when they would have said something for themselves, the selfsame day they came, caused them all to be kill'd, and throwne into a ditch, [Thucid. l. 2. with Herod. l. 7, c. 137.]

3575. The winter following, the Athenians, sent six ships, into Caria; under the command 4285 429 of Melesandrus, both to gather what mony they could in those parts, and to scoure the seas from pirates and robbers, who out of Peloponesus, were wont to take up poor Merchants ships with their loadings, which traded along the coast of Phaselis, Phenice, and other ports of the continent. But Melesandrus, with his Athenians, and other confederates, not keeping the sea, but going a land in Licia, was there met, and fought withall, and slain, with a great part of his army, [Thucid. lib. 2.]

3575 Seleucus, the king of Bosphorus Cimmerius, died, having held that principality 4 years 429
[Diod. 4 year of the 86 Olympiade.] after whom, as it seemeth, Spartacus the 2. reigned, and 4285. 428.
he continued 22 years.

3576. Pericles died, the 4 year of 87 Olympiade, [Diod. l. 12.] 2 years and 6 months after the beginning of the Peloponesian war, whereof himself had been the chief occasion, [Thucid. 4286. 428.
lib. 2.] and when he had continued Prince of the Athenian state, 40 years, [Cic. lib. 3. de oratore. and Plutarch in the life of Pericles.]

In the same year died Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, Pericles his master, who was born in the 70 Olympiade, and died in the first year of the 88 Olympiade, as Laertius in his life reporteth, out of Apollodorus his Chron. though it be there miswritten, Olympiade 78. Where he also addeth, that the men of Lampsacus, bestowed on him, an honourable burial, with this Epitaph, recorded also by Elian, [lib. 8. Var. Histor. cap. ult.] upon his tomb.

Great Anaxagoras lies hear in mold,
Who did all secrets of the Heavens unfold.

3577. In the winter season of the fourth year of the Peloponesian war, the Athenians sent 12 ships, commanded by Lysicles, and four commissioners with him, to collect their tribute from their confederate cities. Lysicles, as he went from place to place to gather moneys, at last going from Myus, thorough Caria, the Carians, and Anæitæ rose suddenly upon him out of an Ambuscado, and slew both him, and the greatest part of his army, [Thucid. lib. 3.] 4287

Alcides commander of the Lacedemonian fleet, coming to the foreland of Myonesus, in the countrey of the Teii, put to death there the greatest part of the Greeks, whom he had taken prisoners out of Asia: but when he was come to Ephesus, some messengers sent unto him, by the Samians, which were of the Anæitæ, told him that he took a wrong way to deliver the Greek nation out of servitude and thraldom, if he purposed to destroy such, as neither ever bare arms against him, nor were his enemies; but onely were forced to pay contribution, to the Athenians: whereupon he spared the rest, and let them go.

A new broile rising between the old citizens, which dwelt in the base town of Notium, and those which had newly fled thither, these confideing in the power of such Arcadians, and other barbarians as Pissuthnes, the Governor of Lydia had sent them, drew a wall round about the upper town, for a fortification against the base town, and confederating with those Colophonians, who dwelling in the upper town, took part with the Medes, made one Common-wealth with them. But the other side sent for Pachetes, a captain of the Athenians to come and help them; who when he came, desired Hippias, whom Pissuthnes, had made captain of the Arcadians in the fort to come forth to a parlee, covenanting with him, that if they could not agree, he should return safe and sound into the fort again, whereupon he came forth: but so soon as he came, Pachetes took, and committed him to safe custody, yet without manacles or fetters; and setting presently upon the fort took it, and put all whom they found therein to the sword, as well Arcadians as Barbarians; and last of all, to keep his word with Hippias he let him come safe and sound into the fort; but so soon as he was come, laid hold on him again, and shot him to death with arrows, so he restored Notium to the Colophonians, save to those, who had taken part with the Medes. Afterward the Athenians sent a plantation thither of their own, and governed the place, according to their own laws, gathering together as many of the Colophonians out of all parts, as they could find to inhabit it, [Thucid. lib. 3. Polya. Stratag. lib. 3.]

3579 3578. Artaxerxes sent Artaphernes, a Persian Ambassador, with a letter written in the Assyrian language, to Lacedemon: wherein, among other things signified to them, that he knew not what they would have, nor what their meaning or intention was; for that they had sent unto him a multitude of Ambassadors: but no one of them agreed with another; werefore if they would have him to understand their minds, they should send some men of their own unto him, with the bearer thereof, [Thucid lib. 4.] 4289.

d. Artaxerxes, in the interim died, and his son Xerxes succeeded him, onely for one year, [Diod. Sic. the 4 year of the 88 Olympiade.] whose mother Damaspia, died the same day, that Xerxes, or rather, that her husband Artaxerxes (as the sequele sheweth) did; and Bagorazus the Eunuch carried the corps, both of father and mother into Persia, [Ctesias.]

3580. a. In the winter of the seventh year of the Peloponesian water, Aristides, the son of Archippus, one of the captains which were sent from Athens, to gather the tribute of their confederetes, lighted upon Artaphernes the Persian Ambassador, as he was going to Lacedemon, at a place called Etone, upon the river strimon, and brought him prisoner to Athens, whom the Athenians presently shipt away, and sent him back to Ephesus, and an Ambassador of their own with him; but coming thither, and hearing there, that Artaxerxes was lately dead, they returned home again, [Thucid. lib. 4.] 4290

b. In the beginning of the next summer, Thucidides sayes, there was a little Eclips of the Sun, beginning, as his manner is the Summer, from the first of the spring, for that upon the 21 day of March, according to the Julian Calendar, toward the end of the fourth 4269.

fourth year of the 88 Olympiade, in the forenoon, the Sun was more than half over eclipsed, the Prutenian account sheweth.

The Banditoes of Mitylene, after their city was taken by the Athenians, joyning with the Banditoes of Lesbos, and hiring some others out of Peloponesus, went in a great body and took Rhætium; and having received of them a round summe of money, spared the City: and from thence went to Antandrus and took that by intelligence within: for their purpose from the beginning was to set at liberty, as sundry other Cities of the country called Actæa, (which formerly was held by the Mitylenians, but was then possessed by the Athenians,) so especially Antandrus; to the end that having fortified it, they might there build them shipping enough, as having the hill Ida, and store of timber from thence at hand: and hoped with that and other provision, to get Lesbos, and other Cities of Eolia, in the Continent, into their possession. [Thucid. lib. b. 4.]

c. At the same time, Aristides and Demodocus, whom Diodorus calleth Symmachus, Captains of the Athenian Navy, lay in Hellespont, gathering of their tribute; whiles Lamachus, their third Captain, was gone with ten ships into Pontus. They therefore hearing that the Mitylenians purposed to fortifie Antandrus; gathered an army of their confederates, and set sail thitherward; and when the enemy sallied out from thence, foiled them in the field; and gat the Town again. But Lamachus who was gone into Pontus, coming into the mouth of the river Caleces, (which Diodorus calls Cachetes) in Heracleotis, leaving their ships at an anchor, there went and spoiled all the country about Heraclea, which in favour of the Persian, had refused to pay contribution to the Athenians. But when upon the falling of a great raine the river swol, and ran with a mighty current, and drave their ships upon the rocky shoar, he there wholy lost his Fleet, and a great part of his army besides. Wherefore when by sea he could not, having lost his ships, and by land durst not with so small a company return home, thorough so many fierce & warlick Nations as lay in his way; they of Heraclea, taking this occasion to gratifie them rather than to be revenged of them, and thinking the spoil of their country well bestowed, if they might thereby purchase them for friends, which were before their foes, sent them away fairly, with all manner of provision for their journey homeward. So Lamachus, with the company which he had left, went over land thorough the country of the Thracians, which dwelt in Asia side, and came safely to Chalcedon. [Thucid. lib. 4. Diodor. lib. 12. Justin lib. 16. cap. 3.]

d. When Xerxes, upon a Festival day had drunk himself stark drunk, and was laid asleep in his chamber, his brother Secundianus, begotten upon Aloguna, a Babylonish woman, and Pharnacyas an Eunuch, came in upon him, and murdered him. [Ctesias.]

Secundianus, who had a long time born a grudge to Bagoras the Eunuch, picking a quarrel with him for burying his fathers body without his advise taken therein, commanded him to be stoned to death: which act of his the army took very ill; and although he bestowed large monies among them, yet what for this, what for the murder of his brother, they ever hated him. [Ctesias.]

3581. Ochus, whom his father Artaxerxes had made Governour of Hyrcania, being sent 4291. 423.
d. for by his Brother Secundianus to come unto him, sent word he would, but came not; and this he often did: but at length, gathered a mighty army, and intended for the kingdom. Arbarius who was General of the Horse to Secundianus, fell over unto Ochus: and Arxanes the Governour of Egypt did the like. Artoxares also, out of Armenia came unto him in person, and whether he would or no, set the Cidaris, (i.) the Crown upon his head. [Ctesias.]

b. Thus Ochus was made King, and called himself from thence forward Darius: and by the advice of Parysatis, his wife and sister, tried first what he could do with his brother Secundianus by fair words and oaths: But Menostharies, who was the greatest man with him among all his Eunuchs, was earnest with him not to believe his oaths, nor have any treaty with faithlesse men: yet Secundianus, came to a treaty, and was there laid hold on; and being thrown into a heap of ashes, there died, [Ctesias] of which kind of punishment, see more before, in the year of the World, 3485. b. and in 2 Maccabees, [cap. 13. 5, 6.]

When Scundianus, al. Sogdianus, was now dead, then reigned Ochus alone, known by the name of Darius Nothus toward the later end of the first year of 89 Olimpiade; as appears by [Thucidides, lib. 8. and Diodor. 3 year of 89 Olympiade.]

3582. When the men of Delos were driven out of their country by the Athenians, Pharnaces gave them Adramyttium in Asia for a dwelling place. [Thucid. lib. 5. Diod. 3 year 89 Olympiade.] 4292. 422.

3583. The Athenians, by command of the Oracle at Delphos, restored those of Delos to their Island again. [Thucid. lib. 5.] 4293. 421.

army into Bithynia, and having wasted the country, and forced many of the lesser towns, used there unmeasurable cruelties: for having gotten together an huge multitude of men women and children, they butchered them every one, [Diod. 1 year of 91 Olympiade.]

3589. Jubilie 21. which was the last that ever the Prophets of the Old Testament saw: for that place in [Nehem. 12. 22.] is not to be understood of Darius the last, but of this Darius Nothus, in whose time [Nehemiah cap. 12. 22.] signifieth, that Johananes, called also Johannes and Jonathan, obtained the High-Priesthood after his father Joiada, (whom Josephus calleth Judas) and that Jadduas his son, who succeeded his father in the Priesthood, was then also born; but these things Nehemiah mentions onely by the way: his full History ending with the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the father of this Darius, of whom Josephus [lib. 1. cont. Apion.] speaketh in this wise: From the death of Moses, to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, who succeeded Xerxes; the Prophets comprised what passed in their times in 13 books; but from Artaxerxes to our time, all things indeed have been likewise committed to writing, but not held to be of like credit with the former: because the succession of the Prophets one after another, hath been uncertain; and Euseb. in Chron. in the 32 of this Artaxerxes, with whom the continued History of Nehemia ended; Hitherto, saith he, the Divine Scriptures of the Hebrews contain the Annals, or year books of the times: but those things which were done among them after this time, we must deliver out of the books of the Maccabees, and out of the writings of Josephus and Africanus; who have delivered a general History of things done among them down to the Roman times. 4299

But that Malachie the last of the Prophets, was contemporary with Nehemia, they gather from hence; to wit, for that he no where exhorts the people to the building of the Temple, as Haggai and Zachary did: but the Temple being now built, he reproves those disorders which Nehemiah at his second return with a new Commission from Babylon, in the last Chapter of his book saith he found to have in his absence crept in among the Jews: as marriage with strange women, [cap. 11. 11.] withholding of tithes, [cap. 3. 8.] and abuses in the worship of God, [cap. 1. 13. cap. 2. 8.] And because they were no longer now to expect a perpetual succession of Prophets, as before; Malachie therefore in the last words of his Prophecy exhorteth them, that they should hold them fast to the law of Moses, until Christ that Great Prophet of the Church should appear, whose forerunner John the Baptist, should first come, in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to their children, and the rebells to the wisdom of the just, [Mal. 4. 4.] compared with [Luke 1. 17. Math. 11. 14. and cap. 17. 12.] to which hath reference that of Jerom [lib. 13. of his Comment. upon Esay cap. 49.] After Haggai, and Zachary and Malachie, saith he, I see no other Prophets till John the Baptist. See [1 Maccab. 4. 46. and cap. 9. 17. and August. de Civit. Dei lib. 17. cap. 24.]

We read indeed in the book of Pirke Abbeth, that, The men of the great Synagogue succeeded the Prophets: though the Jews of later times reckon, even Haggai, Zachary, and Malachie, among them, and make Ezra the President and Head of this Sanedrin, or great Syagogue, or Concil.

3590. Pissuthnes the Governour of Lydia, revolted from Darius; and therefore Tissaphernes, Spitradates, and Pharmises, were sent against him. And Pissuthnes went to meet them, having with him Lycon an Athenian, with such Grecians as he had under his command: But the Kings Commanders bribed Lycon and his Greeks, and drew them off from Pissuthnes, and then drew in Pissuthnes himself, upon promise to bring him safe to the King, which they did. But he presently bad, Away with him to the Ash-heap: and bestowed his Government upon Tissaphernes: and Lycon, for a reward of his treachery, had whole Cities and Countries bestowed upon him. [Ctesias.] 4300.

Eusebius in his Chron. noteth that Egypt fell off from the Persian, and that Amyrtæus Saites reigned there 6 years: which seemeth to be the same Amirtæus, which Herodotus writeth of, [lib. 2. cap. 140. and lib. 3. cap. 15.] where he sheweth that he did the Persians a thousand mischiefs.

3591. In the 19 Summer of the Peloponesian war, when Nicias would have drawn off his army in a night from before the walls of Syracusæ in Sicily, there suddenly appeared an Eclipse of the Moon, about ten of the clock at night, in the moneth Metageiton; upon the 27 of August, according to the Julian Calender; at the sight whereof he was so affrighted, that he forbare drawing off, for that time, and by a little more delay used thereupon, he lost himself and his whole army, [Thucid. lib. 7. Polyb. lib. 9. Diod. Sic. an. 4. 91. Olympiade, Plin. lib. 2. cap. 12. Plutarch in the life of Nicias, and in his book, De Superstitione.] 4301.

The winter following, two Governours of Darius, upon the sea coast in the lesser Asia, Tissaphernes of Lydia, and Pharnabazus of Hellespont, seeking to recover the old tribute from the Grecian Cities lying within their severall Govern-

Governments, which the Athenians had of late forbidden them to pay unto the King, dealt with them under hand, to fall off from the Athenians: and withal sollicting the Peloponesians in general to make a fresh war upon the Athenians, moved the Lacedemonians in special to confederate and joyn in armes with the king against them: when the Athenians power was thus weakned in Asia; upon whom Pissuthnes had founded all his hopes, Tissaphernes sought by all means how to get Amorges, a bastard son of Pissuthnes, who had taken up arms in Caria, into his hands; and, as he was commanded, to send him alive or dead to the king. But finding at this present, that the Citizens of Chios and Erythræ, were ready to revolt from the Athenians, he sent his messenger with theirs to Lacedemon, there to negotiate the matter; by the joynt advice of both, [Thucid. lib. 9.]

At the same time Calligetus and Timagoras the one of Megara, the other of Cyzicum, each banished out of his own countrey, came to Lacedemon, sent indeed by Pharnabazus, who had enterteined them, during the time of their exilement, but in the name of the inhabitants of Cyzicum, to get shipping of them, to carry into Hellespont. And when the messagers of Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, made each of them his suit a part from the other, the Lacedemonians were thereupon extremely divided among themselves: some advising that Ionia and Chios should first be holpen; other that Hellespont; but in the end, the Petition of Tissaphernes and the Chii carried it; and the rather, by the help of Alcibiades, who standing at that time a condemned man at Athens, lived at Sparta, in house with Endius, one of the Ephori, his fathers old acquaintance, wherefore having made a confederacy with the Chii and Erythræans, they presently ordered 40 saile of ships to be sent away to their succor. But Calligetus and Timagoras, who were there in the behalf of Pharnabazus, and the men of Cyzicum, would contribute nothing toward the setting out of this fleet to Chios; nor would lay out the 25 talents which they had brought with them to hire ships for themselves that way; because they had a purpose shortly to prepare a fleet of their own, [Id. Ib.]

3592. In the 20 summer of the Peloponesian war, Alcibiades an Athenian, and Chalcideus a Lacedemonian, were sent by Endius, and the rest of the Ephori, with five ships into Ionia, to draw the Greek cities there off from the Athenian party: and coming speedily to Corycum, by such perswasions as they used, they prevailed first with the Chii, then with the Erythreans openly to revolt from the Athenians: and then going with three ships to Clazomenæ, draw them also over from the Athenian party: and those of Clazomenæ, putting over presently into the continent adjoyning, there built a strong fort, that if need were, they might there have a place to retire unto out of their poor Island: and in like manner all that revolted from the Athenians, fell in hand presently, with fortifications, and other preparatives for the war, [Thucid. l. b. 8.] 4302.

Strombichides, a Commander of the Athenians, coming with 8 ships to Samos, and taking with him one more from thence, sailed to Teus, and perswaded them, not to enter into any practise against the Athenians. Chalcideus also came thither with 23 saile of ships; and had with him some foot companies of the Clazomenians and Erythreans. The Teians, though at first refused to receive those foot, yet when they saw the Athenians fled and gone, took them in: who having a while expected the return of Chalcideus from the chase of the Athenians, and he not returning, they of their own heads, threw down the wall which the Athenians had made to the land-ward, with the assistance of certain others which came to help them, under the command of Tages Tissaphernes his Livetenant. Chalcideus and Alcibiades, having pursued Strombichides, as far as to Samos, taking with them 20 ships more from Chios, sailed to Miletus, and by the means of Alcibiades, who had great acquaintance with the chief men there, perswaded them also to fall off from the Athenians, and when the Athenians followed them thither, but were kept out by the Milesians, they retreated to an Island called Lada, lying over against Miletus. [Ib.]

After this revolt of the Milesians, the first association of the Lacedemonians and the Persians was concluded and made, by Tissaphernes and Chalcideus, upon this condition, that what ever cities the Persians did then hold, or heretofore had held, should continue still in their power, [Ibid.]

The Chii therefore presently to know how the squares went at Miletus, and with all to induce other cities to the like revolt, from the Athenians, bent their course with ten ships to Anæa, a city in Caria: but being called back by Chalcideus, because Amorges Pissuthnes his sonne, was drawing down thitherward, with his land forces, they came to a place called Dios-hieron, a small town, in Ionia; where, espying a fleet of 16 saile of the Athenians, sent from thence under the command of Diomedon to joyn with Thrasicles, they dispersed themselves, and one ship of them came to Ephesus, the rest to Teus, but four of them fell into the Athenians hands: yet nothing but the bare hulls, for the men were got to land, the rest of the ships came safe to Teus. After this when the Athenians were gone to Samos, the Chii pursued their purpose, with the remainder of their Fleet and Forces, and drew over to their party Lebedus and Eras, cities of Ionia, [Ib.]

After the Foot companies of the Chii, were departed from Teus, Tissaphernes, coming thither with his army, pulled down what was left of the walls of Teus, and departed: and no sooner was he gone, but Diomedon, with ten sail of Athenians came thither; and agreed with the Teians to receive him too: and going from thence to Eras, when he had tried, and could not force it, went his way, [Ib.]

The Athenians, having taken the Fort, which the Clazomenians had built in the Continent, made them go back again into their own Island, all save the heads of that revolt, who went to Daphnus: and so the Clazomenians returned into the obedience of the Athenians, [ib.]

c. In the same Summer, the Athenians with 20 sail which lay at Lada against Miletus, landing at Panormus, and lighting there upon Chalcideus, the Lacedemonian slenderly accompanied, slew him, and all that were with him; and returning thence the third day after, erected a Trophie in memory of what they had there done: which the Milesians, as set up by those who had not mastered the country, demolished, [ib.]

In the end of that Summer, the Athenians with 1500. Corselets, and 1000. men out of Argos, and as many of their other confederates, with 48 ships, commanded by Phrynichus, and Onomacles, and Saronidas, sailed into Samos first, and from thence set sail for Miletus; and landing there, sate down before it with their army. Against them went out 800. of the Milesians themselves, all Corselets; and Alcibiades, with those companies which Chalcideus had brought out of Peloponesus, and certain companies of forreign nation which followed Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes himself with his Horse. The Argivi which led the Van in the wing where they were, trusting over much to their valour, were wholy routed by the Milesians, whom they vilified and contemned as being but Ionians, and lost 300. upon the place: yet the Athenians had the better of the day: and therefore setting up a Trophie in the field, set themselves to besiege the city, seated as it was, in a peninsula or neck of land: but when news was brought that a Fleet out of Sicily and Peloponesus was upon the sea thitherward, by the advice of Phrynicus, they drew off, and returned to Samos, [Ibid.]

The Fleet when it came, with the ships of Chios which had formerly been beaten with Chalcideus by the enemy, at the entreaty of Tissaphernes, set upon Jasos: where Amorges the base son of Pissuthnes, (who had revolted from the King) then kept himself. The Peloponesians under the command of Astyochus the Ammiral, to whom Theramenes a Lacedemonian had brought that Fleet, and the Syracusans (who made principal proof of their valour in this service under their General Hermocrates) setting suddenly upon the Jasians, who thought they had been friends, surprised them, and took the city. The Peloponesians having therein taken Amorges alive, delivered him up to Tissaphernes, to send him to Darius, if he pleased. The city Jasos it self, which long peace had made to abound with all plenty, they sacked, and made a vast booty of it: The companies which Amorges had there in pay, they saved, and because most of them were Peloponesians borne, they listed them among themselves: but the Town it self they gave over to Tissaphernes, with all the persons thereof, bound and free, taking for every head of them half a crown; and returning from thence to Miletus, they convoyed Pædaritus, who was sent by the Lacedemonians as Governour to Chios, overland, with the companies belonging to Amorges, as far as Erythræ, and left Philippus, Governour of Miletus, [Ibid.]

d. The Winter following Tissaphernes, having put a Garrison into Jassos, came to Miletus, and there according to promise made at Lacedemon; paid them and their fellows, the monies which were due, which was a drachma of Athens, upon every head; and agreed with them for a standing pay, in time to come, [Ib.]

Astyochus the Ammiral of the Lacedemonian Fleet with ten ships of Lacedemon, and as many of Chios, having in vain for a while besieged the city Ptelcum, put over to Clazomenæ, and there commanded such as favoured the Athenian party to leave the place, and go and dwell in Daphnus: which was the command also upon them laid by Tamos Lieutenant of Ionia; which when they refused to do, he set upon the Town; being but an open burgade: yet not being able to carry it by assault, he left it and went his way: But meeting with a strong wind at sea, he himself came safe to Phocæa and Cuma, but the rest of his ships, were driven ashoar upon the Isles lying before Clazomenæ, Marathusa, Pela, and Drymissa: where they lay 8 dayes for the violence of the tempest, and there spent and spoiled what they pleased of such goods as the Clazomenians had transported thither for fear of the war; and the rest they put aboard their ships, and carried away, and came to Astyochus at Phocæa and Cuma, [Ibid.]

The same Winter, Hippocrates of Lacedemon, setting sail from Peloponesus with ten ships of the Thurians, commanded by Dorieus and two others in commission with him, and one of Laconica, and another of Syracusæ, came to Cnidus, which had now revolted revolted from Tissaphernes, whereof so soon as the Milesians heard, they presently sent unto Hippocrates, by all means to leave one half of his ships in garrison at Cnidus, and to go with the rest, and surprize certain ships laden with Marchandise from Egypt, lying at Triopium, which is a foreland of Cnidia; and the Athenians hearing thereof, went from Samos, and surprized the six ships which lay at Triopium, as a garrison to the places, but the Marriners were got out of them, and so left them nothing but the hulls: and then coming to Cnidus, missed but little of surprizing it, at the first onset, being but an open bourgade without walls; but being put off for that time, their purpose was, to try again the next day: but the Cnidians having cast up some works about the place that night, and they which were forced a shoare at Triopium, coming thither also, the thing grew harder to do now, than it was before, wherefore having wasted the countrey, they returned to Samos, [Ibid.]

3593. When the league concluded between Chalcideus, and Tissaphernes, was judged at Sparta, not to be right, and pinch a little on the Lacedemonians side, another form was drawn up, between the Lacedemonians and their confederates on the one side, and Darius and his sons, and Tissaphernes on the other, in clearer terms than the former was, and subscribed, in the presence of Theramenes of Lacedæmon; after which Theramenes, having given up the charge of the Navy to Astyochus, put himself aboard a little Skiff, and went his way, [Ibid.] 4303 411

The business, which Pharnabasus, (who was Governour for the king in Hellespont) had sent Calligetus of Megara, and Timagoras of Cyzicum about to Sparta, was there granted, according as he desired, and 27 saile of ships were sent under the command of Antisthenes a Lacedemonian, in the depth of winter from Peloponesus into Ionia, The Lacedemonians also sent 11 Commissioners of theirs (whereof one was Lycas, the son of Arcesilaus) to be of councel with Astyochus, in the management of this war, one of their instructions was, that when they came to Miletus, they should send of these 27 ships, all or some, more or lesse, as they should see cause into Hellespont, to Pharnabazus, and make Clearchus Commander of those they thought fit to send, and further, that, if they saw cause, they should remove Astyochus (who was drawn into some suspition upon Pedaritus his information by letters against him,) from the charge of the Navy, and put Antisthenes in his room. Now these Commissioners loosing from Malea, a port in Peloponesus, came first to the Island of Melus; and from thence fetcht a further compasse about, that they might go in the lesse danger of the enemie, and landed at Caunus in Asia, [Ibid.]

Astyochus coming to Cnidus, hasted from thence to meet with the Athenian fleet, which waited for the Peloponesian ships coming from Caunus, where they were safely arrived: and meeting with them, they fought, where the Athenians gave at first the enemy a blow, but receiving a far greater one in the second fight from them, they retired, and came to Halicarnassus: and the Peloponesians as conquerers, returned to Cnidus. The Athenians after this, came to an Island called Sima, where they had received their overthrow; with all their fleet, and yet durst not attempt any thing upon the Lacedemonian navy, which lay at Cnidus, but taking in onely some tackle and furniture from Sima, and having done something against Lorymæ, in the continent, they returned again to Samos, [Ibid.]

When all the Peloponesian Navy was come together at Cnidus, consisting in all of 94 ships; the 11 Commissioners debated with Tissaphernes of matters aleady transacted, if they found fault with any thing therein, and how the war for the future might be carryed on, for the best advantage on both sides, but especially Lichas, considering what had passed, said, that neither of the two leagues, no, not that which was made with Theramenes, was as it should be, for that it was a thing not to be endured, that the king should hold all those countreys which he or his ancestors had held; for by this reason, said he, all the Islands, and all Thessaly, and Locri, and consequently, all Bæothia, must all fall again into the kings power, and the Lacedemonians, instead of freeing the Greek cities, must help to enslave them to the power of the Persian more than ever; and therefore, that they must fall to a new draught & form of a league between them, or vacate this, and never ask nor receive Stipend more of the king of Persia, by vertue of this that was already made; whereupon Tissaphernes growing into cholor, brake up the treaty, and went his way, [Ibid.]

Now when letters came from the Peloponesians to Astiochus, that he should make away Alcibiades, for that they had him in suspition, and he was a professed enemy to Agis the king of Lacedemon, Alcibiades getting an incling thereof, withdrew himself secretly, and fled over to Tissaphernes, and perswaded with him, not to make such large allowance of Stipend to the peloponesian Navy; but rather hold matters in such a ballance, that neither they might subvert the state of the Athenians, nor the Athenians theirs; and so when they had wearied and worn out each other with a war, both in the end might easily be brought into the kings subjection. Hereupon Pisander and ten ten other Ambassadors with him, sent by the people of Athens, to treat with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades, upon such terms, as to them should seem meetest for the Commonwealth, and benefit of both, of whom Alcibiades in Tissaphernes his name made such vast demands, as though they yielded to many of them, yet were they fain at last to break off without doing any thing, for he demanded that they should surrender into the kings hands, all Ionia, with the Islands adjacent thereunto: and when they had yeilded thereunto, then he demanded, that the king might make what ships he would, and where he would, and that he might passe and repasse by their coast as often, and with as many ships in a fleet as he pleased. But then the Athenians conceiving these demands to be intolerable, and themselves abused by Alcibiades, brake up in a rage, and returned to Samos, [Ibid.]

b. After this, toward the end of this winter season, Tissaphernes went to Caunus, purposing to recall the Lacedemonian Commissioners back to Miletus, and to make them take their pay again, upon any conditions, least they should turn flat enemies against him: when they came, he paid them down all their arrears: and made a third league with them: which began thus,

In the 13 year of the reign of Darius, when Alexipidas was Ephorus, (i. e.) agreements were made, in the field of Maander, between the Lacedemonians, and their confederates on the one side, and Tissaphernes and Hieramenes, and the sonnes of Pharnacus on the other, concerning the affairs of the king, and of the Lacedemonians and their confederates, to wit, That what countrey soever in Asia is the kings, that let him hold still, and of his own countreys, let him dispose as he will, &c. But concerning the paiment of their yearly stipend it was thus agreed, That Tissaphernes should pay the fleet that then was there, till the kings own ships came, and after they were come, then the Lacedemonians and their confederates, should maintain their own navy if they would, but if they would rather have a stipend for it, then Tissaphernes should furnish it; but with condition, that upon the end of the war, they should refund all the moneys, which they had received, [Ibid.] from whence we may gather the full meaning of what Justin, [lib. 5. 1.] more concisely hath delivered, Darius the king of Persians, saith he, making a league with the Lacedemonians by Tissaphernes his Governour of Lydia, promised to bear all the charge of the war.

In the very beginning of the summer following, which began the 21 year of the Peloponesian war, Dercylidas, a Lacedemonian, is sent from Miletus over-land, with a small company into Hellespont, to stir up the city of Abydus, which was a colony or plantation of the Milesians to rebel against the Athenians: whereupon that city first, and two dayes after Lampsacus, fell off from them to Dercylides, and Pharnabazus.

Upon the first news whereof, Strombychides set saile out of Chios, with a fleet of 24 Athenian vessels, and came to Lesbos; and when the Lesbians, made a sally to encounter him, he routed them, and took the town at the first assault, being but an open bourgade, and having setled matters there, went to Abydus, but being there mansully repulsed, he put over to Sestos, and there placed a strong garrison for the defence of all the Hellespont, [Thucid. lib. 8.]

The whole Navy of the Athenians comming together at Samos, they there entered a covenant with the Samians, to joyn in the restoring of the Popular estate in Athens, and to abolish the Junto or Government of 400, newly there erect, and bound themselves with solemn oath for performance hereof; and appointed Thrasibulus and Thrasyllus for captaines in this action; they consulted also of calling home Alcibiades, hoping by his means, to draw away Tissaphernes from the Lacedemonian party, and to gain the kings favour and assistance to themselves, [Id. ibid.]

Among the sea-men of the Peloponesians, which were at Miletus, there grew a grudge and murmuring against Tissaphernes, and Astyachus both; against Astyochus; for that he, when as heretofore they were strong in shipping, and the Athenians weak, would never fight with them at sea, nor to this day would, though it were known well enough unto him, what division there was among the Athenians: no, nor would ever so much as draw the Lacedemonian Navy into a body; and against Tissaphernes, for that he cared not to send for the Navy of the Phœnicians, according to his promise, nor payed them their stipends, but when pleased himself: and then but by halfs neither: when therefore they cried out to put the matter to a battaile; Astyochus and his confederates, commanded the Milesians to march over-land, to the fore-land of Micale, whiles they went about by sea, with their whole fleet, consisting of 112 ships, to the same place. But when the Athenians, which lay at Glauca, under Mycale, with eighty two ships, saw their fleet coming, they presently weighed ancor, and highed them away as fast as they could to Samos: yet when Strombichides with his fleet, hearing thereof, hasted him to come to their help out of Hellespont, the Peloponesians withdrew and returned to Miletus. And the Athenians, having now 108 ships together, all strong and well provided, followed them home to Miletus, and there going on land, ranged their army in the open field; but seeing that the Peloponesians would not

not come forth, they took sea again, and returned to Samos without stroke striking. After which, the Peloponesians, seeing they were not able to deale with the Athenians, with all the force they could make by sea; and not being able of themselves to pay so many seamen, especially when Tissaphernes, was so sparing and backward, in sending in their stipend, according to agreement; they sent away Clearchus with 40 of their ships into Hellespont, to Pharnabasus, who both desired their coming very earnestly and promised them pay very liberally, and many good offices besides, if they pleased to come, [Ib.]

Thrasybulus, going to Tissaphernes, brought over Alcibiades with him to Samos, where the army made him one of their chief commanders; and indeed committed the whole charge of things to his ordering: who being thus made, in a sort, General to the Athenian army, sailed back presently to Tissaphernes; that he might seem to communicate in all counsels with him; and handled matters so cunningly to his own advantage, that he could make the Athenians afraid of Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes of them, at his pleasure; [Ibid.]

And moreover wrought this effect in the Peloponesians which lay at Miletus, that he set them further out with Tissaphernes, than they were before, so that they began now to mutiny again, not only against him, but also against Astyochus: whom they charged of collusion with Tissaphernes for his own gain and advantage sake. And in this mangling it fell out that the Mariners of the Syracusian and Thurian companies cried, gelt, and demanded pay of Astyochus in a very sawcie and mutinous manner; and when he again answered them somewhat roughly, and with some menacing termes withal, and offered to bastinado Doricus, who commanded the Thurian squadron (though the Greek scholiast of Thucidides, understands hereby, Hermocrates, commander of the Syracusian squadron) for upholding his marriners, they, crying, One and All, ran in upon him; and had, no doubt, there made an end of him, had he not ran and saved himself at an altar there by. The Milesians also, making a head, got secretly into the fort or citadell, which Tissaphernes had built, and turning out the soldiers that were there in garrison, took it into their own hands: which was very well liked of by the rest, save only by Lychas the Lacedemonian, who said that the Milesians, and the rest under the kings dominion ought in duty to obey Tissaphernes so long as he governed so moderately as he did; and untill the war should receive a happy end. [Ibid.]

Whiles they were busie in this alteration, Pindarus arrived, sent from Lacedemon, to succeed Astyochus in the Ammiralty or command of the Navie: and he took it upon him, upon the surrender of Astyochus. When Astyochus took shipping to returne home to Lacedemon, Tissaphernes sent a messenger of his own along with him, one Gauletes, a Carian born, but one that could both the Greek and Persian tongue; who was both to charge the Milesians for surprising his citadel, and withall to clear him from those false aspersions, which the Milesians, and Hermocrates the Syracusian had cast upon him, for he well knew, that they would along too, and accuse him for conspiring with Alcibiades against the Lacedemonian state; and for ficklenesse of minde toward them.

Tissaphernes seeing the Peloponesians bent against him, (among other things, for suffering Alcibiades to return to his own again) as one who now openly favored the Athenian party against them, went to Aspendus, where the Phenician fleet, consisting of 147 sail of ships, was now arrived to purge himself, as he thought: and took Lichas the Lacedemonian along with him, leaving his Agent Tamos with them, to see the stipend duly paid to the Peloponesian Navy, which yet was but so so performed by him: moreover the Peloponesians at Tissaphernes his request, sent Philippus a Lacedemonian, with two tall ships to Aspendus, there to take a view of the Phenician fleet. And Alcibiades, understanding that Tissaphernes was at Aspendus came with 13 sail to Caunus first, and then to Phaselis, promising every where to his friends huge supplies and aides in all kinds, and when he was returned to Samos, he informed them there, that he had wrought matters so, as that the Phenician fleet should not assist the Peloponesians, and that Histaphernes was now become more friend to the Athenian than ever; for true it was, that Tissaphernes met with the Phenicians at Aspendus, but would not let a saile of them go to the Peloponesians; putting them off with this idle excuse, that there were not so many ships come to him, as the k. had commanded: whereas indeed his purpose was, to hold both parties of the Greeks in suspence; and by siding with neither, to make them waste and consume one another, [Ib.]

The Junto or Government of 400 at Athens was dissolved, and 5000 put in their places; who by an Act of theirs, ratified, and confirmed the recalling of Alcibiades home, into his country, [Ibid.] and by the same order, was he joyned in Commission, though absent, with Thrasybulus, and Theramenes, and by their vallour, and vertue, the Athenian state, was in short time, much reformed and brought into better order than earst it was, [Emil. Prob. in the life of Alcibiades.]

Whiles

Whiles the Peloponesians linger out the time at Miletum, none of those, whom Tissaphernes, when he went for Aspendus, had left behind him, took care to pay the Navie, nor did Tissaphernes himself, of the fleet which he promised, come at them: and both Philippus, who was sent with Tissaphernes to Aspendus, wrote to Mindarus, who had the charge of things belonging to the Navie, and so did Hippocrates from Phaselis, that he should not look for any supply of ships, or any thing else that good was, from Tissaphernes his hand: But on the contrary, Pharnabazus, who served the king, in the parts of Helespont, shewed them all the favour and friendship, that could be imagined: For he both sollicited their coming, and of his own accord, moved all the Greek cities within his Province, to fall off from the Athenians (which Tissaphernes would have seemed to do too) hoping hereby to have encreased his own power. Mindarus, being netled with this newes, made ready in an instant 72 ships; and gave the word, on a suddain to be gone, to the end, that there might no tidings thereof be carried to Samos, where the Athenians lay, and presently weighing anchor from Miletus, ran a streight course to Hellespont; and Thrasyllus hearing thereof, followed him from Samos, with 55 saile [Thucid. lib. 8.]

Mindarus and the Syracusian squadron had a fight at sea with Thrasyllus and Thrasybulus, at a fore-land of Cynos-sema (a place known by old Hecubaes tombe) where after a sharp bickering on both sides, the Athenians went away with the victory, having had 15 of their own ships sunk, and taken 21 of their enemies: which sea-fight is more fully set forth by Thucid. [in his 8. book; and by Diod. Sic. 2 year of 92 Olympiade.]

The 4 day after this fight, the Athenians having used all possible diligence, in repairing their fleet, set saile from Sestos to Cyzicum, which had revolted from them, and having espyed 8 ships at Harpagium and Priapus, which came from Byzantium, set upon them, and having beaten those who defended them from the shoare, took the ships into their own possession: and going on their way to Cyzicum, took that also, being then but an open bourgade, and squeesed a great summe of mony out of them, [Thuc. 8.]

Alcibiades setting out from Samos with 22 ships, exacted great summes of mony out of them of Halycarnassus: and then wasting the country of Coos, fenced the town of Cos, with a wall; and the winter now drawing on, returned with a great prey to Samos [Id. ib. Diod. 2. year of 92 Olympiade.]

Astacus a Persian borne, and Lievtenant to Tissaphernes, having conceived secret deadly hatred against the men of Delos (who being driven out of their old habitation, dwelt at Atramyttium) coming that way, sent for all the chief men among them, as friends and confederates, to come and serve the king in his wars, and upon a time, seeing them altogether at dinner, closed them round with his souldiers, and they with their darts slew them every man. [Thucid. ib.]

Those of Antandrus in Eolia, fearing least Astacus should serve them with the same sauce, and impatient of those taxes which he had laid upon them, sent for certain Peloponesian souldiers, from Abydus, and drawing them privily over the mount Ida, received them into their city, and turned the garrison of Astacus out of the Castle there, [Id. ibid.]

Tissaphernes returning from Aspendus into Ionia, and being much moved with this last attempt at Antandrus, and with other the like at Miletus and Cnidus (for there also the inhabitants had turned out his garisons) thought himself much wronged by the Peloponesians: wherefore fearing worse matters from them, and troubled moreover in his mind, least Pharnabazus, in a shorter time, and with far lesse charge in paying them, should seem to have gone further against the Athenians than himself had done, he purposed to go in person to the Peloponesians in Hellespont, both to expostulate with them their fact in turning his Garison out of Antandrus, and also to clear himself, in the best manner he could, of those imputations which they laid upon him, concerning the Phenician fleet and other things: and as soon as he was come to Ephesus, he there sacrificed to Diana, [Id. lib. 8. in fi.] Here ends the History of Thucid. which Theo-pompus continues for 17 years, and Xenophon for 48 years after, [Diod. 2 year of 92 Olympiade.] Theo-pompus we have not, the later we have, but maimed in the head: for besides the proeme of his History, we want his whole two first years of it: to wit, from the end of the summer of the 21 year of the Peloponesian war, where Thucidides left, to the end of the 23 summer of the same war.

3594. Of the 300 ships sent back into Phenicia, Tissaphernes purged himself to the Lacedemonians, saying that he had received advertisement, that the coast of Phenicia was in 4304 danger to be assailed both by the Arabians, and also by the king of Egypt (meaning K. Amyrteus) [as Diod. Sic. hath it, 3 year of the 93 Olympiade,] whereas Thucid. taught us, that there came but 147 ships to Aspendus out of Phenicia, and that they were all sent back again by Tissaphernes; contrary to his promise made.

3595. c. There was this year another sea-fight, between the Lacedemonians, and Athenians, 4305.
at Cynos-sema aforesaid; which was described by Theo-pompus, as a certain nameless greek writer saith, in the life of Thucid. Thy-

Thymochares, coming to Athens with a small company of ships, presently the Lacedemonians and Athenians had another sea-fight, wherein the Lacedemonians, under the conduct of Hegesandridus, gat the victory, [Xen. in the beginning of his History of the Greeks.]

Not long after Dorieus of the Isle of Rhodes, Ammiral of the Thurian Fleet, out of Italy, in the beginning of Winter, setting out from Rhodes with 14 sail of ships, went to the Hellespont, there to joyn with Mindarus: who lying at Abydus, did there attend the coming of all the friends aud confederates of the Peloponesian name and nation. And now was this Dorieus come as far as Sigeum, a Port in Troas, when the Athenians lying at Sestos, having knowledge of his being there, and whither he was going, went toward him with 20 ship: but Dorieus hearing of their coming, fled from thence, and drew up his ships upon the Rhætean shoar; and having there landed his men, with the help of the men of Dardania, they defended both themselves and their ships too, in spight of the Athenians: who seeing at last, they could do no good upon them, came back to Madytus, to the rest of their army. Mindarus seeing this fight, who at that time happened to be at old Troy, sacrificing to Minerva, went speedily with 84 ships to the Foreland of Dardania, to relieve Dorieus, and to save his ships; where he found also the land Forces of Pharnabazus ready to assist the Lacedemonian Navy against their enemies. Against whom the Athenian Fleet consisting of 74 ships came forth, close to the shoar of Abydus, and there began the fight. Mindarus having under his command 97 ships in all of his own, besides those of Dorieus, he placed the Syracusians in the left wing; himself took charge of the right: on the other side, Thrasybulus had the right wing, Thrasyllus the left. The fight continued doubtful from morning to the evening: when upon the sudden Alcibiades came stemming in with 18 fresh ships which came from Samos towards Hellespont: upon sight whereof the Lacedemonians fled towards Abydus. And the Athenians, following them close, took ten of their ships; and then a great storm of winde arose, so that the Athenians could not do as they would have done in the chase, and so the Peloponesians escaped all safe to shoar, and fled to Pharnabazus his land army that was thereby: and Pharnabazus himself during the fight, rid his horse into the very sea, up to his saddle-skirts, and there fought, and commanded his men both Horse and Foot to do the like. The Peloponesians also themselves, locking their ships close together, and making one bulke of them, fought against their enemies from the decks close to the shoar: but the night drawing on, the Athenians with 30 empty ships which they had taken of their enemies, and taking with them such of their own as had been hurt, and either battered or bilged in the fight, returned to Sestus: and the next morning so soon as it was light, gathering what spoiles they could get together of their enemies wreck, they erected a Trophie: and then leaving 40 sail to guard the Hellespont, they disposed of the rest, some here, some there, to gather up their tribute monies: yet one of their chief Captains, Thrasyllus, sailed back to Athens, there to let them know what a victory they had gotten, and withal to desire a supply both of men and shipping for the carrying on of the war in those parts. [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Diod. Sic. lib. 13. Plutarch in the life of Alcibiades.]

Mindarus, about the first watch of the night, came back to the sea side, and gave order for the curing of his ships which were hurt and broken in the fight: and sent in all haste to Lacedemon for fresh supplyes; both by land and sea. And whiles these things were in providing, his purpose was to joyn his land Forces with Pharnabazus, to take in the tributary cities of the Athenians, that were in Asia, [Diod. ib.]

3596. a. Meane while came Tissaphernes in Hellespont, and Alcibiades thinking to magnifie himself after so great and glorious a victory atcheived against the Lacedemonians, came a land unto him with rich presents, and a princely traine. But Tissaphernes, who was already ill spoken of at Lacedemon, and fearing least some information would be made against him to Darius, laid hold on him, and put him in irons at Sardes; pretending, that such was the Kings command, to shew, that he reckoned the Athenians for his open enemies. But within a moneth after, he with one Mantitheus, a Carian borne, and a fellow prisoner of his, gat horses, and by night stole away to Clazomenæ; and gave out, that it was with Tissaphernes his privity and consent, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Plutarch in Alcibia.] 4306.

b. Mindarus with 60 sail of ships, in the later end of Winter, went to Cyzicum, and joyning with Pharnabus his land army, took the place by force; and against him with 86 ships went Alcibiades, Thrasybulus, and Theramenes: and routed him first at sea, and then in a second fight at land; in which Mindarus himself, bravely fighting, died. The Syracusians, seeing no means left to escape, set their own ships on fire. The rest of the Fleet came all entirely into the Athenians hands, who carried them all away to Proeconnesus. This fight is more amply described [by Xenophon Hellen. lib. 1. by Diodor. lib. 13. by Plutarch in the life of Alcibiades, and by Polyænus, stratag. lib. 1.]

The next day, the Athenians sailed from Proeconnesus to Cyzicum, where they were received into the city; which was abandoned by Pharnabazus, and the Peloponesians, [Xenop.] and there they erected two Trophies; the one for their victory at sea, in the Isle of Polydorus, the other for that at land; where they first put the enemies to flight, [Diod.]

Alcibiades staying at Cyzicum 20 dayes, and having gotten a vast summe of money out of them, departed without doing them any other harme: and returned to Proeconnesus, [Xenoph.]

The Commanders of the Athenians, which remained behind at Cyzicum, came at length to Chalcedon, and there walled Chrysopolis, and made it a place where to gather a tole or tribute of every bottom that passed by out of Pontus, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Polyb. lib. 4. pa. 312. and Diod. 4 year of 92 Olympiade] leaving there a Garrison, and a Fleet of 30. ships, under the command of Theramenes and Eubulus; both to keep the Town, and also to watch what ships came in and out at the mouth of Pontus, and to do what other mischief they could to the enemy, [Xenoph.]

The Athenians also intercepted certain letters, written Laconically, or concisely, from Hippocrates, Mindarus his Lieutenant to Lacedemon, to the Ephori there, of the losse they had sustained at Cyzicum: in this wise Ἔῤῥει τὰ καλά· Μίνδαρος δ' ἀπέσσυα· πεινῶντι τ' ὤνδρες· ἀπορίομες τί χρῆ δρᾶν. (i.) All is lost: Mindarus is dead; our men starve: we know not what to do, [Xenoph. and Plutarch.]

The Lacedemonians hereupon sued for peace, which they opposed, who lived by the war, [Justin. lib. 5. cap. 4.] For though the more moderate sort of the Athenians were inclinable enough to peace, yet they who made their advantage of these combustions, chose rather to continue the war: especially one Cleophon, who was a principal Leader of the people; He, when he had spoken many things proper enough to the purpose then in hand, ἐμετεώρισε τὸν δῆμον, τὸ μέγεθος τῶν εὐτυχημάτων προφερόμενος ὥσπερ τῆς τύχης οὐκ ἐναλλὰξ εἰθισμένης βραβεύειν τὰ κατὰ πόλεμον προτερήματα, as Diodor. Sic. elegantly expresseth it: (i.e.) He made the people proud, by recounting to them the greatnesse of their good successes; as if Fortune did not use to bestow her favours in the war by turns; Now this Cleophon, who by his turbulent speeches, stirred up the people to a continuation of this war, (though to his own confusion, as appeared afterward) was by his occupation a Lute-maker; and one who, as every man knew, had been a slave and kept in irons; yet afterward by divices and tricks, came to be a Denison of Athens, and at this time, having won the people to him by his munificence and largesse, grew so bold, as openly to professe, that he would with his own hand, cut of that mans head who ever he ware, that should offer to speak any more of a peace: as Eschines hath it in his Oration, De falsa legatione, (i. e.) of a false Embassie.

The Peloponesians, and their confederates the Syracusians, as many as had escaped alive out of the fight, betook themselves to Pharnabazus, [Diodor. lib. 13.] whom Pharnabazus courteously entertained, and with many words of comfort told them, that for the losse of a few wooden ships, they should not let fall their courage, seeing the king had wood enough in his Dominions to build more ships withal, so long as the men were safe: and withal gave them every man a new suite of cloaths, and two moneths pay beforehand: and moreover arming the Mariners, placed Garrisons all along the sea coasts of his Government; and assembling all the Commanders of Cities, and Captains of every ship, gave them order to build as many new ships at Antandrus, as they had lost of their old; and gave large allowance of monies to go in hand therewith; and allowed them timber out of the mount Ida, as much as they would for that purpose: which done, he presently sent to relieve Chalcedon, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 1.]

c. While this Navy was in building, the Syracusians, joyning with the inhabitants of Antandrus, built a wall about the Town, and made it a most strong place of defence; in requital whereof, the Antandrians made the Syracusians free of their City, [Xenoph. ib.]

The Captains of these Syracusian companies, being all condemned to exile, by their country-men at home; Their General Hermocrates, accused Tissaphernes at Lacedemon, and found credit in all that he said; not onely upon the testimony of Astyochus, but even for his own words sake: whereupon he returned to Pharnabazus, and without asking, received from him a large sum of money; wherewith having procured men and ships, he returned into his own country, [Xenoph. ib. with Diodor. 4 year, Olympiade 92.]

Parasippidas, being condemned to exile at Sparta, because it was conceived, that by his plotting with Tissaphernes, he had procured all that favoured the Lacedemonian party, in a tumult there raised, to be turned out of the Isle of Thasus: Cratesippidas was sent to take charge of the Navy in his room at Chios, [Xenoph. ib.]

He with 25 sail of ships, trifled away the time about the coast of Ionia, but did nothing worth the speaking of for a long time; yet afterward, being furnished with monies

nies by those that were banished out of Chios, he brought them home again, and thrust 600 of the contrary faction out; who possessing themselves of Atarneum, a most fortified place in the continent, over against Chios, made dayly incursions from thence upon them, [Diod. ib.]

d. In the 93 Olympiade, wherein Eubotas the Cyrenian wan the prize in running; when Archippus was Ephorus, at Lacedemon; and Euctemon, was Prætor, or L. Chancelor at Athens, there was a new game set up, of a race to be run, by a brace of Mules, in a Coach, called Ξυνωρίς, or συνωρίς, as Xenophon shews [Hellen. 1°] of which besides Diod. Sic. [lib. 13.] and Pausan. [lib. 1.] Eliac. Julius Africanus also in Catalog. Stadionicarum maketh mention, adding moreover, that in the same Olympiade, Polydamantes the Scotussian, wan the prize at wrastling, being the same man, whom Darius Nothus, by expresse messengers, with large gifts and promises drew to him at Susa, where he slew three of the kings guard, which is called the Immortal Guard, of which you may see more in Herod. [lib. 7. cap. 83.] which all at once ran in upon him, as Pausan. in his later book Eliacor, sheweth, who also in the same book speaketh of Eubotas, surnamed Stadionicus, who when the Oracle of Ammon had foretold, that he should win the prize at running, he caused his own statue to be made before-hand; and coming afterward indeed to win the prize, was proclaimed to have won it, and dedicated his statue in testimony thereof, all in one day.

In this year also, the Medes which had fallen off from Darius the king of Persians, submitted themselves again to him, as Xenophon testifieth, [Hellen. 1.] Herodotus also, in the first of his History, [cap. 130.] relates, how the Medes revolted from Darius, and that upon an overthrow received, they returned to his subjection: who because he makes mention both of the war at Decelæa, [lib. 9. cap. 71.] which was waged the fifth year before, and of Amyrtæus his son reigning after him, [lib. 3. cap. 15.] (of whom I shall speak more in the year following) hence I gather, that he either wrote, or at least revised his History, in the very later end of the Peloponesian war.

In the beginning of the Summer, Thrasyllus at Athens, taking command of the ships committed to his charge, with five thousand seamen, all armed in fashion of targateers, which he was to joyn with those other targateers, which were there before, came to Samos, where having staid three dayes, he put over to the coast of Pygega, in Ionia, and having first wasted the countrey thereabout, he came at last with his army before the wall of the town it self, and when some succours came from Miletus, and fell upon the Athenians, who were but slightly armed, and busie in gathering the spoile of the countrey, the rest of the Athenians coming to relieve their fellows, put all the Milesians, (few escaping) to the sword, and having got together, 200 of the bucklers, of them that were slain, erected a trophy of them, and the next day sailed to Notium, and there providing themselves of necessaries, went to Colophas, which presently yielded to them. The next night they entered into Lydia, when their corn was almost ripe, and set many villages on fire. But whiles they were scattered here and there, and minded nothing but their boot-haling, Stages, a Persian, (the same Tages, as it should seem, which I mentioned before in the year of the World, 3592. out of Thucidides) fell upon them with his horse, and took one prisoner, and slew seven of them, [Xenoph. Hellen. l. 1.]

Tissaphernes understanding that Thrasyllus was ready to set saile for Ephesus, to surprise it, gathered together all the strength he could make, and sent about horsemen into all parts, to command men to come in and defend Diana of the Ephesians. Thrasyllus, when he had spent 17 dayes in Lydia, set saile for Ephesus; landed his corselets at Coressus, but his horse, his Targateers, and other Soldiers all, he set on shoar near to a bog on the other side of the town, and so soon as it was light, drew up to the town in two companies: against whom, they of the town, with such aids as Tissaphernes had sent them; set first upon the corselets which were at Coressus: whom when they had routed, and pursued to the sea side, and killed some ten of them they speedily returned, and set upon them which were placed near the bog: where having put the Athenians to flight, and slain 300 of them upon the place, they there erected one Trophy, and another at Coressus. But of their aids, they highly rewarded the companies of the Syracusians, and Selinuntians, because they had carried themselves of all others most valiantly in that service; promising such of them, as would be denised in their city, freedom from tax and tallage for ever, [Id. ib.] Plutarch also in the life of Alcibiades, maketh mention of a Trophy of brass there set up, in scorn of the Athenian nation,

The Athenians, having upon a truce received the bodies of their slain, and buried them at Notium, sailed away to Lesbos and Hellespont. And when lying at Methymna, a city of Lesbos, they there espied twenty five saile of the Syracusians, with whom they had had to do at Ephesus, passing by, they set upon them, and took 4 ships, with all the men in them, and routing the rest, pursued them as far as Ephesus. Thrasyllus sent all the prisoners which he had taken to Athens, saving onely one Alcibiades an Athenian, and cousin germain to Alcibiades, and a banished man also, as the other was; and him he there put to death: and then set sail for Sestus, where the army lay; and from Sestus the whole army put over to Lampsacus, and withal, the Winter which they reckon from the beginning of Autumn, came on. But when Alcibiades at Lampsacus, would have drawn his whole army of all sorts into one indistinct body; his own old souldiers refused to be ranked and mingled with those who had served under Thrasyllus. We, said they, who have ever been Conquerors, to be sorted with those that were beaten and routed but the other day, [Xen. Hellen. 1.]

3597. When Alcibiades and Thrasyllus his companies wintering altogether at Lampsacus (Diodorus his copies have it Labdacus) had fortified the places, in a military way; they then went to besiege Abydus: which when Pharnabazus came with a very great army to relieve, he was there fought withal by the Athenians, overcome, and put to flight. And Alcibiades had Pharnabazus himself in chase, with his Horse, and 120. Corslets following him; and gave him not over till late in the night. Upon which victory so gotten, the whole army grew friends, and willingly consorted each with other, without distinction: and so returned triumphantly into their Camp whence they set out. 4307

The next day Alcibiades set up a Trophie; and went and wasted Pharnabazus his province, with fire and sword, without any opposition; but all the Priests which he took, he sent away ransom-free, [Plutarch ib.]

The Lacedemonians finding themselves agrieved with Tissaphernes his delayes, and puttings off, sent Bœotius and others with him Ambassadors unto Darius; who easily obtained of him all that ever they demanded, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. 7.]

In the same Winter, Alcibiades and Thrasyllus his companies, making their several inrodes upon the countries belonging to Darius; in the Continent, made infinite havock there, [Id. ibid.]

3597 b. Darius gave his son Cyrus the younger, being then not above 16 years of age; as being born after his father came to be King, (as Ctesias affirmeth, and Plutarch also in the life of Artaxerxes) charge over all the sea coast, with the title of Satrape, (i.e.) President or Governour of all those countries: and withal made him Generalissimo of all those, whose Randevouz or place of assembling was wont to be in the plain of Castolus in Lydia: with this charge, that he should joyn with the Lacedemonians in making war against the Athenians, [Id. ib. and in Expedit. Cyri. lib. 1. in initio.] And Justin, [lib. 5. cap. 5.] out of Trogus, saith, That Darius King of Persia made his younger son Cyrus Governour of all Ionia and Lydia; and that it was he who raised the Lacedemonians to the recovery of their former fortunes. And Diodorus saith expressely, that Darius sent his sonne Cyrus to this very end, that in pursuing the war against the Athenians, he should relieve and set up the Lacedemonians, [1 year of the 93 Olymp.] and he also very well saith that Cyrus was made, ἄρχων τῶν ἐπὶ θαλάττης σατραπῶν: (i. e.) Commander over all the Governours by the sea side, [2 year of the 94 Olympiad.] and [in the 2 year of the same Olympiade] that he was made, τῶν ἐπὶ θαλάττης σατραπειῶν ἡγέμων: (i. e.) He was made Commander in chief, over all the Provinces lying upon the sea coast: For it is manifest, that both Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, though both Satrapes and Governours of their several provinces, yet were both under him and his command. 4307.

We read in Euseb. his Chron. that after Amyrtaus of Sois, Nepherites the King of a new Dynastie or Principality, succeeded in the kingdom of Egypt: whereas we find, [in Diodorus. 1 year Olympiade 95] that next before Nephereus or Nepherites, Psammitichus (descended of the race of that old Psammitichus; whom Manetho placeth in the 26 Dynastie or Principality, which was also of the Saites) reigned in Egypt. So that a man may well doubt, whether this were not Pausiris the son of Amyrtæus, which by the favour and help of the Persians recovered his fathers kingdom, as [Herod. lib. 3. c. 5. reporteth] but of the number of this and other Egyptian Kings reigns, we have already spoken in our Egyptian Chronology.

c. In the year when Pantacles was Ephorus in Sparta, and Antigenes Prætor or L. Chancelor in Athens, in the beginning of the Spring, next going before their coming into their offices: the Athenians with all the power they could make, sailed into Proconnesus: and removing from thence, encamped before Chalcedon, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1.] Diodor. saith that they went to Theramenes, who at that time lay before Chalcedon, with 70 sail of ships, and 5000. men, [year 4. Olympiade 92.]

The Inhabitants of Chalcedon, hearing of the approach of the Athenian army, sent away all their goods to the Thracians of Bythinia, their next neighbours. But Alcibiades hearing thereof, went with all his Horse, and a part of his Foot, and demanded all those goods of them; threatning force, if they refused to deliver them: and so having gotten them, made peace with the Bithynians, and returned to his Camp before Chalcedon: and drew a wall of timber-work before the City athwart the neck of land from sea to sea: which when Hippocrates the Lacedemonian Commander saw, he drew out all his forces, and fought with Thrasyllus, upon equal terms for a great while, till till at length, Alcibiades coming in with his forces, both of horse and foot, Hippocrates was laid dead upon the place, and then his men were fain to fly back into the city. But while the fight continued, Pharnabazus, with all his army, coming another way without the timber wall, sought by all means to have broken in, and to have come to the rescue of Hippocrates, but failing thereof, wheeled about, and retired to Heracleum, or the Temple of Hercules, which was in the territory of Chalcedon, where his own camp lay well entrenched. [Xenophon lib. 1. and Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiadis.]

d After this Alcibiades went into Hellespont, and Chersonesus, to gather moneys: and the rest of the Commanders, (though Diodorus saith, onely Theramenes) came to a composition with Pharnabazus, concerning Chalcedon, that he should give them 20 talents, and should convey the Athenian Ambassadors safely to the kings presence; and by solemn oath they covenanted each with other, that the men of Chalcedon should pay the Athenians the same tribute they did before, with all arrears: and that in the mean time, the Athenians should not offer to molest them of Chalcedon, till the returne of their Ambassadors from the king, and Alcibiades at his return, sending two Commissioners from Chalcedon, and Pharnabazus two more from Crysopolis, did not onely enterchangeably swear performance of Covenants on the publick behalf, but they themselves plighted their faith each to other solemnly, upon the same tearms, [Xenoph.]

These things thus done, Pharnabazus presently returned; willing the Ambassadors, which were to go to the King to meet him at Cyzicum: now the Ambassadors sent from the Athenians to the king were these, Dorotheus, Philodices, Theogenes, Euryptolemus, and Mantitheus, unto whom were added of the Argivans, Cleostratus, and Pyrrolochus: and some Ambassadors alsso from the Lacedemonians, as Passipedas, and others: all these took their journey to the King; to whom Hermocrates also, who stood now a banished man from Syracusa, joyned himself, and Proxenus his brother, [Id.]

Whiles Pharnabazus was taking care for the convoying of these Ambassadors, there came unto him from the other side of the water, Clearchus, a Lacedemonian Commander, partly to receive moneys for the pay of their army; and partly that he might gather into a body the ships, which lay scattered, some at Antandrus, some in Hellespont, and some in other places; hoping thereby to work some mischief, upon the confederate places of the Athenians: and in special thereby to draw off their forces from before Byzantium. But in his absence from thence, Byzantium was betrayed and given up to the Athenians, [Id.]

As these Athenian Ambassadors were upon their way to the King, there met them the Lacedemonian Ambassadors, Boeotius and the rest returning from the King, and Cyrus himself then going to his charge, as Governour over all the sea coasts of those parts: whom when they saw their chief suit unto him, was, that they might proceed in their journey to the king; if not, that they might return safe home again: but Cyrus commanded Pharnabazus, either to deliver up those Ambassadors into his hands, or at least to send them home again; as being no wayes willing, that the Athenians should come to the knowledge of what was then in hand against them, whereupon Pharnabazus held the Ambassadors still in suspence, sometimes telling them, that he would carry them on their way to the king, sometimes that he would send them home again; and so held them on by the space of three years (or rather, indeed of three moneths) and in the end, by Cyrus his leave, dismissed them to return to their own home, [Ibid.]

Alcibiades taking with him 20 ships from Samos, sailed into the Bay of Ceramus in Caria, and having there gathered 100 talents in money, and withal, taking the pillage of no lesse than 200 vessels, which he had either rifled or sunk, came to Athens; where being declared General of all their armies, with full and absolute power to command, and having received 200 talents, (as Lysias, in his oration, against his son Alcibiades sheweth) out of the treasury of the city, he presently raised an army, of 1500 corselets, and 150 horse, with 100 saile of ships, [Xenophon, Hellen. 1. Diodorus lib. 13. Justin lib. 5. cap. 4, 5. Plutarch and Emil. Probus, in the Life of Alcibiades.]

Satyrus the Son of Spartacus, held the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimmerius, by the space of 14 years, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 96.]

The Lacedemonians, when Cratesipidas their Admirals time was out, sent Lysander to succed him in that charge: He, when he came to Rhodes, having there gathered the fleet together, sailed therewith into the Isle of Coos, and to Miletus, and from thence to Ephesus, with 70 saile of ships, and there stayed, till Cyrus came to Sardes, [Xenoph. Hellen 1.] And when he found Ephesus pliant to him, and wholly addicted to the Lacedemonian party, and much grieved with the Persians carriage, and fallen to decay, decay, by reason that the Persian Governours lay commonly at Miletus thereby, and drew away all the trade and trafick from them, to that city; he therefore took up his standing quarter there, commanded all marchants to unloade there; made sundry Docks, and caused all ships for the Navy to be there built. By which means he procured in short time, their port to be filled with ships; their exchange with Merchants, and their shops and ware-houses, with all kind of wealth, [Plutarch, in the Life of Lysander.]

Lysander being certified, that Cyrus was come to Sardes, went thither to him, in company with the rest of the Commissioners from Sparta, where he charged Tissaphernes very heavily; for that, when he had command from the king to support and help the Lacedemonians what he could: to beat the Athenians out of the sea, he on the contrary by Alcibiades his procurement, grew remisse, and cold that way, and by keeping back their pay from the marriners, utterly destroyed the Lacedemonian Navy, and Cyrus of himself was willing enough to receive any information against Tissaphernes, who had otherwise no goodness in him; and was ever a back friend to Cyrus himself: and the more Lysander put on the young man to be doing, the forwarder was he to promise, that all should be done; adding still, that it was his fathers command it should be so; and assured him, that there should be no want, neither of paines nor monies on his part, for that service he raised the pay of the Mariner and sea Soldier, from 3 Soles by the day to 4. he payed the whole army, what ever was in arreare: advanced a whole moneths pay before hand; paying down to Lysander 10000 Darics for that purpose, and by this means, put heart and courage, more than ever, into his own seamen, and left the Athenian fleet empty almost of Marriners, for the most part of them, for greedinesse of better pay, left the Athenians, and went unto Lysander, and those which staied, grew idle and carelesse in the service, and mutinous and troublesome dayly to their Commmanders, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Diodor. lib. 13. and Plut. in the life Lysander.]

When the Athenians heard this, with heavy hearts, and by the setting on of Tissaphernes, they dispatched away Ambassadors to Cyrus; but Cyrus refused to admit of them to his presence, though Tissaphernes himself spake for them; and told him, that what he did, he did upon the advice of Alcibiades, whose counsel it ever had been, to hold the Grecians in a ballance, and let neither side over top the other, but suffer them to continue the war, and thereby to wast and consume one another to nothing, [Id. ibid] and although the Peloponesians were thus borne up with the Persian bags, yet the Athenians held it out 3 whole years against them, [Thucid lib. 2.] And who can wonder if at last the Athenian state was sunk, and came to nought, seeing that the power of all the East joyned to their destruction, [Justin. li. 5. cap. 1.]

Lysander, when he was returned to Ephesus, there rested him for a while; and in that time drew up 90 of his ships, which were sore bruised; and made them fit again and serviceable for the sea, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1.] He sent also for the chiefest, and most powerful men out of every adjoyning city; made a confederacy with them, and assured them, that if things sorted out in this war, as he hoped they would, he would make every one of them a Prince in his own city: whereupon they were so set a gog, that every man was ready to do more, than Lysander himself could with reason require of them; and so came to be abundantly provided of all things necessary for the war in a trice, and sooner than he could have imagined, [Diod. l. 13.]

When Alcibiades had heard, that Thrasybulus was gone out of Hellespont, to fortify Phocæa; he set saile and went unto him: leaving the fleet in the mean time, under the charge of Antiochus with a strict command, that he should in no wise, offer to stir out, nor fight with Lysander in his absence. But Antiochus, with his own vessel, and one other of Notium, as Xenophon and Plutarch say, (for Diodorus saith, that he drew out ten of the choicest ships he had) would needs go himself to Ephesus, and there skir along before the very noses of Lysanders ships. Then Lysander put out at first with a small company of ships, and pursued him; but when more and more came to the help of Antiochus, Lysander drew out his whole fleet, and the Athenians did the like on their side, from Notium and other places: but when they came on, here and there in a confused manner, they quickly lost 15 of their best ships, and the rest saved themselves by flight; and Antiochus himself was slain in the fight. Lysander erecting a Trophy at Notium, returned with the ships which he had taken to Ephesus, and the Athenians that were left, to Samos, where Alcibiades hearing what had passed, went with his whole fleet before the port of Ephesus, and there ranged it, in battle array. But Lysander not stirring (for indeed his number was far inferior to that of the enemies) Alcibiades returned to Samos, from whence he came, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Diodor. lib. 13. Plut. in the lives of Alcibiades and Lysander.]

Alcibiades putting to sea again from Samos, sailed to Cuma: where laying many false calumnies to their charge; he took a multitude of them prisoners, and brought them a boord his own ships: but when the Cumeans ran all presently to armes, and stood stood upon their guard; and fell withal upon their enemies; Alcibiades for a while, bare the brunt of their assault; but when the country there about came in also to their help, Alcibiades returned the prisoners which he had taken, and was fain to flee to his ships for safeguard: yet this defeat sticking in his stomach, he presently sent for more help to Mitylene; and drew his men forth in battalion before the walls of Cuma, and dared them to come forth: But when no man stirred, he drew his men back to Mitylene having first ravaged and wasted the country round about.

The Cumeans sent presently to Athens, and there brought their action, and put in their bill against him in forme of Law: for that he had wasted and spoiled a confederate city, and country thereabout, which had no wayes offended them. And the way once opened, sundry other complaints came in against him, of foule misdemeanors in that kind: And some also of the Garison in Samos, which bore him a grudge, stole over to Athens, and informed against him: and openly charged him before the whole assembly of the people, that he plaid false, and did but collude with the Lacedemonians; & had private intelligence and correspondencie with Pharnabazus, upon a sure hope given him, that if they prevailed, he should be made Prince and Sovereign of Athens. [Diod. lib. 13.]

3598. 4. The Cumeans therefore on the one side, and Thrasybulus in the behalf of the armies on the other, accusing him of many pranks, played by him in his government, there were presently sent away Conon, and nine other Commissioners assistants with him, to succeed Alcibiades in the charge of the Army; which he hearing of, got presently and privately away in a single ship; and went to his own lands and castles, which were in the Chersonesus of Thrace, [Diodor. ib. Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Plutarch in the life of Alcibi.] 4308 406

b. 3598 Lysander, sending for such out of the cities adjoyning, as he knew to be blades, and had good hearts and head-peeces of their owne, bad them make every man, what friends he could, and set up for himself: assuring them as before, that as soon as the Athenians were down, he would dissolve the popular governments in all those cities, and that they should be every man a Prince in his own country, [Plut. in the life of Lysander.] 4308. 406.

c. The moon was eclipsed in the evening, [Xenophon Helen. 1.] 15. April, according to the Julian Calendar, about 3 houres after sun set; as the Astronomical accompt sheweth.

When Pityas was Ephorus at Sparta; and Callias, Pretor or L. Chancellor in Athens, and Lysanders year of command was out, Callicratidas was sent to succeed him in the charge of the navie; and forasmuch as he was a man whom Lysander hated, he surrendred the ships to him indeed, as he could do no lesse; but of the monies which he had received from Cyrus to pay the Navy withal, what was remaining unspent in his hand, that he all returned to Cyrus again at Sardes, bidding Callicratidas, go aske it of Cyrus if he would have it, and see how he could get moneys to pay the Navy: whereupon Callicratidas was forced out of pure necessity, to make a journey into Lydia, to Cyrus, and there desired to have pay for the Navie. But being none of the greatest Courtiers, grew quickly impatient of attendance, and that thus he was put off and delayed from day to day; and saying that the Greeks were come to a faire passe, if they must now stand crouching for pay, to a company of barbarians, gave over his suit, and came his way, [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. and Plut. in the life of Lysander.]

Callicratidas sailing to Miletus, got moneys of them there, and going from thence to Chios, had the Castle of Delphinium, which was kept by five hundred Athenians, delivered up unto him: which he brake downe: and having there gotten about a mark sterling, for every marriner, went to Teos, where slipping into the towne by night, he sacked it; and came to Lesbos, where he took Methymna the chief City of the Isle: Conon the Athenian made what haste he could to come to their rescue, but came too late; wherefore, finding all lost there, he began to fly away; but Callicratidas with his fleet of one hundred and seventy ships, pursued him, drew him to a fight, and overcame him. In which fight, Conon, having lost 30 saile of his ships, fled with the 40 that were left, to Mitylene. But Callicratidas followed him, and there blockt him up by sea and land; and whiles he lay there, moneys came to him, sent after him by Cyrus, [Xenoph. ib. Diod. l. 13.]

The Athenian Navy consisting in all, of one hundred and fifty saile, drew forth, to come to the rescue of Mitylene: and Callicratidas, leaving Eteonicus, with fifty ships to continue the siege, with the other one hundred and twenty, came to the Islands called Arginusæ, which lye between Malea, and a bay of Lesbos, and Catanis, a foreland in Asia, and there, manfully fighting, was slain; the Athenians got the victory, but lost twenty and five of their ships in the fight, with all the men aboard them, save some some few, which swam a shore, and the Peloponesians having lost seventy and seven ships, fled away to Chios; but the greatest part of them retired into the Countreys of Cuma and Phocea, [Id. ib.] and that this fight at Argiunsæ, was made, when Callias was Pretor, or L. Chancellor at Athens, the third year of the ninety third Olympiade, besides Xenophon and Diodorus, Atheneus also in his fifth book, de pnosoph. affirmeth.

3599. Cyrus put to death his two own cousin Germans, Autobezaces and Mitreus, the sons of Darius his fathers sister: for that when they met him, they had not pulled in their hands within their sleeves; an honour which was never wont to be done, but to the king himself; which when Hieramenes and his wife, the parents, as it seemeth, of them that were to put to death, heard, they told Darius, that it was a shame for him, to wink at so foule a fact of his son: whereupon Darius sent for his son, to repaire to his presence, pretending that he was sick, in his Camp at Thamneria, in the Country of the Medes, whither he was gone with his army against the Cadusians, a bordering Nation, which had newly revolted from him, [Xenophon Hellen. lib. 2.] 4309 3409.

The Lacedemonians which were scattered in the countreys of Eolia and Ionia, met together at Ephesus; and thence sent messengers to Lacedemon, to let them there know, how things went with them in Asia; and to desire that they might have Lysander again for their General, a man of whom they had had so good proof of, in the year before: in which request, Cyrus also joyned with them; but because by their Law, the same man could not be twice Ammiral of their fleete, therefore they gave the title of Ammiral to one Aracus, but committed the whole power for the management of the war unto Lysander, under the name of his Lievtenant. Lysander therefore coming to Ephesus, sent to Eteonicus to come unto him with his ships from Chios; gathering also out of Peloponesus, and other parts, all the ships that ever he could make, and did not only repaire those which he had, but also built new ones, in the port at Antandrus, [Xenophon, ibid. Diodorus in the third and fourth years of the ninety third Olympiade; and Plutarch in the life of Lysander.]

Lysander made a journey to Cyrus, and desired money of him, as before; which having, though with much difficulty, gotten (for Cyrus made it appear unto him, that by reason of his former liberality that way, moneys went very short with him) he forthwith appointed sea captaines over every fighting ship, and payed every mariner his due to a farthing, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

The Carthaginians having taken Gela in Sicily, took the statue of Apollo, which was in his temple in the suburbs of the city, all of brasse, and of a vast bignesse, and sent it to Tyrus, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Cyrus, having received his fathers message, as afore said, sent for Lysander, to come unto him at Sardes, willed him by no means to fight with the Athenians at sea, till he had gotten a far greater fleete of ships than now he had; promising at his return to bring with him a very great Navy, from Phenicia, Cilicia, and other parts thereabouts, and then commended the care of all the cities of his own Government to Lysander, and for such tributes as belonged peculiarly to himself, he assigned them all over unto him, and what was left of that, bad him take it to himselfe, [Xenophon Hellanic. 2. Diodorus, year 4. Olympiade 93. Plutarch in the life of Lysander.]

Then took Cyrus his journey toward his father, taking Tissaphernes, as a friend, along with him, and three hundred Grecians, all Corseleteers, commanded by Xenophon of Arcadia, [Xenophon de Expedit. Cyri, lib. 1. pag. 243. and 254.]

When Cyrus was gone, Lysander having paid his army, went with his fleet to Ceramium, a bay in Caria; and coming with his army, before a town called Cedreas, a place confederate with the Athenians, the next day he took and sackt it, and made the inhabitants thereof (who were no better than a kind of half barbarous people) slaves: so doth Xenophon relate this matter in [2 Hellanic.] but Diodorus [year 4. Olympiade 93.] thus, Lysander (saith he) with a great number of ships, setting upon Thasus, a City of Caria, confederate with the Athenians, took it by force, and cut the throats of all the males there, not under age, to the number of eight hundred; and selling the women and children for slaves, laid the City smat smooth with the ground; where, instead of Cedrenians, the word Thasians is put; which were the inhabitants of an Isle called Thasus; far off from thence, and who after the defeat of the Athenians at Egos Potamos, and final ruine of that state, were not taken by force, by Lysander, but surprised by a trick or slight of his, as we may easily learn out of a broken passage of [Emil. Probus, in the life of Lysander,] and the full relation of the thing, by [Polyenus, lib. 1. stratagem.]

At

At Miletus, certain men, being desirous to abolish the popular government there used, brought it to passe by Lysanders help; thus. At first, in the Feast of Bacchus, they laid hold on those which were most against their faction in their own houses, to the number of 40. and cut their throats. Afterward again, in a full market, they seized on 300. more of the richest of the people; and cut off their heads: whereupon, some of the principal of the people that were left, fearing what might befall themselves, to the number of a thousand, and no lesse, fled to Pharnabazus, the Persian Governour in those parts; who entertained them very kindly, and giving every one of them, a Statere of gold, gave them Clauda, which is a Castle of Claudia (shall I say of the Island Clauda mentioned Acts 27. 16?) for a place to dwell in, [Diodor. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

The Athenians set sail from Samos, and came to Chios and Ephesus; and having wasted the Kings countries thereabouts, prepared themselves now for a sea-fight: mean while Lysander sailing from Rhodes, and leaving Ionia on the right hand, went up with his Fleet to Hellespont, to see that no shipping should passe that streight; and withal to reduce such Cities as had revolted from them in those parts, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

Lysander going from Abydus, came with his Fleet to Lampsacus, a confederate city with the Athenians; and thither repaired also the men of Abydus by land, and such others as were under the command of Thorax, a Lacedemonian Captain: and setting upon the city, took it by force, and sacked it, being rich, and full of corn and wine, and all other provisions: but sent away the Athenian Garrison that was there, according to his word, suffered all freemen there to enjoy their liberty, and having given the spoile thereof to his souldiers, he left the place it self entire to the inhabitants, [Plut. in the life of Lysander.]

The Athenian Navy, which consisted of 180 sail, was wholy surprized and taken by Lysander at Egos-potamos, in the streight of Hellespont (of all which number, scantly ten escaped) with 3000. souldiers, besides their Commanders, [Id. ibid.]

Conon their Captain seeing the Athenian State here utterly lost, and fearing the cruelty of his country-men, if he returned to Athens, came with nine ships onely to Abarindes a Foreland of Lampsacus: and taking from thence some principal masts of Lysanders ships, sailed away to Euagoras King of Cyprus, with whom he was formerly of good aquaintance: sending away neverthelesse a Post-barque to Athens, to let them know what had befallen him at Egos-potomos, [Id ib. with Isocrat. in his Euagoras: Aristot. lib. 2. Rhetor. Justin lib. 5. cap. 6. and Aristid. in Oratio. Rhodiaca.]

Lysander having rifled their Camp, carried away the ships, and prisoners, and spoils, and all, with the sound of Pipe and Flute, and Triumphant Songs, to Lampsacus. And the same day sent away Theopompus, who had been a Milesian Pirate, with the news of this victory to Lacedemon; in a most choice ship with pennants hung out, and streamers, and all other magnificent attire; which journey he went in three dayes, Philocles the Captain, and the Athenian prisoners to the number of 3000. Adimantus onely excepted, had all their throats cut, [Xenoph. Diodor. Plutarch.]

Lysander, having set all things in order at Lampsacus, sailed to Byzantium and Chalcedon, both which opened their gates unto him: sending away the Athenian Garrisons in both places, upon his word. They who had formerly betrayed Byzantium to Alcibiades, getting away, went first into Pontus, and from thence came afterward to Athens, where they were all endenised. And Lysander leaving Sthenelaus a Lacedemonian for Governour, both of Byzantium and Chalcedon, returned to Lampsacus, there to repair his Navy, [Xen. Hellen. 2.]

Lysander turning out of every City, such as favoured the Athenian party, and destroying every where, Democraties, and all other forms of Government whatsoever; left them onely, such as at Sparta were called Harmostæ; (i.e.) Moderators, to govern them: and dividing each City into ten Wards or Companies, chose out of them ten special men, to whom he committed the soveraignity over all, into which number he chose none any where but such as either had been formerly obliged to him, or would now take an oath to be his: and having by this means erected a Decemvirate, or a Government of Ten men in every City, held them all at his own devotion: and did all himself, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in the life of Lysander.]

Lysander, having spent some short time in ordering this businesse, sent word to Sparta that he was ready with 200. sail; with which, together with Agis and Pausanias the Spartan Kings, he forthwith came to the siege of Athens, hoping in a short time to take it: but finding that they defended themselves beyond his expectation, he himself returned into Asia; where he abolished all Republicks, or Democraties, and established every where his Decemvirates, or Government by Ten men: putting many to death every where, and making the rest to get them packing into other places. And whereas at Miletus, his friends to whom he had undertaken to assist them in suppressing the Democratic there, had already upon a second advice, fallen to an accord with the adverse faction; he most cunningly, and most perfidiously withal, so wrought the matter, that he delivered no lesse than 800. of the Democratical party to be murdered by those which stood for an Aristocratie in that city, [Plutarch ib.].

3600. The Athenians being so besieged by sea and land by the Lacedemonians, obtained at last peace upon certain articles: But upon the 16 day of Munichion the Attic moneth (the 24 of April, according to the Julian Calender) as Plutarch in his life reporteth; he told the Athenians, that they had broken the articles, in that they had not demolished their walls within the ten dayes limited to them to have done it in: whence it is gathered, that that peace or agreement was made upon the sixth of their moneth Munichion, (i.e.) upon our 14 of April:) wherewith ended the Peloponesian war, when it had lasted 27 years: as [Thucidides in his 5 book] telleth us. 4310.

Shortly after this peace, Darius King of all Asia, when he had reigned 19 years died: whose eldest son, and successor, Artaxerxes, reigned 43 years, [Diodor. Sic. year 4. Olympiad 93.] But Ctesias who was Physitian to this Artaxerxes, saith, that when Darius Ochus died at Babylon; there succeeded him Arsacus, al. Arsaces, begotten by him, upon the body of Parysatis, before he came to be King: and that coming to the crown, he altered his name to Artaxerxes: who for the greatnesse of his memory was surnamed Mnemon. To which also, as I conceive refers that relation of [Athenæus, lib. 12. Deipnosoph.] where he saith, that Ochus when he lay a dying, was asked by his eldest son, by what wisdom and policy he had maintained his State so many years, to the end, saith he, that having learned by you, I may follow your steps therein: and that his answer to him was, that he had done it, by doing right to God and man. For although Darius Ochus was often urged by his wife Parysatis, who ever loved her younger son Cyrus more than the elder; to follow the example of Darius Hystaspes, and leave him to succeed him in the kingdom, who was first born after he came to be King; and not him that was borne before: yet would he never hearken to her therein: But by his last Will, gave the kingdom to his eldest son Artaxerxes, and to his younger son Cyrus, all those Cities and Territories, which he had at that time under his Government in Asia, [Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes. Justin. lib. 5. cap. 11.]

So soon as Artaxerxes came to the Crown, by the perswasion and importunity of Statyra his wife, he took Vadiastes, who had murdered Terituchmes, her own brother, and husband to Amistris, who was Artaxerxexes his own sister, and caused his tongue to be drawn backward out of his pole, and there to be cut off: and made Mitridates or Mithridates his son, who had preserved the city Zaris, to the son of Terituchmes, Satrape or Governour in his room, [Ctesias.]

When Artaxerxes went to Pasargada, where according to the custom, he was to put off his own Robe, and to put on the Robe which old Cyrus wore, before he came to the Crown; and was there inaugurated according to the ancient Regal Ceremonies by the Priests of Persia: Tissaphernes brought him the Priest, who had instructed his brother Cyrus in his childhood, according to the custom of his country, and taught him the principles of the art Magick, who was in that regard the more easily believed; when he accused Cyrus for having a plot, when Artaxerxes should be putting off his own Robes, to set upon him, and to murder him in the very Temple, [Plut. in the life of Artax.]

Artaxerxes hereupon caused his brother to be laid hold on, purposing to put him to death; and put him in chains of gold, for the reverence he bare to the Regality of his blood: but when he was to be killed, his mother caught him about the middle, and then casting her hair about his neck, and tying it to her own, with many teares and lamentations made, at length procured his pardon; and obtained him to be sent again to his command in Lydia, and other sea Towns in Asia, [Id. ib. with Xenoph. in Expeditio. Cyri. lib. 1. Justin. lib. 4. cap. Ult. and Ctesias.]

Alcibiades fearing the power of the Lacedemonians, who commanded all now by sea and land, withdrew into that part of Bithynia which belonged to the Thracians; and carried thither with him a great masse of Silver and gold; yet left he a far greater quantity of both behind him in the Castle where he was. But the Thracians there, so soon as they perceived the wealth which he had brought, devised how to catch him, and to get his money to themselves: yet him they missed, for he had conveyed himself privily away to Pharnabazus in Phrygia: whom he so caught, and enamoured with his gentle behaviour, that no man was so inward with him, as Alcibiades was: whereupon he gave him the Castle of Grynium in Phrygia; whereof he made fifty talents a year in tribute, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in the life of Alcibiades.]

The Lysandrian Feast, and Games, were instituted in honour of Lysander: wherein, when Antimachus and Niceratus, contended in Poetry; Lysander gave the Garland to Niceratus: and when Antimachus took that so to heart, that he burnt his own Poeme; Plato being then but a youth, cheered him up, and told him, that ignorance hurt hurt onely the ignorant themselves, as blindnesse did the blind, [Plut. in the life of Lysander, with Diodor. 4. yeare 93, Olympiade, out of Apollodorus.]

d. In the next Olympiade after the taking of Athens by Lysander, wherein Crocinas a Thessalian, wan the prize in running, which is counted the 94, Olymp. Xenephon saith that there was an Eclipse of the Sun. [Hellen 2.] which the Astronomicall account sheweth to have fallen upon the 3. of our September in the forenoone.

3601. e. When Cyrus was gotten back again safe into Lydia, remembring how he had been shackled by his brother, he began to cast about, how he might hereafter keep himself out of his brothers danger; and withal, if it might be, how to make himself king in his room. Therefore he listed as many Grecian soldiers as possibly he could, and under this and that colour, gathered a great army of several nations, that with them he might come upon his brother as unprovided as might be, [Xenoph. Exped. Cy. lib. 1. Plutarch in the Life of Artaxerxes.] He sent also unto Lysander a ship, made all of gold and Ivory, of two cubits high; congratulating him thereby, for the great victory he had gotten by sea, which Lysander laid up in the treasury of Brasidas, and Acanthians, [Plutarch in his Lysander,] And when Lysander came to him at Sardes to deliver him a present from all the confederate cities, of sundry things (among which perhaps was that jewel or neck-lace, which Elian. [Var. Histor. lib. 12. cap. 1.] saith, was sent unto him from Scopas the younger, out of Thessaly) Cyrus also, to welcome him, shewed him his Orchard, which he had laid out and planted with his own hand, and entertained him with such discourse of husbandry, as is set forth by Xenophon in his Oeconomies in the person of Socrates. 4311 403

Among the Persians, Satabarzanes accused Orontes; for keeping company with Parysatis the Kings mother: whereas otherwise she had ever lived in a fair reputation of chastity, therefore was Orontes put to death; and Parysatis grew discontent with her son, and caused Mithridatis, Teritucknes his son, to be made away by poyson, [Ctesias.]

Alcibiades having learnt, that Cyrus intended to make a war against his brother, and that the Lacedemonians had a hand therein; he had purposed to hast away to Artaxerxes, to make him the first discovery of this treason, hoping by this means, both to procure a benefit to himselfe, as Themistocles had done before him; and withal, by the kings help to free his countrey of Athens, from their Lacedemonian bondage. In this mean while, Critias, one of those 30 Tyrants, whom Lysander had set over the Athenians to rule them, gave him notice, that unlesse he took order, to have Alcibiades made away, all would come to nothing, that he had done at Athens, neither yet did Lysander do any thing hereupon, untill a cipher was brought him from Lacedemon, commanding him expressely, to dispatch him: whereupon Lysander sent to Pharnabazus, to let him know, that unlesse he forthwith delivered up Alcibiades into his hands alive or dead, the league made between the king and Lacedemonians could not stand, but all would break out again; and hereupon Pharnabazus sent Susamithres his Uncle, and Magæus, (whom Emil. Probus calls Bagoas) to murder Alcibiades, whiles he was in a certain place in Phrygia called Melissa, situate in the mountain of Elophois, and was preparing for his journey toward the king.

The people of the countrey whom they had hired to do the deed, durst not attempt it by sword or handy stroaks: but in the dead of the night, laying a great deal of wood round about the house, wherein he lay a sleep, set it on fire; and when Alcibiades had gotten through it, and was escaping away, they shot their darts and arrows at him, and so kill'd him, and carried his head to Pharnabazus; the rest of his body, a sweet-heart of his, wrapped in her own gown, (which a little before he had dreampt, he was wraped in) and buried in the same fire which the house was burned with; making him as fair and as honourable a funeral, as the time and place, and her present ability afforded, [Ephorus lib. 17. cited by Diod. year 1. Olym. 94. Aristot. Histor. Animal. lib. 6. cap. 29. Cic. lib. 1. de Divina. Valer. Max. lib. 1. cap. 7. Justin. lib. 5. cap. 8. Athena. Deipnosoph. lib. 13. Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in their lives of Alcibiades.]

b. Clearchus a Lacedemonian, bearing himself for a Tyrant of Byzantium; and being overcome by his own people, led by Panthoedas, stole away by night, and came into Ionia; where growing into familiarity with Cyrus, whose mind was at that time wholly set upon making a war against his brother, wrought so far upon him, that he was made by him General of all his forces: for finding him, a man of a haughty spirit, and a courage apt to embrace any imployment; he gave him 10000 darics, with which he raised forces, and marching out of Chersonesus made war upon the Thracians, that bordered northward upon Hellespont: which because it seemed for the advantage of the Grecians, therefore did the cities of Hellespont contribute willingly to the maintenance thereof: so that these forces were maintained under hand for the use and service of Cyrus, [Xenophon de Expedit. Cyri. lib. 1. Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 94.]

c. Then Lysander in hostile manner wasted the Province of Phrygia and other places of Pharnabazus his government, he forthwith sent to complain of him at Lacedemon, where himself was in great esteem and much beloved, because he had at all assayes, ever upheld their State, against their enemies: and therefore the Ephori being much incensed against Lysander, took Thorax a great friend and favourite of his, and because they found that he had store of money in his house, put him to death: and sending their cypher, called Lysander himself home out of Asia. Hereupon Lysander was faine to entreat Pharnabazus to write other letters in his justification; which he openly did, and that in so good a manner, as Lysander himself could wish no better: but having others ready written, he shuffled them in at the sealing, and sent them away by Lysander himself; which when he came to Lacedemon, and there delivered to the Ephori, he was thereby made the proper informer against himself, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in their lives, of Lysander, and Polyænus, lib. 7. Stratagem.]

Not long after, hardly and with much adoe, he gat leave of the Ephori to travel, and to visit the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; pretending that it was to pay the vows which he had made before he entered into certain battels, which he had fought in their service: but indeed it was to bribe the Priests there, for his own ends and purposes. And to that end, he carried with him a large proportion of monies; and had there besides King Lybis, an old friend and host of his fathers: and for a memorial of that friendship, his younger brother had his name given him Lybis by his father. But the chief Priest of that Oracle would not be bribed: nor that onely, but they sent messengers to Sparta, to inform against him, for attempting so to do: whereupon when he returned to Sparta, he was called in question for it; but was acquitted by the court, [Diodor. year 2 of the 94 Olympiade, Plutarch and Emil. Probus in their lives of Lysander.]

3602. At this time all the cities of Ionia, save onely Miletus, which were under the government of Tissaphernes, fell over to Cyrus: for when Tissaphernes residing at Miletus, perceived that the Milesians had the same inclination towards Cyrus that the others had, he prevented that purpose of theirs, by killing some of them, and turning others out of the gates: who coming to Cyrus were graciously received by him; and he gathered forthwith an army by land and sea, to restore them to their right again, [Xen. De Expedit. Cy. lib. 1. pa. 244.] among his land companies there was one Socrates of Achaia with 500. Corselets, and Pasio of Megara with almost 700. more, [Ib. pa. 245] But Tamos an Egyptian, Cyrus his Ammiral, with 25 ships, kept the siege by sea, [Ib. pa. 252.] 4312.

Cyrus sent to Artaxerxes, praying that he would be pleased to trust him being his brother, with the government of those cities, rather than Tissaphernes: in which sute his mother also stickled hard for him; so it came to passe that the King perceived not that there was any Treason intended towards himself, but thought that Cyrus had kept an army about him, onely to oppose Tissaphernes: and was well enough content, that they two should try it out between themselves. For Cyrus duely sent unto Artaxerxes the tribute payable out of those cities, which Tissaphernes formerly held, [Ib. pa. 241.]

This Cyrus, who never came to be King, either of Persia or Babylon, is the man, whom Geor. Harvartus, lulled, as it seems, asleep with some pleasing fancy of his own, would needs have to be him, who after the end of the Babylonish captivity, licensed the Jews, with their Governour Zerobabel, and Joshua, al. Jesu, the son of Jozadake the High Priest, to return into their own country: whereas Artaxerxes Mnemon was then King of Persia, and Johannes, who in [Nehemiah ca. 12. 11, 22, 23.] is called Johanan and Jonathan, was High Priest of the Jews; and the Governour of the Jewish Nation, was a certain Persian Lord, whom Josephus Antiquit. [lib. 11. cap. 7.] sayes was called, Bagoses, a captain of another Artaxerxes: as Rufinus translates him; (i. e.) another from Artaxerxes Longimanus; of whom Josephus had spoken in the next precedent Chapter. But the relation which he makes of these men, is this:

Jesus was brother to John the High Priest, whom Bagoses much affecting, promised to bestow the High Priesthood on him, when ever it should fall. In confidence whereof, the said Jesus bearing himself bold; first fell into contestation, and afterward into an open brawle with his brother in the very Temple; and therein provoked him so far, that his brother slew him on the place. Which done, Bagoses came, and entering the Temple, profaned it; saying that the High Priest had already polluted it with his own brothers blood: and for seven years after, vexed the Jews for that murders sake, laying a heavy fine upon them; to wit, that before they offered their daily sacrifice, they should pay (not for every year, as the common translations of Josephus, and out of them Salianus have it) but, for every lamb, 50 drachmaes. Which punishment continued so long as that Johannes the High Priest, who committed that fact lived, and as it seemeth, no longer; and whom we rank also with the time, not of Artaxerxes Ochus, but of this Artaxerxes Mnemon; and but with the beginning of his reign neither, which we therefore do, because we find mention of this Johannes or Johanan (though not then High Priest) in the book of Ezra [chap. 10. 6. with Neh. 12. 23.] For between the 7 year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to which that History of Ezra refers, and the end of the 7 year of Artaxerxes Mnemon his reign, (before which we suppose and take for granted, that this Johannes died not) there passed no lesse than 70 years space, according to our account. And so, he dying after the 90 year of his age, his son Jaddus, succeded in the priesthood, and held it to the reign of Alexander the great; and died about the 83 of his age, if we suppose him to have him been born toward the end of Darius Nothus his reign. But this by the way: we now return to our Cronology, and the death of Cyrus the younger, who was taken out of this life, before he attained to the 22 year of his age.

3603. Cyrus sent messengers to Lacedemon, praying them, that as he from time to time had supported them with men and money against the Athenians, so now they would send him men, telling them further in his letters vauntingly; that if they sent them foot, he would give them horses; if horsemen, Coches: if they had lands, he would give them town-ships: if towns, cities for their reward; and as for their wages, that they should have it not by tale, but by weight, paied down unto them. Hereupon the Lacedemonians, conceiving that what he asked at their hands, was but right, and that this war would sort out to their advantage, taking no notice against whom it was, decreed to send him aide: seeking to ingratiate themselves with Cyrus, and if things fell out otherwise than well, yet they had a fair excuse to Artaxerxes, that they had decreed nothing against him in person, and the Ephory dispatched away presently their letters to their Ammiral at Samos, to do whatever Cyrus required at his hands. [Xeno. lib. 3. Hellen. Diodor. year 4. Olympiade 94. Justin lib. 5. cap. ult. Plutarch in the Life of Artaxerxes.] 4313.

The Lacedemonian Ammiral therefore with his ships put over to Ephesus, there to meet with Tamos the Egyptian, Ammiral to Cyrus, and offered him his service to the uttermost of his power, he joyned his fleet with his; and attending him from thence round about the coast of Ionia, unto Caria, wrought so, that Syenesis, who commanded all there, could not stir to hinder Cyrus in his march by land against his brother, [Xenophon and Diodor. ib. with Xenophon, Cy. lib. 1. pag. 348, and 352.] Diodorus saith, that the Lacedemonian Ammiral at Samos, whose name also was Samus, had 25. and Tamos, 50 saile: whereas upon the more assured testimony of Xenophon, in his book of this journey, undertaken by Cyrus, Tamos had onely 25 saile, and Pythagoras the Lacedemonian, (for him he maketh the other Ammiral, and not Samus) 35.

Cyrus having now his army on foot, and resolved to march into the upper Asia, gave it out, that he went against the Pisidians, which, said he, make often inrodes upon places of my government, and thereupon sent for Clearchus the Lacedemonian, Aristippus of Thessaly, Xenes of Arcadia, the banishment of Miletus, and the Army which lay at the siege of Miletus, Proxenus a Beotian, with all the power he could make, Grecians or others to repair unto him with all speed to Sardes, [Exen. de Exped. Cy. lib. 1.

Tissaphernes perceiving that greater preparations were made, then a bare going
b. against the Pisidians could require, with a troop of 500 horse, hasted him away; with all the speed he could possibly make to Artaxerxes, who enformed hereof by him, began presently to make provisions for the war, [Xenoph. de Exped. Cy. lib. 1.]

Cyrus, having left some trusty Persians, friends of his to look to Lydia, and entrusting Tamos, his Ammiral, an Egyptian born, but a sure carde, to take care of the cities of Ionia and Eolia in his absence; himself with his army, marched towards Caria and Pisidia, giving still out, that certain persons in those parts, began to grow unruly, [Diodor.]

But how Cyrus gathered his army, and with them marched up against his brother; and how the battail was fought between them; and how Cyrus perished in it, and how those Grecians that went with him, came back again safe to the sea, (i.e.) into Asia the lesse) Themistogenes of Syracusa hath delivered, saith Xenophon, in the beginning of the third book of his Grecian History, with which place of Xenophon, we are to compare that saying of Plutarch, in his book, [de Gloria Atheniensium] where he saith, Ξενοφῶν αὐτὸς ἑαυτοῦ γέγονεν ἱστορία, γράψας ἃ ἐστρατήγησε, καὶ κατώρθωσε, καὶ Θεμιστογένη περὶ τούτων συντετάχθαι τὸν Συρακούσιον, ἵνα πιστότερος ᾖ διηγούμενος ἑαυτὸν ὡς ἄλλον, ἑτέρῳ τὴν τῶν λόγων δόξαν χαριζόμενος, (i.) Xenophon wrote a history of himself; setting down how he played the Captain, and what feats he did, and then made as if Themistogenes of Syracusa had written it; giving away the glory of this his writing to another man, that the things therein written of himself, might finde the more credit in the world. And another place in Suidas, where he sheweth, Κύρου ἀνάβασιν ἥτις ἐν τοῖς Ξενοφῶντος ἑλληνικοῖς φέρεται καὶ ἄλλα τινὰ περὶ τῆς ἑαυτοῦ πατρίδος, &c. (i. e.) That the Expedition of Cyrus, which commonly goes with Xenophons History of the Grecians, and some other Pieces concerning his own country, were all of Xenophons own writing: For indeed, these books of the Expedition of Cyrus, went heretofore with the rest of his Grecian Histories. In the end whereof, he plainly sayes, that the writer thereof, was present in all that Action: and therefore the work it self, which is full every where of Xenophons worthy acts therein, is attributed to him; not onely by Plutarch, but long before him by Cicero, Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, Hermogenes, Laertius, Athenæus, and (not to speak of our Divines, Eusebius, and Jerom) by Arianus of Nicomedia; who also had the surname of New Xenophon put upon him, as we read in Photius and Suidas: both because he comprised the discourses of his master Epictetus in 4 books, as Xenophon had done those of his master Socrates, in the like number; and also, for that as Xenophon had written that Expedition of Cyrus in 7 books, so he had written the Expedition of Alexander in as many: though he in his Anabasis, or Expedition of Alexander did not altogether imitate that former Anabasis or Expidition of Cyrus, because that hath a brief Proeme to every book, but none to the book in general, as Laertius hath observed; whereas this in every book, save the sixth, maketh a transition, by way of an epilogue or summary of the precedent books, which because Xenophon useth not in his, with some other occurrents in those books which relish not altogether of Xenophon; therefore I rather encline to think, that these books were of Themistogenes his writing, and not of Xenophons. However, following the authority of those ancient Worthies, I have all along cited him by the name of Xenophon, as they have done before me.

Now of those five heads, mentioned by Xenophon in his said 3 book Hellenic. and said to have been written by Themistogenes, the four first are wholy comprised in the first book of this Anabasis, or Expedition of Cyrus. 1. The gathering of his army. 2. Their marching into the Upper Asia, and coming to the place where they fought. 3. The manner and issue of the fight it self: and 4. The fall of Cyrus in that battel.

For Cyrus moving from Sardes, (where Xenophon met him being sent for from Athens by Proxenus the Bœotian, and there listed himself for the action, as we find in the 3 book) came to Celænæ in Phrygia, and there stayed 30 dayes: in which time Clearchus, and other Greek Commanders came from divers parts, and by sundry ways unto him: and there, upon a general muster, were found enrolled, eleven thousand Corsletes, and about two thousand Targateers.

From Celænæ Cyrus came with this army to the bank of Cayster, where he received money from Epiaxa: Syenesis, the King of Cilicia his wife, (with whom Cyrus was thought formerly to have been too familiar) and therewith paid his army (with whom he was then 3 moneths behind, at which they much repined) four full moneths wages. Epiaxa came five dayes before Cyrus to Tarsus in Cilicia; and by her perswasion, her husband Syenesias, coming thither also to him; gave him a vast summe of money toward the relief and maintenance of his army: And both Ctesias and Diodorus adde, that Syenesis, like a wise man, supplied Cyrus and Artaxerxes too, with necessaries for the war. For having two sons, he sent one of them to Cyrus with a competent number of men for his service, but had sent away the other privily beforehand to Artaxerxes, to let him know, that having such an army come upon him, he durst not but keep fair with Cyrus, and openly joyn with him, neverthelesse that he continued a true servant in heart to Artaxerxes, and would fall over to him so soon as he could spie out his opportunity. Cyrus stayed 20 dayes at Tarsus, where the Grecian companies told him plainly, they would march no further. But Clearchus by his wisdom took them off from that mood; and so they came to Issus, which was the utmost city of Cilicia, where Cyrus his Fleet met him, bringing him 700. Diodorus saith 800. Corseleteers: which the Lacedemonians had sent him under the command of Chirosophus; and there also 400. Corseleteers, which had formerly served Artaxerxes under their Captain Abrocomus, came into his Camp: but Abrocomus himself, leaving Phœnicia with 300. thousand men, marched away to Artaxerxes, though he came not to him till five dayes before the fight: so that by his abandoning the place, Cyrus passed the gates, or streights of Syria, and so came without stop or hinderance to the place where the fight shortly after was; having made in all from Ephesus to that place, 93 stages or dayes journeys, and in them marched 535 Parasanges, which make 16050. furlongs.

The place where the fight at last was, was called Cynaxa, as Plutarch saith; and is 500. furlongs from Babylon: from whence, whereas it is said in the 2 book of the Expedition of Cyrus, that the fight was 3060, furlongs from Babylon. Jacobus Capellus, thinks it should be read, from Susa. In the army of Cyrus there were reckoned of the Grecians, upon the point of 13 thousand men (though Justin. lib. 5. cap. ult. sayes, there were not above 10 thousand) of which there were 10 thousand 4 hundred Corseleteers, 2500. Targateers; and of other nations 100 thousand, and near upon 20 hooked chariots. Of Artaxerxes his part; there were 900 thousand men, and 15 hundred hooked chariots: but but Ctesias Cnidius, who was in the battel, quoted by Plutarch, and Ephorus, cited by Diodorus, say there were in his army but 400 thousand onely. In the fight there died of Artaxerxes his side 15 thousand, as Diodorus saith, of the other 3 thousand: but Ctesias in Plutarch affirmeth, that the number of the slain given in to Artaxerxes, was not above 9 thousand; but that in his judgement, there could be no lesse than 20 thousand lost that day. But whatever the number was, this battel was fought the 4 year Olympiade 94. when Xenænetus was Pretor or L. Chancelor in Athens, one year before Socrates was there put to death; as [Diogenes Laertius reporteth in the life of Socrates.]

In this fight the two brothers met, and Artaxerxes was first wounded thorough his coat of armour; which wound Ctesias saith that himselfe did cure. But Cyrus carried on with this good successe against his brother, spared for no danger, and so was slain by an unknown hand in the battel. Artaxerxes spent his rage upon the dead body of his brother, severing his head from the body of him, and cutting off the hand that had wounded him from his arme, and carried it about in a triumphant manner: which his sorrowful mother, coming her self to babylon, with much adoe got together, and carrying his reliques to Babylon, there bestowed burial on them. This encounter of the two brothers, is more amply delivered by Plutarch, out of Ctesias and Dinon.

The King coming to rifle his Camp, there found and took Cyrus his Concubine, a woman so much renowned for her wit and beauty, [Xenoph. lib. 1. Exped. Cy.] She was a Phocæan, born in Ionia, the daughter of one Hermotimus, called at first by the name of Mitto: but afterward by Cyrus (because she seemed nothing inferior to Aspasia the Miletian, who was Pericles his Mistresse, of whom I spake before, in the year of the World 3564.) Aspasia. Artaxerxes was wounderfully desirous to get her into his hands; and when she was brought bound unto him, he grew exceedingly wrath with those which so brought her, and laid them in irons for their paines: and ever after esteemed her above all the Harlots he kept, (which were in number 360. all choice beauties) and most doted on her, [Plut. in the lives of Pericles and Artaxerxes. Elian. Var. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 1. Justin. lib. 10. cap. 2.]

The Grecians, on the other side, not knowing what was befallen to Cyrus, kept on fighting still, and in their quarter beat Tissaphernes, and all his power; in which squadron yet of the Grecians there were not in all, above six thousand, as Isocrates tells us, in his Panegyric: adding, that they were none of the choicest Grecians neither: but the meer refuse of them, and such as could no longer live at their own homes: and these now in a strange country, forsaken of their fellows, betrayed by their companies, and bereft of their Captain, whom they followed to this war. But the King coming with the maine of his army to the rescue of Tissaphernes, fell upon their Camp and rifled it, which yet they returning from the pursuit of Tissaphernes, recovered and beat the King out of it again; and lodged therein that night, supperlesse for the most part that night, as well as dinnerlesse the day before. And here ends Xenophons first book of Cyrus his voyage.

The second book sets forth, how these Grecians under the command of Clearchus their Leader, intended to return home again: and how Tissaphernes promising to convoy them back with his own forces; and to be himself their guide on the way: and breaking this promise and league and oath made unto them, procured Clearchus, with Proxenus, Agias, and Socrates, Colonels, and 20 more Captains of companies, and 200 common souldiers, to be murdered. Ctesias also in his Persian History, (which the author of this book of the voyage of Cyrus had undoubtedly read) had formerly told us, how cunningly Tissaphernes, by the meanes of one Menon a Thessalian borne, and by his jugling, and by his swearing and forswearing had gotten Clearchus, and the rest above mentioned into his hands, and sent them away fast bound in irons, to the King at Babylon; and how Ctesias himself, who was Physitian to Parysatis the Kings mother, did by her meanes do many good offices to Clearchus, whiles he lay there in prison: and how the King at her sute, had promised and sworne too, that Clearchus should have no harme: and yet neverthelesse, how the King afterward by the means and instigation of Statyra his Queen, caused Clearchus and all the rest of the Commanders, Menon onely excepted, to be butchered; and how all the rest of the bodies were thrown out and devoured by wilde beasts and birds, onely the body of Clearchus was covered with a huge sand-hill, cast up over it by a mighty winde, and so preserved, [Ctesias in the Collections of Photius, and Plut. in the life of Artaxerxes.]

d. In the third book, and the four following, is declared how the rest of the Grecians, who kept themselves out of Tissaphernes his clutches, returned into their own country: and how the souldiers by the perswasion of Xenophon, having lost their old ones, chose them new Captains to command them, (of whom Xenophon himself was one, chosen in the roome of Proxenus) and by their conduct, passed thorough so many Countries of the enemy, and endured so much cold in the Winter season, and infinite other miseries and dangers, and thorough them all came safe home at at last: the summe whereof is to be found in [Diodorus Siculus, in the History of year 4. Olympiade 94.] to which a man may adde, what is in Isocrates his Panegyric.

Artaxerxes, for his good service in this war, bestowed upon Tissaphernes all the Governments which his brother Cyrus held, besides what he had before, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. Diod. year 4. Olympiade, 94.] and having heaped many other large gifts and favours upon him; gave him above all, his own daughter to wife; and used him ever after as his most confident friend and servant, [Diod. ib.]

The Carian, who wounded Cyrus in the thigh, so that thereof he died, Parysatis, the kings mother caused, after ten dayes torment, his eyes pulled out, and boyling lead powred in at his ear-holes, to be done to death. Mithridates, who gave Cyrus his first wound, and in his cups afterward, bragg'd that he had killed him, was put between two boats, and there lay 17 dayes, and untill he was eaten out with wormes: as for Bagabæus, Artaxerxes his Eunuch, who at his command, had cut off Cyrus his head, and right hand, Parysates wan him of the king at Dice, and having gotten him; caused him to be flead alive; and then his body to be laid athwart three crosses, and his flead skin to be hung up by it; and then Parysatis, at the humble suit of the king her son, left of mourning for Cyrus, [Ctesias, and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes.]

Parysatis, caused the Queen Statyra, hir daughter in law, to be poisoned in this manner, Statyra had a maid servant about her, which was all in all with her, called Gingis or Gigis: whom Dinon saies to have been a voluntary instrument in her death: Ctesias, that her hand indeed was used in it, but against her will: him which gave the poyson, Ctesias calls Bellitara, but Dinon, Melantas: There is a little bird in Persia, called Rhintaces, or Rhindaces; which hath no excrements at all; but all her guts are fully stuft with fat: one of these birds, Parysatis, as she sate at table with Statyra, took and cut in two with a knife, which was poysoned on the one side, gave the one halfe, which was toward the poysoned side, to her, and the other she took and ate her self: as Ctesias thinks: But Dinon saith, that not Parysatis her self, but Melanta her maid, carved to her with a poisoned knife; but when the Queen died in extream torments after it, the king suspected his mother for it, as one who knew well the cruelty and implacable disposition of her nature; and caused her servants and carvers to be questioned, and had to the rack about it. But Parysatis kept Gingis a long time in her own chamber; and though the king required her, yet would she not give her up to justice, till at last, Ginges her self desiring she might steale to her own lodging by night, Artaxerxes took her, and punished her, as a poisoner. As for his mother, he neither did, nor said any hurt to her: but when she asked leave to retire her self to Babylon, he gave it her; but told her withal, that while she lived, he would not come there, [Plutarch, Ibid.]

Aristo, with some others, surprised the city of Cyrene: and in the tumult, slew 500 of the principal men of the inhabitants, of the rest, the better sort escaped by flight. These associating to them, some 3000 of the Messenians, whom the Lacedemonians at this very time, had turned out of their country, came into the open field, against those, who had possessed themselves of their City. In the fight there was a great slaughter made of the Cyrenians on both sides, as for the Messenians, there were scarce any of them left, yet when the fight was ended, the Cyrenians came to an agreement between themselves; and taking an oath each to other, never after to remember by-past injuries, lived in good correspondencie each with other, in the Government of their Commonwealth, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 94.]

3604. Tissaphernes (for whom Pharnabazus is by error crept into Diodorus) being sent by Artaxerxes, to take charge of all the governments in the lesser Asia, would have 4314
drawne into his hands all the cities of Ionia also, [Xenoph. Hellen. l. 3. Diod. year 1. Olymp. 95.]

Now when, upon his coming, all the petty Governors and Cities, who had any ways adhered to Cyrus, grew afraid what would become of them, they all, by their particular messengers, sued to Tissaphernes for his favour; but he that was the chiefest of all, Tamos the Egyptian, of whom I spake a litle before, Governor of Ionia, putting himself, with all his treasure, and sons, all save Gaus, (who became afterward the kings General) aship-board, went with his fleet into Egypt, to Psammyticus the king there, bearing himself bold, upon the many good offices, which he had formerly done unto him; But Psammyticus, casting off all respects of gratitude, for courtesies received, and pity towards a poore suppliant at that time, butchered him and all his children, onely to possesse himself of the ships and treasure, which he had brought; [Diodorus, Ibid.]

The

The Grecians (of whom I spake before) departing from Trapezus, which was the first city of Grecians, which they came unto, and is situated upon the coast of the Euxine sea, in the countrey of Colchos, after three days march, came to another Greek city, and in the same countrey of Colchos, and a sea town, as the other was, called Cerasunta, and there they stayed ten dayes, and mustered their men, whom they found to be 8600. which were remaining of the 10000, which they carried out; the rest were lost either by the enemy in the battle, or by the snow, or other sicknesse in their return: from thence they went thorough the countries of the Mosynæcori, the Chalybes, and Tybarenians and came to a Greek town called Catyora, a colony of the Synopians, eight, or rather, as the order of the history implyeth, five months after the fight in the country of Babylon, having made from thence to this place, 122 stages, or dayes journey, and marched 620 parasanges, 18600 furlongs, and here they staied 45 dayes, [Exped. Cy. lib. 5.]

During their abode here, they made their provision, partly out of the market of Colyora, and partly by such booties, as they got out of the countries adjoyning of Paphlagonia; and on the other hand, the Paphlagonians, if they found any of them stragling from the camp, did as much by them; untill at length Corylas, who was governour of the Paphlagonians, set all things straight between them. Afterward these Grecians getting shipping from those of Heraclea, and Synope, came to Harmone a port town of Synope, where they staied five dayes; and from thence to Heraclea, a plantation of the city of Megara, made in the country of the Myriandeni, and came to a Peninsula, or neck of land there, called Acherusia: here they divided themselves into three companies. The Arcadians, and Achæans, which made above 4500 men, all corseleteers and foot, having gotten shipping of the Heracleans, put themselves speedily aboard; that coming unawares upon the Thracians which inhabited Bithynia, they might get the greater spoile of them, and landing at the port of Calpe, (which is in the middest of their sea coast) by night, went to the next towns and villages, six mile up into the countrey. But these Thracians thus provoked, flew upon them, and slew many of them; for one regiment of them, with their Colonel Smicrates, was quite cut off, and of another company of theirs, there were but eight persons, with their captain Hegesandrus that escaped; the rest were fain to fly to a hill for safeguard; where they were presently close besieged. Chirosophus with 1400 corseletiers, and 700 targateers, (which were themselves Thracians, and had followed Clearchus in that voyage,) went from Heraclea all along the country on foot, and when at length he came into Bithynia, growing there somewhat sickly, he got shipping, and came with his men safe to Calpe. And Xenophon with his brigada, consisting of 17 hundred corseletteers, and 800 targateers, and some 40 horse more or lesse, came by sea into a country which parts those Thracians of Bithynia from the countrey of the Heracleans: and from thence marching thorough the body of the country, came and rescued those, who were besieged in the hill, by the Thracians; and so at last came all together into a body in the port of Calpe, [Ib. lib. 6.]

There died Chirosophus, and in his place, was chosen to succeed, Neo, of an Asinian born; who when he saw his company miserably opprest with hunger and other wants, gathering together, to the number of two thousand men, went a forraging all over the country of Bithinia: these first Pharnabazus set upon with his horse, which he sent to help the Bithynians; and withall, that with their further assistance, he might keep these Grecians from falling upon his government of Phrygia. These horse at first onset, slew of the Grecians no lesse then 500. the rest flying to a hill for safety, were by the coming of Xenophon rescued from the enemy, and so all returned safe to the camp before sun-set. But when Spithridates and Rhathines, came with more companies to succour the Bithynians, the Grecians obtained there a notable victory of them, and in memory thereof, erected a Trophy upon the place, and then returned to their camp by the sea-side, being distant some 7 or 8 miles from thence. After which victory so gotten, their enemies provided for their own indemnity, by driving their cattle, and carrying away their families and goods, from thence into remoter parts. But when the Grecians, having passed quite thorough Bithynia, found nothing to relive themselves withal in the parts where they were, they returned back a day and a nights journey, into Bithynia again, and there found and brought from thence store of prisoners, and sheep and other provisions for their own support: and six dayes after came to Chrysopolis, a city of the Chalcedonians, where they stayed seven dayes; and there sold the booty which they had gotten, [Ibid.]

Pharnabazus fearing least these Greeks would make war upon his country, wrought so with Anaxibius, the Lacedemonian Ammiral, that he transported them all out of Asia to Byzantium: And then Anaxibius returning from thence with Xenophon into Asia, had word sent him to Cyzicum from Aristarchus the new Governour of Byzantium, that Polus was appointed Ammiral in his place, and that he was onward of his way, as far as Hellespont: and therefore sailing from thence to Paros, he sent to Pharnabazus, and demanded the money which he had promised him for transporting the Greeks out of Asia: which not obtaining, he dealt with Xenophon in all haste, to carry them back again into Asia. But Pharnabazus prevailed so far with Aristarchus the Governour of Byzantium, that he brake the neck of that design; whereupon Xenophon was fain to put himself in pay under Senthes the King of Thracia: the winter not being yet over, and the cold so violent, that many of the Greeks lost, some their noses, some their ears thereby, [Ib. lib. 7.] and Diodorus tells us, that part of these Grecians returned into their own country; but that the greatest part of them followed Xenophon into Thracia, to the number almost of 5000. [year 1. Olympiade 95.] whereby it appears, that the number is mistaken in him, where he sayes, that there came to Chrysopolis onely 3800. men, [year 4. Olympiade 94.]

c. The Ionian and other Greek cities thoroughout Asia, partly out of a desire of their own liberty, partly for fear of Tissaphernes, because they had ever preferred Cyrus before him, refused to admit of him; and dispatched away their messengers to the Lacedemonians, praying them, that since they were the Princes and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect nor abandon them, being Greeks, though dwelling in Asia: but would take order, that their country might be kept free from devastation and spoil, and themselves enjoy their liberty as others, [Xen. Hellen. li. 3. Diodor. Sic. year 1. Olympiade 95.]

This petition was very welcome to the Lacedemonians, who, according to the manner of men, the more they had, the more they would have; and not content to have doubled their estate by the accession of the Athenian power, affected now nothing lesse than the soverignty and dominion of all Asia, [Justin. lib. 6. cap. 1.]

The Lacedemonians therefore, promised them aid at first word: and forthwith sent to Tissaphernes, to pray him not to make war upon the Grecian Cities that were in Asia. But he beginning with the city of Cuma, wasted all the Region belonging thereto, and carried many prisoners from thence, and then came with his army, and sate down before the city it self: but because the Winter coming on, he could not take it for the present, he set a great ransom upon the prisoners, and so for that time brake up his Siege, [Diodor. ib.]

Hereupon was Thimbron sent into Asia with an army; wherein were 1000. new made citizens of Laconia; 4000. of Peloponesus, and 300. Athenian horse, who had formerly served the 30 tyrants of Athens: such as the City had rather should be wasted away, and spent in forreign services, than be kept at home to do greater mischief. And to these Thimbron, when he came into Asia, added many more taken out of the cities of the country, [Xenoph.] for at Ephesus, what out of the confederate cities, what out of other places, he listed 2000. and having now an army of 7000. men, he marched some 15 miles further into the country, and at his first assault took Magnesia a city of Tissaphernes his Government. And from thence went to Tralles a city of Ionia, and began to besiege it; but because the situation of it was very strong, he left it, and came back to Magnesia; which was no walled Town: and therefore fearing least so soon as he was gone, Tissaphernes would take it again, he removed it to a hill thereby called Thorax. And then fell to wasting of the enemies country; and thereby exceedingly enriched his army. But hearing that Tissaphernes was coming down upon him with an army of Horse, he retired to Ephesus, [Diodor.] For not being able to encounter his horse, he durst not keep the plain; thinking it enough if he were able to keep the countries, where himself was, from being harrowed and wasted by the enemy.

When as now the Grecians under Xenophon had served Senthes three moneths in Thracia, there came unto them Charminus and Polynicus sent from Thimbron, to tell them, that he had great need of their help in Asia against Tissaphernes: and that he would give them a Daric every man by the moneth for his pay: to every Captain of a company, two Darics, and to every Colonel four. But when Xenophon told them, that for his part, he was purposed to be going home into his own country; the chief of all the army came unto him, and humbly and earnestly besought him not to leave them untill he had carried them from thence, and delivered them into Thimbrons hand: wherefore he went aboard with them, and passed over to Lampsacus; where he met and conferred with Euclide, the Phliasian Poet. Then passing thorough the territory of Troas, they came to Pergamus; where Xenophon was entertained by Hellas the wife of Gongylus of Eretria, and her two sons, Gorgius and Gongylus: by whose advice and counsel, when he had gone about to entrap and take Asidates the Persian, but had failed thereof, and not without great danger to himself and all his company; at length by chance his souldiers lighted on him, took him with his wife and children, and horses, and all that ever they had; which was exceeding much: and presently after came Thimbron to them, and received the army from Xenophons hand; and and mingling them with the rest of the Grecians in his army, he presently led them against Tissaphernes and Pharnabasus, [Exped. Cy. l. 7.]

And here end the seven books of the Expedit. of Cyrus, the writer whereof, whosoever it was, was present in this whole Action, and concludeth his book, with this Epilogue. The Kings Commanders in the countreys which we passed through, were these, Artimas of Lydia, Articamas of Phrygia, Mithridates of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, Siennesis of Cilicia, Dernes of Phenicia and Arabia, Belesis of Syria and Assyria, Rhoparas of Babylonia, Arbacas of Media, Teribazas of Phasis and Iberia, the Carduchi, the Chalybes, the Macrones, the Colchi, the Mosynœci, the Cœti, and the Tybareni had no Governors, but were all free people: Corylas was President of Paphlagonia, Pharnabazus of Bithynia: Seuthes was king of the Thracians, in Europe side. The whole voyage, going and coming, was 215 stages, 1150 parasanges, and 34255 furlongs, or rather 34500, allowing thirty furlongs to every parasange, the whole time of their going and coming, ἀναβάσεως καὶ καταβάσεως, was one whole year and three months.

d. Thimbron growing strong with this new accesse of forces received from Xenophon, durst now pitch down his camp, in the fields, before Tissaphernes his face: and took Pergamus into his hand, upon a voluntary surrender made unto him: so did he Tenthrania and Halisarnia, which were commanded at that time by Eurysthenes and Procles, the descendants of Demaratus of Lacedemon, Gorgius also and Gongylus, the two brothers before mentioned, had already joyned with him; whereof the one held Gambrius and Palegambrius, the other Myrina, and Grinium: and Thymbron himself took in other weaker places by plain force, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3.]

3605. Thymbron, when Larissa, a town in Asia called Egyptia, would not open her gates besieged it; but whiles he lay before it to little purpose, there came letters to him from the Ephori at Sparta, that leaving Larissa, he should march away into Caria: and he was now onward of his way thither as far as Ephesus, when Dercylidas, an excellent Engineere, and for his wit sirnamed another Sisyphus came to succeed him in the charge of the Army. And Thymbron returning to Sparta, was there accused by sundry confederate Cities, for suffering his army to plunder them, and was therefore bannished the City, [Id. ib. Diod. 2 year of the 95 Olympiade.] 4315. 399.

Mania a woman of Dardania, but of a manly spirit, and one who after the death of her husband Zenis, had very happily mannaged the government of Eolia, under Pharnabazus, and had taken in sundry sea townes, as Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colone, was most trecherously murthered by her son in law Midias, when she her self was upward of fourty years of age, and her son of the age of seventeen, was murthered with her, and that done, he seised upon the two strong townes, Scepsis and Gergitha, wherein she had principally laid up her treasure, the rest of the townes, the garrisons that were in them held good for Pharnabazus: whereupon Midias sent unto Pharnabazus, his messengers, with great presents, desiring that he might hold the whole government of those parts, upon the same termes, that Mania did: but all in vaine; for Pharnabazus returned him answer, that he should never enjoy himself more, if he left that murther of his, committed upon Mania, unrevenged, [Xenoph. ib. with Polya. l. 8. in Tania, or Phania, for so by misprinting, is Mania there called.]

Dercylidas, when he saw, that he had to do, with Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes both, two great commanders, and both borne up with mighty armies; but saw withal, that they were at variance between themselves, closed with Tissaphernes, and made peace with him, [Id. ib. with Justin lib. 6. cap. 1.] where yet Hercylidas is put for Dercylidas.

Dercylidas, having first conferred with Tissaphernes, marched fairely, and without any spoile of the country, into Eolia, which was under Pharnabazus his Government, unto whom he bare also a particular grudge, for an affront received from him, whiles he commanded at Abydus, under Lysander: and in a trice possessed himself of Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colonæ, which submitted to him of their own accord (where by the way it is to be noted, that Diodorus Siculus, instead of Larissa, hath Arisba.) and proceeding on, he took in Neandrus, and Ilium, in the same manner; nor did the Cocylitæ stand out at all against him: Cebrene also, a very strong and fortified City, for fear of an assault, which they saw ready to be made, yeilded to him: whereupon, leaving a good garrison there, he marched forthwith, with the rest of his army to Scepsis and Gergithe; where when Midias, who feared no lesse the very inhabitants of the place, than he did Pharnabazus, coming forth upon hostages taken, to a parly, and beginning to treate of an association of armes against a common enemy, Dercylidas laid hold on him, and told him plainly, that there was no hope of any friendship between them two, unlesse he would presently set all the citizens of those places which he held, at liberty, to live each of them according to their own lawes. And thereupon marching into Scepsis with him, and there having done sacrifice to Minerva, and turning out Midias his soldiers, he perswaded the inhabitants of the place, to maintain their liberty: now they had had it restored to them. And from thence going to Gergithe with his army, when Midias desired that he would at least leave him that city, but could not be heard; he commanded to open the gates, and Dercylidas entered that likewise, and finding there the moneys which Mania had laid up, sufficient to maintain an army of eight thousand men, for all most a whole year, he took that into his own hands, and sent back Midias, to live a private life at Scepsis. And so Xenophon tells us, that in eight dayes space, he took in nine several cities. And Diodor. the 2 year of the 95 Olympiade, writes that, what by plain force, what by tricks, he possessed himself in a very short time of all the cities, and country of Troas.

There was a quarrel grown between Artaxerxes, and Euagoras the king of Salamis in the Isle of Cyprus, who had turned out from thence, him that was the Lord of the place, and one whom Artaxerxes wished very well unto, called Abdemon Thyrsius, or, as Theopompus, in the Excerpta Photii, nu. 176. calls him, Abdymon Cityces. This quarrel therefore was now composed between them two, by the mediation of Conon the Athenian, who had sometime lived with Euagoras, and of Ctesias the Cnidian, who had long lived in the Court in Persia, upon condition, that Euagoras should pay a certain tribute to Artaxerxes, and a present also was sent to Satibarzanes; Ctesias also sent letters to Euagoras, to make an attonement with Anaxagoras a king of the Cyprians; which with others of like kind, written by Euagoras and Conon, Ctesias hath all inserted into his History of the Persian affairs.

Dercylidas having gone thus far in these parts, sent to Pharnabazus, to know whether he would have war or peace, and Pharnabazus, being afraid what might betide unto Phrygia, where himself did constantly dwell, and which bordered upon Eolia, which was now all in Dercylidas his hand; desired a truce, [Xenophon Hellen. 3.]

3606. This truce concluded, Dercylidas marched away into that part of Bithynia, which 4316.
a. the Thracians held, and there wintered; which Pharnabazus liked well enough of, because the Thracians of of that countrey made often inrodes upon Phrygia and Dercylidas plundering that part of Bithynia, at his pleasure, wanted no provision for his winter quartering, [Id. ib.]

Certain Odrysian horse to the number of 200, and 300 targateers, being sent from Senthes King of Thracia, to aide Dercylidas, upon their first coming, went a forraging into Bithynia, and were there almost all cut off. But afterward keeping themselves close with the Lacedemonian army, they wasted the borders and territories of the Bithynians very sorely, [Ib.]

The spring coming on, Dercylidas removed out of Bithynia, and came to Lampsacus, where he understood by three Ambassadors come from Sparta, that his command was continued to him for another year. The same Ambassadors also, by command from the Ephori, told the army there, that in former time the souldiers had been extremly injurious to their allies and confederates, and commended them, for their good behaviour that way: whereunto answer was made by him, that commanded those who had formerly followed Cyrus in his wars, that the souldiers were still the same, but that different Commanders, had caused a different behaviour in them. This done, Dercylidas sent away the Ambassadors from Ephesus to take their journy thorough the Grecian cities and countries in those parts, telling them how glad he was, that they should find them all in so peaceable and flourishing a state as they should do, [Ibid.]

c. When the Ambassadors were gone, Dercylidas sent again to Pharnabazus, to know whether he would have the last winters truce to continue, or whether he would have war. And when he desired the continuance of the truce, he passed forthwith with his army over the Hellespont, and came into the Chersonesus of Thracia, which contained 37 furlongs, all which he enclosed with a strong wall. This work he began in the spring, and finished it before the beginning of Autumne, [Id. ib. with Diodor. Sic. year 2. Olympiade 95. where, contrary to his custom, he delivers the gests of two years in one discourse.]

Conon the Athenian wrote his letters from Cyprus to Artaxerxes, concerning his own affairs, which he desired to be presented to him, either by Zenon of Crete, a dancer, or by Polycritus of Mendes a Physitian, or in their absence, by Ctesias, who was likewise a Physitian. It is said, that this letter coming to Ctesias his hand, he added thereto of his own, that he prayed the king, to send Ctesias unto him, as a man very necessary for the kings service, in those parts, especially in matters belonging to the sea. But Ctesias himself writes, that the king of his own accord, sent and imployed himself in that service, [Plutarch in Artaxerxes,] which letters of Conon to the King, and to himself, as also the speech which he used to the King ament that matter, he hath inserted into his own History; where he relates also, how, when at the same time the Lacedemonians had sent Ambassadors to the King, he committed them to custody; and kept them there.

Pharnabazus

Pharnabazus having made truce with Dercylidas, took a journey to the king : and there charged Tissaphernes before him, for that when the Lacedemonians had sent an army into Asia, he had not only not opposed them, but had moreover maintained them there at the Kings charge ; telling him that it was a shame, that the Kings war should not be pursued to an end, but bought out; and that his enemies should be bribed with money, and not beaten out with armes : and perswaded the King to furnish out a fleet, and make Conon the Athenian, Ammiral of it. By whose perswasion, together with the advice of Euagoras the King of Cyprus, the King presently commanded 500 talents to be consigned into Pharnabazus his hand ; and commanded him to commit the charge of the Phenician fleet unto Conon, and to make him commander in chief, over all his maritime affaires, [Diod. year 2. of the 95 Olympiade, with Isocrates in his Euagoras : and in his Oration ad Philip. and Pausanias, in Atticis, and Justinus, lib. 6. cap. 1.]

Pausanias returning from Court, having conferred with Conon, about what course to be held, made him Ammiral of the seas : making him many large promises on the Kings behalf : Conon taking the charge upon him, but not fully furnished with a fleet, took 40 ships, which he had then readie, and with them sailed into Cilicia, and there provided to begin the war, [Diod ib.]

4. Ctesias being sent away by Artaxerxes to the sea side, went from thence first into Cnidia his own country, and from thence to Sparta, as himself saies, toward the end of his History ; which as Diodorus saith, he ended with the third year of this 95 Olympiade.

Dercylidas returning out of Chersonese into Asia, going in progresse over the cities, found that the banditoes of Chios, had possessed themselves of Atarne, and from thence making sundry inrodes upon Ionia, lived upon the spoile thereof; and although the town it self was strong, and well provided of victuals, yet he went and laid siege thereto, and continued before it, full eight moneths space, [Xenophon, Hellenic. lib. 3.]

3607. In the end, when they were forced to render themselves, he committed the keeping thereof to one Dracon of Pellene; but himself, having furnished that place with ample provisions, that he might have it for a sure retreat, if need were, went to Ephesus, 4317. 397.
[Id. ib.]

When the Embassadors from Ionia came to Sparta, and there declared, that if Caria, where Tissaphernes constantly resided, were invaded, they conceived that Tissaphernes would quickly grant them leave to live according to their own lawes, the Ephori wrote to Dercylidas, that he should march into Caria with his army, and to Pharaces their Ammiral, that he should saile with his fleet, into those parts also, [Ibid.]

The same time also, Pharnabazus went to Tissaphernes, partly for that he was the chief General, partly to let him know, that he for his part was ready to joyne with him in making war upon the Grecians : and therefore first took him along with him into Caria, to settle matters there ; and having put garrisons there, returned with him into Ionia. But Dercylidas hearing that they had passed the river Meander, and having conferred with Pharaces, and shewed him, that he feared least Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, would both fall down with their armies into Ionia, being now destitute of garrisons, put over the Meander likewise, [Ibid.]

In the Persian army there were 20000 foot and 10000 horse; but Dercylidas was not in all above 7000 strong, [Diodor. 2 year of the 95 Olympiade.] And now as many soldiers as were there out of Peloponesus, stood firme, and prepared to fight : but as many as were there out of Priene and Achilium, as likewise out of the Isles, and other townes of Ionia, partly threw away their armes into the corne, which was then in great store, growing in the fields lying upon the Meander, and ran away partly when they came to fight, shewed well enough that they meant not to stand to it : yet Tissaphernes, remembring how the Grecians which were in Cyrus his army, had plaid the men in that fight against himself, and imagining that all Grecians would prove like them, durst not set upon them, as Pharnabazus would have had him : but sending to Dercyldias, told him that he desired to come to a parly with him, whereupon, upon hostages enterchangably given and taken, they fell to treat of a peace; Dercylidas demanded, that the King should suffer all the Grecian cities to be free, and enjoy their liberty : Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, that the Lacedemonian forces should withdraw out of the countreys of the kings dominions, and their commanders out of the cities, and the truce was to continue, till Dercylidas could receive an answer from Sparta thereupon : and Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus from the K. and so both armies drew out of the field, the Persians returning to Tralles, the other to Leucophris, [Xen. & Diod. ut supra.]

a rigging, others upon the stocks, and a Navy of 300. sail providing, put himself aboard the first ship that he found bound for Greece; and coming to Sparta, informed them, what a Fleet was there in providing: but whither bound, or for what purpose he said, he could not tell. The Lacedemonians were much troubled hereat: And Agesilaus one of their two Kings, being put on by Lysander, offered himself to go in person with an army into Asia against the Persians: and to take with him 30 men of Sparta, whom they should chuse by their advice, to mannage that war. The first of whom was Lysander, who hoped by this occasion to restore again the Decemvirates thoroughout all the cities in Asia, which himself had heretofore set up: and which the Ephori afterward had abolished, commanding every city, to live according to their own laws. So Agesilaus taking with him 2 thousand of the new made Citizens of Sparta, and 6 thousand out of their confederate cities, with as much provision as would serve for six moneths, loosed from Geræsium, a Port in Eubæa, with all the Forces that he could there make, and came to Ephesus; and that so speedily, as he landed there before ever Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus heard of his setting forth: whereby it came to passe, that he found them there, all as unprovided, as himself could wish, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3.] and in his Oration, of Agesilaus, with Plutarch and Emil. Probus, in their several lives of Agesilaus, and Pausa. in Laconicis: who yet sayes, that he landed first at Sardes.

And now having raised 4 thousand souldiers more at Ephesus, he drew into the field with 10 thousand foot, and 4 hundred, or (as the Latine translation hath it) 4 thousand horse: unto which were joyned a rabble of others, which followed the Camp for pillage, being no fewer in number, than the army it selfe, [Diod. year 4. of the 95. Olympiade.]

Tissaphernes hereupon, sent to him to know what was the cause of his coming into Asia: and his answer was, that he came to restore the Grecian cities there to their liberty and freedom. Tissaphernes hereupon desired him to forbear for 3 moneths, that he might send to the King, bearing him in hand, that he nothing doubted but all should be to his content. Agesilaus hereupon, sent Heripidas, Dercylidas, and Migialius to him, to take an oath of him, that he meant no guile, but would do what possible he could to procure the peace which he had promised: & they on Agesilaus his behalf took an oath, that Tissaphernes performing on his part, they would inviolably keep the truce on their. But Tissaphernes, not regarding his oath taken, sent to the King to encrease his army. And Agesilaus, though he knew well what he intended, yet kept the truce made on his part, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. and in his book of Agesilaus; with Plutarch and Emil. Probus. in Agesil.]

Whiles Agesilaus lay still at Ephesus, all things grew to a confusion in the cities; because neither the Democratical government was observed with the Athenians, nor the Decemviral, which Lysander had set up, was observed among them; all became suitors to Lysander, a man well known among them, that he would obtain of Agesilaus for them what they desired. Hereupon it was, that Lysander had ever a great court of attendants and suitors about him: so that Lysander now seemed to be King, and Agesilaus a private man. This was a web in Agesilaus his eye, and therefore he began first to take the administration of matters out of his hand, and to lessen his authority: then sent he him on an errand into Hellespont; where when Lysander found that Spithridates, a Persian, (Plutarch calls him Mithridates) was over-born by Pharnabazus, he desired to speak with him, and upon conference perswaded him, with his children and such wealth as he had, and 200. horse, to fall off from Pharnabazus; and he presently leaving, what he had safe at Cyzicum, with his son, came unto him, and he carried them with him to Agesilaus; who was glad to see him, and by him informed himself to the full, how things stood with Pharnabazus, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and Plut. in the life of Agesilaus and Lysander.]

Tissaphernes having gotten fresh supplyes from the King, grew high, and proclaimed open war against Agesilaus; unlesse he would presently leave Asia. Agesilaus was glad hereof, and bad his men provide themselves presently for the war: and withal sent to the Ionians, Eolians, and them of Hellespont, to send him to Ephesus all the strength they could make: and Tissaphernes supposing that he would march into Caria, went himself with his army into Phrygia; and falling suddenly upon the cities there, gat a vast sum of money and other provisions out of them, and so came safe and without any stop, near to Dascylium: where his horse, scouring the country before the army, were met with by the horse of Pharnabazus, and routed; and in that encounter lost 12 men, and 2 horses. But when Agesilaus with his foot came to their rescue, the Persians on the other side retired, having lost one of their men, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Agesilaus, with Plutarch and Emil. Probus in their Agesilaus likewise.]

Agesilaus having spent the greatest part of that Summer in plundering of Phrygia, and the countries adjoyning, and enriched his army; toward the Autumn returned to Ephesus,

Ephesus, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade:] and there spent that Winter, [Emil. Prob. in his Agesilaus.]

3609. Nephereus, al. Nepherites reigned in Egypt 6 years. 4319. 395.

The Lacedemonians sent to him, to joyn with them in armes against the Persian; but he instead of that, sent them tackle and furniture for 100 ships of war, and 30 thousand bushels of wheat, for a present, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade.] Justin calls him Hercinion, and so doth Orosius; treading all along in his steps: and relates the matter in this manner. The Lacedemonians, saith he, crave help by sea of Hercinion, by their Ambassadors: and received from him 100 ships of war fully furnished, and 600 thousand bushels of wheat, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. and Orosius lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Pharax, Ammiral of the Lacedemonian Fleet, seting sail from Rhodes with 120 ships, came to Sasanda a Castle of Caria, distant from Caunus 150 furlongs: and weighing again from thence, set upon the Town of Caunus, and upon Conon the Athenian, who there lay with his 40 ships. But when Artaphernes and Pharnabazus, came with a huge army to the relief of Caunus: Pharax raised his siege, and returned with all his Fleet to Rhodes. After this, Conon gat together to the number of 80 ships, and with them sailed toward Chersonesus. And at the same time the Rhodians keeping out the Peloponesian Fleet, revolted from the Lacedemonian State: and received Conon with all his Fleet, into their Port and City. And it fell out, that the Egyptian Fleet, knowing naught of the alteration there made, came boldly to an anchor under the Island with all their loading of wheat, sent to the Lacedemonians: where Conon with the Rhodians setting upon them, took and brought them all, with their men and loading, into the Port, and stored the place with corn, [Diodor. year 1 Olympiade 96.] but the souldiery mutined against Conon, because the Kings Officers defrauded them of their pay: who therefore asked their pay the more boldly, because they were imployed in so great a service, under so great a Commander as Conon was, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Agesilaus, knowing well that there was no dealing with the enemy in a Champion Country without sufficient horse, set himself to raise Troups on all hands; and therefore gave order thoroughout all the confederate cities, that such of them as were rich and had no mind to serve themselves, should send him in every man a horse, with a rider on him in his stead. And the Spring coming on, commanded all his army to come together at Ephesus: and there trained all sorts, both of horse and foot, with great care and diligence to make them fit and ready for the war. And during such preparation, made the City of Ephesus seem more illustrious than ordinary, as being the very shop, and, as it were, the work-house of so great a war, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Agesilaus: and Plutarch and Emil. Pro. in the same mans life.]

And now a whole year was spent since Agesilaus came from Sparta, and the 30 Commissioners allotted for his Council returned to Sparta; of which Lysander, as I said before, was the prime man, and 30 others were sent in their rooms, of which Heripidas was chief. Of these Agesilaus chose Xenocles, and one more, to command the Horse, and Scythes to command the Foot of the new made Citizens of Sparta, which were all Corselets: and Heripidas to lead them who had served under Cyrus; and Migdon, them which were sent in by the Cities of Asia. And gave it out that he would march out-right into the strongest part of the enemies country, to the end they should all arme and prepare their minds for a hot encounter. And Tissaphernes conceiving that he had given this out of purpose to amuse him a second time, and to keep him at home, marched directly into Caria, commanding his Horse to stay behind, and keep in the plain of Mæander: But Agesilaus did indeed, what he had said; and fell on with his whole army into the country of Sardes. And when he had marched 3 dayes and saw no enemy appear, he gathered there a huge stock of all kind of provisions for his army. On the 4 day the enemies Horse came in sight, and finding the Grecians scattered abroad, and busie about the plunder of the country; fell upon them, and slew a great part of them. To whose rescue when Agesilaus came, and considered with himself, that the enemies Foot was not yet come up, and that himself was ready at all points, he set upon the enemy near the River Pactolus, and there gat a great victory of them: and possessing himself of their Camp, and having all now, both friends and enemies goods in his hands, he found there among other riches, amounting to above 70 talents of money, and all his camels, which he afterward carried with him into Greece. But Tissaphernes lay all this while at Sardes: and was therefore blamed and accused by the Persians, as a desertor, and a plain betrayer of them.

So Xenophon: But Diodorus, sayes, that Tissaphernes was present in the fight with 10 thousand Horse, and 50 thousand Foot: and that Agesilaus, coming down from the hill country of Sipalus, and over-running all the plaine about Sardes it self, wasted all, and destroyed among others things a goodly Park or Garden of Tissaphernes his own, enclosed and set with all sorts of trees and other things for pleasure, infinitely sumpsumptuous, and of most exquisite workmanship and beauty. And that turning from thence, he sent Xenocles with 14 thousand men, to lye in ambush midway, between Sardes and Tybarnæ, to intercept certain Persians, which were to passe that way: and that fighting a second time with the Persians, he overcame them again, and slew upward of six thousand of them; and took a great multitude prisoners, and seized on their camp, stored with infinite riches: and that after all this done, Tissaphernes fled to Sardes, and Agesilaus returned to the sea side with his army. Pausanias also in his Laconica, writeth, that Agesilaus fought with Tissaphernes in the champion country of Hermus; and there overthrew not onely the horse, but also the foot army of the Persians, which was the greatest number that ever they had in one body, next that of Xerxes, with which he passed into Greece, and that other of Darius, which he carried into Scythia. But tis best relying upon Xenophons credit in this point: who was not onely Reader to Agesilaus, (as Cicero 3 de Oratore affirmeth,) at leastwise, was very intimate and familiar with him, (as Emil. Pro. sayes in the Life of Agesilaus, and Diogenes Laertius, in the Life of Xenophon reporteth) but was also with him in all this service in Asia; and the next year returned with him into Greece.

Conon, Ammiral of the Persian fleet, having often sollicitated the king, by his letters for pay for the Navy, and doing no good that way, at the length made a journey to him himself; Pharnabazus also putting him foreward to accuse Tissaphernes of treason to the King; wherefore committing the charge of the Navy to Hieronimus and Nicodemus (both of Athens) in his absence; he sailed into Cilicia, and from thence coming to Thapsacum in Syria, he put himself into a barge, and so came down the river Euphrates unto Babylon: There addressing himself as the manner was to Tithraustes the Chiliarch or chief Coronel, who holds as I said before, the first place next the King, he shewed him what he was, and that he desired to speak with the King. But when he could not be admitted to the presence or speech with the King without adoration, (i. e.) prostration first used to him, he was fain to do his businesse with him, by entercourse of letters and messengers: whereby yet he so far prevailed, that the king declared Tissaphernes to be a Traitor to him; and bad Conon to take charge of the war against the Lacedemonians, and to make paimaster of the Navy, whom ever he pleased to nominate to that office. And so being highly rewarded for his service, was dispatched away to the sea-side, with power to command what shipping he thought fit of the Cypriots and Phenicians, for the guard of the sea against the next summer, and Pharnabazus was assigned to him, for an Assistant or Coadjutor, as himself desired, [Diodor. year 1, of the 96 Olympiade, Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. Emil. Pro. in the Life of Conon.]

As concerning the Cypriots, it is to be observed; that in the very time, whiles there passed courtesies and presents enterchangeably between Artaxerxes and them, the King intended war against them, ten whole years before it came to an end, eight whereof he spent in meer preparations making for it; as we shall shew hereafter, when we come to the fourth year of the 98 Olympiade, out of Diod. Sic. speaking of the issue of that war, of which 8 years, it seems that six were spent, at what time Isocrates made that his Panegirical oration, whereby speaking of those many vain attempts made upon Euagoras in Artaxerxes, he useth these words; He made, saith he war upon Euagoras, who was Lord but of one poor city in Cyprus, and one who had formerly rendred himself unto him, and became his vassal, and lived in an Island, and had suffered a great losse at sea; and had not above three thousand targateers to maintain his state withall; and yet, thus weak as he is, the king hath not been able to have his will of him, though he hath now spent six whole years in a war against him.

Parysatis the Queen-mother, egging the King on against Tissaphernes, for the hatred which she bare him for her son Cyrus his sake, he committed the charge of that war to Tithraustes, giving him letters to the cities and Commanders in those parts, whereby he commanded them all to do what ever Tithraustes commanded, [Diod. year 1. of the 98 Olympiade.]

He gave him also at his departure two several letters to Tissaphernes himself; willing him to go on with the war against the Lacedemonians; and one in speciall to Ariæus the Commander of Larissa, requiring him to be assisting to Tithraustes, in the making away of Tissaphernes. Those Tithraustes delivered to him so soon as he came to Colossæ in Phrygia: and Ariæus having read them, sent presently to Tissaphernes, praying him to come to Colossæ, there to consult about the Kings affairs, especially concerning the war against the Grecians: whereupon he fearing no hurt, left his army at Sardes, and came with all speed to Colossæ, with a troop of 300 Arcadians, and Milesians in his company, and took up his lodging in Ariæus his house; and there going into a Bath, layed aside his sword: there Ariæus with his servants seized on him, and clapping him into a close Coach, sent him away prisoner to Tithraustes; who carrying him as far as to Celæna, there cut off his head, and sent it to Artaxerxes: and Artaxerxes bad carry

carry it to his mother: who was exceeding glad at the sight thereof; and no lesse were all the Grecian women, whose husbands had followed Cyrus in his war, and were afterward by his treachery cut off, when they heard thereof, [Diod. ib. Polyænus stratagem. lib. 7. Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his book of Agesilaus, and Plut. in the lives of Artax. and Agesilaus.]

Tithraustes sent messengers to Agesilaus, to let him know that the Author of this late war, Tissaphernes, had suffered his due punishment for it; and that the King now thought it great reason, that he should withdraw himself with his army, out of Asia: and to leave the cities there, to the use of their own laws, paying the King their former tribute: And when Agesilaus answered him that he could not so do, without the consent and order of his country, which had imployed him; at length they came to this agreement, that he with his army, should withdraw into Pharnabazus his Government; receiving for the entertainment of them, 30 talents, untill he could receive an answer from Sparta, what he was to do: so saith Xenophon [lib. 3. Hellen.] Diodorus only writes, that Tithraustes having drawn Agesilaus to a parly, made a truce with him onely for 6 months: and Xenophon in his book, written of the praises of Agesilaus, addeth further, that when Tithraustes offered him a great summe of mony, if he would withdraw out of the kings territories, Agesilaus answered him in this wise, Tithraustes, said he, we hold it with us, more honour for a General, to enrich his army, rather than himself; and to take spoiles from his enemies, rather than rewards.

Whiles Agesilaus was upon his march towards Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his command; he received a Scytala, or a letter, from the Magistrates of Sparta, that he should take charge of the Navy, as well as of the land army, and to make Ammiral thereof, whom he thought fit; whereupon, he in a short time, what by the publique contribution of the cities, what by the beneficence of private men, who were desirous to gratifie him in his own person, made up a Navy of 120 saile: and gave the command of them to Pisander, his wives brother, a man desirous indeed of praise and honour, and of courage enough, but not much skilled that way, [Xen. l. 3. Hellen. Plut. in his Agesilaus. Pausan. in his Laconica.]

Pisander being dispatched away to the Navy, and himself holding on his way into Phrygia. Tithraustes perceiving that Agesilaus had no meaning to leave Asia, but rather conceived great hopes of vanquishing the King there right, sent Timocrates of Rhodes (for so Plutarch also calls him in his Laconical Apophthegmes, however the name of Hermocrates be crept in, in his life of Artaxerxes) into Greece, with gold, amounting to the quantity of 50 talents of silver: whereby it came to passe, that the chief Cities, being bribed, conspired together, and raised a common war on the behalf of the Athenians, against the Lacedemonian party, [Xenoph. ibid. Plut. in his Artax. Pausanias in his Laconica and Messenica.]

3610. Agesilaus therefore entering into Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his Government, about the beginning of Autumne, burnt and spoiled all that country; taking in all the cities thereof, either by force or voluntary surrender, and then by the perswasion of Spithridates, marched into Paphlagonia, to move them to a revolt from the Persian: And Cotys the King thereof, who was formerly sent for by Artaxerxes, but would not go, now confederated with Agesilaus, and he by Spithridates his perswasion, left there a thousand horse, and two thousand foot to assist him; and he, to recompence Spithridates in some sort, for his service, before he went thence, procured Cotys to take his daughter to wife, [Xenoph. lib. 4. Hellen. and in his Agesilaus: and Plutarch likewise in his.] For Agesilaus was ever very desirous to requite his friends, as appears by that Epistle Laconically written and attributed to him: Νικίας εἰ μὲν μὴ ἀδικεῖ, ἄφες· εἰ δὲ ἀδικεῖ, ἐμοὶ ἄφες, πάντως δὲ ἄφες. (i. e.) If Nicias hath not done you wrong, forgive him: if he hath, forgive him for my sake; however forgive him. [Plutarch in his Agesilaus, and in his Laconical Apophthegmes.] 4320 394

Leaving Paphlagonia, he marched to Dascylium: where Pharnabazus his Palace was; and round about him many townes, large and full of all provisions, and there wintered; and partly from thence, partly from other parts adjoyning, maintained his army, [Xen. ib.]

b. 3610 Where, when his souldiers went a forrageing, and sometimes not so warily as they should have done, contemning their enemy, because hitherto they had never been distressed by them, Pharnabazus by chance fell upon them with two hooked chariots, and some four hundred men, as they were out of order, following their pillage. But the Grecians espying him, rallied themselves in a body, to the number of 700. Pharnabazus presently putting his hooked chariots in the front, followed them with his horse, and bad them drive in upon the middest of them; and when the chariots had broken in upon, and disordered them, his horse fell on, and slew to the number of one hundred of them: the rest fled back to Agesilaus, who was not far off, with his Corselets, [Id. ib.] 4320. 394.

Three or four dayes after, Spithridates found that Pharnabazus lay with his arm in a spacious bourgade called Caije, about 160 furlongs from thence, and advertised Heripidas, chief of the Councel of war, thereof. He presently prayed Agesilaus to give him two thousand Corselets, and as many Targateers; and so many horse as would voluntarily go with him, though there went not with him indeed a moitie of any kind. But he, setting out, with those which he had, so soon as it grew dark, came upon Pharnabazus in the very dawning of the day, and slew the Mysians, who happened that time to be upon the guard: then the whole army took a fright, and fled, and he entred their camp, and there got a rich booty, together with Pharnabazus his own pavilion, and all his rich furniture and wealth therein; for he for fear of the Grecians, like the Scythian Nomades, removed his camp hither and thither, never staying long in any one place: his chief care being, that the enemy might not know where to find him. And here Heripedas, making too too rigorous an enquiry and search after the spoile which was taken, set commanders with their souldiers on work, and stript Spithradates and his Paphlagonians of all that ever they had gotten in the pillage of the camp: upon which abuse, they all the next night, took what was left, and got them away to Sardes, unto Araeus, who had himself formerly revolted from the King, and served against him; nor was there any thing in all this journey into Asia, that more troubled Agesilaus than this departure of Spithridates, and Megabates his son, whom Agesilaus exceedingly loved, and of these Paphlagonian forces, [Diod. Id. ibid. and Plutarch in his Agesilaus.]

Afterward Agesilaus and Pharnabazus, coming to a parly, by the means of one Apollophanes of Cyzicum, who was a common friend to both, they fell to treat of an agreement. Pharnabazus (as Xenophon hath it, in his oration concerning Agesilaus) openly professed, that unlesse the king would make him absolute and sole Commander of the army, he would revolt from him; but if he might command all, then he would maintain the war against Agesilaus, as long as he could: and Agesilaus told him, that he would depart out of his territory, with all the speed that might be, and so long as he could find a work elsewhere, would not trouble him: and so soon as Pharnabazus was gone, his son begotten upon Parapyta came running to Agesilaus, and entered into a league of friendship with him, and in assurance thereof, they gave gifts each to other, as pledges of love between them, [Id. ib.]

And now the spring came on, and Agesilaus came into the plaines of Thebes, and pitched near the Temple of Diana Astyrina, and there gathered exceeding store of wealth on all hands; and provided himself to march into the upper countries; nothing doubting but that all the regions which he left behind him, would fall of from the Persian. [Xenophon. lib. 4. Hellen.] and now the fame of him grew mervelous great in Persia; having spent two full years in that war, [Plutarch, in his Agesilaus.]

The Lacedemonians having now gotten certain knowledge, that the Persian moneys flew about in Greece, and that the principal cities there, confederated for a common war against them, dispatch't away Epicidas to Agesilaus, to call him home to the defence of his own country. Hereupon Agesilaus, though much troubled that he was thus taken off from so great a design, as he had then in hand, yet thought fit to obey their command, [Ib.] and wrote back to the Ephori this Epistle, which Plutarch inserted among his Apophthegmes.

Agesilaus to the Ephori, greeting: we have subdued a great part of Asia, and routed the Barbarians, and provided great store of armes in Ionia. But because you have set me a certain day, within which to return unto you, I will obey your commands, and peradventure be back, before that day: for I am King not for my self, but for you, and our confederates: for a king is then a true King, when he is commanded by the laws, and Ephori, and the other magistrates of the city.

It is said also that he told his friends merrily, that the king had driven him out of Asia thirty thousand Archers; meaning, that Timocrates his Agent, had bestowed so many thousand golden Darics, which were stamped with Archers upon them, among the leaders of the people in every city, to raise a common war against the Spartans, [Plutarch in his Laconical Apophthegmes, and in his Artaxerxes.]

Agesilaus returning, left Euxenus behind him to command in chief; and with him 4000 souldiers to assist the Ionians if need should be. And to the end he might carry back with him a sure and sufficient army; he made promise of great rewards and honours to those cities and commanders, who should send him in the best horse and foot, and best furnished; and thereby put them into an emulation each with other, who should do best in that kind, [Xenoph. Hellen 4.]

Xenophon,

Xenophon, when he was to return with Agesilaus into Bœotia to make war against the Thebans, left half the gold which he had gotten in his voyage with Cyrus at Ephesus, in the hands of one Megabyzus, treasurer of the Temple of Diana there; for he foresaw that going now with Agesilaus he should undoubtedly hazard himself in a battel: which accordingly fell out afterward at Coronæa. Wherefore he left order with him, that in case he escaped alive out of that battel, then he should restore him the money deposited in that Temple; but if he miscarried, then he charged him to consecrate it all to the goddesse Diana: and of the other half, he sent offerings to Apollo at Delphos, [Expedit. Cy. lib. 5. and Diog. Laertius in Xenophonte.] But Agesilaus himself consecrated a tenth of all that he had gotten in his two years wars in Asia, to Apollo at Delphos; which came to upward of 100 talents, [Xenoph. and Plutarch, in their several lives of Agesilaus.]

Agesilaus having passed the sea at Hellespont, received news of the victory which the Lacedemonians had gotten near Corinth: and thereupon sent back Dercylidas into Asia to inform the Ionians of it; thereby to hearten them the more, in continuing firm to the Lacedemonian party, [Xenoph. Hellen. 4. and Plut. in his Agesilaus.]

About this time it was that that famous sea-fight was made at Cnidus, (and under the hill called Dorius, as Pausanias, [in the 2 book of his Eliaca] reporteth, when Eubulus, or Eubulis was L. Chancelor at Athens, who began his office there, in the very entrance of 3 year of 96 Olympiade, as Lysias, a very good Author in his Oration concerning the acts of Aristophanes affirmeth.

The Commanders of the Persian Fleet lay near to Doryma, in Chersonesus, with more than 90 sail of ships; Pharnabazus commanded the Phœnicians, and Conon the Athenian, the Grecian squadron of them. But Pisander, (for whom Periarchus is falsely put, by Diodorus) the Lacedemonian Ammiral, setting sail from Cnidus with 80 ships, came to a place called Physcus in Chersonesus: and going from thence, lighted upon a part of the Kings Fleet, and at the first encounter had the better of it: but when the rest of the Kings Fleet came in to their rescue, and the friends of the Lacedemonians shifted for themselves, and fled to land, Pisander with his ship fell in upon the thickest of the enemy; slew many of them, but died himself manfully in the fight. Then did Conon with his men pursue the Lacedemonians hotly to land, and took no lesse than fifty of their ships: the rest fled and returned safe to Cnidus, [Xeno. Hellen. 4. Diodorus year 2 of the 96 Olympiade. Justin lib. 6. cap. 3. Emil. Probus in the life of Conon.]

When Agesilaus was now ready to invade Bœotia, news was brought him of this great overthrow of the Lacedemonian Fleet, and therein of the death of Pisander his wives brother: and at the very instant, the Sun was eclipsed, and lookt like a half-moon, [Xenoph. Hellen. 4. and Plut. in his Agesilaus] which fell upon the 14. of our August, as appeareth by the Astronomical accounts, in the year 394 before the birth of Christ.

After this great victory at Cnidus, Pharnabazus and Conon went about, and cast the Lacedemonian Governours and Garrisons out of all the Islands and sea Towns; making them believe, that they would never put any Citadels upon them: but that they should thence forth live according to their own laws, [Xenoph. lib. 4. Hellen.] and hereupon, first the Coi, then the Nisæans, then the Teians, and those of Chios fell off from the Lacedemonians. Then they of Mitylene, of Ephesus, and Erythræ, did the like: and in an instant, all the rest of the cities fell a madding against the Lacedemonian Government; whereof some casting out the Lacedemonian Garrisons, set up for themselves, and maintained their own State. Others gave themselves up into Conons hands: and from that time forward, the Lacedemonians lost the soveraignty of the seas, [Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 96.]

Dercylidas, an old enemy of Pharnabazus, being at this time at Abidus, would not out thence, as others did out of their commands; but having made a grave and pithy Oration to the inhabitants, held them firm and constant to the Lacedemonian party: and when other Commanders which were cast out of their several places, repaired thither, they entertained them lovingly there; and such as came not of themselves, they invited to come. And when a multitude of them were come together, Dercylidas put over to Sestus on the other side, and there entertained all such as were driven out of their commands on the Europæan side; and put the like courage into their hearts, as he had done to the rest in Asia side: telling them that in Asia it self, which from the beginning belonged to the King, sundry places, as Temnens, no great Town, and Egæ in Eolia, and other places held still their own, and would not stoop to the Kings obedience, [Xen. Hellen. 4.]

3611. Pharnabazus purposing to go for Ephesus, delivered over to Conon 40 ships; and bad him meet him at Sestus. He himself sent Minatory letters to both places, telling 4321 393 them, that unlesse they rid their hands of the Lacedemonians, he would hold them for his

his enemies. And when they would not, he commanded Conon to block them up by sea; and he himself went and wasted all the country about Abydus. But finding that that would not bring them to his bent, he left them, and went his way home. But gave order to Conon to deal with the Cities bordering upon the Hellespont, and to provide the greatest Fleet that possibly they could make against the next Spring: and so this Winter was taken up, in these provisions making.

b. 3611 In the beginning of the Spring, having gotten together a mighty Fleet of his own, and hired what else he could besides, Pharnabazus, taking Conon with him, went thorough the middest of the Islands of the Egæan sea, and came to Melus, one of the Sporades, that from thence, he might the more easily put over, and set foot in Laconia the country of the Spartans. And having there spoiled the country, he purposed to return into Asia: but before he went, Conon prevailed with him to leave the Navy with him; for that with it he would go to Athens, and would repair the long walls there, and fortifie the Port of Pyrœum; which, as he said, would trouble the Lacedemonians nothing more. Glad was Pharnabazus of this offer, and furnished him with monies to do that work. So Conon came to Athens with 80 sail of ships, and presently fell in hand with the repairing of the walls both of the City and Port: and having received 50 talents of money from Pharnabazus, bestowed it all among his fellow-citizens, [Id. ibid. Diod. year 2. and 3. of the 96. Olympiade. Plut. in his Agesilaus, and Laconical Apophthegmes. Justin lib. 6. cap. 5. Emil. Prob. in the life of Conon.] 4321.

d. The Lacedemonians hearing this news, dispatched away Antalcidas to Tiribazus, another chief Commander of the Kings, residing at Sardes, to make him, if it were possible, their friend, and to mediate a peace between him and them. Whereupon the Athenians also sent Conon, and sundry others unto him: so did also the Bœotians, and Corinthians, and those of Argos. Now when they were all come before Tiribazus, Antalcidas began, and told him, that he was come to sue for a peace between the King, and his country-men, such as the Kings own heart could wish; for that the Lacedemonians would not stand with him for the Grecian cities in Asia; but would be content if all the Islands and other countries out of Asia, might be free and live according to their own lawes: But when all the rest of the Legates, there met, disclaimed that motion, all brake off, and every man returned home again. But Tiribazus, though he saw it was not safe for him to make a league with the Lacedemonians, without the Kings pleasure first known; yet under-hand he furnished Antalcidas with monies to set up their Navy again; that so the Athenians and their confederates might the more easily be wrought to condescend to a peace with the King: and more than that, threw Conon himself into prison at Sardes; charging him as guilty of all that ever the Lacedemonians said of him, and as if he had made use of the Kings souldiers and monies, onely to get towns and cities for his country-men the Athenians; and to restore Ionia and Eolia unto them. And that done, made a journey to the King, to inform him of what propositions the Lacedemonians had made unto him; and of what he had done to Conon, and upon what grounds, and to know his pleasure upon all, [Xen. Hellen. 4. with Plut. in his Laconical Apophthegmes: and in his Agesilaus. Diodor. 3 year of the 96 Olymiade: Emil. Prob. in the life of Conon.]

After the decease of Satyrus, King of Bosphorus, succeeded Leuco his son, and reigned 40 years, [Diod. 4 year of 96 Olympiade.]

Parysatis the kings mother, had caused by her trusty servant, certain slips of palme trees to be privily hid in the heap of sand and dust, under which Clearchus his body lay casually buried, as I shewed before; out of this heap, now after 8 years, there sprang up a wonderfull grove of palme trees, which overshadowed all the place, as Ctesias reporteth in his Persica.] Adding further, that thereupon the King much repented him of his doing him to death, as a man whom the Gods themselves respected, [Ctesias, in the Excerptions of Photius, and Plut. in the life of Artaxerxes.]

Some write that Conon was carried away prisoner to the King, and by him put to death: and among them, Isocrates in his Panegyric. But Dinon, an Historian, and of great authority in Persian matters, says that he escaped out of prison; demurring only upon this, whether with or without Tiribazus his privity and consent, [Emil. Prob. in his Conon.]

3612. Whiles Tiribazus was with the King, the King dispatched away Struthas into the lower Asia, to take charge of the sea: whom when the Lacedemonians perceived to bear a rancour and hatred to them, for the many mischiefs which Alcibiades had done the Persians in those parts; and to be much enclined to the Athenian party, and their confederates, they presently sent away Thimbron to make war upon him, Thimbron passing the sea, came to Ephesus, and from thence, and other places, lying upon the Meander, and out of Priene, Leucophrye, and Achillium, plundered the Kings Countreys adjoyning, [Xenoph. Hellen. 4.] for, possessing himself of Ioadæ, and of Coressus, a mountain distant from Ephesus some 40 furlongs: and having with him 4322

8000 men, which he brought with him, besides those which he raised in Asia, he made often incursions from thence, and spoiled all provinces and places adjoyning, of the Kings subjection, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 97.]

3612 After a while, Struthas, with a great company of horse, five thousand Corselets, and upward of twelve thousand targateers; encamped not far from the Lacedemonian army; and perceiving that Thimbron kept no good order in drawing out his men upon any service, he sent out some horse into the plain countrey, willing them to make spoile of what ever came to their hand: and when he saw Thimbron to send out forces by handfulls, and in no military order, to relieve them that were distressed, then he himself, with the main body of his horse, all in good array, drew out and fell upon them. Thimbron himself, and his dear friend Thersander, fell in the very first encounter: which Thersander was a singular minstrel, and a very good souldier withal: Hereupon, the rest of the Grecians fled, and the Persians following the chase, slew some of them, and others they took alive, few escaped; they which did, came safe to Cnidus, and other cities of the Grecians, [Id. ibid.] 4322. 392.

3613. Ecdicus, who was sent by the Lacedemonians, with 8 ships, to help the Banditoes of Rhodes, came to Cnidus; where finding that the Rhodians were grown very strong, by sea and land, and had a fleet twice as bigg as his, he kept himself quiet at Cnidus, [Xenoph. Hellen. 4. Diod. year 2. Olympiade 97.] 4323. 391.

In the same fleet also, they sent Diphridas, with charge to land in Asia, and to man all those cities which had adhered to Thimbron: and that, gathering together the remainder that was left of his great overthrow, and such other as he could get, he should begin the war a fresh upon Struthas, which he did; and among other his good haps, it was his fortune to light upon Tigranes, Strathus his son in law, upon the way as he was going with his wife to Sardes: but let him goe, having wrung a great summe of money from him, which came very opportunely to pay his army, [Xenoph. ibid.]

Euagoras the K. of Salamis in Cyprus, by the endeavours of his son Protagoras, got almost the whole Island into his subjection, [Isocrates in his Euagoras.] and the rest he got into his hand, partly by force, partly by perswasive words: But they of Amathusa, and of Solos, and the men of Citium; sent to pray in aide from Artaxerxes; laying further to his charge that he was the cause of the killing of Argyris, who was, whiles he lived, a confederate of the Persians: and undertook to assist the king in getting the whole Island into his hands. Artaxerxes therefore partly to clip Euagoras his wings, partly out of a desire he had to make Cyprus his own, for the shipping that there was, to defend Asia with, gave order to send aide against Euagoras; and sending away the Embassadors, commanded all his sea townes in Asia to fall a building what ships possibly they could, with tackle and furniture thereunto belonging; and he himself, going through the cities of upper Asia, raised great store of men, [Diod. year 2. Olympiade 97.] of all which army, he made Antophradates, the Governor of Lydia, General by land; and Hercatomnus the Commander of Caria, Ammiral at sea, [Theopomp. in Biblioth. Photii, nu. 176.] The later of which yet, instead of making war against Euagoras, under-hand supplyed him with monies, to hire him auxiliaries from other parts, [Diodor. ut sup. and an. 3. Olympiade 98.]

3614. When the Lacedemonians saw that Ecdicus had not power enough to pleasure their friends, they called home Telentias from the bay of Corinth, and sent him to succeed Ecdicus in that charge, with 12 ships: and to support, all he could, the Rhodians who favoured the Lacedemonian party, and to represse their enemies. Telentias therefore coming to Samos, got some more shipping there: and from thence sailed to Cnidus: and there dismissing Ecdicus, fitted himself with a Navy, consisting in all of 27 ships, well furnished, and with them sailed to Rhodes, [Xen. Hellen. 4. with Diodorus year 2. of the 97. Olympiade.] 4324. 390.

As he was upon his way to Rhodes, he lighted upon Philocrates, who was sailing from Athens to Cyprus with ten ships, to the relief of King Euagoras: all these Telentias took, and carrying the spoile of them to Cnidus, there sold it. And so it fell out, that they who were enemies to the King of Persia, spoiled them who were going to make war against him, [Xen. ibid.]

d. The Athenians perceiving the Lacedemonians to grow strong again at sea, sent out Thrasybulus with a Fleet of 40 sail against them; and he first sailing into Ionia, gathered monies there from their confederates: and because he found all the cities in Asia kind unto him, by reason of that correspondency which was between the King and them, therefore he set sail for Byzantium; and let out the custom of the tenths of every ship that passed that streight to farmers: and then having contracted a league and friendship with them of Chalcedon, he returned out of the Hellespont, [Id ibid. with Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 97.]

After which, returning into Asia with his fleet, among others he sent and required a supply of Money, from those of Aspendus, lying with his fleet at the mouth mouth of the river Eurymedon, and they contributed, according to his command; but when, that notwithstanding, some of his company went up into the country, and there plundered their goods: the men of Aspendus, growing into choler thereupon, watched their oportunity, and falling upon them, slew many of them, and among the rest, Thrasybulus himself, as he lay sleeping in his tent, which strook the Athenian captains with such a fear, that they presently gat them aboard, and sailed to Rhodes: and the Athenians sent forthwith Argyrius to succeed in Thrasybulus his room, [Xenoph. Hel. 4. Diodor. year 3. Olympiade 97.]

The Lacedemonians, though they had little reason to find fault with Dercylidas his doings, yet they sent Anaxibius to succeed him in the gouernment of Abydus, a man, borne up by the favour of the Ephori, and one that promised to do wonders, if he might be furnished with men and money: wherefore they gave him 3 tall ships of war, and money to hire and pay a thousand sea souldiers more. He therefore coming to Abydus, raised land forces with the monies which he brought, and by that means drew off sundry cities of Eolia, from Pharnabazus his party, and wasted the enemies country, and then getting 3 ships more, he annoyed and troubled the Athenians, which used upon that coast, and if he happened to light upon any of their ships stragling, he took and brought them to Abydus, [Xenohp. Hellen. 4.]

The Athenians hearing thereof, sent Iphicrates (lately returned from Corinth) with 8 ships, and 12 hundred targateers, to maintain what Thrasybulus had gotten, and setled in those parts, against Anaxibius, and comming into Chersonesus; he for his part, and Anaxibius for his, set up a company of Pirates, and land robbers, to carry on the war for them, [Id. ib.]

3616. Anaxibus with his hired bands, and his own country-men, and 200 men out of Abydus, all corselets went to Antandrus, and was there very kindly received and entertained. 4327. 387.
Mean while Iphicrates disposed certain ambushments for him, in the passages of the mountains, against he should return from thence to Abydus. The vessels which had wafted him over, in the night season, he caused to row up the Hellespont, that men might conceive him to be abord them, and that he was then going, as at other times he used to do, te collect monies: wherefore, when the men of Abydus, who led the Van, came into the plaine which lieth near to a place called Cremastes, (where there are also gold mines) and the rest were coming down the steep of the Hill, and Anaxibus himself, with his Laconian companies following them. Iphicrates with all his men, rose out of their ambushment, and set upon them. Anaxibius finding himself thus entrapt, fought manfully and died, and with him 12 other Lacedemonians, governors of several cities, which were then come unto him; the rest fled, and Iphicrates pursued them to the very gates of Abydus, there perished of the rest some 200, of Abydus it self almost fifty, all Corselets, and then he returned into Chersonesus, [lib. 4. in. fi.]

Hierax being sent to succeed Teleutias, in the command of the fleet, he returned home; leaving an incredible desire of him in the hearts of the souldiers, [Xenophon Hellen. 5.]

3617. Shortly after they sent Antalcidas to succeed Hierax in that charge, supposing that 4327. 387.
therein they should exceedingly content and please Tiribazus: and he coming to Ephesus, left Nicholochus his Lieutenant there; and he with Tiribazus went together to the King, to conclude the peace which was then in agitation, [Xen. lib. 5. Hel. Diod. year 2. Olympiade 98.]

Nicolochus, to secure Abydus, set saile from Ephesus, and by the way landed at Tenedos, wasted their country, and wrung out of them a large proportion of money, and then went on his journey to Abydus as he intended: mean while the Athenian Captaines, which were at Samothrace, Thasus, and other places near adjoyning, hasted to come to the reliefe of Tenedos. But finding that Nicolochus was safely arrived at Abidus, they went out of Chersonesus, with 32 saile of ships, and besieged him as he lay at Abidus with 25 ships, [Xenoph. Hellen. 5.]

Chabrias was openly sent by the Athenians to the aide of Euagoras, with 800 Targateers, and ten tall men of war, and left not the place till he had subdued the whole Isle; whereby the Athenians got a great reputation in the world, [Id. ibid. and Emil. Prob. in the Life of Chabrias.] of the Embassie sent from the Cypriots to the Athenians for their aide, Lysias the Orator, in his oration upon Aristophanes, maketh mention.

Artaxerxes, who could never before abide a Lacedemonian, but would ever say, (as Dinon reporteth) that they were the most impudent of all men living, yet seeing Antalcidas dance, the Leonidas, and the Calicratidas, before him, fell infinitely in love with him: and as he sate at supper, sent him a garland wrought of roses and safron from his own head, dipt all in a most costly ointment, to wear for his sake: whereunto he answering; Sir, saith he, I take, and thank you for this noble gift and favour: but the perfume of the oyntment in it, marrs the natural sent, and fragrancie of the flowers, [Plut. in his Artax. and in his Pelopidas, and in his Sympos. lib. 7. quest. 8. Athenæus Deipnos. lib. 2. Elia. Varia. Histor. lib. 14. c. 39.]

Tiribazus returned from the king and Antalcidas with him; having made a firme league and association of armes, in case the Athenians and their confederates, would not partake in that peace, which he had propounded. Pharnabazus being sent for, went to the king, being then in the upper Asia, and there he married the kings daughter, [Xenoph. Hellen. 5.]

Antalcidas, presently upon his return, hearing that Iphicrates and Diotimus besieged Nicolochus in Abidus; with all his fleet, went thither by land, and putting to sea by night, gave it out, that he was sent for to Chalcedon, but falling into the port of Percope, he there lay close: four Captains there were of the Athenian party, who hearing that Antalcidas was gone to Chalcedon, purposed to follow him upon the trade-way to Proconessus. But Antalcidas so soon as they were passed by, came back to Abydus; and by a stratagem, laying 12 principal swift ships, in an Ambushment, intercepted 8 ships, which Thrasybulus the Athenian brought out of Thrace, and thought to have joyned with the main body of the Attic fleet: [Id. ibid. Polyænus, lib. 2. Stratag. in Antalcida.]

Antalcides having received 20 saile of ships from Syracusæ and the parts of Italy, which were brought him by Polyxenus, and others, as well out of Ionia, from Pharnabazus, as out of those parts which belonged to Ariobarzanes, his old friend, had made up a fleet of 80 saile, and was absolute master of the sea: and thereby forced those ships which coming out of Pontus, were bound for Athens, to turne their course to some port or other, of the Lacedemonian party, and there to discharge, [Xenoph. ib.]

When Tiribazus had summoned all to come in, that would subscribe to the forme of a peace propounded by Artaxerxes, all the Grecian Cities, by their Embassadors, readily came in: unto whom he shewing the kings seals affixed to the instrument, he caused it to be read as followeth.

The King Artaxerxes thinks it reason, that the cities which are in Asia, as also the Islands of Clazomenæ and Cyprus should be his, and under his command: And all other Cities of Grecians, as well small as great, should be free, and live every of them according to their own lawes, except Lemnus, and Imbrus, and Scirus, which as heretofore, so now also, the Athenians shall hold and possesse. And as for them which shall not receive this peace, them will I, together with those who shall embrace it, pursue with an open war, by land and by sea, with ships and with moneys. Which when the Embassadors at their returne had reported every of them to his own people, although it grieved them to see the Grecian cities of Asia, for which Agesilaus had so bravely fought, thus fowly betraied into the Kings hand, yet because needs they must, they submitted thereunto, and accepted of the peace, [Xen. Ib. Isocrates in Panathen, Diod. year 2. Olymp. 98. Plutarch in Agesil. and Artaxerx. and in his Laconical Apophtheg. Aristides in his Leuctric. 1, and 2.] which peace was published, as [Polyb. lib. 1.] hath observed, 19 years after the sea fight at Egospotamos, and fixteen years before the battel at Leuctra in Bœotia.

When this peace was thus made, Agesilaus, as Xenophon sayes, was an earnest man to see it observed, and the Lacedemonians made themselves very severe guardians, and defenders of it in Greece. And Artaxerxes wrate a particular letter to Alcibiades, which he sent by a Persian in company of one Callias a Lacedemonian, wherein he offered him both hospitality and friendship. But Alcibiades accepted neither, but bad the Kings messenger tell his master, that he needed not trouble himself to write letters to him; for if he continued a good friend to the Lacedemonians, he would not faile to continue the like to him; but if he endeavoured any ill to them, he should not think that any letters of his, should work him over to his friendship. [Plut. in his Laconical Apophthegmes.]

In those articles of Antalcidas his peace, formerly related out of Xenophon, who could not be ignorant of the particulars thereof, we find that not all the Islands bordering upon Asia, but two of them only, were given up to the King, (though Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes, seems to have been of another mind,) and those were Clazomenæ (which as I shewed before, in the year of the World 3504, 3505. was then an Island) and Cyprus: the tenor of this peace, now drew Chabrias from thence; when he had indeed already subdued it wholy, and reduced it to the obedience of Euagoras, as I shewed before, in requital whereof, Euagoras armed almost every man in the Isle, and mustered a huge army against Artaxerxes: and now Artaxerxes having made a final peace with the Grecians, commanded all his forces to provide themselves for the conquest of Cyprus, [Diod. 2 year, Olympiade 98.]

where they very vigorously put on the war against Euagoras: and he for his part procured himself supplyes of all kindes from the Egyptians, Tyrians, Arabians, and others, enemies to the Persian State: so that he made up a Fleet of 90 sail; of which number, 20 were from Tyre, the rest were his own: and of his land souldiers 6 thousand of his own, and his auxiliaries from other parts, a far greater number. And so having money enough to pay them, his army grew exceeding great, [Diod. lib. 15. year 3. Olympiade 98.]

Euagoras set on work certain Pirates, of whom he had good store at his command, to fall upon the enemies vessels of loading: of these they took some, sunk others, and the rest durst not put to sea for fear of them. Whence it came that victuals presently failing in the Persian army, some of the hired souldiers killed their Commanders: and a mutiny grew over all the army, so that with much adoe could the Coronels at land, and Gaos the chief Officer at sea quiet them: wherefore the whole Navy in a body were fain to set sail for Cilicia, and from thence brought they store of provision for the Camp. But Acoris King of Egypt suffered not Euagoras to want either for corn or money, and all other provisions, as much as he wanted, [Id. ibid.]

Euagoras finding that his Navy was far too weak for the enemies, furnisht out 60 ships more of his own, and besides them had fifty more sent him from King Achoris: so that now his Fleet was 200 fighting ships. And at his first encounter by land, had the better of the enemy; and routed them again at sea, falling suddenly upon their Fleet, as they were sailing to Citium, sunk some of them, and took others; which he found scattered from the body of the Navy. But when the General of the Persian Navy, and the rest of the Commanders had recollected themselves, the fight then grew hot and fierce between them, wherein Euagoras at the first had again the better of it; But when Gaus fell on with all his might, and fought himself very manfully, Euagoras his men fled, with the losse of many of his ships. The Persians therefore having gotten this victory, assembled both their land and sea Forces together at Citium: where fitting themselves with necessaries, they went joyntly to besiege Salamis it self the chief city, both by land and sea, [Ibid.]

Teribazus immediately after the fight, put over into Cilicia, and went to carry Artaxerxes news of the victory: and Euagoras leaving Salamis to be defended by his son Pythagoras, (Protagoras perhaps, of whom I formerly made mention out of Isocrates, in the year of the World 3613.) and comitting the charge of the whole Isle to his charge, got out by night with 10 ships onely in his company, and sailed into Egypt, Where he perswaded Acoris, with all the power he had to make a war upon the Persian, [Id. ibid.]

and when he there found Salamis Strongly besieged; and himself abandoned by his confederates, he was fain at last to send to Tiribazus, and to treate with him about a peace. Tiribazus who commanded over all in chief, made answer, that he would admit of the motion, provided that he would surrender all Cyprus into the Kings hand, save onely Salamis, and pay the King a tribute for that too; and be at his command as a liege vassal ought to be to his Lord and Soveraign. These conditions, as hard as they were, yet was Euagoras fain to submit unto; for he said, he should be subject to him, as one King to another; not as a slave to his master: and yet this would not content Tiribazus neither, [Diodor. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

But Orontes the other Commander in chief, envying the honour of Tiribazus, sending away privily letters to the King, his father in law, among other matters, laid to his charge, that he intended a rebellion; and that under-hand he had confederated with the Lacedemonians, and used all means, to oblige to himself, all the principal Captains and Commanders of the army. To all which the King giving hasty credit: gave Orontes a commission to seize on his person, and to send him to him, [Id. ibid.]

Orontes, fearing Tiribazus, seized on him by this wile. There was a house which had a great vault in it: over this vault he set a bed not corded, but covered over with tapistry, and many costly coverledes: then desired Tiribazus to come unto him, pretending a conference about some urgent matters; and Tiribazus coming in, sate him down upon the bed, and thorough that fell into the vault: and being there caught, was sent away fast bound in chains to the King, [Polyen. stratag. lib. 7.]

Orontes now commanding all in Cyprus, when he saw that Euagoras had taken fresh courage, and endured the siege more stoutly than before; and his souldiers repining at Tiribazus his misfortune, received no commands, and left the siege: admitted Euagoras to a peace upon such terms as Tiribazus had propounded to him: to wit, that paying a yearly tribute to the king, he should continue king of Salamis, and as a king should be obedient in all things to the king. And so this war of Cyprus, which had lasted ten years, whereof yet the far greatest part was spent in preparation making, and two years onely in the war it self, came to an end; and the king having consumed 50 thousand thousand talents in it, when all was done, left Euagoras in the same state he was in, when the war began, [Isocrates in his Euagoras, Diod. year 4 Olympiad. 98.]

Gaus, Vice-Ammiral of the Navy, and son in law to Tiribazus, fearing least, as a man privy to Tiribazus his designes, he might perchance be made away for company, bethought himself of falling off, and revolting from the King. And having wealth and souldiers enough, and the chief Captains of the Navy wholly at his devotion, confederated forthwith with Acoris king of Egypt, and the Lacedemonians, to make a war upon Artaxerxes, [Diod. ib.]

Artaxerxes following herein the example of Cambyses, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 25. Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 3.] caused certain of his Judges to be flead alive, and their skins to be hung up over the Judgement seats, that they which sate therein, knowing what hung over their heads, might be the more carefull to do justice unto his people, [Diodoru ibid.]

3620. Artaxerxes leading with him an army of 300 thousand men against the Cadusii a people lying between the Euxine and the Caspian seas, [Diodor. Olymp. 98. year 4. Plut. in Artaxerxes.] In this war there fell many a Great man on either side, but among others of that of the kings party, one Camissares, a Carian born, a stout and a valiant man, whom the King had made Commander of that part of Cilicia, which lies next to Cappadocia, inhabited by the Leucosyrians, and in honour of him, the king made his son Datames governour in his room, who also did the king singular service in this war, [Emil. Prob. in the Life of Datames.] 4330. 384.

Artaxerxes with his army in this war, was brought to such extremity, that hardly could a man buy an Asses head for 60 Drachmes: and was relieved by Teribazus, who lived then a poor neglected and contemptible gentleman in the army, in this manner. There were at that time two Kings of the Cadusians, and they held their camps apart, He therefore making the King first acquainted with it, went himself to one of them, and sent his son privily to the other; and each of them deceived his man: perswading him, that the other had underhand sent to Artaxerxes, to make a peace with him for himself, and to leave the other out, Hereupon, each sent his Ambassadors, the one with Teribazus, the other with his son to the King, and he made peace with both, and so the war was ended, [Plut. in Artaxerxes.]

Upon this, the King referred the cognisance of Teribazus his cause to three honorable persons, before whom he made his innocency so to appear, and withall his services to the King, to have been so great, that they all assoil'd him, and the King ever after held him in very high esteem, and heaped great honours on him: as for Orontes, he was condemned for a false accuser, thrust out of the kings favour, and held for an ignominious person ever after. [Diod. year. 4. Olympiade 98.]

Whiles Gaus was in Cyprus, the Grecians which there served under him, wrote letters against him into Ionia; and to find out who they were, and what they wrote, took this course: he provided a ship, and fitted her with Mariners, and the master gave it out, that he was going for Ionia; and lingred out the time, to get as many letters aboard, as possibly he could, and at last set out: but turning short, came back into a creek, not far from the place whence he went: thither Orontes went on foot; and causing all the letters aboard to be delivered into his hands, red them; and finding who they were that had written against him, he put them all to death with torments, [Polyan. Stratag. lib. 7. in Gaus, instead whereof, it is miswritten, Alos and Glos.]

3621. Gaus, when he had stirred up both the Egyptians and Lacedemonians to engage in a war against the Persian, was kil'd, I know not how, nor by whom, and so went not on, with what he had intended. But after his death, Tachos, going on upon his grounds, got an army, and built him a town upon a high hill, joyning upon the sea, called Leuca, where also he built a Chappel for Apollo: but he coming also to die shortly after, the Clazomenians, and they of Cuma, fell to strife about the possession of it, and the Clazomenians made the more hast, and got it; and so all rebellions in Asia were laid asleep: the Lacedemonians also, Gaus and Tachos, both being now dead; cast off all care of Asia, and would have no more to do with it, [Diodorus year. 2. Olympiade 94.] 4331. 383.

3622. When Pharnostratus was Lord Chancelor of Athens, in the moneth Possideon, in the 366 year of Nabonassars account, on the 26 day of the Egyptian moneth, Thoth, in the entring upon the 23 of our Decemb. five hours and an half after midnight, there was a small eclipse of the moon observed at Babylon, [Hipparch. in Ptol. in his great Syntax. lib. 4. cap. ult.] 4332 382

3622 In the same mans time, in the moneth Scirrophorion, and in the same year of Nabonassar, on the 24 day of the moneth Phamenoth the 18 day of our June, ending 5 houres and one half before midnight, there was another Eclipse of the moon observed in the same place, [Id. ib.] 4332. 382.

3623. When Euander was Lord Chancelor of Athens, in the former moneth of Posside-on, in the 367 year of Nabonassars accoumpt, the 16 day of the moneth Thoth, in the end of the 12 day of our December, two hours and a half before mid-night, there was a third Eclips of the Moon, and that a total one, in the same place; [Id. ibid.] 4333 381

3627. Acoris King of Egypt, bearing formerly a grudge to the King of Persia, now set himself to gather a vast army of strangers, especially out of Greece; of whom he made Chabrias the Athenian General: He, though without any order from, or consent of the state there, yet took this charge upon him in Egypt, and prepared himself, all that possibly he could, for this war against the Persian. But Pharnabazus, whom Artaxerxes had made General of his army for this war, when he made huge preparations for it, sent messengers to Athens, and there charged Chabrias, for offering his service to the Egyptians, thereby to alienate the good affection of Artaxerxes from their state; and withall, desired that they would send unto him Iphicrates, their Captain. The Athenians therefore, who were principally desirous to endear the king unto them, and to keep Pharnabazus their good friend, sent presently for Chabrias out of Egypt, and gave Iphicrates charge to go and help Pharnabazus, [Diodorus, an 4. Olympiade 100.] 4337. 377.

Iphicrates having the charge of the hired souldiers of his army, amounting to 12 thousand, committed to him by Artaxerxes, made them by continual training and exercise, so expert in the art military, that as among the Romans, afterward, a skilfull souldier, was commonly called a Fabian Souldier, so then from Fabius, such a one went by the the name of an Iphicratian souldier, from Iphicrates among the Grecians, [Emil. Prob. in his Iphicrates,] Now Pharnabazus spent many years in preparing for this war. And Iphicrates upon a time, finding him a man so voluble in his speech, and so slow in his actions, askt him the reason: the reason, quoth he, is, because I am master of my words, but the King of my actions, [Diodorus, year 3. Olympiade. 101.]

After Hecatonus Mausolus was made governour of Caria, and so continued for 24 years, [Diod. year 4 of Oymp. 106.] having married Artemisia the elder of his two sisters. [Strabo. lib, 14.]

3628. After Acoris in Egypt, reigned Psammuthis, 1 year. 4338. 376.

3629. And after him, came Nepherites, the last of the Dynasty of the Mendesians, and sate 4 moneths, and then arose the first of the Dynasts of the Sabennitæ, called Nectanabis, and reigned 12 years, 4339. 375.

Artaxerxes being now to make a war upon Egypt, to get the more more aide thereto out of Greece, sent his Ambassadors thither, to move them to make a general peace among themselves; upon these terms, that every city should from thence forth live according to their own laws, and should have no garrisons among them. This motion all the cities of Greece embraced, save onely the Thebans, and they refused, [Diod, year. 2. Olymp. 101.]

3630. When all Artaxerxes his army was come together at Acon in Syria, upon a muster, there were found of other nations 200 thousand under Pharnabazus, and 20 thousand Grecians, under the conduct of Iphicrates, and the Navy, besides, ships of burden, and vessels for other uses, consisted of 300 ships, each of 3 stories high, of oares, and 200 of 30 oares a piece; the first sort called τριήρεις in Greek, the other τριακόντοροι. In the beginning of the Summer, (i. e.) in the first of the spring, the Persian Navy setting saile for Egypt, came to the frontier town, towards Syria, called Pelusium, which they found exceedingly well fortified by Nectanabis: wherefore they put of to sea again, and being out of kenning, they steered their course for Mendesium, a city standing upon another of the mouths of Nile, and where the shoare runs a great way out from the land; there they landed three thousand men, and Pharnabazus and Iphicrates, both went to surprise a fort, standing upon the very mouth of the river. But when there came 3 thousand horse and foot of the Egyptians, to the defence of the place; there grew a fierce skirmish between them: wherein at last, the Egyptians, overlaid with the multitude of Persians which came thronging out of the ships to help their fellows, and being wholly enclosed by them, suffered a great slaughter, many of them also were taken, and the rest fled to a little town thereby. But Iphicrates his men pursuing them, entred pell mell with them into the gate, and took it, and rased it to the ground, and carried away the inhabitants thereof prisoners, [Diodorus. year 3. Olympiade 101.] 4340. 374.

Iphicrates then gave counsel to go presently by water to assault Memphis, the Metropolis of all Egypt, unprovided at that time of any garison, and before the Egyptian forces came in to defend it, Pharnabazus said no; but he would stay till his land forces came, and so they should set upon it, with lesse danger. By this means the Egyptians gat gat time enough to put in what supplyes they would into Memphis, and from thence made sundry sallies upon the small town which the Persians, as I said before, had seized on; and skirmished frequently with them, and made great slaughter of them. And when now the time of the year came that Nilus used to overflow, it covered all the country thereabouts, and served for a fortification to it. Wherefore the Persian Commanders, thinking it no boot to strive against nature, were of opinion to withdraw from thence for the present: and so all that huge preparation came to nothing, [Id. ibid.]

Now, so soon as they were returned into Asia, Pharnabazus fell out with Iphicrates: and he fearing least hereupon he might be thrown in prison as Conon was, got aboard presently in the dark, and came for Athens. And Pharnabazus sent thither after him, and there laid to his charge, that he was the cause, why Egypt was not recovered. To whom the Athenians made this answer; that they themselves would see him punished, if they saw he deserved it; yet presently after they made him Ammiral of all their Fleet, [Id. ib.]

Nicocles an Eunuch in Cyprus, murdered Euagoras, and made himself King of Salamis in his room: as Diodorus in this years relation hath it. And indeed that he was murdered by an Eunuch, [Aristotle 5, of his Politicks, cap. 10.] tells us: but that his name that did it was Thrasydæus, we learn out of Theopompus, in [Biblioth. Photii, nu. 176.] where he shews that Euagoras, by this Eunuchs means, got to lie with the daughter of Nicocreon (that tyrant of Cyprus, who, as Plutarch in his life reports, invited Isocrates to supper,) and that that was the cause of his death. For that Nicocles was Euagoras his own son, and succeeded him in his kingdom at Salamis, and had children of his own, appears out of Isocrates; who had of him 20 talents for an Oration of his written and sent unto him; as [Plutarch in the life of Isocrates reporteth] which Oration of his, entitled to Nicocles, of a kingdom, or kingly function, we have yet extant: and another entitled Nicocles: wherein, in the person of Nicocles, is set down the duty of the subject to his Prince; as also a third called his Euagoras; which is nothing but a funeral Oration made upon him; for whereas Nicocles in this very year solemnised his fathers Funeral, not onely in a costly and magnificently pompous manner; but also with all manner of Games, of Musick, and Dancing, and Wrestling, and fights of Ships by Sea, and Horses by land: Isocrates therefore wrote this Oration to him, in praise and commendation of his father, conceiving that this would serve both Nicocles himself, and his sons and children after them, for an example and exhortation of well-doing in that kind. ἡγέμενος καὶ σοὶ, &c. supposing, saith he, that this will serve both you and your children, and other the descendants of Euagoras, for a most fair encouragement to your well-doing, [Isocrates in his Euagoras.] Whence we may amend that error in Diodor. and say; as the truth is, that Euagoras was murdered by Thrasidæus an Eunuch, and that his own son Nicocles succeeded him in his kingdom of Salamis.

3633. When Alcisthenes was Lord Chancelor at Athens, Artaxerxes, seeing Greece fallen into new broiles among themselves, sent Abassadors again to exhort them to live 4343.
in peace each with other, according to the late establishment: and thereupon the cities of Greece fell to accord again, and bound themselves by an oath to the observance of it, all save the Thebans. And now there being a full peace made and sworn between the Athenians, Lacedemonians, and the King, Iphicrates was called home again with his Fleet, [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 102. with Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 6. and Diony. Halicarnas. in the life of Lysias.]

Plutarch in the life of Agesilaus, sheweth that this peace was concluded and made among the Grecians at Lacedemon upon the 14 of the moneth Scirrophorion with the Athenians, and in the last moneth of Arcisthenes his Chancelorship there, upon the 16 day of our July.

3634. The Lacedemonians having received that great overthrow given them at Leuctra 4344 by Epaminondas, sent forthwith Agesilaus into Egypt, and Antalcidas to Artaxerxes, to get monies. But Antalcidas his suit was by Artaxerxes rejected with so much scorn and indignation, that at his return, for very spight, he had been so used by the enemy, and fear of what might betide him from the Ephori, he forbare his meat, and starved himself to death, [Plut. in Artax.]

3635. Philiscus of Abidus, sent by Artabarzanes, one of Artaxerxes his Lords into Greece, 4345 to compose matters between the Thebans and their confederates, and the Lacedemonians; summoned them all to Delphos, where when the Thebans stood upon it, that Messene should not be for the Lacedemonian jurisdiction, he grew so offended at it, that leaving 2 thousand of his most choice men to assist the Lacedemonians against them, he returned into Asia, [Xenoph. Hellen. 7. Diod. year 4. Olymp. 102.]

3636. The Thebans affecting now the Principality of Greece, thought good to send their 4346
Ambassadors to the King of Persia; and to that end, called their confederates together, and pretending that Euthycles of Lacedemon was already with the King, they dispatched away to him Pelopidas of Thebes it self, Antiochus the Pancratiast of Arcadia, Archidamus of Eleus, a Town in Thrace, with one other out of Argos: which coming to the Athenians eares, they dispatched away also their Ambassadors to the King; Timagoras and Leontes. And among them all Pelopidas appeared most gracious in the kings eye, and next him Timagoras; and were of all others most honourably entreated by him, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Ismenias of Thebes joynt Commissioner with Pelopidas in this Embassie, when, being brought by Tithraustes the Chiliarch, to the presence of the king, he was bid to prostrate himself before him: let fall his ring before him; and presently falling all along, took it up again: and so being conceived to have done it to the king, obtained whatever he asked of him, [Plut. in Artax. Elia. Var. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 21.]

Timagoras the Athenian, sent a letter of intelligence at the same time by one Bubaris his Secretary, and had for his pains a thousand Darics; and had moreover a rich supper sent him to his lodging: whereupon the kings brother Ostanes, said unto him; Remember Timagoras this supper; for it is not sent you, for any small purpose: which sounded rather as an upbraiding of some treason to him, than any congratulation of the gift, so sent unto him, [Plut. ib.] It is said also that the king gave him 80 Cowes, which because he was sickly, should afford him milk upon his way homeward: and a costly bed and furniture, with some servants to make it, because the Grecians skilled not of such matters: and moreover, caused him to be carried all along to the sea side in a Lictier, because of his infirmity; giving those which carried him 4 talents for their pains, [Id. ib. and in his Pelopidas] But [Athena. lib. 2.] having told us that this Timagoras, after his prostration to the king, was used with great honour by him, addes onely, that the King sent him some dishes from his own table. As for that costly bed and furniture, and men to make it, as if the Grecians knew not how to make a bed; sent by Artaxerxes, he sayes it was to one Timagoras of Creet, or Eutimus of Gortyna in Creet, as Phanias the Peripatetic calls him.

Pelopidas, being so gracious with the king, gat letters from him, wherein the king commanded that Messene should be exempt from the Lacedemonian jurisdiction: and the Athenians required to draw up their ships; and if they obeyed not, proclaimed open war against them both; and if any city refused to follow him in this war; then that city was first of all others to be made an example. And when Leontes spake openly and said, that it was time for the Athenians to look them out and provide new friends instead of the king: Artaxerxes bad adde, that if the Athenians did not like it, they should come and shew cause, why not, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

When the Ambassadors came home, the Athenians took Timagoras, and for his prostration to the King, struck off his head: taking it amisse that the glavering flattery of one citizen of theirs, should subject the whole honour of the Athenian Sate to the domineering power of the Persian: so sayes, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 3.] Where I know not by what mistake, Darius is crept into the text instead of Artaxerxes. Others say it was, for his base acceptance of the Kings gifts: of which a man may see more in, [Plutarch in his Artax. and Pelopidas.] But Xenophon sayes, that he was accused by Leontes his collegue: for that he would not so much as keep in one lodging with him, and communicated all his counsels with Pelopidas: which no doubt was the chief cause of his being put to death.

The Thebans summoning all the cities of Greece to hear the Kings letters read, and they being publickly read by the Persian that brought them, who first shewed them the Kings seal, put to them; they required all, who would be friends to the king and the Thebans, to take an oath for the observance of the contents of those letters. But when the Legats first, and afterwards the Cities themselves, refused that oath: all that Embassage to Artaxerxes, and the principality and soveraignity of Greece so much affected by Pelopidas and the Thebans came to naught, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Artaxerxes sending an other Embassage into Greece to require them to put an end to these wars, and to make a peace among themselves; in the end, prevailed with them, [Diodor. an. 3. Olymp. 103.]

Eudoxus the Cnidian, sirnamed Ἔνδοξος, Endoxos: (i.e.) the famous, was in his prime at this time. He going into Egypt with Chrysippus a Physitian, carried with him letters of commendation from Agesilaus to Nectanabis: and he commended him over to the Priests there: where being upon a time with Iconuphi of Heliopolis, (whom Clemens Alexan. in the first book of his stromat. calleth Conuphis) Apis came, and all to belicked his cloak: whereupon the Priests said presently, that he should grow very famous, but should not be long-lived: as Phavorinus in his Commentaries saith. He having stayed in Egypt one year and four moneths, shaving himself all over, to his very eye-eye-brows, wrote the Octaeris, as some report, of which we in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic year. [cap. ult.] have said somewhat. From thence he is said to have travailed to Cyzicum, and Propontis, and to have spread his philosophy in those parts, and so to have come to Mausolus, [Diog. Laertius in his Eudoxus,] others say, that this Eudoxus went in company with Plato in Egypt, and they both conversed 13 years space, with the Priests there, as we read in Strabo, [*lib.*17.]

3639. At Heraclea in Pontus, when the common people there, desired all bills and bonds to be cancelled, (i.e.) all debts to be released, and all lands to be cast into a hotch potch and equally shared among them, the better sort, sent both to Timotheus, Prince of Athens, and also to Epaminondas, of the Thebans for help against them; but failing of their hope, they sent for Clearchus home, whom they had formerly cast into exile, and prayed his aide to represse them, [Justin lib. 16. c. 4.] 4349. 365.

3640. Clearchus, supposing the dissention of the people, to be a fit occasion for him to attain to the sovereinty of the city, dealt secretly with Mithridates King of Pontus, who was in hostility with his country, and agreed with him; that being called home into his country, he should deliver the city into his hands, and hold it afterward as governour under him. And having set a time, when to deliver the city into Mithridates his hand, took him, when he came about it, and all his friends that came with him prisoners, and wrung a great masse of money out of them, and so let them go: and then, as he made himself an unexpected enemy of a friend to him; so insteed of maintaining the rich mens cause against the people, he made himself a patron and leader on of the common sort against them; and did not onely incense the people against them, but fell to exercising of acts of tyranny and cruelty upon them. For when the people had put the supremacy, and all power into his hands, he cast 60 of the chief of them (for the rest were fled) into prison, and having first taken away their goods, then put them all to death likewise, [Id. ib.] and setting Dionysius the Tyrant of Syracusae before him for a pattern in all things to follow, he held the place 12 years, [Diodor. year 1. of the 104 Olymp. with the Collections of Photius in his Biblioth. out of Memnon the Historiographer of Heraclea, num. 224.] 4350. 364.

3641. Tachos, whom Polyaenus [lib. 7. Sratagem.] calls Thamos, Aristotle [lib. 2.] of his Oeconomics Taos, and Julius Africanus, Teos, reigned in Egypt, two years. 4351. 363.

With this year Xenophon concludes his 7 books of his Grecian history, and Anaximes Lampsacenus the first part of his: where beginning from Θεογονία, that is, the generation of the gods, and beginning of man kind, he endeth with the battle of Manthinea, wherein Epaminondas was slain, comprehending in 12 volums, almost whatever passed among either the Greeks or Barbarians, [Diod. year 2. 104 Olympiade,] and in the second part he sets down all the gests of Philip of Macedon and his son, Alexander the great, [Pausa. 2. of his Eliaca.]

When Mithradates king of Pontus was dead, Ariobarzanes, the Governor of Phrygia under Artaxerxes, seized on the kingdom of Pontus, and held it by the space of 26 years, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 104. and year 4. of Olympiade 110.]

Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclea, when he found that the chief men and Aldermen of Heraclea, which were fled from thence, stirred up all the neighbouring cities and states against him, he manumised and set at liberty all their servants, and gave them their masters wifes and daughters in marriage, threatning those that would not, with death; that hereby he might make those slaves the more sure and trusty to himself, and the more deadly enemies to their masters. But when the women reckoned these dolefull marriages to be worse than death it self, many of them before their marriage, many after, having first murdered their new husbands, slew themselves: at last they came to a battle, where the Tyrant getting the victory took the chief men and Aldermen prisoners, and led them in triumph thorough the city, in sight of all the people, and then laid some of them in irons, others upon the rack, others he put to death, leaving no corner of the city free from sight and sense, of his cruelty, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 5.]

3642. The Lacedemonians fell flat out with Artaxerxes, for that professing himself to be their friend and confederate, he had yet commanded them to part with Messene out of their hands, and to make the Messenians a distinct member, in the leage and confederacy of Greece, [Xenoph. in his Agesilaus, and Diod. year 3, Olymp. 104.] and with them joyned Ariobarzanes, the Governour of Phrygia, who, as I said before, upon the decease of Mithridates, had seized on and possed himself of the kingdom of Pontus. [Diodor. ib.] 4352. 362.

Autophrades the Governor of Lydia, besieging Ariobarzanes in Assos, a city of Troas, for fear of Agesilaus, who being now old, came into Asia, onely to raise money for his country, brake up his siege, and fled; and Cotys, who lay before Sestus, which which was at that time under Ariobarzanes his command, brake likewise up his siege, and gat him packing. Mausolus also, which besieged Assus, and Sestus, both with an hundred ships by sea; not thorough fear, but upon perswasion drew off, and returned home with his Fleet: and furnishing Agesilaus with monies for his countries use, sent him fairely away, [Xenoph. in his Agesilaus.] Of which Ariobarzanes, and of his being besieged by Autophradates in Adramytium, [Polyanus also lib. 7.] maketh mention.

Mausolus, calling his friends together, bare them in hand, that Artaxerxes, unlesse he satisfied him forthwith with an excessive summe of money, would deprive him of his principality, which he held by inheritance from his father: which they believing, brought him, in an instant, an infinite summe of money, [Polyenus lib. 7. stratag.] compared with [Aristot. in his Oeconomics:] which having once fingered, he was so far from giving it to Artaxerxes, that therewith he confederated presently with those Governours and Captains which then were up in armes against him; for there rebelled at this time against him, of the Ionian nation, all Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia; and besides these, the Syrians and Phoenicians, and almost all that border upon the Asiatick sea; Tachos also king of Egypt, proclaimed open war against him, and was busie every where in building of ships and raising of forces; especially out of all parts of Greece, and got the Lacedemonians themselves to confederate and joyn with him, [Diod. year 3. Olympiade 104.]

All these rebelling at once against Artaxerxes, he lost one half of his revenues coming into his cofers. And the remainder sufficed not for the necessary use of the war, considering that he was to maintain a war all at once, against the king of Egypt, and all the Grecian cities and countries in Asia; against the Lacedemonians and their confederates; to wit, all the Lords and Captains which held the Maritime towns and regions in all Asia under their command, [Id. ib.]

The king of Egypt sent for Agesilaus to come unto him, promising to make him General of his army, [Xenoph. in his Agesilaus.] And he being sent thither by his country, laid out the monies which Tachos had sent him for himself, in levying souldiers for his service. And having stored his ships with men, and taking along with him 30 Spartan Commissioners for his Council of War, went with a thousand Corselets into Egypt, [Plut. in his Agesilaus: and Diodor. ut sup.] When the report of his landing came to the Courtiers eares in Egypt, happy was he that could first send in presents to him; but when they came, and saw no attendance about him, onely a decrepit and wearisom old man, lying along upon the beach, sloven-like, and of a small stature, in a course thredbare cloak, they contemned and scorned him; and much more did they loath his sordid and insulse behaviour, when they saw, that of those rich presents and provisions of diet which were sent in to him of all sorts, he would take some meale, and a veale perhaps, or a goose for himself, and throw away the dainties and sweet meats, and precious oyntments to his souldiers, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in his Agesilaus.] The King of Egypt himself also, performed not with him, nor made him General of his army, according to his promise, [Xen. in his Agesilaus.] Deriding him for the smalnesse of his stature: and said, that he weened the old Proverb was true, The hills were great with young, and were delivered of a mouse: which when Agesilaus heard, he said in a rage, I will one day seem a Lyon unto him, [Athenæ. lib. 14. with Plutarch.]

Chabrias the Athenian, was not sent by publick authority, as Alcibiades was, but upon the perswasion of Tachos, served him as a private man, [Diod. and Plutarch.] Who when he saw the King in some distresse for want of money, advised him to take up what monies possible he could of the richer sort of the country, and promise them payment out of his yearly revenues: and by this means, he gathered an infinite sum of money without wrong to any, [Polya. strat. lib. 3.] and Aristotle [2. of his Oeconomics.] reckons up a great many the like shifts that he made for the getting of monies, at this time.

They which rebelled in Asia, made Orontes the Governour of Mysia their Commander in chief: who having received monies enough to pay 20 thousand hired souldiers for one whole year; took first those who had contributed these monies and sent them prisoners to Artaxerxes, and then betrayed sundry other cities and castles, and companies of hired souldiers, to such Lieutenants as the King had sent into those parts, [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 104.] of this war managed by Orontes and Autophradates and other Captains of the Kings, [Polyanus lib. 7. stratag. maketh also mention.] But for as much as Diodorus assures us, that in the last year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, both Autophradates and Orontes, and other Commanders, fell all off from him; we must of necessity conclude, that Autophradates stood for his son Artaxerxes Ochus, and that it was Orontes which made the war against him.

Artabazus, who commanded Artaxerxes Mnemons army, falling upon Cappadocia, Datames the Governour of that Province, met him with a strong body of horse, and and 20 thousand foot, of mercenaries; but then Mithrabarzanes his father in law, and General of his horse, stale away from him by night with all his horse, and fled to Artabazus, and truly he and they, had their wages well payed them for such their trechery, for it fell out, that they were set upon, and hewed in pieces, by both the armies, both that to which, and that from which they fled: and Diodorus addeth, that Artaxerxes being informed, that Datames had brought him this noose, by putting a trick upon him; made all the haste he could to rid his hands of him, and that shortly after, he caused him privily to be made away: but it appears out of Emil. Prob. that Datames lived long after this: Whose actions, as he acknowledges them to have been carried all along in an obscure way, so he saies, that himself was the more inquisitive and diligent in searching out and describing the concavities of them: which he doth in such wise, as a man may easily discerne, that what he did was all in Artaxerxes Ochus his time.

Rheomithres was sent by the united Lords into Egypt, where having gotten 500 talents, and 50 tall ships, he returned with them to Leucas in Asia: and having sent for many of the principal of them to come thither to him, he laid hold of them, and sent them all away prisoners to Artaxerxes; and by this act of his, reingraciated himself with the King, who was formerly displeased with him, [Diodorus year 3 Olympiade 104.]

Tachos, having now fitted himself with all things necessary for the war, gave the command of the 10 thousand men, which he had hired out of Greece to Agesilaus; but his fleet consisting of 200 saile, to Chabrias (which with what care and cunning he furnished with rowers, [Polya. lib. 7. Stratag.] sheweth) and his foot army consisting of 80 thousand Egyptians, to Nectanabus, his, or rather, his brother or sisters son, for the word ἀνεψιὸς in the Greek signifieth either; but reserved to himself the oversight and general-ship of all. And although Agesilaus perswaded him, to carry on this war by his Lievtenants, and to stay himself in Egypt; yet he would not, [Diod. ib.] neverthelesse, Agesilaus, beneath himself, and contrary to his own humour, attended him by sea into Phœnicia, [Plutarch in his Agesilaus.]

Whiles the Egyptian fleet, lay in Phenicia, Nectanabus was sent to take in some principal cities of Syria; where having compacted with him whom Tachos had left for Governor of Egypt in his absence, he proclaimed himself King of Egypt; and drew the commanders of the army by large gifts, and the souldiers by no lesse large promises, to side it with him against his father, [Diod. ut su.]

Tachos being now utterly deserted, both by his own subjects, and also by Agesilaus, whom he had formerly offended by that base jest put upon him, fearing the worst, fled thence to Sidon in Phenicia, and from thence, to the King of Persia, as besides Xenophon and Plutarch, Theopompus and Lysias of Naucratis, in his affaires of Egypt, both cited by Athenæus [in his 14 book, 4 chapter,] report. Diodorus and Elian say further, that he was very graciously entertained by Artaxerxes, though I cannot believe Diodorus in this, that Artaxerxexs presently made him general of all the forces which he had then raised to make a war upon Egypt, and that with them he returned into Egypt, and was there reinthroned by Agesilaus, neither yet, [Elian, lib. 5. Var. Histor. c. 1.] where he telleth us, that having formerly used to live frugally at home, he now died with overgorging himself with excesse of diet, after the Persian manner, seeing that Lynceus or Lyceas, whom I mentioned before, teacheth us that his Egyptian diet was far more sumptuous, than that of the Persian was, [cited by Athenæus, lib. 4. cap. 10. Deip.]

After this, another set up himself against him in Mendes, with an army of 100 thousand men, [Plut. in his Agesilaus.] So when there were now 2 Kings in Egypt, Agesilaus followed him whom he saw most to favour his Countrey men the Lacedemonians, [Xen. in Agesilaus.] and that was Nectanebus; with whom he endured a strong siege in a Castle. But when Nectanebus grew impatient of being thus shut up; and would needs hazard himself upon a battle, Agesilaus left him, and stayed behind in the castle, till the whole Castle was quite surrounded with works, and the enemy about them, all save a little space, where there was yet a passage left: then sallied he out at that narrow passage, and made his way through with a great slaughter of the enemy, having their works at his back, so that they could not enclose him round, [Plut. in Agesil. Polya. stratag. lib. 2. with Diod. year 3. Olymp. 104.] where yet he hath by mistake Tachos, instead of the King of Mendes.

b. 3643 As for the other king, which bare a hatred to the Greek nation, Agesilaus overthrew him in a fight, and took him prisoner: but restored the other to his kingdom: and made him a firme friend to the Lacedemonian State, [Xenophon in Agesilaus.] Though Emil. Prob. attribute this restitution of the king, to Chabrias: the reason whereof was, because it was indeed done by the joynt work of the Lacedemonians, and Athenians. Now from this time to the putting of Nectanebus from the kingdom, Diodorus reckons 12 year; which was indeed the true terme of his reign, 4353. 361.

reign, not 18, as Affricanus and Eusebius have it.

Nectanebus entreated Agesilaus very earnestly, to spend that winter with him; but he hasted homeward; for that Sparta was then engaged in a war; and he knew they wanted money: and maintained a forreign army: wherefore he dismissed him very honourably; and gave him, besides all other gifts, 230. or, as Emil Probus hath it, 220 thousand talents. [Plut. in Ages.]

Agesilaus having fingered this money, hasted him homeward, though in the dead of winter; for fear least the Lacedemonians should spend the next summer idle, and do nothing against their enemies. [Xen. in Agesil.] But being cast by a tempest upon a desert shoare, called Menelai Portus, (i.) Menelaus his Port, lying between Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell sick and died. There his friends for want of wax, made him up with hony, and so carried him to Sparta, [Plutarch and Emilius Probus, in Agesilaus.] and Diodorus saith that his body so brought thither, was there enterred, in a most royal manner, [year 3. Olymp. 104.]

c. Ochus, the lawful son of Artaxerxes, because his base brother Arsames, was very tenderly beloved of his father, caused him to be murdered by Harpates the son of Tiribazus, aud Artaxerxes hearing what was betided to his so much beloved son, took it presently to heart, and died of grief, [Plut. in Artaxerxes.]

Ochus, knowing that his father while he lived, was by his people, and that himself after his death would be nothing regarded, dealt so with the Chiliarch, the Eunuchs, and others about him, that his death was kept close ten moneths after, and in the mean time dispatcht away letters into all parts in the kings name, with his seal to them, requiring every man to receive Ochus for their king, [Polya. lib. 7. Strateg.]

Clearchus the Tyrant of Pontus, had a son born him at Heraclea, whom he called Dionysius, who lived 55 years, witnesse Athenaeus, lib. 12, and Mnemon in the collections of Photius, cap. 5.]

3644. Ochus, when now all men had acknowledged him for king, and done fealty to him, made it known, that his father was dead, and commanded a publique mourning to be made for him according to the Persian manner, [Polia. lib. 7.] and took upon him his fathers name, Artaxerxes, [Diodor. Valerius Max.] and then fill'd and foul'd his court with the bloud of his kindred and nobles, without respect having to kin, sex, or age, [Justin lib. 10. cap. 3.] among which he caused his own sister, whose daughter he had married, to be buried alive with her heels upward, and made an Uncle of his, with above 100 children and grand-children descended from him, to be brought into a court, and there shot to death with arrows, [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 2.] which as it seemeth, was the father of Sisygambis, the mother of Darius the last king of the Persians, for of her it is that Q. Curtius, [lib. 10. cap. 8.] reporteth, that her father, and 80 brothers were all put to death by Ochus in one day. 4354. 360.

3646 3645. The several states of Chios, Rhodes, Byzantium and Chos, all at once revolting from the Athenians, there grew that war which was called Bellum Sociale, (i. e.) the confederates war. When the Athenians began with the siege of Chios, besides their own confederates, Mausolus also the petty king of Caria sent aides unto them, [Demosthenes in his Oration of Peace, and of the Rhodians liberty, Diod. an. 3. Olympiade, 105.] 4356. 358.

3648. In the first year of the 106 Olympiade, (as it is rightly read in Eusebius his Chron. out of Fuxius his copy, corrected by Arnaldus Pontacus) was Alexander (who because he conquered all Asia, was afterward surnamed, The Great) born at Pella, in the country of Macedon: for seeing that he lived 32 years, eight moneths, as Arianus reporteth out of Aristobulus, and died in the end of year 1. Olympiade 114. in the last, save one of the moneth Thargelion, of the Attic account; as we shall see when we come to that year; it follows, that he must be born, in the year aforesaid, and that in the third year called Boedromion, in the Attic Calendar, so that as well they, who (as in Elian Variar Histor. lib. 2. cap. 25.) have said, that he both was born and died, upon the sixth day of Thargelion, have erred in their account; as Plutarch also, who in the life of Alexander saies, that he was born in the beginning of the moneth Hecatombeon, called Lous by the Macedonians, to wit, on the sixth day thereof. And there was reason indeed why they, who living at that time, first reported it in writing, should say, that he was born upon the sixth day of the moneth Lous: because at that time the moneth Lous with the Macedons answered just to Metons Boedromian, as appears by King Philip, the father of this Alexander, his Epistle to the Peloponesians, as we have already shewed, in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic years, in the first chapter thereof, which the Historians and other writers of later times not observing, and finding the Syro-Macedon moneth Lous in Calippus to hit right with the moneth Boedromion among the Athenians, thought that Alexander had been born upon the sixth day of that Boedromion. 4358. 356.

And from hence grew that error of Plutarch, which he mended afterward by a far greater greater one, where he saith. The same day that Philip took Pitidaa, there came to him three several tidings, one from Pharmenion, that he had given the Illyrians a great overthrow, the second, that he had won the race with his horse at Olympus, and the third, that his son Alexander was born: for we learn out of Demosthenes, in his oration against Leptines, and Diodorus, year 3. Olympiade 105. That Polydæa was not taken this year, but two years before. And again, if it had been so, that Alexander had been born in the 106 Olymp. and upon the 6 day of Hecatombæon, yet had it been a great wonder, that he should not have heard a great deal sooner of the birth of his son, than he could possibly have done of his winning the race of Olympus: for that that race was ever wont to be run on the day of the full moon, and judgement given thereupon, on the 16 day of the same month, we are taught by the old Scoliast of Pindarus, upon his 5 Ode or Hymne of his Olympics, yet Justin out of Trogus tells us more clearly, [lib. 12. cap. 16.] The same day, saith he, on which Alexander was born, news came to him of two several victories by him gotten, the one upon a battle in Illyrium, the other in a race at Olympus; whither he sent his coach with four horses to run: Out of which reports, not hanging all of the best together; though I grant that it may be not improbably gathered, that Alexanders birth was in the sommer season, of that year, wherein the Olympic games were kept at Olympus in Elis, yet the testimony of Aristobulus, to whom Alexander himself in person was so well known, is so firm and strong an argument to me of the day wheron he was born, that I conceive no doubt to be made, but that Philip the father, was certified of the race won by him at Olympus, before his son was born.

The same day that Alexander was born, was the temple of Diana at Ephesus burnt; whence came that poor jest, whether of Timæus, as Cicero hath it, or of Hegesias the Magnesian, as Plutarch saith, That Diana being from home that night, at the travile of Olympias, could not tend to save her own Temple, [Cic. lib. 1. de Natura deorum, and lib. 1. de Divina, and Plut. in his Alexander.] He that put the fire to it, being taken and had to the rack, confessed that he did it of purpose, that having destroyed so famous and excellent a work, his name might for it be carried over all the world: whereupon by the common-council of all Asia, it was decreed that no man should ever after name him, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 14. Aul. Gell. lib. 2. cap. 6.] which yet Theopompus in his History did; whether it were Erostratus, as we read it [in Strabo, lib. 14. and Solinus cap. 4.] or Lygdamis, as Hesychius, in the word Lygdam.

The Priests, who were at that time in Ephesus, apprehending that the burning of this Temple was but the fore-runner of some greater mischief to ensue; ran up and down as if they had been mad, and cut their faces, saying, that some great calamity 3648. was that day hatched against all Asia, [Plut. in Alexan.] 4358. 356.

Artabazus, having entered into a rebellion against Ochus, joyning his forces with those of Chares the Athenian, overthrew an army of the Persians, consisting of 70 thousand men: and thereupon gave Chares such a masse of money, that it enabled him to pay all his army. The King expostulated this matter with the Athenians; and they, hearing a rumor, that the King was about to send 300 sail to the relief of their enemies, against whom Chares at that time was in armes; clapt up a peace out of hand, and came to an agreement with them, and so that war between them and their confederates, called Bellum sociale, ended, [Diod. year 1. and 4. of the 106. Olymp.] 354

Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, when he went to the celebration of the Feast of their god Bacchus, was murdered in the 12 year of his reign, [Id. ib.] Chief author of which murder was one Chion of Heraclea, the son of one Matris, a scholar of Platoes, and a kinsman of Clearchus; who associated to him Leonides and Antitheus, scholars also in Philosophy, as the other was, and one Euxenon, and some fifty others of their allies and kindred, whom they disposed privily in places fitting for that purpose. Having therefore spyed their time when the tyrant was busie and intentive upon the sacrifice with the rest of the people, Chion ran him thorough with his sword; whereof, when he had laien greivously tormented with pains, and haunted with the apparitions and ghosts of those whom he had most barbarously murdered: the next day he died. But most of the conspirators, if not all, were either presently cut in pieces by his Guard, though they stoutly defended themselves; or were shortly after taken, and put to horrible torments (which they endured with incredible constancy and patience) and so died, [Memnon in Excerpt. cap. 2. Justin. lib. 6. cap. ult. and Suidas in Clearchus.] See also the Epistles attributed to this Chion, as written by him to his mother Matis.

Satyrus, brother to Clearchus, succeeded him in that Principality; and held it 7. years: wherein he contented not himselt with the death of the conspirators themselves: but fell upon all their children, though innocent of their fathers fact; and being left as Guardian and Protector of Timotheus, and Dionysius his brothers children, was so respective of them, that though he had a wife, whom he loved very dearly; yet would he not do with her, whereby to have children of her, least he might perhaps thereby leave an issue, which might in time prove dangerous to his brothers children, [Memnon in Excerpt. cap. 3.]

3652. 4362. 352. In the 107 Olympiade (not in the 103, as Suidas in Theodectes hath it) Artemisia proclaimed a Game, for all to come, and shew their wit and art, in praise and honour of her husband deceased. To this game, came in sundry men of excellent parts; Theopompus of Chios, the prime man of all the hearers and scholars of Isocrates, as [Diony. Halicarnasseus in his Epistle to Pompeius, witnesseth of him.] Theodectes of the City of Phaselis in Lycia, a Tragedian Poet; another Scholar likewise of Isocrates: and Naucrates Erythræus, of Naucratis in Cyrenia; all mentioned by Photius in Biblioth. [c. 176 and 260.] some there are also, which say that Isocrates himself, put in for the prize in this Game: of which Plut. is one, [in his life of Isocrates.] but that was not this Isocrates of Athens, but another of the same name, his scholar, and successor in his chaire, as Suidas, out of Callisthenes the Orator, teacheth us. In that contention of wits, Theopompus, as some say, and as others, Theodectes the Tragedian, who left a tragedy, entitled Mausolus, wan the prize, [A. Gell. lib. 10. c. 18. Suidas, in Theodectes and Isocrates.] though it should seeme that all went not here with Theopompus to his mind because that writing afterward a history, he therein saies, that Mausolus never spared for any vilany, if he might get money by it: which in all likelihood, he would never have done, if things had sorted out there, according to his expectation. [Suidas in Mausolus.]

But of this Theopompus (of whome I have spoken before) who was an Historian, and Theodectes a Tragedian, I may not here let passe, what is reported by Demetrius Phalereus, in Aristeas (and out of him by Josephus, [lib. 12. Antiquitat. c. 2. and by Euseb. de Præpar. Evengel. lib. 8. c. 3. and 5. & in his discourse of the Septuagints Interpretation:] as this, that Theopompus would fain have inserted some things out of the books of Moses, into his History, but lay thereupon distraught of his wits, by the space of 30 dayes; and that in his intervals of that sicknesse, he earnestly besought God, to reveale unto him the cause, why this great judgement was befallen him: and that in a dream it was told him, that it was because he went about to mingle those divine Oracles with his humane studies; and publish them to the world: and upon change of that purpose, he was restored to his right wits again: and of Theodectes: that when he purposed to translate some things out of the holy writ into a Tragedie of his, he suddainly grew owle-eyed, or pore-blinde, till having considered, that such his attempt was the cause thereof, he asked God mercy, and was restored to his perfect sight again.

3653. 4363 ~~3463~~. 351. Artimisia, who, to continue the memory of her husband, built that stupendious tombe for him at Halicarnassus, reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, pined away at last and dyed for grief, [Cicero. Tuscul. Quest. lib. 3. Strabo. l. 14. A. Gell. lib. 10. c. 18.] To the making of this so miraculous a frame, the most famous workmen and artificers of the world set their hands, Scopas, out of the East, Bryaxis, from the North, Timotheus from the South, and Leochares from the West: and albeit she died before the work was finished, yet they gave it not off till they had brought it to a full perfection; knowing that by so doing, they should also eternize their own names, and glory in it, [Plin. lib. 36: c. 5. with Vitruvius in the Proeme of his 7 book;] Whence it was even at Rome, that every sumptuous and magnificent building, was afterward called a Mausoleum, [Pausan, in his Arcadica.]

After her death, her brother Idrieus or Hidrieus, held the Dynasty or Principality of Caria, 7 years, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 107.] who being the second son of Hecatomnus, married his second daughter Ada, his own sister, according to the law of Caria, [Strabo l. 14. Arianus, of the Gests of Alexander, l. 1.]

The Thebans, falling into great distresse for want of money, in their war against the Phoceans, sent their Embassadors to Ochus, and had of him 300 talents, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 107.]

The Phenicians, especially the inhabitants of Sidon, having been basely abused

by

by Ochus revolted from him, and sending to Nectabenus king of Egypt, confederated with him in a war against the Persians, and then having furnished themselves with a great fleet of ships and store of land souldiers, cut down the kings Garden and Orchard, and burnt the hay that was provided for the kings stable, and put to death those Persians, that had done them wrong: wherefore the Satrapa of Syria, and governour of Cilicia, made war upon them. But Tennes the King of Sidon, having received from the king of Egypt, four thousand Grecian souldiers under the command of Mentor of Rhodes, with the help of them, and his own men together, routed them both, and drave the Persians clean out of all Phænicia, [Id. ib.]

The petty kings of the 9 cities of Cyprus, which were subject to the king of Persia, following the example of the Phænicians, fell off from him too, by a generall consent among themselves: and fitting every man himself with provisions for a war, made themselves absolute soveraignes, each in his own city. Against these, by the command of Artaxerxes Ochus, Idrieus, newly made king of Caria, and by a tradition received from his Ancestors a true servant of the kings of Persia, and a follower of them, in their wars, sent 40 saile of ships, and in them 8 thousand mercenary souldiers, under the command of Phocion the Athenian, and of Euagoras, who formerly had been a king there, into Cyprus. These began with the best first, and besieged the city Salamis; whereupon there resorted to them, out of the parts of Syria and Cilicia, lying over against Cyprus, in hope of a prey, a very great multitude of men; so that Phocyon and Euagoras his army grew twice as big as it was at their coming thither, [Ibid.]

Artaxerxes Ochus, having mustered an army of 300 thousand foot, and 30 thousand horse, with 300 fighting ships, and 500 ships of burden, to carry his provisions in, set out from Babylon, toward Phænicia, and the sea-side. But Mentor, whom the Sidonians had made Commander over the Mercenary Greeks, taking a fright at his approach, sent a man called Thessalion to him, offering him first to betray all the Sidonians into his hands, and afterward to do him right good and trusty service in the conquering of Egypt. Thessalion, having delivered his message, and received the kings promise, and kissed his hand upon it, returned to Mentor, and assured him from the king, undiscovered by the Sidonians, [Ib.]

Mean while, Ochus sent his Ambassadors into Greece for some aides from them, against the Egyptians. Whereupon the Athenians and Lacedemonians returned him answer, that they would keep the peace made with him, with all their hearts, but send him any aide at this time they could not. But the Thebans readily sent him a thousand Corslets, under the command of Lachetes. They of Argos also sent him three thousand men, but appointed no Commander over them of their own, because the king had specially desired to have Nicostratus to command them; a man of a high spirit, and who in imitation of Hercules, used in fight, alwayes to wear a Lyons skin about him, and bare a club in his hand. The Grecians also dwelling upon the sea-coast of Asia, sent him in six thousand men; so that the Grecians in his army were in all, ten thousand men. But before their coming to him, the king was advanced, past Syria, and as far as Phænicia, and had pitcht his camp not far from Sidon, [Ibid.]

Tennes the king of Sidon, combining with Mentor in his treason, assigned him to the guard of a certain quarter in the town, and left him to manage the treason on that side; himself with 500 men, went out of the city, pretending that he would go to the common meeting or council of Phænicia. Now he had in his company 100 of the principull men of the city, as councellors about him: all which he gave up to be butchered by Artaxerxes; as the authors of that defection from him; and shortly after Artaxerxes, when 500 more of the chief of the Sidonians came to him to crave his mercy in suppliant wise, with Olive branches in their hands, he caused them every man to be struck thorough with darts, as he had done the former, having understood formerly by Tennes the king, that the city should be absolutely delivered up unto him, and without conditions; and then dealt with the Grecians which he had in pay to open the gates, and to receive the king, and him into the city, and so betrayed it to Artaxerxes: who being once in, and seeing that Tennes could do him no further service, caused his throat to be cut likewise, [Ibid.]

The Sidonians, who before the Kings coming had set fire on all their ships, to the end no man should have left any possibility of saving himself by flight that way, shut themselves every man up in his own house, with his wife and children, and then set their houses on fire, and consumed all to cindres, The number of them which perished in this fire, servants and all, amounted by report, to 40 thousand souls. The cindres of the place, with the molten silver and gold among, the King sold for many a Talent. The rest of the cities affrighted herewith, surrendred themselves presently to the King, [Ibid.]

and took many along with him out of Judea to serve him in his war in Egypt: as we gather out of Aristeas, in his book of the Septuagint Interpreters; where also, in the Epistle of Ptolomeus Philadelphus, to Eleasarus, it is said, that many of the Jewes were carried away into Egypt by the Persians, whiles they bare the sway there. Which saying of his, is to be referred to this time of Artaxerxes Ochus; as is also that place in Justin, where he saith, [lib. 36, cap. 3.] if there be any truth in either of them, That Xerxes was the first of the Persians, that subdued the Jews.

3654. While Salamis was besieged by Phocyon and Euagoras, all the rest of the cities submitted to the Persians, onely Protagoras King of Salamis held it out against them, wherein Euagoras his care was, to be restored to his fathers kingdom in Salamis. But some having done him very ill offices, and laid great accusations to his charge, with the King, he seeing the King to favour and help Protagoras against him, gave off all hope of prevailing in that sute: and went and cleared himself of all imputations before the King; which he did so well, that the King bestowed a far better Dynasty or Principality upon him in Asia. And Protagoras at last voluntarily submitting to the King, held the kingdom of Salamis quietly ever after, [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] But this Euagoras of whom we now speak, it seems, was the grandchild of an other Euagoras, who died 24 years before, by his son Nicocles: for that Euagoras the elder, had a son Nicocles, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Salamis; and another called Protagoras, appeareth out of Isocrates; but this younger Euagoras who succeeded Nicocles, seems to have been put from his kingdom by Protagoras, which was his Uncle. But having, as was said before, a greater thing than Salamis bestowed on him by this Ochus, by his misbehaviour therein used, he was fain to flee again into Cyprus, where being taken, he was put to death as a malefactor, [as Diodorus shews.] 4364. 350.

Eusebius in Chron. sheweth that in this 3 year of the 107. Olympiade, Ochus making Nectanebus to flee into Ethiopia, possessed himself of all Egypt: And that in him was destroyed the kingdom of Egypt, and that here was the period of Manethoes Commentaries concerning the affairs of Egypt: and in what manner Egypt was taken in by Ochus, Diodorus in this year doth at large deliver: the summe whereof is this.

Ochus after the destruction of Sidon, and when his auxiliary forces were come unto him from Argos and Thebes, and the Grecian Cities in Asia were come unto him, uniting all his forces, he marched to the Lough of Sirbonis: where a great part of his army perished, being swallowed up for want of guides in those bogs there, which are called Barathra. From thence he marched to Pelusium, the first mouth of the River Nile: held by a Garrison of 5 thousand men, commanded by one Philophron. Here the Grecians encamped close to the city; the Persians lay 40 furlongs of. Here Ochus divided the Greeks into three brigadaes; every of which was to have two Commanders, the one a Persian, the other a Grecian. The first brigade was of the Boeotians, commanded by Lachetes a Theban, and Rosaces a Persian, Governour of Ionia and Lydia. The second was of the men of Argos, commanded by Nicostratus a Grecian, and Aristazanes a Persian. The third was by Mentor, who betrayed Sidon, and Bagoas an Eunuch of Persia. To every of which Grecian brigadaes thus commanded, there were added also sundry companies and troups, and sea Captains with their squadrons of ships; on the other side, Nectanebus had in his army 20 thousand auxiliary Grecians: and as many to his aide out of Lybia, and out of his own country of Egypt, 60 thousand men, called Warriours, with an exceeding great multitude of river boats, fitted to fight in the river Nile, if need should be: when as therefore he had furnished every place with reasonably sufficient Garrisons, himself, with 30 thousand Egyptians, and 5 thousand Grecians, and one half of his Lybians, kept the passages which lay most open and easiest for invasion.

Things therefore thus ordered on both sides, Nicostratus who commanded the Argivians, having gotten for his guides certain Egyptians, whose children and wives were kept for hostages by the Persians, with his part of ships put over one of the ditches or cuts of the Nile, the most out of sight that might be; which the next Garrisons of the Egyptians perceiving, sent no lesse than 7 thousand men, commanded by Clinius, of the Isle of Coos, to cut them off. In that encounter, the Grecians of the Persian side, slew of the other, upward of 5 thousand men, with their Commander Clinius: which slaughter of his men coming to Nectanebus his eares, he with the army which he had about him retired presently to Memphis to make that sure: mean while Lacrates, whom commanded the first brigade of the Grecians, hastened to set upon Pelusium, and having drained away the water that ran under Pelusium, by a ditch that he cut, and raised a mount upon the very channel of the old River, there planted his batteries. The Grecians within, who had till then manfully maintained the place; hearing now that Nectanebus had left the field, and was retired to Memphis, fell a treating with their enemies enemies about a composition; and when Lacrates had told them, and bound it with an oath, that, the town being surrendered, they with such things as they brought out with them should be all sent away into Greece, they gave up the Town unto him.

Mentor who commanded the third brigade, when he saw that all the cities were manned with two sorts of people, Grecians and Egptians, he caused a bruite to be cast abroad, that Artaxerxes his purpose and resolution was to deal most graciously and well with those, who willingly submitted to him; as for the rest, they must look to fare no better than Sidon had done. Whereupon the Grecians and Egyptians every where strove who should be first and forewardest to give up their Towns and places to the Persians. And first Bubastus, then all the rest of the cities, upon such terms as they could get, came all in, and submitted to the Persian.

Mean while Nectanebus being at Memphis, and hearing how all the cities fell off, one after another to the Persian, despairing of better fortune, gathered together what treasure he could, and fled with it to Ethiopia, thus [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 107.] Others report, that shaving his head, and in a disguised habit, he got him to Pelusium, and from thence as a passenger, went to Philip king of Macedon, at Pella. [see the Excerpta, Barbaro-Latina, published by Scaliger, pag. 58. the Chronicle of Alexandria, al. Fasti Siculi, published by Raderus, p. 393. Cedrenus in the Basile Edition, p. 124. and Glycas, p. 195. out of Pseudo-Callisthenes his fabulous history of the Gests of Alexander.]

Artaxerxes Ochus, having thus possessed himself of all Egypt; dismantled all the principal cities in it, and spoiling their temples, got from thence an infinite masse of treasure: he took away moreover all their records and writings out of their most ancient temples, yet these the Priests bought again, and recovered by a great sum of money given to Bagoas the Eunuch for them, [Diod. ut supra.] Ochus also is said to have derided their ceremonies, and their god, Apis. [Severus Sulpicitius in his sacred History, [lib. 2.] And because the Egyptians, for his dull behaviour and spirit, called him an asse; he violently took their god Apis, and sacrificed him to an asse, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 4. cap. 8.] and not that onely, but he gave order to his Cooks to cut him in pieces, and dresse him for dinner to be eaten, Suidas in Ochus.

After this, Ochus rewarding his Grecians by whom he had brought this great work to passe, with wealth and honour, every man according to his desert, he sent them all away to go every man for his own country, and leaving Pherendates for his viceroy and governour of Egypt, he himself, being full of glory and spoiles, after so great a conquest made, returned to Babylon with his army, [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] whither he carried also prisoners a great many of the Jews, sending most of them into Hircania, bordering upon the Caspian sea: For so Georgius Syncellus, out of Julius Africanus reports in this wise: Ωχος δ' Ἀρταξέρξου παῖς, &c. (i. e.) Ochus the son of Artaxerxes, making a journy into Egypt, led away certain Jews captives: whereof he placed some in Hircania near the Caspian sea, and the rest in Babylon it self, where they contine unto this day, as many Greek writers report.

Hecatæus Abderia also, in his first book, de Judæis, cited by Josephus, in his 1 book contra Apionem, talks of many a ten thousand of Jews, carried away to Babylon, but of their carrying from thence into Hircania, Paulus Orosius writeth in this wise, l. 3I. c. 7. Ochus, saith he, who is also called Artaxerxes, after his great and long war in Egypt was ended, carried many of the Jews, and commanded them to inhabite in Hircania, near the Caspian sea; where they continue to this day, in a wonderful increase of their stock and linage, and, as is thought, will one day break out from thence into some other quarter of the world. Which opinion yet, as it seemeth, had no other ground but that Apocryphal of Esdras lib. 4. cap. 13. 40.——46. concerning the ten tribes carried away by Salmanasser, and that of the Jews, concerning certain Hebrews shut up I know not where, and of a river Sabbation. As for that which Petrus Trecensis in his Scholastical history, [1 Esth. c. 5.] and out of him Vincentius Bellovacensis in his Specul. Histor. [lib. 30. cap. 89.] reports, of those ten tribes, shut up afterward more close than before within the Caspian mountains, these things agree nothing at all with Josephus, whom he alleadgeth for his author; but rather with the writings, of that false or supposititious Gorion, and Methodius, and even with those fictitious relations of the Mahometan Arcoran it self, concerning Alexander.

3655. Ochus having rewarded Mentor of Rhodes, with 100 talents in mony, and very rich furniture for a house, made him over and above, Prefect, of all the Asiatic shoare, 4365 with full and absolute power to suppresse all rebellions which should happen to arise in those parts; which great grace and favour he so well used, that whereas Artabazus and Memnon who had lately made war upon Ochus (of which see before in the year of the world. 1648. 1651.) and being new driven out of Asia, were fled to Philip king of Macedon, and lived with him; he got both their pardons of the king, and sent for them both to come unto him, with all their families: for indeed Artabazus had by

Mentor and Memnons sister, eleven sons and ten daughters: with which so numerous a progeny, Mentor was exceeding much delighted, and raised the sons, every of them, as he grew up, to places of Government in the Army, [Diodorus year 4. Olympiade 107.]

Mentor drew Hermias, Prince, or Tyrant, of Atarne, who was in rebellion against Ochus, and had many strong Cities and Castles under him, to a parley, upon promise made him that he would procure him the Kings pardon, but having once gotten him into his fingers, he laid hold on him, and having gotten his seal ring, dispatched away letters presently in his name, requiring the Captains and Garrisons every where of his dominion, to surrender and give up their several places, to the bearers thereof: which was forthwith done accordingly, [Id. ibid. and Polyænus Stratag. lib. 6.] And in like manner did he with all the other Rebels of the King; partly by force, and partly by tricks and policies, he brought them all into the Kings subjection again; sending the King ever now and then, hired souldiers out of Greece, and ordering all matters committed to his charge, with great judgement, valour and fidelity to the King, [Diod. year 3. and 4. Olymp. 107. and Demosthenes in his Oration, contra Aristocratem.]

When Spartacus the King of Bosphorus Cimmerius was dead, his Brother Parysades succeeded him in the kingdome, and held it 38 years, [Diod. year 4. of 107. Olympiade.]

thens, Plato the Philosopher, founder of the old Academia, died; as Hermippus in Laertius, Dionysius Halicarnasseus, in his Epistle to Ammeus concerning Demosthenes, and Athenæus, [lib. 5. c. 13.] report, of whom that saying of Numenius the Pythagorean goes, reported by Hesychius the Milesian, (in Numenius) that what ever he said of God and the world, he stole it all out of the books of Moses. Whence came that famous saying of his, reported, not only by Hesychius, and his follower Suidas, but, even long before them, by Clemens Alexandrinus, [Stromat. 1.] τί γάρ ἐστι Πλάτων, &c. for what is Plato, but Moses put into good Greek? and that he translated many things out of Moses his books into his own writings, Aristobulus the Jew, mentioned before in the year of the world 3479, saith, so that I shall not need for this purpose to vouch the authority of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Ambrose, Theodoret, Johannes Philoponus, writing upon the Hexameron, and other Christians.

After the decease of Plato, Aristotle, the setter up of the Sect of the Peripatetic Philosophers, travelled to Hermias the Eunuch and tyrant of Atarve, of whom I spake in the year going before, with whom he lived and conversed three years, as Laertius out of Apollodorus his Chronicle, and Dionysius in his fore-cited Epistle to Ammeus testifie; and Strabo [lib. 13.] tells us, that he lived at Assos, which was under the dominion of Hermias, and of which mention is made, [Act. 20. 13.] by reason of that affinity which he had contracted with him: for he married Pythiades the adoptive daughter of Hermias, and either his sister, or his brothers natural daughter, I know not whether, though Aristocles the Peripatetic (as we find in Euseb. de Preparat. Evangel. lib. 15.) That for the love which he bare Hermias in his life time, he married her after his death; and whiles he remained in Asia, he conversed with a certain Jew, a man of great learning and temperance withal, which was come from out of the upper Asia to the sea side, and there Aristotle, with sundry others addicted that way, were his auditors, and heard him discoursing in the Greek tongue, as Clearchus of Solos a principal Scholar of Aristotles, cited by Josephus, [lib. 1. contra Apionem.] in his 1 book de Somno. (i. e.) of sleepe, reports. So that perhaps to this Jew it is that the Peripatetic sect of Philosophers owe so many good sayings of theirs, so consonant to the words of Moses and the Prophets as our Clement of Alexandria affirmes they are, out of Aristobulus, aforesaid, and a great maintainer of that way, [lib. 5. Strom.] motheus, eldest son to his Brother Clearchus, was shortly after taken with a most grievous and incurable disease, by a Cancer growen in his groine, and which never left eating inward, till it had consumed him, after he had lived 65 years, whereof he spent 7. in the Government of Heraclea, [Memnon in Excerpt. c. 3.] and Timotheus forthwith, took his younger brother Dionysius into the consortship of his Principality, and designed him withal for his successor in case he should dye, [Ib. c. 4.]

of friendship, sent for Hermias the Eunuch, Tyrant of Atarne, to come unto him; and when he came, seized on him, and sent him prisoner to the King; who presently took and hanged him. But the Philosophers whom he had sent for to be about him, as Aristotle and Xenocrates, a Chalcedonian in Bithynia borne, got away, and escaped out of the Persian dominions, [Strabo lib. 13.] But Aristotle when he had lived with him 3 years, went to Mytilene, what time Eubulus was L. Chancellor at Athens, this instant, [year 4. of the Olymp. 108.] as Laertius out of Apollodorus his Chronicles reports:

as

as also Dionys. Halicarnas. in his Epistle to Ammæus aforementioned. There is also extant in Laertius an Epigram of Aristotles, making upon Hermias his Statue at Delphos to this purpose.

Him did the King of Persia slay
Contrary to Joves law or reason,
Not by force or bloody fray,
But by a friends detested treason.

Which I therefore thought fit to insert in this place, that no man might gather that Aristotle was any way consenting to his death out of those words of Tertullian, where he saith, Aristotle made his friend Hermias shamefully to leave his place.

3660. Idrieus, Prince of Caria (whose wealth is so much celebrated by Isocrates in his Oration to Philip of Macedon) died: unto whom his, both wife and sister, Ada succeeded, and held that Principality 4 years, [Strabo, lib. 14. Diodor. year 1. Olymp.] For in Asia it was grown an usual thing after the time of Semiramis, for wives to succeed their husbands in their kingdoms, [*Aria in Exped. 3664. Pexodarus the youngest son of Hecatomnus, turning his sister Ada out, held that Principality 5 years, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] Leaving her but one onely town to live upon, called Alinda. 4374

But Pexodarus sent for Orontobates a Persian Lord to make him his Consort in the Dynasty or Principality of Caria; and gave him his daughter Ada to wife, [Aria. lib. 1. Strabo lib. 14.]

Philippus King of Macedon besieged Perinthus a Town in Thracia, lying upon Propontis, with an army of 30 thousand men, thoroughly provided of all sorts of armes and engines of battery, and so incessantly playing upon the walls, that he gave them no time of rest or intermission. The King of Persia growing jealous of this mans daily growth in the World, gave order to his Commanders and Governours in Asia, that they should send to relieve Perinthus, all that possible they could, which accordingly they did, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] which was the thing, that Alexander alleged to Darius, as one of the principal causes why he invaded Asia, in his Epistle to him, [Aria. lib. 1. pag. 41.]

3666. Artaxerxes Ochus, having now reigned 23 years, fell sick; which Bagoas the Eunuch and chief man about him, as Chiliarch of the Kingdom, seeing, gave him poison, and rid him out of the way; using therein the help of his Physitian, [Diodor. year 3. of the 104. Olympiade: and year 2. of the 111. Olympiade, Severus Sulpitius. Histor. Sacra lib. 2.] For being an Egyptian born, he so hated Ochus, for killing their god Apis, that he not onely revenged that scorn, (as Sulpitius speaketh) put upon his nation, by killing the King; but also when he was dead, cut his flesh all in gobbits, and threw it to the cats to eat, and instead thereof, put I know not what else into the coffin to be buried for him, at the time of his funerals: and of his thigh-bones made hefts and handles for swords, thereby representing the propensity of his minde, whiles he lived, to blood and slaughter, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 6. cap. 8.] And (as one that could do all in all in the kingdom,) when the father was dead, he set up his youngest son Arsen, and made him King, and withal, put to death all his brothers, that the young King having none left to help him, might be forced to cleave the faster to, and rely the more upon him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 107. and year 2. Olymp. 111.] 437

Timotheus the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, died 15 years after his father Clearchus, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 110.] This man, for his great goodnesse sake, was not called any more a Tyrant, but Εὐεργέτης and Σωτήρ: (i.e.) a gracious Lord and Saviour. His body was honourably enterred by his brother and successour Dionysius: with justs, and tiltings, and wrestlings, and enterludes of all sorts; some of which were performed then presently, as the time would afford; others afterward, but with greater pomp and magnificence than the former, [Memnon in Excerpt. cap. 4.]

3667. At a general assembly of all Greece at Corinth, Philip King of Macedon, was made General of all the Grecian Forces, with absolute power over them, to make war against the king of Persia: whereupon he presently made infinite preparations for it; and having assessed a certain number of souldiers to be levyed upon every city, returned into Macedon, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 110.] 437

3668. c. The next Spring, Philip sent three of his Captains into Asia, Parmenio, Amyntas and Attalus, with a part of his army, to infest the kings countries there, and to set at liberty the cities of the Greeks, [Justin. lib. 9. cap. 5. Diod. year 1. Olymp. 111.] 437

Bagoas the Eunuch, when he undoubtedly perceived that Arsen meditated revenge upon him, cut off him and all his children, in the 3 year of his reign: And when the kings Race was thus utterly destroyed, so that there was none of them left, then set he up Darius, a friend of his own, and the son of one Arsamis, which was a brother to Artaxerxes, to claim the Crown, as next of kin, and so made him king; so saies Diod. [lib. 17. year 2. Olympiade 111. but Justin lib. 10. cap. 3.] speaketh of him in this wise, Codomannus, saith he, in regard of his singular virtue, was made King by the people, and the name of Darius was given him for majesties sake, And Alexander the Great, in Q. Curtius, [lib. 6. cap. 4.] useth these words: For neither Darius himself, saith he, came to the Crown by succession, but by the meer procurement and favour of Bagoas the Eunuch, and the same again, in an Epistle of his to Darius, in Arianus [lib. 2. pag. 41.] charges him, ὡς Ἀρσῆν ἀποκτείναντα μετὰ Βαγώου, &c. (i. e.) As a murderer of Darius, together with Bagoas, and one that had gotten that kingdom wrongfully, and not according to the laws of the Persians; but in their great and insufferable wrong: so also doth Strabo, [lib. 15.] Νάρσην ἀποκτείνας Βαγώας, (i.) Bagoas having murdered Narses, set up Darius, who was none of the kings blood, in his room: and lastly, Plutarch in his first book, of the fortune of Alexander, brings him in, speaking to Fortune in this wise, Δαρεῖος ἦν σὸν ἔργον. ὃν ἐκ δούλου, (for so it should be, and not δούλης) καὶ ἀστάνδου, (and not ἀσγάνδου, as in his Printed Copies,) βασιλέως, κύριον Περσῶν ἐποίησας, (i. e.) Darius also was thy work, whom of a slave, and letter-post of the kings, thou madest Lord of the Persians: for so Hesychius tells us in his Lexicon: Ἀστάνδης; saith he, is ἡμεροδρόμος, (i. e.) Astandes, is a Carrier: and Suidas, Ἀστάνδαι καὶ Ἀγγάροι, οἱ ἐκ διαδοχῆς, γραμματοφόροι, Astandæ and Angari, saith he, in the Persian languague, are those which carry letters from post-house to post-house, till they come to the place of their right deliverance, so that Darius was one of them, who in Esther, c. 8. 14. are called אחשתרנים, and as ἀστάνδης is in Elian to be put for ἀσγάνδης: so for δούλης, we are there to read δούλου, out of the same place in Plutarch.

Artax-

Bagos, whose hand had been so much used that way, went now about to make away Darius also, by a poysoned potion, but the matter being discovered to him, he sent fairly for him, and when he came, entreated him to drink it off; which when he refused, he caused it to be powred down his throat, [Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 111.] but told the people that he had slain him in defence of himself. [Q. Curtius lib. 6. cap. 6.]

d. Darius, in Philips life time, purposed to begin a war upon him in Macedon it self. [Diodor. lib. 17.]

Sanballet a Cuthæan born, from whom the Samaritans had their beginning, was by the King made Governour of Samaria, who gave his daughter in marriage to Nicasus the son of Manasses, brother to Jaddus the high Priest at Hierusalem, hoping by this band of affinity to hold in the better with the nation of the Jews, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11. cap. 7.]

Philip, king of Macedon, whiles he was celebrating the marriage of his daugher Cleopatra, with Alexander the king of Epeirus, at a place called Egæas, was murdered by Pausanias, the son of Cerastes, of Orestis, a Town and Country in Macedonia, [Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 111. Justin lib. 9. cap. 6. Joseph. lib. 11. cap. 8.] But Alexander in his Epistle to Darius, sayes, that his father was murdered by Assassians, set on work, and hired by Darius thereto, with an infinite sum of mony, as in Q. Curt. [lib. 4. cap. 1. and in Arria. lib. 2. pa. 41.]

A little before Philip was thus slain, Neoptolemus a Tragedian is reported by Diod. [lib. 6.] to have sung an ominous song before him; which very song was afterward again sung before Caligula the Emperor, the very day wherein he was murdered, as Suetonins in his life reporteth. Mnester, saith he, the Stage-player, sung and acted that very song, which heretofore Neoptolemus the Tragedian, did in a play, wherein Philip the king of Macedon was killed: which part of the Latin History, Josephus as it seemeth, not well understanding, [lib. 19. Antiq. c. 1.] after he had spoken of this Mnester, and the song which he sung, saying ὁ ὀρχηστὴς δρᾶμα εἰσάγει Κινύραν ἐν ᾧ αὐτός τε ἀπεκτείνετο, καὶ ἡ θυγάτηρ αὐτοῦ Μύῤῥα, which Rufinus renders thus in Latin, and I to this effect in English: The Stage-player danced the fable of Cynaras, wherein both Cinyras himself and his daughter Myrrha were both slain: draws it in, as if the killing of them both had fallen out, upon the same day, thus, ὁμολογεῖται δὲ, &c. It goes for currant, saith he, that the murder of Caligula was acted upon the self same day, whereon, Philip, the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, was slain, by one of his friends, Pausanias by name, as he was going into the Theatre. And so some men place both these murders upon the 24 day of our January. But the time of Philips death, will best be known, by the time of Alexander his succeeding him in his kingdom.

After the death of Philip, when Pythodemus, as Arrianus or Pythodorus, [Diodor. Sic. year 1. Olympiade 111,] calls him, was L. Chancellor in Athens, Alexander being then 20 years of age succeeded him, as Plutarch, and out of Trogus, Justin, write. And although Arianus, in the beginning of his History of Alexander, saith, that he was about 20 years old when, after his fathers death, he took his journy into Peloponesus, which may seem in some sort to abate of the precise number of 20 of his age, yet, to speak nothing of that interval of time, which might passe between his fathers death, and his journey thither) the exact account of his then age, appears from the time of his death; mentioned in the end of the same history, where it is said that he lived 32 years, 8 moneths, and that of them he reigned 12 years and those 8 moneths, for subducting 12 years and 8 moneths out of the total above mentioned, there remain 20 entire years; without addition or substraction either of year or moneth: and since it appears that Philip died in the end of the Macedonic moneth Dæsis, by his own Ephemerides (which I shall in due time, publish to the view of the world) I therefore gather, and from thence conclude, that Alexander began his reign, about the 8 moneth before that 1. of the moneth Dii, and in consequence thereof, that Philip was murthered about the 24 of Septemb. in which moneth of ours the month Dii began, as I have made appear in my discourse of the solar year of the Macedonians and Asiaticks, rather than the 24 of December.

3669. Alexander coming to Peloponese, and treading in his fathers steps, summoned all the cities of Greece to Corinth, & was by the general sufferage of all the Grecians there, saving the Lacedemonians only, made General and Captain in his fathers stead, to go against the Persians, [Justin lib. 11. cap. 2. Diodorus lib. 17. Arrianus lib. 1. pag. 1.] 4379. 335.

From thence returning into Macedon, in the very first of the next spring, he made an inrode through Thrace, upon the Illyrians, and the Thribulli, [Arria. lib. 1.] where in a pitcht field upon the banke of the Danow, he overthrew Syrmus, the King of the Triballi, [Plut. in Alex.] mean whiles, tidings came to him, that the Athenians, Lacedemonians and Thebans, were all fallen over to the King of Persia's side: and that the Author thereof was Demosthenes the Orator, having been bribed thereto, by a vast summe of money from the Persian, and that he, in an Oration made, had assured them that Alexander with all his forces, was quite broken and overthrowen by the King of the Triballi, [Justin. lib. 11. cap. 2. with Eschines in his Oration cont. Ctesiphontem.] And the Athenians further, by certain Legates of theirs, and Demosthenes his Epistle by them sent unto him, sollicited Attalus, one of the 3 Captains, sent by Philip into Asia, to revolt from Alexander, as the Greeks had done, and made a new Decree, to vacat that former order of theirs, whereby he was made General of Greece, [Diod. year 2. Olym. 111. with Demosth. his Oration for Ctesiphon.]

4. Memnon the Rhodian Commander, being sent into Phrygia with 5 thousand souldiers, passing the hill Ida, set suddenly upon the city of Cyzycum: but missing of his purpose, wasted their territorie all over; and returned loaden, with a vast spoile from thence, [Diod. ib.]

When Pexodarus was dead, his son in law, Orontobates, by the authority of the Persian King, succeeded in the Principality of Caria; [Strabo, lib. 14. Arrian. lib. 1. pag. 24.]

Alexander having mastered those barbarous people, turned himself towards Greece, which was then all in a combustion, and in his way, made the Thessalonians his friends, and passed the streights of Thermopylæ, and wan them of Ambracia to him by his kindnesse; then passing with his whole army into Bœotia, and camping before Cadmæa, which was held by a Garrison of Macedons, the Athenians sent their Legates to aske his pardon, and he gave it them; but when the Thebans refused it, being offered to them, he fell roundly to work, and besieged their City, very strongly, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 111. Plut. in Alexan.]

He sent also Hecateus, with an army into Asia, to apprehend Attalus; but Attalus, having recollected himself, sent the letter which he had received from Demosthenes, to Alexander, with a very exact and serious excuse and justification of himself: Nevertheless Hecatæus following his commission, and getting him into his hand, sent him packing into another world; and so the Macedonian army which was in Asia, grew quiet, and free from mutining any further, [Diod. ib.]

Parmenio, who stood ever truly affected to Alexander, took Grinium by force, and sold away all the townsmen thereof for slaves: from thence he went and besieged Pitane, but Memnon approaching, so frighted the Macedons, that they raised their siege, [Id. ibid.]

Callas, with an army composed of Macedons, and other hired companies, fought with the Persians in the country of Troas, though far inferiour to them in number, and was there beaten, and fain to retire to Rheteum, [Ibid.]

3670. 4. Alexander layed Thebes in Bœotia level with the ground, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 111.] in the moneth of our Octob, which was the time when the Mysteries were kept in Athens: whereupon it was, that that great solemnity, which they were then in hand with, was laid aside for that time, [Id. in Alexan. and Arria, lib. 1.] there were slain of the Thebans at the taking of their city, 90 thousand men, and sold for slaves, 30 thousand; all went to pot, saving only the Priests, and his father Philips guests, and Pindarus the Poets house, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 13. c. 7.] 4380 334

Alexander at a common Council of Greece, being chosen General a second time, against the Persians, went to visit Diogenes the Philosopher there, [Plutarch in Alexan.]

b. 3670 Then returned he into Macedon, [Arria. lib. 1. pag. 11,] where in a town called Dios, as he was wholy taken up with thoughts of subdueing Asia: in his sleep the likenesse or resemblance of the High Priest of Hierusalem appeared to him, who bad him be couragious and bold, and speedily with his army to put over into Asia, and that he would be his conductor in the conquest of the Persian Empire; as he himself reports in [Iosephus, lib. 11. of his Antiquit. cap. ult.] 4380. 334.

c. In the very beginning of the Spring, therefore Alexander, setting forth from his own home, after 20 dayes march came to Sestus: and from thence put over with his army into Asia, [Arria. lib. 1.] (Euænetus being then L. Chancelor at Athens) eleven years bfore he died: as Clement of Alexandria observes out of the most ancient Chronologies, [lib. 1. Strom.] to wit, the third moneth before Ctesicles, came to be Lord Chancelor or Prætor there: in which time, it is, that Diodor. Sic. placeth his passage into Asia; whom Zosimus following as it seemeth without scruple, [lib. 1. Histor.] saith, that he passed not into Asia, till the thired year of his reign; when as indeed it was in the second: to wit, [year 2. running Olymp. 111.]

Leaving therefore Antipater, behind him, to look to matters in Europe, with 12 thousand Foot, 1500 Horse, Alexander himself, with 60 sail of ships, put over to Troas, [Diodor. ut sup.] but gave order to Parmenion, to transport the greatest part of his Foot and Horse from Sestus to Abidus: which accordingly he did, with the help of 160 men of War, and a multitude of other ships of burden, [Arria. lib. 1.] Concerning the just number of men which he carried with him into Asia, even they who were present at it, do not well agree among themselves. In [Polybius lib. 12. cap. 663. in fi.] Calisthenes is reported to affirm, that he had 4500 Horse, and 30000 Foot. In Plutarch, in that discourse of his of Alexanders fortune, Aristobulus is alleged to say, that of Foot he had 30 thousand, of Horse 4 thousand. Ptolomei the son of Lagos, King afterward of Egypt, agrees for the 30 thousand Foot, but sayes there were 5 thousand Horse: But Anaximenes of Lampsacus, raises the numbers of both; and sayes, there were 40 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand 5 hundred Horse. In the number of 4 thousand Horse, Livi. [lib. 9.] agreeth with Aristobulus; and Diodorus, [lib. 17.] Justin [lib. 11. cap. 6.] and Orosius, [lib. 3. cap. 16.] all with Calisthenes for the number, 4 thousand 5 hundred Horse, though [Arria. lib. 1.] saith, that he had above 5 thousand; and even in Diodorus himself, the particulars cast up, amount to 5000 one hundred Horse: but in the number of 30000 Foot, he concurs to a hair with Calisthenes, Aristobulus, and Ptolomei. Livie sayes there were more than 30. Arrianus, that there were not much more than 30000 Foot. To these Justinus and Orosius adde 2000 more; But that number of 40000 Foot which Callisthenes and Anaximenes speak of, Julius Frontinus assigneth to his whole army, thus. Alexander of Macedon, with 40 thousand men, all old souldiers, trained up under his father Philip, set upon the whole World; and slew an infinite number of his enemies, [Frontin. Stratag. lib. 4. cap. 2.]

For pay of his army, Aristobulus saith he took with him, but 70 talents of money: Duris saith, but 30 dayes provision: one Sicrius addeth, that he went in debt 200 talents to pay his army, [Plutarch in his life, and in his book of the fortune of Alexander.]

So soon as he touched upon the Continent, Alexander the first of all others, threw a Spear on shoar, thereby to take possession, as it were, of all Asia; and lept on shoar, capering and tripping, all armed as he was: and offering sacrifice, he besought the gods, that these lands might willingly receive him for their King: and then went and sacrificed to the ghost of Achilles, from whom he was descended by the mothers side; and of Ajax, and other Worthies of the Greeks who died at the war of Troy, [Diodor. Justin. Arrianus:] commending the great good fortune of Achilles in two respects. First for having so true a friend about him as Patroclus; and such a Trumpet of his praise, as Homer was, [Plut. in Alex. Cic. pro. Archia Poeta. & Arria. lib. 1.]

When he came into Ilium, he sacrificed to Pallas of Troy; and hanging up his own armes in her Temple, took from thence in lieu of them, some other armes out of the chancel there, which had remained from the time of the Troian war, [Diodor. Arria.] and when among other reliques they shewed him Alexanders or Paris his Lute, or Harp, he said, he would have thanked them, if they could have shewed him that of Achilles his; whereunto he had sung the praises of famous men, [Plut. in Alex. Elia. Variar. Hist. lib. 9. cap. 38.]

From Ilium he went to Arisbe, where his whole army, having passed the sea, was encamped. And the next day, passing by, first Percora, then Lampsacus, he encamped at a River called, Prosactium, [Arria. lib. 1.] He had once a purpose utterly to have destroyed stroyed Lampsacus with the inhabitants thereof; for that they had already revolted, or were shrewdly suspected of a purpose to revolt to the Persians: And when he saw Anaximines the Historian, a man very well known to him and to his father before him, coming to him, and supposing what his errand was; he sware first and said; what ever he desired of him, that he would not do: Then quoth Anaximines, Sir, I beseech you to destroy Lampsacus. And Alexander being so caught in his own net by the wit of the man, though much against his will, yet spared the place, and went his way, [Valer. Max. lib. 7. cap. 3. Pausan. in his Eliaca. lib. 2. Suidas, in the word, Anaximenes.]

Alexander, having with much difficulty and danger passed the River Granion in Phrygia, fought a pitcht field with the Persians in the plaine of Adrastia. Justinus and Orosius say, that there were at that time in the Persian army, 600000 Foot, and 20000 Horse; Arrianus somewhat improbably addes, that there were over and above of hired souldiers, little lesse than 20000 Foot: But Diodor. is more cautious than so, and sayes, that his Horse was above 10. and his Foot under 100 thousand men: of these there fell in that battel 20000 Foot, and 2500 Horse: as Plutarch sayes; but Diodor. reports, that they lost 10000 Foot, and no lesse than 2000 Horse, and above 20000 taken prisoners. Arrianus his account is, that there were slain of the Persian Horse in the chase, 1000. but that their forreign and hired souldiers were almost all cut off; and 2000 taken prisoners. Not to speak of Orosius, who out of all reason sayes, that there were upon the point of 400000 slain, [lib. 4. cap. 1.]

In this fight Alexander who wore that armor which he had taken out of the Temple of Palas at Ilium, had his head-piece cut quite in pieces to his very hair: and of his men were missing, as Plutarch out of Aristobulus, who was in it reports, 25 Horse, and 9 Foot. But Justin and Orosius deliver, that besides those 9 Foot, there were slain 120 Horse. But according to Arrianus, there fell of Alexanders own Troup, at the first encounter about 25. all Macedons, whose Statues were all cast in brasse by Lysippus, and of the others, 60 Horse, and of the Foot, about some 30. all which Alexander the day following caused to be enterred in their armes, with all Funeral rights and obsequies. This great and memorable victory, and which opened him the way to the Empire of all Asia, was gotten in the moneth Dæsius with the Macedonians, upon the 6 of Thargelion with the Athenians; that is, upon the 20 of our May, [year 2. Olymp. 111. yet running:] as we have already delivered in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic Solar year, [cap. 1. pag. 4. 5, 11.]

Alexander, having a little refresht his army, marcht forward thorough Lydia, and came to Sardes; which was voluntarily surrendred to him, by Mithrinnes, or Mithrenes, the Governour, with all the provisions and treasures therein, [Diodorus Arria.]

d. Then going to Ephesus, he there abolished the Oligarchie which he found there, and instituted a Democratie among them: and assigned all the tributes which were formerly paid to Darius, unto Diana. The Ephesians cryed out for justice against those who had robbed the Temple of Diana, and demolished the Statue of Philip, which was there set up: and drew Syrphaces, and Pelagon his son, and the children of Syrphaces his brother, and stoned them to death, [Arria. lib. 1.] Moreover they enlarged and beautified the Temple it self which was burnt down by Erostratus upon the night in which Alexander was born: appointing Dimocrates the Architect to oversee the work; whom Alexander afterward appointed to order the building of Alexandria in Egypt, as Julius Solinus, [cap. 40.] writeth: whereof Artemidorus speaketh in [Strabo lib. 14.] saying that Alexander promised to make the Ephesians allowance for the cost they had already been at about it, and to adde more thereto if they would suffer himself to be reputed the author and builder of the work: but they refused.

Whiles Alexander stayed at Ephesus, Ambassadors came to him from Magnesia and Tralles, and surrendred their cities to him. And he sent Parmenion, with 2500 Foot of forreigners, and as many of his Macedons, and 200 Horse of his auxiliaries, to receive them. He sent also Alcimalus the son of Agathocles, to the cities of Eolia and Ionia, which were hitherto held by the Persians, with no lesse numbers, than he had done with Parmenion; he every where abolished Oligarchical, and set up Democratical Governments in their cities: and gave leave to every of them to live after their own laws, and took off the tributes, which the Persian had imposed on them, [Arria. lib. 1.]

Himself remaining at Ephesus, sacrificed to Diana, and with his whole army all in battel array went in procession to her; and the day after, with the rest of his Foot, and his Archers and Agrians, and Horse of Thrace, and aides of his confederates, and his own Troup, with three other, he went to Miletus, [Id. ibid.] for thither the Persians, which escaped out of the fight at Granicum, were fled with their Generall Memnon. [Diodor.] But three dayes before their coming thither,

Alexander had sent Nicanor, with 160 ships to possesse himself of Lada, an Island lying over against Miletus, and had put into it 4 thousand men, Thracians, and other nations, so that the Persian fleet consisting of 400 saile, coming thither afterward, was fain to get them going to the mount of Micale, [Arrianus.]

Alexander falling to work, and besieging Miletus, both by sea and land, and having battered their walls; in the end, they gave up the place and themselves, in all suppliant wise unto him. Three hundred Mercenary Greeks, which had fled from thence into a little Island thereby; Alexander took and listed them among his own companies. He gave the Milesians life and liberty: as for the Barbarians there found, he either slew, or sold them all for slaves, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 111. Arria, lib. 1.]

3671. Alexander dismissed his fleet of 160 ships (which yet was in all consisting of 182 bottoms, (as Justin. lib. 11. cap. 6. sayes) keeping onely one score of the Athenian vessels, to carry his engines of batterie in, from place to place, as occasion required, [Id. ibid.] 4381 333

Memnon of Rhodes, sending his wife and children to Darius, as pledges of his fidelity, was made General of all his army, [Diod. ib.]

Alexander marched away with his army into Caria, and where ever he went, he proclaimed liberty to all cities of the Greeks; every of them to live after their own laws, and tribute free: giving it out every where, that he undertook not this war, but for the liberty of the Greeks, against the Persians, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he was upon his way, Ada met him; whom, Pexodarus his brother had put from the Principality of Caria; and gave up into his hands, her city Abinda, the strongest place in all Caria; desiring to be restored to her Grand-fathers kingdom: promising further, to do him service, in taking in the rest of the forts and cities of that country, which, she said, were in the power of her near friends, and adopted the King for her son: in requital whereof, he gave her the keeping of her town Abinda, and proclaimed her Queen of Caria; bad her claim it as her own, and refused not to be called her son: Whereupon all the cities of Caria sent their Legates to him, presenting him with Crowns of gold, and offered him their service, in whatever he should command them, [Id. ibid. Strabo, lib. 14. Arria. lib. 1. Plut. in Alexander.]

Orontobates a Persian, held Halicarnassus the metropolis of Caria, ever since Pexodarus his father in law his dayes, with whom Memnon of Rhodes the Persian General, had joyned himself with all his forces. Alexander encamping before the walls thereof, began to assault and batter it in a furious and fearfull manner: and Ephialtes an Athenian, behaved himself, above all other, bravely in the defence thereof. But when he and others were slain upon the breaches, then Memnon, and certain other Persian Lords and Captains, putting a strong garrison of their stoutest souldiers into the Castle, got shipping and passed over with the rest of the people, and all their chief moveables, into the Isle of Coos, near unto Rhodes. And when they were gone, Alexander casting a trench, and building a strong wall upon it round about the Castle, rased the city it self to the very ground; and leaving Garrisons there, and in other parts of Caria, three thousand souldiers of forrein nations, and two hundred horse, all under the command of Ptolomei, left the command of that whole province or country of Caria, to his adoptive mother Ada, [Diod. year 3. Olimpiade 111. Arria. lib. 1.]

Alexander gave his Macedons, which had married wives a little before they listed themselves for this journey, leave to go and spend their winter quarter with them, where they would out of Caria, appointing Ptolomei the son of Seleucus, one of the squires of his body, to be their Commander, and joyning with him Cœnus the son of Polemocrates, and Meleager the son of Neoptolemus, because they themselves also, were in the order of the new married men, and gave them in charge; that when they returned, they should not fail to bring again their new married fellows unto him: and withall, to raise and bring with them, as many horse and foot as possibly they could, out of the country, where they wintred. [Arria. Ib. and Q. Curtius in the beginning of his 3 book.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to Sardes, making him Commander over all the horse of his confederates, and bad take with him all the Thessalian horse, and auxiliaries, and all carts and carriages that he could make, and go before him as far as Sardes, whiles himself went into Lycia and Pamphylia; that having taken in all the sea towns, the enemies Navy might prove uselesse to them. And upon his way, he took in Hyparna, a very strong Town, upon his first approach, giving the Mercenary souldiers, which were there in garrison, quarter, and leave to depart with safetie: from thence marching into Lycia, he there procured those of the city Telmessus to submit upon conditions: then passing the river Xanthus, both Pinara, and the city Xanthus, and Patara, rendred themselves unto him; and so did 30 other lesser Towns. [Arria. ib.]

b. This done, in the midst of winter he went to Mylias, in Phrygia the greater; there he made a league, with the Ambassador, which came to him from Phalelis, and the lower Lycia, giving up all their cities into his hands: and shortly after, he in person went to Phaselis; and there rased a certain strong fort, which the Pisidians had built, to annoy those of Phaselis with, [Id. ibid.]

3671 Whiles he was in the parts about Phaselis, he received advertisement, that Alexander Aeropus, whom he had made Commander of the Thessalian horse, intended his destruction, having entrusted him with that charge: notwithstanding he had been suspected, together with his two brothers Heromenes and Arrobæus, to have had a hand in his fathers death. For Darius having received letters from this Alexander by Amyntas, who fled over to him, sent Asisines a Persian to the sea side, under colour of a messenger to Atysies, governour of Phrygia: but indeed, to assure this Alexander, that if he killed Alexander, the kingdom of Macedon shoud be his, and he would give him a thousand talents of money besides. But Asisines being lighted on by Pharmenion, and put to the rack, confessed all, and thereupon, was sent away with a sure guard to Alexander. The king looking well into the businesse, sent Amphoterus to Pharmenion, with private instructions to him, to seize upon Aeropus, and to imprison him, [Id. ibid.] To this it was, that Alexander had respect, when in his letter to Darius, recited by Q. Curtius, [lib. 4. cap. 1.] he thus saith: When having arms of your own, you yet go to cheapen your enemies heads; as you of late, being king of so great an army, would hire a man to take away my life, with a thousand talents, [see Justin lib. 11. cap. 7.] 4381.

Alexander going from Phaselis, led his army along by the sea side to Pergæ, and from thence came to Aspendus, and besieged it, being seated upon a high and cragged mountain; and had it surrendred to him: then going into Pisidia, and having tried to take in the city Telmissus; but missing of his purpose, and making a league with the Selgians, who were enemies to the Telmissians, he took Salagassa by force, having slain about 500 of the Pisidians, and lost a Captain of his own, called Cleander, with about 20 of his men, from thence he went to take in other cities of Pisidia; and some of their strong places, he took in by force, others upon conditions. After this he came into Phrygia, to the Marsh-lands of Ascania; and at his fifth remove, he arrived at Celenæ, [Arria. lib. 1.]

The Castle of Celenæ, which a Persian Commander held with a garrison of a thousand Carians, and one hundred hired Grecians, after 60 dayes truce, (within which he expected relief from Darius) was given up into his hands, [Id. ibid. and Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Alexander left a garrison of 1500 in Celenæ, and having staid there 10 dayes, he made Antigonus the son of Philippus, governour of Phrygia, and made Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commander of the auxiliaries in his stead: he himself marched to Gordium, writing to Parmenion, that he should not faile to meet him there, [Arrianus, ibid.]

Parmenion with his army, and the Macedons which had leave to go kisse their new wives, came to Gordium accordingly, and with the army newly raised, which Ptolomæus, and Cænus, and Meleager commanded. That army consisted of one thousand Macedons foot, and 300 horse, of 200 Thessalian horse, and 150 horse of Elis led by Alcias, of the same country, [Id. ibid.]

Memnon, whom Darius had made Ammiral of his fleet, and chief Commander of all the sea-coast, purposing to carry the war out of Asia into Macedon and Greece, and having rigg'd up, and manned a navy of 300 saile, took the Isle of Chios by intelligence, and the rest of the cities and places in Lesbos, all save Mitylene, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 111. with Arrian. lib. 2. in prim.]

The Elders of Jerusalem, being offended that Manasses Jaddus, the high Priest his brother, had, contrary to their law, married a wife of a strange nation, required at last, that either he should put away his wife, or not come any more at the altar. And whenas hereupon Jaddus was forced to forbid him the altar, he going to Sanballet his father in law, told him, that he loved his daughter very well, but was loth to lose his priesthood for her sake, which was an honour belonging to him by his birth-right, and was very highly esteemed by his country men the Jews. And Sanaballet answered him, that he would undertake, in case he would keep his wife, and not part with her, not only to maintain him in his priesthood; but also to make him a high priest, and Prince of all his own province, and build him a Temple on the hill hanging over Samaria, as good as that at Jerusalem, and that he would do all this by the authority of Darius the king: Manasses hartned up with these promises, continued with his father in law, hoping to get the priesthood it self, by the gift and power of Darius. Hereupon all the priests, and other Israelites, who had married strange wives resorted to him: Sanballet furnishing them with mony, and lands to till, and setting forward the ambition of his son in law, all that possibly he could, [Josephus lib. 11. Antiq. cap. ult.]

Alexander

Alexander undid the Gordian knot, either by pulling out the pegg or pin in the beame, as Arrianus hath it, or by cutting it in pieces with his sword, as others deliver, [Plutarch in Alexander. Arrianus, lib. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. Justin, lib. 11. cap. 7.]

Alexander, departing from Gordium in Phrigia, went to Ancyra, a city in Galatia; Thither resorted to him, Embassadors from Paphlagonia, and making a league with him, delivered up their countrey into his hands; and he appointed them one Calas, a Lord of Phrigia to be their Governour: and then having received that new supply out of Macedonia, he marched into Cappadocia: and subdued all the country on this side the river Halys, and some part of the other side likewise [Arria. lib. 1. with Curtius lib. 3. c. 3.]

Memnon dying at the siege of Mitylene, Autophradates, and Pharnabazus the son of Artabazus, (unto whom Memnon in his death bed, had committed that charge, till Darius should otherwise dispose thereof,) took the charge upon them, upon certain agreements made between themselves: so then Autophradates, continued with the body of the Navy, and Pharnabazus with some certain ships, sailed into Lycia, carrying with him some mercenary souldiers, [Arria. l. 2.]

Darius, after the death of Memnon, sent out tickets for the levying of souldiers, commanding them from all parts, to resort to him at Babylon, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.] and having set up his standard there, he pitched his camp, and mustered his army, casting up a huge trench round about it, capable of ten hundred thousand armed men: & then, Xerxes like, he went to count the number of them; There were found then upon the account, 100 thousand Persians, of which 30 thousand were horse; of the Medians there were 10 thousand horse, and 50 thousand foote; of the Barcans, (which were a people bordering upon Hircania, as Stephanus tells us) there were 2 thousand horse, and 10000 foote, from Armenia there came 40000 foot, and 7000 horse; Hircania sent 6000 to serve on horseback, the Derbices furnisht him with 40000 foot, and 2000 horse from the Caspian sea, there attended him 8 thousand foot, and 2 hundred horse; with these there were others, of petty, ignoble Nations, which might make up two thousand foote, and twice as many horse: unto all which were added 30 thousand Greeks, which served him for pay: so doth Curtius summe up this army, [lib. 3. c. 4.] which comes but to 311200 men. But Diodorus sayes they were 400 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse: which number, the new editions, of Justin, corrected out of the manuscripts also retaine: though the former old editions, together with Orosius, who followes him in every point, have only 300 thousand foote, and 100 thousand horse, and both [Arria. l. 2. and Plutarch in Alexan.] make this army of his, in a grosse summe, to have amounted to 600000 men.

Charidemus an Athenian, a man well skilled in military matters, and whom Alexander had thrust out of Athens, went unto Darius, and advised him to withdraw himself, and to leave this army and war to the management of some General, who had given good proof of his ability that way, in former services: telling him further that an army of one hundred thousand men, whereof, one third to be Grecians were enough for this battel, by which sage and good counsel of his, he so far incensed the Lords with envy, and the King with choler, that he was presently had away and put to death for it. [Diod. ut sup. Curtius, l. 3. c. 5.]

Darius sent Thymondas, or Thymodes, Mentors son, a forward young man, to Pharnabazus, to receive from him, all the auxiliaries or hired souldiers, which Memnon had under his command, and to bring them to him, for he would use them: and put Pharnabazus himself in Memnons place, [Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 6. Arrianus, lib. 2. in prin.]

Alexander committing the charge of Cappadocia, to Abistenes, as Curtius calls him, or, to Sabictas, as Arrianus, marched with his whole army to the gates or streights, which open into Cilicia; and being come to a place, called Cyrus his Camp, (whether from the old Cyrus, as Curtius, or from the younger, as Arrianus thinketh) distant from those gates fifty furlongs, when he there found that they were taken up, and possessed with a strong garrison of the enemie, he left Parmenion there, with his companies of foote, which consisted all of Corselets, and he himself in the first watch of the night, taking with him his targateers and archers, and his band of Agrians, went to set upon that Garrison which kept those streights, at unawares, which he did; and the Garision, at the very bruite of his coming, threw away every man his armes, left the place, and fled, and Arsames the Governour of Cilicia, wasting all the country with fire and sword, that he might thereby disappoint the enemy of provisions, gat him away from Tarsus, to the King, [Arrianus, l. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. c. 8.]

When Alexander, with great speed, was come to Tarsus, taking pleasure in the river Cydnus, which ran thorough the city, all hot as he was, he threw off his armor, and lept into the cold water; thereupon he grew instantly so benumb'd in all the nerves of his his body, that he lost the use of his tongue; and so far was he from hope of recovery in time, that there was nothing but present death expected in him, [Justin. lib. 11. cap. 8.] Curtius addes that it was in the Summer season, and that the heat thereof was encreased by the intensivenesse of the Sun in the climate of Cilicia, [lib 3. cap. 10.] and Aristobulus saith, that he fell into his disease, by over-labouring himself: reported by [Arria. lib. 2.] But one Philip a Physitian, gave him a portion, which he took, and it cured him out of hand; though Parmenion had forewarned him, that this Philip was set on work to poison him, [Justin. Curtius. Arria. Plut. and Valer. Max. lib. 3. cap. 8.]

Orontobates the Persian, which held out the Castle at Halicarnassus, and Myndus, and Caunus, and Thera, and Callipolis, against Alexander, was overthrown in a fight by Ptolomei and Asander; wherein he lost about 700 Foot, and 50 Horse upon the place; and had no lesse than a thousand of his men taken: and thereupon the Myndians and Caunians, and most of the places thereabouts gave up to Alexander, [Arria. lib. 2. Curtius lib. 3. cap. 11.]

Darius making a bridge over the Euphrates, passed it with his army in five dayes, [Curt. ib.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to possesse himself of another strait or passage, like that former of Cilicia; and which divides Cilicia from Assyria, (or Syria) and he following after him from Tarsus, came the first day to Anchialos, [Arria. lib. 2.] Thence he marched to Soli; put a Garrison of his own into the Fort there, and levyed 200000 talents of silver upon the Inhabitants; for that they had shewed themselves more inclinable, and well willing to Darius than to him, [Id. ibid. Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] From thence he went with 3000 Macedons, all his archers, and Agrians, and set upon the hill country of Cilicia; and within seven dayes space, what by fair means, what by foul, he took them all entirely in, and returned to Soli: where when he had sacrificed to Esculapius, and with his whole army had gone in procession with burning tapers in their hands, and made pastimes of wrestlings, and musick, and other games, he gave the city leave to enjoy a Democratie, [Arria. ibid.]

The Grecians souldiers which Thymodes received by appointment from Pharnabazus, being the chief, and almost the onely hope, that Darius had, being come unto him, were very earnest with him to retire, and keep himself in the champion country of Mesopotamia: or at least, that he would break this vast and numberlesse army of his into parts, and would not hazard all upon the chance of one battel: But Darius liked not their advice; but as if he could never make haste enough, the Winter (beginning with Autumn) now drawing on, he sent away all his monies, jewels, and pretious stuff, with a reasonable guard to Damascus in Syria; under the command of Cophenes, the son of Artabazus, as Arrianus sayes, [lib. 2.] and he with the rest of his army marched on to Cilicia. His wife, and mother, and daughter, and little son, according to the fashion of Persia, following after the Camp, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 13.] leaving his baggage and such people as were unserviceable for the war, at Damascus, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.]

Sanaballet, hearing of Darius his coming into those parts, told Manasses, that he would quickly perform what he had promised him of the High Priesthood, so soon as Darius returned with victory over his enemies, whereof those inhabitants of Asia made no doubt at all, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. ult.]

3672. Alexander, willing Philotas to bring the Horse thorough the Aleian plains in Lycia to the River Pyramus, came with the Foot, and the Kings Troup to Magarsus, and sacrificed to Minerva of that place, called, Minerva Magarsis, [Arria. lib. 2.] 4382 332

Then making a bridge over the Pyramus, he came to the city Mallos in Cilicia, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] where he offered to the ghost of Amphilochus the founder of that place, as to a demy god; and when he found the inhabitants there all in a sedition and distracted among themselves, he made them all friends, and released the tribute, which they had formerly payed to Darius, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he yet remained at Mallos, news was brought him, that Darius with all his army, were encamped at a place called Sochos, two dayes journey distant from those streights, which I even now spake of, that parted Cilicia from Assyria, (or Syria) [Id. ib.]

From Mallos he came to Castabala an other town in Cilicia likewise. There Parmenion met him, whom he had sent to discover the passage thorough a Forest which he was to passe to come to the town of Issos; now Parmenion had withal seized on the passage or streight in that Forest: and leaving a small company to keep it, went forward and took the very town of Issos also; being abandoned by the inhabitants upon his approach. And going yet further, he turned out all those which were set to guard the inner parts of those mountains, and put Garrisons every where of his own in them; and having cleared all those parts, returned to Alexander, and made him a relation of what he had done, in the journey which he had sent him on, [Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 11.]

Then came Alexander with his army to Issos, where putting it to a council of war, whether he should march onward, or stay there and expect the supplies which he knew were coming to him out of Macedon, Parmenion was of advice, that he could not finde a fitter ground to fight on, than that was; for that there, no more could come to fight on the one side, than of the other, by reason of the streightnesse of the place, [Id. ibid.] Now Callisthenes, as he is vouched in Polybius, sayes, that at Alexanders first entrance into Cilicia, there came unto him out of Macedon, 5000 foot, and 800 horse, [Polyb. lib. 12. pag. 664.]

Darius having passed the streights of the hill Amanus, marched toward Issus, unwitting that he had left Alexander at the back of him; and having taken it, cruelly tortured and put to death a company of poor souls of the Macedons, which Alexander had left there; as not being able thorough sicknesse, or other infirmitie, to follow the Camp: and the next day, he marched to the river Pinarus, [Arrianus lib. 2.]

But when tidings were brought him, that Alexander in battel array was approaching, he forthwith passed the river Pinarus, with 20 thousand horse, and some 20 thousand light armed foot, that he might at the more leisure be able to range the rest of his army in array. And first, he took of those Grecians which he had in pay, all Corselets, to the number of 30 thousand, and set them against the Macedonian Squadron: on both sides of them, he placed the Cardacans, who were Corselets as well as they, to the number of 60 thousand; for more than that, he could not possibly range in one squadron, and bring to fight, for the narrownesse of the place. As for the rest, whether Corselets or others, according to their several nations, he hudled them them together, he cared not how, behind the main battle of Greeeks, and Cardacans; so saith Arrianus in his second book: but Curtius in his third book and 17 chapter, speaketh of it in this wise. Nabarzanes (saith he,) who was General of Darius his army, was in the right wing with the horse, to which were joyned almost 20 thousand, slingers and archers. Thymodes also was in the same wing, commanding some 30 thousand hired Grecians; and this was, no doubt, the pith and marrow of that whole army; and were of themselves very well able to match the Macedonian Phalanx or Squadron. In the left wing, Aristomedes a Thessalian born, commanded 20 thousand foot of sundry nations: In the rere, and for a dead lift, he placed his reserves, of the most warlike nations, that he had in all his army; in that wing was the king himself, attended with a guard of 3 thousand choice horse, used to the guard of his person, and 40 thousand foot, then fallowed the Hircanian and Median horse; and next them, were ranged the horse and foot of other nations, some on the right hand, some on the left: before this battalian thus ranged, there went six thousand slingers, and javeliners; all the ground that was there, in that streight, was filled up wholly with men, and the wings reached the one the mountain, the other to the very sea: as for the Queen and the Kings mother, and the rest of the women kind, they were all taken into the midst of the army. Callisthenes, who himself made one in this battaile, saith, that there were 30 thousand horse, and as many auxiliaries, set all to encounter the Macedonian Phalanx or Squadron. But Polibius in his 12 book, where he sheweth, that Alexanders army, consisted wholly of 42 thousand foot, and 5 thousand horse, convinceth Callisthenes in many points; and sheweth that for want of knowledge and skill, in the marshaling and ordering of an army, he hath written many absurdities and impertinencies in the description of this fight.

When Hephæstion in the morning came to put Alexander in mind of drawing forth into the field, and forgetting himself, bad him, ὑγίαινε βασιλεῦ, instead of χαῖρε βασιλεῦ, (i. e.) as we should say, God help you Sir, instead of, God save you Sir; whereat all the company there, presently were moved, as if thereby he had meant, that the king had not been well in his wits: and Hephæstion himself grew amazed at his own mistake. Alexander perceiving it, took it up, and said, Ma rry, I thank him for his good bode; for this tells me, that we shall all, by Gods helps come safe out of the battle to day. This is related by Eumenes Cardianus in his Epistle to Antipater, who was present, when the words were spoken, and fell himself into the like errour, as it is in Lucian, in his discourse, [Περὶ τοῦ ἐν τῇ προσαγορεύσει πταίσματος, (i. e.) of mens mistakings in their speech.]

Arrianus sayes, that this fight was fought, when Nicostratus, or as Diodor. hath it, when Micocrates, year 4. of 111 Olympiade, was L. Chancellor of Athens, in the moneth Mæmacterion, whose new moon fell upon the 28 of our October, and that in it the Persians lost 10 thousand horse, and 90 thousand foot: and with him in the number of horse agree the other writers; but concerning the foot, they all vary extremely, not onely from him, but each from other also; for Justin sayes, they were 60, Orosius, 80. Curtius, 100. Diodorus, 120 thousand. Plutarch sayes that in all, they lost 110 thousand: Justinus and Orosius add, that there were 40 thousand taken; But of Alexanders side, side, there were of wounded men 504. of the foote there were missing 32. of the horse 150. as we finde in Curtius, with whom in the number of horse, agree Plutarch, Justin, and Orosius, though of the foot, Diodorus saith there were but 300, and the rest, 330 lost.

Ptolomeus the son of Lagus, who attended upon Alexander in the pursuit of Darius reports, that the squadron, pursuing the enemy, marched all over the slaughtered bodies of the enemy, [Arrian. lib. 2.] but there followed not Alexander in the chase of Darius above one thousand horse, when as yet they slew a huge multitude of the enemy, [Curt. l. 3. c. 22.] but the mare, which Darius, when he was throwen out of his coach, got on the back of, remembring her foale at home, ran so fast, that Alexander with his horse could not reach him, [Elianum Historia Animali, lib. 6. cap. 48.]

Alexander growing weary of the pursuit of Darius, and the night growing on, and he out of hope to overtake him, having rode some 200 furlongs, about midnight returned, and came into Darius his camp, which his men had a litle before taken, [Diodor. and Curt.] In it was taken Darius his mother, whom Diodorus calls Sisyngambis, but Curtius, Sysigambis; as also his wife (who Justin says was his sister too) with his son Ochus, not yet full six years old, and his two daughters, both marriageable; with certain other Noble mens daughters attending on them, but not many; for the most of them had sent their wives and daughters to Damascus, with the baggage; for even Darius himself had sent thither, the greatest part of his treasure, as was said before, and what ever rich furniture the Kings were wont to carry with them into the war: so that in his camp, Alexander found not above 3 thousand talents of silver, [Arria.]

Alexander the next morning early, taking Hephestion with him, went to see the two Queens, and when Sisygambis, by a mistake, fell downe at Hephestions feet, and then perceiving her error, craved Alexander pardon for it, no harme (said he, smiling) for this is Alexander too, [Diodor. Curtius. Arrian.] giving halfe of himselfe, in so few words, away to his friend, as [Valer. Max. lib. 4. c. 7.] saith. As for the two Queens, and the women about them, Alexander caused all their attire, dressing, and ornaments to be entire restored to them, with more of his own bestowing on them; nor suffered he any man to use any incivility toward them, [Iidem with Plut. lib. 2. de fort. Alex.]

Darius in his flight, came to a place called Unchas, (i. e.) as it seemes, to Sochos, two dayes journey from the streights of Amanus, as we noted before out of Arrianus: where gathering in a body such of the Persians and others as were saved out of the battle, he took 4 thousand of them with him to Thupsacus: that he might once have the great river Euphrates, running betweene him and Alexander, [Curt. lib. 4. c. 1. Arria. lib. 2.]

Amyntus the son of Antiochus and Thymodes the son of Mentor, and Aristomedes Phereus, and Bianor of Acarnania; all which had formerly fallen over to the Persians from the Greeks, fled now with 8 thousand in their company to Tripoli in Phenicia: and there finding certain vessels, newly drawn up into the docks, and which lately came from Lesbos, in they took as many as would serve their turne, to saile away in, and set the rest on fire that they might not be used to pursue them, and in them they fled to Cyprus first, and from thence into Egypt, [Arria. ib. with Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 112. and Curtius, l. 4. c. 3.]

Alexander, making Balacrus, the son of Nicanor, one of the Squires of his body, Governor of Cilicia; made Menetes, the son of Dionysius, squire of the body in his roome; and to Polyperchon the son of Simeus, he gave the charge of the brigade, which Ptolomei the son of Seleucus (who was slain in the late battle) had; he released to the men of Solos in Cilicia 50 talents, which were yet unpayed of that summe which he had formerly fined them at: and restored them their hostages, which he had taken of them, [Id. Ibid.] and having built 3 altars, one to Jupiter, another to Hercules, and a third to Minerva, upon the banks of the river Pinarus, he marched into Syria; sending before him Parmenion to Damascus, where all Darius his treasure lay, with the Thessalian horse, who had behaved themselves very manfully in the late fight, of purpose to make them rich out of the spoile of that City, [Plut. in Alexan.]

As Parmemion was upon his way thither, he met with letters sent to Alexander from the Governour of Damascus, offering to betray the city to the King: The fourth day he came to Damascus. When presently the Governor, as if he doubted of holding the place, the next morning before sun-rising, took all the Kings treasure (the Persians call it his Gaza) pretending that he would flee away and save it for Darius; but indeed to deliver it into Parmenions hands, at which instant there had fallen a great snow, and the ground was hard frozen.

Among the women that fled from thence, and were taken, there were 3 virgins, daughters daughters of Ochus, last King before Darius, and his Relict, and the daughter of Oxatris, Darius his brother, and the wife of Artabanus, a principal man at Court, and his son, whose name was Ilioneus. There was also taken, the wife of Pharnabazus, whom Darius had made Commander of all the townes and cities lying upon the sea: and 3 daughters of Mentor; and the wife and son of that most noble Memnon; and scantly was there any Noble mans house of the Court of Persia, which had not his share in that calamity, [Id ibid.] Parmenion also in his letters to Alexander signified to him, that among the rest he had taken 329 of the Kings women, which were skilful in musick: 46 weavers or knitters of crowns; pastery women, 277. cook maids 29. White meat-makers, 13. makers of drinking cups, 17. wine-cellar men, 70. apothecaries, and confectioners, 40.

The summe of ready coin there taken, was 2600 talents: in bars of silver, 500 weight: 30 thousand men, 7 thousand camels, bearing burdens on their backs, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 25.]

As for him that betrayed the place (which, as it seemeth, was that Cophenes, by whom Darius sent his treasure to Damascus,) one of his own fellows cut off his head, and carried it to Darius, [Curt. ibid.]

Alexander made Parmenion, as Curtius, or Memnon, as Arrianus, Governour of Cœlosyria: appointing to him his auxiliary Horse, for the defence of that Province. The Syrians, not yet sufficiently broken with the war, could not brook this new Governour; but being quickly suppressed, they submitted themselves to all commands, [Arria. lib. 2. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 1.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to seize on the Persian Fleet, and others that were about him to receive the Cities of Asia, which had surrendred to him; for even Darius his own Commanders, after the battel at Issos, gave themselves up, with all their gold and treasure, into his hands. Then marched he away into Syria; where many Kings of the East came in, and submitted to him. These he entertained every one according to his desert: some he made league with; others he deprived of their kingdoms, and made new Kings in their roomes, [Justin. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

There was one Gerostratus, who was at that time King of the Island of Aradus, and the sea coast adjoyning, and of some places also lying further off into the land: which like as other Kings of Cyprus and Phenicia had consociated their Fleets with Antophradates Commander of the Persian Navy under Darius; His son Strato, Vice-roy of Aradus, in his fathers absence, met Alexander as he was upon his way into Phenicia, and set a Crown of gold upon his head, and surrendred to him the Island it self of Aradus, and Marathus, a rich town and a great, lying over against it in the Continent, and the city Mariamme, and whatever else belonged to his father, [Arria. lib. 2. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 1.]

Having received him to grace, he marched to the city Marathon; there came letters to him from Darius, to desire him that he might ransom his captive women: to whom Alexander by another letter returned answer, and sent one Thersippus to deliver it, [Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 1. Arria. lib. 2. Diod. year 4. Olym. 111.] as for the Ambassadors of the Grecians, sent to Darius before the battel at Issos, when he understood that they were taken at Damascus, he willed them to be sent unto him: of which, when they came, he presently dismissed the two Ambassadors of the Thebans, Thessaliscus and Dionysodorus, and Iphicrates of Athens, the son of that famous Iphicrates: But Euthycles the Lacedemonian, he committed first to custody, yet free from irons: but afterward when all things prospered as his hearts desired, sent him away too, [Arria. ibid.]

Alexander removing from Marathon took in the city Biblus upon conditions; and the Sidonians which had been, not long before, so terribly used by Ochus; sent unto him, and desired to be received by him in hatred of the Persians, and of Darius their King, [Id. ibid. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 2.] Strato at that time reigned there: Now because this surrender proceeded not so much from him, as from the people of that place; therefore he took the kingdom from him, and in his room, placed one Abdolominus, who lived by dressing a poor garden thereby, and made him King: and gave him not onely the rich furniture of Stratoes house; but added sundry other rich gifts, out of what himself had taken from the Persians: with all the territories adjoyning thereunto, [Curt. ib. Iustin. lib. 11. cap. 10.] Plutarch in his discourse of the fortune of Alexander, calls this man Alynomus, and King of Paphos: Diodor. calls him Ballonomus, and sayes, that Alexander made him King of Tyre.

Now was all Syria his, so was Phœnicia, Tyre onely excepted: And Alexander with his Camp lay in the Continent: between which and the City, there ran a narrow cut of the sea. The Tyrians had sent a very massive Crown of gold unto him for a present, congratulating him thereby, for his great successe, and sent him all store of provisions, out of their City. He received their presents, as from his good friends; and using many many gracious and friendly words to them that brought it, told them, that he had a great desire to see their city, and there to sacrifice to Hercules; They told him, that there was an alter in Palætyrus, or Old Tyre, in the continent hard by, and that it were better to offer sacrifice to Hercules upon that, as being the more ancient of the two; whereupon he strait way grew into such a choler, that he vowed to destroy their city. It fell out, that at the same time, there came certain select men from Carthage, to perform a yearly sacrifice there unto Hercules; for the Tyrians were the founders of Carthage; and the Carthaginians ever honoured them as the fathers that begat them. They therefore exhorted them to stand it out, and to endure the siege like men, assuring them further of speedy supplies, and aide from Carthage; for at that time, the Carthaginians were very strong at sea, [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 5. and 6. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

Thus being resolved for a war, they endured a siege of seven moneths long, [Diod. year 1. Olympiade 112. Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 15. Plutarch in Alexander.] their King Azelmicus being then absent, and gone to sea, with Autophradates, leaving onely his son behind him in the city, [Arrianus lib. 4.]

Alexander began with Palætyrus, or old Tyre; and pulled that down to the ground, and sending for all the country thereabout to come in, what by them, what by his own men, took the stones and rubbage of all that city, and threw it into the sea that ran between, thinking to have made a causeway over it, to the city, which lay from the continent, four furlongs, as Diodoras saith; and with him agreeth Curtius, [lib. 4. cap. 5. or full 700 paces, as Pliny will have it, lib. 5. cap. 19. Diod. ut sup. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 8.]

Amyntas the son of Antiochus, with those 4 thousand Grecians, which, as I said before, fled with him out of the battle at Issos, wherein Sabaces a Persian, and Governour of Egypt died, set sail from Cyprus to Pelusium, and there seized himself of that city, pretending that he came to take charge of it, by order from Darius, in Sabaces his room, because he was slain in the battle at Issos. From thence he went with his army to Memphis, at the noise whereof, the Egyptians came in out of town and country to assist him against the Persians; by whose help, when the Persians, which lay there in garrison, sallied forth upon him, he routed and forced them into the city again: but anon after, by the advice of Masases their Captain, seeing their enemies scattered about the country, and busie in plundring, he issued forth again, set upon them unawares, and cut both him and all his whole company in pieces, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 22. and ib. 4. cap. 3.]

Certain other Captains also of Darius, which escaped out of the field at Issos, with such Persians as followed them, with other Cappadocians and Paphlagonians in their company, went about to recover Lydia. But Antigonus, who commanded there in chief for Alexander, routed them in three several fights. And at the same time, the Macedonian fleet, coming out of Greece, set upon Aristomenes, which was sent by Darius to recover the Hellespont, and either sunk or took all his fleet, [Diod. year. 1. Olymp. 112. and Curtius lib. 4. cap. 4.]

Whiles Alexander lay at the siege of Tyrus, he sent to Jaddus the high priest at Hierusalem, demanding of him, supplies and other provisions; and withal, such tribute, as was formerly paid to Darius. But when Jaddus answered that he was tied by a former oath of allegeance to Darius, and that he could not be free from that oath, so long as Darius lived. Alexander growing wroth thereat, swore, that as soon as he had taken Tyrus, he would march against that city, [Josephus lib. 11. Antiquit. cap. ult.]

To him also, at the very beginning of the siege of Tyrus, Sanaballat the Cuthæan, and forsaking Darius, came with eight thousand men; and being graciously received by him, he asked him leave to build a temple upon his own land, and thereof to make high priest his son in law, Manasses, brother to Jaddus the high priest at Jerusalem; and having obtained his grant, because he now grew old, he fell presently to work, and built a Temple, and made Manasses high priest of it, thinking hereby to leave a great honour to the posterity of his daughter, [Id. ibid.]

Alexander purposing to make a broader causway from the continent, for his easier approach to Tyrus, caused new engines to be made; which being finished, he with his Targateers, and Squadron of Agrians, marched to Sidon, there to gather together, as many ships of war as possibly he could; finding it impossible to take Tirus, so long as the Tyrians were masters at sea, [Arria. lib. 2.]

Mean while, Gerostratus the king of Aradus, and Enulus the king of Byblus, finding that all their cities were already taken by Alexander, forsaking Antophradates, and the ships that were with him, came with their fleets to Alexander, and with them certain ships of the Sidonians; so that Alexander had now a navy of 80 saile. At the same time also came to him a fleet from Rhodes, wherein there was one ship, called Periplus, and nine other; and three more from Soli and Mallus;

and ten from Lycia: and one out of Macedon, of 50 oares, whereof was captain, Proteas the son of Andronicus: and not long after came to him certain Kings of Cyprus, with 120 saile, into the port at Sidon: and all upon the fame of his victory at Issus; and report that all Phenicia was come in to him: To all these Alexander forgave their bypast errors; for that of necessity, rather than of their own accord, they had adhered to Darius with their fleets, [Id. Ibid.] And now Azelmicus also himself, the King of Tyrus, leaving Antophradates, came to his own City Tyrus, while it was thus besieged, and was therein afterward taken, as Arrianus shewes.

In mount Lebanon, whence Alexander made his provision of timber for his shipping, the wilde Arabians, setting suddenly upon the Macedons, whiles they were busie at their work, slew, upon the point, 30 of them, and carried away almost as many prisoners. Alexander leaving Perdiccas and Craterus, or as Polyænus seemes to say, Parmenion, to hold on the siege of Tyrus, went himself, with a running camp, into Arabia, [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 8.] and that he made an excursion into Arabia, the same Polyænus sheweth, [lib. 4. Stratag.] which Arrianus more clearly delivers, where he saith, that Alexander, with certain troups of horse, and light targateers, and his squadron of Agrians, went into Arabia, as far as to Anti-Lebanon: and Plutarch, where he tells us that he marched, ἐπὶ τοὺς Ἄραβας τοὺς προσοικοῦντας τῷ Ἀντιλιβάνῳ: (i.e.) against the Arabians which dwell over against Anti-Lebanon.

When he was come to the mountanous country of those parts, he was then fain to leave his horse and march on foot as others did: but the body of his army, was gone a good way before, and the night grew on, and the enemy not far off, and Lysimachus, the instructor of him in his childhood, being spent in travel, and fainting, and he loath to leave him in that case; and whiles he stood heartening him up, and drawing him on before he was aware, he with a very few with him, were severed from the rest of his company, and was faine to passe that night in the dark, in a bitter cold frost, and in a place void of all relief: neverthelesse, seeing not far off many fires made by the enemies, being of a nimble and active body, he ran to the next fire, and there killing two of the enemies that sate at it, brought away a fire-brand, and therewith kindled a fire for himself, and for the relief of those few Macedons that were about him; which growing into a great flame, struck such a terrour into the enemies hearts, that they durst not stir: and so he and his company lay safe all that night. This Plut. relateth of him, out of Charætes, a mitylenæan born, and one of those who wrote the gests of Alexander.

Having now taken in all that country, partly upon amicable termes, and partly perforce, he returned to Sidon, eleven dayes after he set out from thence, where he found Alexander the son of Polemocrates, newly arrived with 4000 mercinary souldiers out of Greece, [Arria. l. 2.]

His Navy being now rigged and fitted, amounting in all to 190 ships, as Curtius, or to two hundred, as Diodorus saies: Alexander, loosing from Sidon, set saile for Tyre, in very good array. Himself was in the right wing, in a Quinquereme, or ship of five decks high; and in that squadron were also the kings of Cyprus, and the rest of the Phenicians, except only Pintagoras, al. Pythagoras; for he and Craterus commanded the left wing, [Arria. ib. Curt. l. 4. c. 10.]

Thirty Commissioners arriving from Carthage, brought them word, that the Carthaginians, were so embroiled with war at home, that they could not possibly send to help him in this distresse of theirs; nor yet did this any wayes abate or quell the courage of the Tyrians, but they sent away every man his wife and children by them to Carthage, as being by so much the better able to bear what ever should befall them, when they had ridd away the halfendeale, and dearest part, every man of himself, out of danger, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 11. with Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 112. Justin, lib. 11. cap. 10.]

When Apollo had signified to sundry men in their sleep by dreams, that he would leave the city, the Tyrians, out of a foolish superstition, took good golden chaines, and bound his image fast to the foot of his shrine; which image of his, was sent thither from Syracusæ, as Curtius, or rather from Gela in Sicily, as out of Diodorus we have already observed, in the year of the world 3599. by the Carthaginians: and they fastened the chain to the altar of Hercules, the tutelar God of that city, as if he should hold him by main strength, from going thence, [Curtius and Diodorus Ibid. and Plutarch in Alexandro.]

Whiles Alexander lay at the siege of Tyre, there came Embassadors from Darius, to him, offering him 10 thousand (not as in Valer. Max. put 10 hundred thousand) talents for the ransome of his mother, wife and children; with all the countreys lying between the Hellespont and the river Halys: and his daughter withal, in marriage; which offer of his being taken into deliberation, in a Council of his friends, it is reported that Parmenion should say, That if he were Alexander, he would not refuse those conditions:

to whom he replied, that no more would he, if he were Parmenion. But to Darius he wrote back, That he offered him nothing, but what was his own already; and therefore willed him to come himself in suppliant wise unto him, and to take such conditions as he would give him, [Arrianus lib. 2. with Justin. lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 16. Plutarch in his Apophthegmes, and in his Alexander Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 4.]

Tyre was taken, when Anicetes, or rather Nicetes, as Dionys. Halicarnas. in Dinarchus calls him, was L. Chancelor in Athens, in the moneth Hecatombæon, [Arria. lib. 2. pag. 49] in the middest of which moneth, the 112 Olympiade ended. In Plutarch we find, that it was upon the 30 day of the moneth Loi, among the Macedonians, the 5 of Hecatombæon among the Athenians, answering to the 24 of our July, as I have shewen, in the end of cap. 5. of my discourse of the Solar years of the Macedonians and Asians.

Justin, [lib. 1. cap. 10.] sayes it was taken by treason, Polyænus by a stratagem, [lib. 1. stratag.] Diodor. by pure force; and with him agree, Arria. and Curtius: and that when the enemies had gotten into the town, yet the townsmen maintained the fight, till there were 7 thousand of them cut in pieces, [as Diodorus writeth.]

Arrianus delivers, that there were 8 thousand of the inhabitants there slain, and 2 thousand more after that rage of slaying was over, hung up all along the shoar, in cold blood, as Curtius sayes: and Diodorus tells us, that Alexander caused no lesse than 2 thousand, all prime young men to be hanged: Justin sayes, that in remembrance of the old slaughter by them made, he caused all that were taken to be crucified: putting them to this slavish kind of death, because the Tyrian slaves heretofore making a conspiracy against their own masters, had murdered all the freemen of that city, together with their own masters: and made a Common-wealth of themselves, sparing none alive, saving one Strato an old man, and his son; and upon him and his posterity, they setled the kingdom.

Of Alexander Justin adds this further: that he saved alive all the descendants of Strato, and restored the kingdom to him and his posterity, (meaning perhaps that Ballonymus, whom Diodorus confounds and makes all one with that Abdolominus, whom Alexander made King of the Sidonians, as a little before,) leaving the City to be re-peopled by the innocent and harmelesse inhabitants thereof, to the end, that having abolished that wicked generation of slaves, he might, in a sort, be the founder of a new and better race there: and by this means it was, that Justin out of Trogus, makes Alexander the restorer and rebuilder of Tyre, [lib. 18. cap. 3, 4.] whereas all others make him not the founder, but the destroyer of it; the prophesie of Esay concurring therewith, [cap. 23. v. 1.] compared with, [Maccabees cap. 1. v. 1.] For if we believe Curtius, Alexander, saving those which fled to the Temples, slew all, and set fire on their houses: if Diodorus, he made slaves of all that were not able to bear armes, together with the femal sex among them: there being such an infinite number of that kind there found, that though the greatest part of them were sent away to Carthage, (as before) yet the remainder was no lesse than 13 thousand heads; but if Arrianus his word may be taken, he spared all that fled to the Temple of Hercules, and those were the chief of the City, with the King Azelmicus, and the Commissioners which came from Carthage, to offer sacrifice at that season of the year to Hercules, according to an ancient custom there used. The rest he sold away for slaves: the inhabitants and strangers there found, amounting to about 30 thousand persons.

Yet Curtius sayes, that the Sidonians, which brake in with the rest of Alexanders souldiers, not forgetting the community of blood that was between them and the Tyrians; (for they were all brought thither, with Agenor, as they believed, and he was the founder of both cities) got a ship-board, and there hid and saved 15 thousand of them: and that of them Tyrus rose, and afterward grew to be a City again, [lib. 4. cap. 15.] And Strabo, [lib. 16. pag. 754.] saith, that after this vast calamity brought on them by Alexander, they quickly overcame their misfortunes; what with their navigation, what with their purple-fishing: and Justin, that by their parcimonie and industry, they quickly recovered strength again, [lib. 18. cap. 4.] and that so quickly, that in the 18 year from thence, they endured another siege from Antigonus, then Lord of all Asia; not seven moneths, as against Alexander, but full 15 moneths, long, as Diodorus tells us, [lib. 19. year 2. Olymp. 116.] and that they were not now content with their little city, which by Alexanders causwayes and other works was joyned to the Continent; but so enlarged their bounds, that in Plinies time, the very wall of their city took in 22 furlongs, and reckoning Palætyrus or Old Tyre with it, the whole enclosure came to no lesse than 19 miles, [Plin. lib. 5. cap. 19.]

Admetus, who first gat upon the wall, and 20 Targateers with him, were slain at the very first encounter: but in the whole time of the siege, there were lost 400 Macedons, at most, [Arria. lib. 2.]

Alexander

Alexander offered sacrifices to Hercules, and went in procession with his whole host, all in armes to his Temple; he made a shew also with his ships, and caused wrestling and other games of activity to be performed by torch-light. And whereas there was a certain Tyrian ship consecrated to his honour, which he had set upon and taken, he dedicated the same unto him again, with an Inscription importing as much, [Id. ibid.] Also he took off from Apollos Iamge, his golden Chain, and the Robes he was tired with, and gave it a new name, φιλαλέξανδρος, (i. e.) a friend of Alexanders, or Alexanders friend; [Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 11.] And upon the very self same day and hower, that the Carthaginians had taken that image from those of Gela in Sicilie, it was, as Timæus reports, that the Grecians offered to him that magnificent and solemn sacrifice, as if by his power and favour they had taken Tyre, [Id. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Alexander, so soon as he had taken Tyre, marched forth with into Judea, [Euseb. Cron. with Pliny, lib. 12. cap. 25.] and subdued all that part of Syria, which is called Palestina, [Arria. lib. 2. pag. 50.] going in person against those places that would not of themselves submit, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 17.] But when he was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus the high priest, terrified with his former threats, and now fearing his rage, had recourse to God, by supplications and sacrifices for the common safety; and was by him warned in a dream, that he should make holy-day in the city, and set wide open the gates, and that he and the rest of the priests every one in his his priestly raiment, and the people all clothed in white, should go forth and meet him. Alexander seeing this company coming a far off, went himself all alone to the high priest; and having prostrated himself before that God, whose name he saw engraven in the golden plate of his Miter, he first saluted him: and being demanded the reason of his so doing by Parmenion, answered that whiles he was yet in Macedon, musing with himself of the conquest of Asia, there apppeared to him a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of all success in the conquest of it. And the priests going before, he entred into Jerusalem, and going up to the Temple, he there sacrificed to God, as the priests prescribed him; and when they had shewed him the book of the prophet Daniel, wherein was written, that a Grecian should come and destroy the Persians, [Dan. c. 8, 7. 20, 21. and chap. 11. 13.] he made no doubt, but himself was the man designed thereby, and so for that time dismissed the company, [Joseph. lib. 11. cap. ult.]

The day following, he assembled the people, and bad them ask what they would of him, and they asking nothing, but that they might live according to the laws of their own country, and that every seventh year, (wherein they were to have no harvest) they might be exempt from paying any tribute, he granted all. And when they asked further, that he would suffer the Jews, which dwelt in the countries of Babylon, and Media, to live according to their own rites and laws, he answered, that he would satisfie their desires in that point also, so soon as he should have gotten those countries into his power. And when he told them, that if any of them would follow him in his wars, they should use their own rites where ever they came, many listed themselves to serve him. And having dispatched, and setled all matters in Jerusalem; he departed and went to the rest of the cities of that country, and was joyfully received every where. [Id. ibid.]

Of Alexanders captains, Callas went and took in Paphagonia, (which fell off from Alexander after the battle at Issus) Antigonus Lyconia, Balacrus, the city of Miletus, having first overthrown Idarnes, Darius his Captain, in the open field, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 17.]

Alexander had given the charge of Cilicia to Socrates, willing Philotas the son of Parmenion, to look to the country about Tyre. Cœlo-Syria was committed to Andronicus by Parmenion, himself having a desire to follow Alexander in the war. The king commanding Hephastion, with the fleet, to scoure the coast of Phænica; himself with his whole army, went to Gaza, [Id. ibid.] and in the siege thereof, held by a garrison of Persians, he spent two moneths, [Diod. year 1. Olympiade. 112. Josephus lib. 11. cap. ult.]

Captain of the Garrison there was, as Josephus saies, one Babemeses, or, as Curtius and Arrianus call him, Batis an Eunuch, and one very trusty to his king: who having hired certain Arabians, and made good provision of corn, and other things, maintained the walls, which were hugely strong, with a small company of men within.

Alexander received two wounds at this sige: whereupon Batis falling alive into his hands, had cords or thongs drawn thorough his ankles, and was therewith tied to a Chariot, and drawn at the taile thereof with horses, round about the city: there were slain in that siege, of Persians and Arabians together, about 10 thousand, nor did the Macedons scape scot-free neither, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 10.] Alexander, selling away for slaves all the women and children there, stored the place with inhabitants out of the neighbouring neighbouring parts, and made that a place of Garrison and Magazin, for himself, [Arria. lib. 2. in fi.] so that those words of Strabo, are not simply to be understood, but with reference to the former state of that city, where he saith, [lib. 16. pag. 759.] that Gaza was formerly a glorious City : but being destroyed by Alexander, remained desolate. Unlesse we will say that this was meant of a later Gaza, built in another place ; which Jerom in his book, De Locis Hebraicis : (i.e.) of places in Judea, affirmeth in this wise, The question is, saith he, how in one of the Prophets it is said, And Gaza shall be turned into an everlasting heap ? which is thus answered, that there are scantly left to be seen, any sign of the old City : and that City of Gaza that now is, was built in another place, instead of that, which was so destroyed.

Alexander having done his pleasure at Gaza, dispatched away Amyntas, the son of Andremon, with 3 tall ships into Macedon, to bring him from thence all the flower of the youth of that country, [Diodor. year 2, Olymp. 112. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 19.]

3673. Alexander from thence marched into Egypt, as he formerly intended ; and seven 4383 331
dayes after he left Gaza, came to a place, which from him was in after-time called Alexanders Camp, and to the city Pelusium, [Arria. lib. 3. in Pri. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 20.] and not back again from Gaza to Jerusalem, as Josephus, inconsiderately enough, affirmeth.

An infinite number of the Egyptians, expecting *A*lexanders coming, were gathered together at Pelusium : where for the offence taken by them of the Persian pride, avarice, and sacriledge, they willingly received the Macedons at their coming, [Curtius ib. Diodor. an. 2. Olymp. 112.]

*A*lexander, leaving a Garrison in Pelusium, and giving order for his ships to go up the River to Memphis, himself marched by land to Heliopolis, having the Nile all the way on his right hand ; and all cities, where ever he came, opening their gates unto him, he passed the Desert of Egypt, and came at last to Heliopolis, and there passing the River, he marcht toward Memphis, [Arria. lib. 3.] Nor durst the Persians there abide his coming, seeing the general defection of the Egyptians from them. *A*nd now he was not far from thence, when *A*straces, who commanded the Garrison there under Darius met him, and delivered into his hand 800 talents, and all his masters Wardrobe ; as we read in [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 20.] where yet it seems, that the name of *A*staces, is crept in, I know not how, instead of Mazaces : as he himself also, [cap. 4. of the same book] calleth him : and so doth *A*rrianus in the beginning of his 3 book, where he tells us, that one Mazaces a Persian, whom Darius had made Governour of Egypt, received Alexander into that Province, and cities thereof, in all friendly wise.

*A*lexander, having offered his sacrifices at Memphis, and there exhibited all games of wrestling, and other activities and musick, to which resorted the most expert and skilfull men of all Greece to put in for the prizes in them, embarqued himself, and came down the River to the sea ; putting his targatoers and archers, and *A*grians, and the Kings Troup, aboard the ships of his confederates, and with them came to Canopus ; and there made choice of a place lying between the Egyptian sea and Marea, or the Lough of Mareotis, and there built a city, which from his own name, he called Alexandria, [Arria. lib. 3.] and in that part thereof, which lyeth next the sea, and the docks for shipping, there was a street called Racotis, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 792. Pausanius, in his Eliaca, pag. 169. Tacit. Histor. lib. 4. cap. 84.]

*A*lexandria was built, not in the seventh, (as Eusebius in Chron, and out of him, Cyril. of Alexandria, lib. 1. cont. Iulianum, and Cedrenus affirm) but in the fifth year of his reign, and that in the very first year of the 112. Olympiade, as [Solinus hath it cap. 32.] not as, [Diodorus in the 2. and much lesse, as Eusebius, in the 3.] As for the certain time when Alexandria was built, the interval of time between the taking of Tyre, and that great fight at Gaugamela, and his gests acted in that interim, cannot but undoubtedly assure us of it : from whence, and from the fifth year of Darius, and Thoth, in the 417. year of Nabonasars account, which falls in with the 14 day of September according to our Julian Calendar, or year 1. of the Olymp. 112. yet running, Ptolomei of Alexandria, deduceth the years of Alexander, whom in the Preface of his Προχείρων Κανόνων : (whereof this is one) he, after the fashion of all Alexandrians, calleth Κτίστην ; (i. e.) his founder.

Dinocrates was the man who laid out the compasse and streets of this city, (whom yet Plutarch both in his life, and also in the 2 book of the fortune of Alexander, calls Stesicrates, and other books call otherwise) Dinocrates, I say, that famous Architect, whose art and industry the Ephesians used in the re-building of their Temple of Diana, who for the excellency of his workmanship, shewed therein, deserves the second place, after the founders themselves in the memory of the World, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 641. Valer. Max. lib. 1. cap. 4. Vitruvius, in the Proeme of his second book. Plin. lib. 5. cap. 10. and lib. 7. cap. 37. Solin. cap. 32. and 40. Ammia. Marcell. lib. 22.]

Alexander having set them on work, and bad them dispatch ; took a journey to the the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, [Plutarch in his Alexander, with Arria. lib. 3.] out of an ambition, which possessed him, because he was told, that Perseus and Hercules had been there, as Callisthenes, in the History which he wrote of him, affirmeth, cited by Strabo, [lib. 17. pag. 814.]

Wherefore he went as far as Paraetonium, along by the sea side, not without finding some fresh water by the way, which lay from Alexandria, 1600 furlongs as Aristobulus wrote, [in Arria. lib. 3. pag. 53.]

About the mid-way, met him Embassadors of the Cyrenians, presenting him with a Crowne, and sundry other costly things; among which were 300 horses, trained to the war, and 5 chariots drawen each with 4 horses, the choicest that might bee found; which he accepted at their hand, and made amity and friendship with them, [Diodor. Olymp. 112. year 2.]

When he went from Paraetonium to Mesogabas, where the Temple of Hammon was, through dry and thirsty countreys, and wandered over the plains, while the wind blew at south, Callisthenes saith that he was saved from an imminent destruction, partly by a shower of rain that fell, which layd the sand, and partly by a flock of crowes, which led him the way, [Strabo as before,] adding further this fable to the story, that the crowes oftentimes, when the men wandered out of the way in the dark, would with their crawing, call them into the right way again, [Id. Plut. in his Alex.]

Ptolomeus the son of Lagus saith, there were two dragons, which went before the company making a noise, and they led them into, and out of the Temple again: But Aristobulus, to whom most writers assent, saith, that there were two crowes, which kept on still flying before the army, and that they were Alexanders guides upon the way thither, [Arria. l. 3.]

Coming to a lough of bitter waters, as they called them, and having gone 100 furlongs from thence, and passing by the Cities, called after Hammons name, one dayes journey from thence, they came to Jupiter Hammons Grove and Temple, [Diod. ut su.]

There the Priests of the Temple being suborned before hand and taught their lesson, so soon as he came to set footing within the Temple dores, came all and saluted him by the name of Hammons son, [Justin l. 11. c. 11] so that now we learn by this act of Alexanders, that be the God himself never so deaf or dumbe, yet it is still, in the power either of the Priest to feigne and lye, what he will, or for him that comes to consult the Oracle, to tell what answer he would there have made unto him, and he shall have it, [Oros. l. 3. c. 16.]

Callisthenes reports, that it was permitted to none but the King himself, by the Priest to come into the Temple, in his ordinary attire; the rest were all fain to change their vestures, and to hear the Oracle without, and that he informed the king of sundry other things by signes and tokens, onely he told him in plain termes, that he was Jupiters son, [Strabo ut supra.] yet he himself in a letter to his mother Olympias, sayes, that he had received many secret and hidden Oracles there, which he would impart to her alone, at his return, [Plut. in Alex.]

He also in the same, or in some other Epistle to his mother; (which I nothing doubt was meant by Tertullian in his book de Pallio) saith, that he was told by one Leo, a principal Priest among the Egyptians, that they who were now Gods, were formerly men, and that in worshipping them, the Nations did preserve the memory of their Kings and Ancestors, [Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 5, and 27. and de Consen. Evangelist. lib. 1. cap. 23. Minutius Felix, in Octavio. with Cyprian, in his book de Idolor. vanitate.] And when he in the beginning of his letter, had thus written to his mother, Alexander the King, the son of Jupiter Hammon, sendeth greeting to his mother Olympias: she very wittily in her answer thereto, told him in this wise, Now my good son I pray thee be content, and do not accuse me, nor lay ought to my charge before Juno, for she will do me some shrewd turn, if you in your letters make me a cuck-quean to her. [M. Varro, in a book of his, entitled Orestes, vel de insania: in Aul. Gellius l. 13. c. 4.]

Alexander having received such an answer there, as by his own confession, pleased him very well, returned from thence into Egypt, by the same way as he went, as Aristobulus saies, but as Ptolomaeus, by a shorter way, to Memphis, [Arrianus lib. 3.]

When he was arrived at Memphis, new forces came to him: 400 mercinaries out of Greece, sent him by Antipater, under the command of Menaetas the son of Hegesandrus, and about 500 horse out of Thracia, which were led by Asclepiodorus, and being there, he sacrificed to Jupiter, and made oblations to him, with his whole Host, all in their compleat armour, and exhibited games and pastimes, with wrastlings, and other feats of activity, and musick, [Id. Ibid.]

And moreover, commanding the inhabitants of the neighbouring townes and cities to leave their dwellings, he transplanted them into Alexandria, and stored that place with a huge multitude of inhabitants, [Curtius lib. 4. c. 21. and Justin lib. 11. cap. 11.] calling thither also, a colony of the Jewes: whose vertue and good behaviour, he much approving, and deeming them worthy of special trust, made it a reward of their service in the war, to endenise them there, and to grant them equal honours, and priviledges with the Greeks: insomuch that their tribe there, went by the name, not of Alexandrians only, but also of the Macedonians themselves, Josep. l. 2. de Bello Iud. c. 36. p. 816. & l. 2. cont. Ap. p. 163. in the Greek and Latin Edition.]

He also gave lands to Sanabalats souldiers, whom he caused to follow him into Egypt, in the country of Thebais, trusting them with the keeping of that territory in his absence, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. the last.]

Alexander had an itching humour, to go and visit, not only the inward and more remote parts of Egypt, but even Ethiopia it self. But his present war with Darius, put him from thinking of such idle pojects: wherefore he made Eschilus and Pencestes, the Macedon Governours of Egypt, with four thousand souldiers for the guard thereof: he commanded Polemon to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with 30 sail of fighting ships, [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 21.] though Arrianus tells us, that he made Pencestes the son of Macatetus, and Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commanders of the foot which he left there, and Polemon the son of Theramenes, Ammiral of the fleet, to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with all the sea lying upon Egypt: as for the civil goverment of the whole country, he committed the care thereof to one Doloaspes, a native of Egypt, as the same Arrianus intimates.

Curtius further tells us, that he left Apollonius to govern Africa, bordering upon Egypt, and Cleomenes, to gather the tributes both of Afric and Egypt; and much to the same purpose, *A*rrianus tells us, that he left *A*pollonius the son of Charinus, to govern Lybia, bordering upon the West of Egypt, and Cleomenes *A*rabia, upon the East thereof, in the city called Urbs Herou̅m, where it borders upon Arabia Petraa, with commmand that all his tributes should be paid in to him: but the execution of the laws, he committed to the Presidents and Justices of the Country, as in former times. In the second of Aristotles Oeconomicks is mention made of, one Κλεομένης Ἀλεξανδρεὺς Αἰγύπτου σατραπῶν, (i. e.) Cleomenes of *A*lexandria, Governour of Egypt, who is the same, who in 3° Arria. of the History of Alexander, is called Ἐκναυκράτιος, Ecnaucratius. But Freinshemius, a man of a quick sent in smelling out such faults, sayes, that in the one it should be, τὸν ἐκ Ναυκρατιῶν, or Ναυκρατίτην, (i. e.) one of the Nauacritians, or Naucratites, and in the other, Ἀλεξανδρείας Αἰγύπτου σατραπῶν, (i. e.) Commander of Alexandria in Egypt: the result whereof is, that this Cleomenes Governour of Alexandria was a native of Naucratis, which was a Colony or plantation, anciently made in Egypt, by the Milesians; for that the care and charge of finishing and peopling this city, was committed to him: we may partly gather out of Aristotle, who sayes, that Alexander enjoyned him, that he should furnish with inhabitants, a city near unto Pharos (as Alexandria is distant but seven furlongs by sea from thence) and should draw all the trade and trafick from Canopus thither: and partly out of Justin, who, [lib. 13. cap.] expressely sayes, that Alexander committed the building of Alexandria to Cleomenes: whereunto may be added, that which Alexander wrote unto him eight years after; wherein he commanded him to build two temples to Hephastion deceased, the one in *A*lexandria, the other in Pharos; and that all bills of loading and other contracts of Merchants, should have the name of Hephæstion, inscribed on them, as Arria. [lib. 7. Histor.] sayes, adding further, that this Cleomenes, was a most wicked man, and one that did the Egyptians a thousand injuries.

When Alexander was gone down the Nile, Hector, a son of Parmenions, then being in the flower of his youth, and a great favourite of the kings, desirous to overtake him, put himself into a little rascal boat, whereinto also more lept, then she could carry, and so sunk, and he with her. The king was wonderfully grieved at the losse of him, and having recovered the body, made him a very rich and sumptuous funeral, [Curt. l. 4. c. 21.]

Upon the neck of this grief, came another, which was the news of Andromachus his death, whom the inhabitants of Samaria had burnt alive: and he marcht presently away with all the speed he could to take vengeance of them for it, [Id. Ibid.]

Alexander having made bridges over the Nile, and every reach thereof about Memphis, in the first of the spring went from thence, toward Phenicia, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 55.] Upon his way, those who had so murdred *A*ndromachus, were delivered into his hands, and put to death; and then he put Memnon in his place, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 21.] And having taken the city of Samaria, he gave it to be inhabited by his Macedons; as Eusebius in his Cron. and out of him Cedrenus hath it. But the territory to it belonging, he bestowed upon the Jews, for their loialty to him, without paying him any tribute for it: as Josephus reporteth out of Hecatæus of Abdera, [lib. 2. cont. Apion. pag. 1063.] Yet the Temple in the mount Gerisim, escaped. *A*nd if any at Jerusalem were in danger for eating of forbidden meats, or breach of the sabbath, or such like crime, they presently flew over to the Sichemites, saying they were fallely accused, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. c. ult.] and the like troubles and quarrels grew between the Jewes and Samaritans, not onely here, but also in Egypt, at Alexandria, by reason of their different rights and usages, according to their several Temples, as we may see in the same, [Josep. l. 11, c. 1. and l. 13. c. 6.]

Alexander coming to Tyrus, found there his fleet, which he had sent thither before him: and there sacrificed a second time to Hercules, and made enterludes, and exercises of wrestling and musick, and the like, [Arria. lib. 3.] wherein the Kings of the Cyprians, had the charge of providing fit actors for them. Nicocreon, King of Salamis, furnished out Thessalus, a man very much favoured by Alexander himself: Pasicrates King of Solos, presented Athenodorus, which carried the prize from all, by the major part of voices, [Plut. in Alex.] now these Cyprian Kings had long before revolted from Darius to Alexander, and sent him shipping, when he besieged Tyre, and he from that time forward alwayes honoured them, as they deserved, [Curt. lib, 4. c. 21.] yet of Nicocreon, it is said, that Anaxarchus of Abdera, the Philosopher, said to Alexander as he sate at supper (as Laertius hath it in his Life,) that there should also a certain Satrapaes head have been served in there: which saying of his, caused him afterward to be put to a most miserable death.

Alexander made Cæranus of Berrhæa treasuror of Phenicia, for the gathering of his tibute there: and in Asia Philoxenus, to do the like, in the regions beyond the mountain Taurus: and put Harpalus in their roome, to take charge of the moneys, which were in his own hampers: into Lydia, he sent Menander one of his confederates, to be Governor there; putting Clearchus in Menanders stead, to oversee the forreigners: and in the roome of Arimna, he set Asclepiodorus, the son of Eunicus, to be Govenour of Syria, [Arria. lib. 3.]

These things, thus set in order, Alexander offered at Hercules his shrine a great vessel of gold, with thirty dishes in it: and his fingers now itching after Darius, he commanded to set forward toward the Euphrates, [Curt. 4. c. 21.]

When tidings came to Darius, that whithersoever he went, Alexander would follow him, he gave order for all Nations, though never so far off, to repaire to him at Babylon: And when his army was now growen half as bigg again as it was, at Issos in Cilicia, many of them wanted armes; which were out of hand provided for them, [Curt. 4. c. 22.] where the whole number of his horse is said to have been 45 thousand; and his foot, 200 thousand men: whereas it is manifest, that at Issus, his forces in either kind, were far exceeding these in number: nor is there any doubt, but the number found in Justin, [lib. 11. c. 12. and in Orosius, lib. 3. c. 17.] comes far short of what in truth it was: 400, or 404 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse, [Plutarch in Alex.] saith they were 10 millions; and in his Apophthegmes, 100 millions, (but no doubt false printed) that is, 1000 thousand, with whom Diodorus in some sort agrees; where he saith they were 80 times ten thousand, and no lesse than 20 times ten thousand horse; now Arrianus allowes to the foot only, as much as Plutarch doth to the whole, both of horse and foot, that is a thousand thousand, adding 40 thousand horse over and above; though some instead of 40 thousand, put there, 400 thousand, to the end, both that the number of horse, might be somewhat more proportionable to the foote, as also that the number of horse might not here seeme so far short of what it was at Issos: whereas Curtius, [l. 4. c. 22.] sayes it was so far beyond it, besides 200 iron Chariots, and 15 Elephants, which the Indians brought him: whereas all Alexanders army, had not above seven thousand horse, and forty thousand foote in it, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

Darius moving with this vast army from Babylon, came to Ninive, having the river Tigris on his left hand, and Euphrates on his right: his army filled all that huge plain of Mesopotamia, [Diodorus, year 2. Olympiade 112. Curtius, 4. c. 22.] and having passed the river Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he sent Satropaces, General of his horse, with a thousand choice men, to hinder the passage of the enemy; and gave him order withal, to burne and waste all the coasts through which Alexander was to passe: for he thought want might happily undo him, having naught else but the spoile of the country to supply him: he himself marched to Arabela; and leaving there his bag & baggage, went forward as far as the river Lycus, where he made a bridge, and there passed over his army in 5 days space, and from thence, marching 80 furlongs, he came to the river Bumelus. [Curt. ib.] Arrianus saith that he pitched his camp at Gaugamela, by the river Bumelus, for so he calleth the place, [l. 6, p. 131.] not as in [l. 3. c. 57.] Bumadus; in a plain and open field: for if there were any hilly or uneven ground there, Darius commanded it to be made all level, that it might be made the more traverseable for his horse, and might lie every way more open to his view, [Arria. Curt.]

Alexander

Alexander came forward to Thapsacus, a great City in Syria, in the moneth Hecatombeon, when Aristophanes was L. Chancelor at Athens: to wit, [year 2. Olympiade 112.] in the very entrance of that year; here the river Euphrates had a foord, where Alexander found 2 bridges ready made; but not thoroughly finished, nor reaching full out to the other bank. Mazæus, whom Darius had sent to make good that passage, so soon as he heard that Alexander was coming; took him to his heeles, with all his army. And when he was gone, Alexander quickly made out the bridges to the other side, and passed his army over in a trice, and then marched on toward Babylon, leaving the Euphrates and the mountains of Armenia on his left hand; but not the strait way thither: because the other was, though somewhat further about, yet the more commodius for provisions of all kinds for his army, nor the heat there so violent, for them to travel in. On the way, certain Scouts of Darius were intercepted; who informed him, that Darius with all his army, was upon the bank of the river Tigris, to stop him from passing there: and that his forces were far more numerous now, than when he fought with him in Cilicia: But Alexander hereupon going thither, found neither Darius, nor any man else there, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander therefore passed the river Tigris, and though there was no man to hinder him, yet not without much difficulty and extreme danger, by reason of the violent swiftnesse of the river; yet gat he over safe and sound, and lost nothing, save onely a small quantity of his stuff and baggage, [Id. ibid. Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 112. Curt. 4. ca. 23.] Now from the passage over the Euphrates, at Thaphacus, to this his passage over the Tigris, Eratosthenes reckons the way to be, 1400 al. 2400 furlongs, [Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 79. and lib. 16. pag. 746.]

Alexander removing his camp, from the bank of Tigris, led his army thorough the country of Assyria: having on his left hand the mountains of Sogdiana, and Tigris on the right. The 4 day after his passage over the Tigris, Mazæus sent out a thousand Horse against him; Alexander sent to encounter him Aristo, who commanded the Horse of Pœonia; who singling out Satropaces, the Commander of that Troup, ran him with his Spear, full in the throat; and when he with that wound fled away, he pursued him thorough the middest of the enemies, and unhorst him; and do he what he could do for himself, took off his head, and brought it with him, and threw it down at Alexanders foot; and Sir, said he, in our country, such a present useth to be rewarded with a cup of gold; to whom Alexander smiling, answered, yea, with an empty one; but I will give thee one full of wine, [Arria. lib. 3. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 23. Plutarch in Alexandro.]

Alexander camped there 2 dayes, and gave order to remove the next. But the Moon falling into an eclipse in the first watch of the night, at first lost onely the brightnesse of her light; but anon after, all the face of her seemed to be over-cast and covered with a colour like blood: and the whole army considering what they were then going about, began first to be troubled, and afterward terrified at the sight thereof, [Curt. ib. cap. 23. and 24.] Pliny hath rightly observed and said, That the Moon eclipsed at Arbela, in the 2 hour of the night, and was then seen rising in Sicily, [lib. 2. cap. 70.] but Ptolomei in his Geographie, [lib. 1. cap. 4.] not so right, where he sayes, that she eclipsed in the 5 hour of the night, and was seen at Carthage at the 2 hour of the night. And rightly also saith Plutarch in Alexan. that she eclipsed in the moneth Boedromion, περὶ τὴν τῶν Μυστηρίων τῶν Ἀθήνησιν ἀρχήν: (i. e.) about the beginning of the mysteries at Athens, to wit, in the full Moon, of the very middest of that moneth; at which the Great mysteries of Athens begin to be celebrated and continued certain dayes after. As for this Eclipse, the Astronomical account sheweth evidently, that it fell upon the 20 day of our September.

Alexander, to hearten up his souldiers mindes, which appeared much to be dejected at this sight, consulted with the Egyptian Southsayers there present: and their answer was, That the Sun was the Grecians, or was the Predominant in Greece, and the Moon in Persia; and that therefore as often as she Eclipsed, it portended ruine and destruction to those nations whose she was, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 24.] Alexander presently offered sacrifices to the Sun, and Moon, and Earth: because they all three concur in the making of an Eclipse of the Moon: And Aristander, who was the Kings Southsayer, declared openly, that that Eclipse portended all good and happy successe to Alexand. and the Macedons, and that there should be a battel fought that very moneth: and that the sacrifices then offered, did foreshew and assuredly promise a victory therein to Alexander, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander perceiving the minds of the souldiers raised to a heigth of hope and confidence; thought fit to use this pang or fit of theirs, whiles it was upon them; and therefore gave order to march on the second watch of the night following, having all the way the Tigris in the right hand, and the Gordiæan mountains on the left. The next morning, himself with a small Troup of his own, fell upon about a thousand Persian scouts, of which some he slew, and the rest he took prisoners; and then sent some of his own company forward to discover: willing them also to quench the flame of such Towns and Villages, as the country people had set on fire: for they running away from the enemie, had set fire on Barnes and Reeks of corn, which taking in the tops, had not yet burnt down to the ground; so that the Macedons hereby saved a great quantity of food for themselves: and Mazeus, who before had set fire on what he pleased, all at leisure, the enemies now coming on so fast, fled away at last, and left all standing as it was, for the enemie to take, [Curt. lib.4. cap. 24.]

Alexander understood now, that Darius was not above 150 furlongs off, and therefore having store enough and enough of provision in his Camp, he there staied four dayes, [Id. ibid.]

3674. During which time he intercepted certain letters of Darius, by him sent to sollicite the Grecians in his army, to murder or otherwise to betray him, [Id. 4. cap. 25.] 4386.

Statira, Darius his wife, weary of this long travail, and vexation of minde, cast the child of which she went, and died; whereat Alexander shed many a tear, and caused a most sumptuous funeral, sparing for no cost, to be made for her, [Id. ibid. Iustin. lib. 11 cap. 12. Plutarch in Alex. and lib. 2. de fortu. Alex.]

Tirus or Tyriotes an Eunuch, whiles others were busie about the funeral, stole away, and carried tidings of her death to Darius: who though at first infinitely perplexed and troubled at it, yet when he understood of Alexanders respect, ever had unto her, and chast behaviour towards her, he lift up his hands to Heaven, and praied the gods, that if it were so resolved, and no remedy left for him, yet none might sit in Cyrus his throne, but so just an enemy, so merciful a conqueror, as this Alexander was, [Curt. and Plutarch ibid.]

Darius so overcome with his so great clemency, and chastity used toward his wife, be thought himself again of trying for a peace, and to that purpose sent ten of the most principal men about him, to offer him new conditions; and withall, sent him 30 thousand talents for the ransom of his mother and two daughters: and to offer him his other daughter Septina, or Statipna, or Sartina, or Statyra (for by all these names she goes, in the several editions of Curtius) to wife, [Curt. 4. cap. 16.] and what ever lay between the Hellespont and the Euphrates for a dower: unto whom Alexander made this answer; That he alwayes found Darius by his moneys, solliciting sometimes his souldiers to revolt from him, sometimes his nearest friends to murder him; and therefore was resolved to pursue him to the death, not any longer as a noble enemie, but as a malefactor and a poisoning murderer: and that whatever he had already lost, or yet remaining in his hands, was but the reward of war, that war should set the bounds of their two kingdoms, and each should have, what to morrow-dayes fortune should allot him, [Curtius. lib. 4. cap. 26. Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 112.]

The Ambassadors thus sent away, told Darius, that he must fight: whereupon he presently dispatched away Mazæus before him with 3000 Horse, to stop the passages where the enemy was to come; and with the rest, he marched after in good array 10 furlongs, and there made a stand, and expected the coming of the enemy. Alexander leaving all his luggage within his trenches, with a reasonable guard to keep them, set forward to meet the enemy, [Curt. ib. cap. 26. & 27.]

When at the very instant, a sudden Pannic fear fell upon his army; the reason was, for that the Heaven, (it being then the summer season) seemed to sparkle and shone out like fire, and they imagined that they saw flames of fire issuing out of Darius his Camp. Alexander by sound of trumpet signified to them, that all was well, and gave order to the Antesignary, (i. e.) those that stood next before the standard, in every company, to lay down every man his arms before his feet, and should give the word to those that followed them, to do the like: which done, he shewed them there was no cause of fear, and that the enemy was yet a far off: so at length they recovered their spirits, and took up both their arms and courage again; yet for more surety, he thought fit there to make a stand; and to fortify his Camp for that present, [Id. cap. 28. Polyæ. Stratag. lib. 4.]

Alexander, drawing out all his forces by night, set forward about the second watch, purposing to fight, as soon as it was open day, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

The next day, Mazeus, who had taken up his standing with a choice company of horse, upon the rising of a hill, whence he might take a view of the army of the enemy, left the place, and returned to Darius, and no sooner was he gone, but the Macedons took it, both because of the advantage of ground, and also for that, from thence they might discover and have a full view of all the enemies forces, which were ranged in the plaine, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 29.]

Alexander commanded his Mercenary souldiers of Pæonia to march in front: he drew his Phalanx, or squadron of Macedons into two wings, both flanked with Horse, [Id. ibid.] the Camps were distant one from the other, about 60 furlongs. And now the army of Alexander was come to certain hillocks, from whence they might discern the enemy; when he advised with his Captains whether his main battel should presently from thence fall on, or make a stand there right, until he had better viewed the ground whereon they were to fight: most were of opinion for the former; Parmenion was for the latter, which Alexander himself approved of, [Arria. lib. 3.]. Resolved therefore to encamp upon one of those hillocks; he gave order forthwith to put spade in ground and to entrench there, for the present: which being quickly done, he went into his own pavilion, and from thence took a view of the army of the enemy ranged beneath him in the plain, [Curt. as before.].

Mean while the horse-boyes, and other tag rag, that followed the Camp, fell in sport to skirmish among themselves; Captain of the one side they called Alexander, and Captain of the other, Darius. Which when Alexander heard, he bad the rest forbear, and the two Captains onely to try it out between themselves. He himself helpt Alexander on with his armor; and Philotas Darius with his: all the army beheld while they two fought: as upon a prognostick of the event in the fight and war it self. It fell out, that he which played Alexander, foiled and overthrew him which played Darius; and had for a reward, 10 townships, and the honour of wearing a Persian garment bestowed on him, [Eratosthenes, in Plut. in his Alexan.]

Alexanders friends came now unto him, and complained of the souldiers, that talking among themselves in their tents, they were resolved to take all the spoile to themselves, and to bring nothing into his Treasury: Whereat Alexander smiled, and said, Very good news, my masters, it is that ye bring me; for I see by this they mean to fight, and not to flee. Many of the common souldiers also in a humor, came unto him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of his enemies: for that they should not be able to endure the very first noise or shout of them; for that in this place doth γράσος signifie, not the smell of them, or of their arme-pits, as Xylander rendred it, [Plut. in his Apophthemes.]

The eleventh night after the Eclipse of the Moon, and when the two armies lay in sight each of other, Darius kept his men in their arms all night, and took a view of them all by torch-light: so that all the plain lying between the mountain Niphat and the Gordieans hills shone with torches. But Alexander, whiles his army took their rest, was up with his Southsayer Aristander before his pavilion, busie in certain arcane and secret rites and ceremonies, and offered sacrifice to Apollo, [Id. in Alexan.] or as Curtius expresseth it, Aristander in a white robe, carrying bunches of Vervin in his hand, and his head covered, mumbled certain prayers, which the King was to say after him, thereby to propitiate Jupiter, Minerva, and Victoria.

When Parmenion and other his friends advised him to set upon Darius in the dead of the night, thereby to conceale from his souldiers sight, the terrour of the fight in so great a disproportion of numbers in the two armies; his answer was, that he was not come thither, to steale a victory, [Plut. Curt. Arria.] And Darius on the contrary, fearing least some such attempt should be made upon him, and knowing that his Camp was no better rampiered than it should be; kept his men all night in armes; which for want of sleep the next day when they came to fight; was the chief cause of their overthrow, [Arria.]

Alexander, troubled in his thoughts, with the expectation of what was then in hand, slept not all night, till toward the morning, and then fell into so deep a sleep; that when it was day all abroad, they could not wake him. And when his friends asked him what made him sleep so soundly, answered, it was Darius, who by gathering all his forces into one place, had eased him of thinking how to follow him into sundry other countries, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 112. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 13. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 35, 32. Plut. in Alexan.]

This battel was fought by Alexander, saith Justin, [lib. 11 cap. 14.] in the 5 year after he came to his Crown: to wit, in the very end thereof, and beginning of the sixth though Jerom upon 11. Daniel, not so considerately writeth, that he overcame and slew Darius in the 7 year of his reign. Arrian saith, this battel was fought, when Aristophanes was L. Chancelor at Athens, in the moneth Pyanepsion; and that so the foretelling of Aristander was fulfilled, when he said, that in that very moneth, wherein the Moon was Eclipsed, Alexander should both fight with Darius, and also overcome him, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 63.] And truly in that, both he and also Diodorus do say, that it was fought in the year, when Aristophanes was L. Chancelor at Athens, they do well; whereas Dionysius Halycarnass. placeth it in the year following, when Aristophones was L. Chancelor there, by an easie mistake of the name, as in his Epistle to Ammæus: nor was Aristander out, when he foretold, that Alexander should gain that great victory over Darius, in that very very moneth; but Arrianus, in setting one moneth instead of another; saying that it was in the moneth Pyanepsion, whenas indeed the very astronomical account, shewes that eclips to have fallen on the moneth Boedromion, for that then the moon was eclipsed, and that upon the 11 day after it Alexander fought that battle, [Plutarch affirmes in Alexand.] and in his Camillus he saith, that he got that victory, πέμπτῃ τοῦ φθίνοντος Βοηδρομιῶνος: (i.e.) upon the 5 day of the last quarter, of Boedromion; which 25 day of Boedromion, which consists of 31 dayes, answereth to the first of our Octob. according to the Julian Calendar.

Battle of Arbela.

That this battle was fought at Gaugamela, near the river Beumelus, both Ptolomeus Lagi, and Aristobulus, both which were present in the fight, do averre, and them, both [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 737. and Plut. in Alex.] (where yet, in some copies, as also in Zonaras, is found written, Gausamela) and [Arria. l. 6. p. 161. and Ammina. Marcellinus, lib. 23.] do with all reason follow, neverthelesse, because Gaugamela was no city, but only a small town, or country village; and the sound of the name it self, not very pleasing to the ear, and which Strabo and Plutarch saith, signifies the house of a Camel, or rather, the Body of a Camel; for so that word גו גמלא properly signifieth in the Chaldee and Syriac language, therefore, as Arrianus thinks, it came to passe, that, that glorious victory is said to have been gotten at Arbela, which was a great and a famous City in those parts: so likewise Strabo saith, that because that other was but a poor place, and Arbela a famous City, (which we find also mentioned in the Prophet Hosea, as I formerly shewed in the year of the world 3276.) therefore the Macedons in their writings, first gave it out, and then other Historians took it from them, and said, that the battel was fought, and victory gotten at Arbela; neither yet were the places very near each to other; for between the river Bumelus, upon which Gaugamela, and the river Lycus, upon which Arbela stood, were not much lesse than 80 furlongs, as Curtius teacheth us, [l. 4. c. 22.] Now between Lycus and the country of Aturia, or Atyria, (which was the old name by which Assyria went, as Diodorus in the life of Trajan shewes) and the borders of the region of Babylon, (in which Ninive and Gaugamela both were) and the river Capros, and in an equal distance from either, both Arbela, and the hill Nicatorium (so called by Alexander himself from this victory near thereto gotten,) lie, as Strabo in the beginning of his 16 book sheweth: whereby it appeareth that Arbela, in Ptolomies 5 Table or Map of Asia, should be placed where Gaugamela is: both which are there placed, not on the hither, but on the further side of the river Lycus; contrary, not onely to Strabo, but also to Eratosthenes his report, [vouched by Strabo, lib. 2. p. 79.] and Curtius, and Arrianus: all which being diligently compared together, we may gather, that Gaugamela and Arbela, were distant the one from the other, not 500 or 600 (as some have delivered, and as Arrianus noteth lib. 3. pag. 57. 63. and lib. 6. pag. 130.) but yet somewhat above one hundred furlongs.

Aristobulus reports, that when the fight was done, there was found a plat, or description of Darius his battle, for this fight, as we find in [Arrianus, l. 3. p. 52.] in whom, as also in Curtius, [lib. 4. c. 27, and 32.] the marshalling and ranging of both armies, is at large described.

Darius leaving his chariots, and throwing away his armes, got him on the back of his mare, that had new foaled, and fled, as fast as she could carry him, [Plut. in Alex.] the like to which he did at the battle at Issos, as I shewed before out of Elian, who in the same place telleth us, that Darius was ever wont, for this purpose, to keep and carry such mares, as had newly foaled, with him into the field: and so, with very few in his company, he came to the river Lycus, which having passed, when some advised him to break down the bridge after him, to hinder the pursuit of the enemy, he considering how many there were behind making to that passage, answered, that he had rather leave a way for a pursuing enemy, than take one from a flying friend, [Curt. lib. 4. c. 36. 37. Justin. lib. 11. c. 14.] where (for that, instead of Lycus, we find Cydnus, printed; which name of a river, we mentioned before, in the year of the World 3671, to run through the midst of the city Tarsus, in Cilicia) from thence it was, that Orosius, following, as I said before, Justin in all things, fell into this errour, to say, that this last great battle between Alexander and Darius, was fought at Tarsus, [lib. 3. cap. 17.]

Mazeus pressing hard upon the Squadron of the Macedons, Parmenion sent to Alexander, who followed the chace of the enemy, as far as the river Lycus, to come and help them; but tidings coming to Mazeus, that Darius had left the field, he fled also, not the nearest way to Babylon, but fetcht a compasse about, over the river Tygris, as being, though the further, yet most out of danger, and the safer way; and so brought what was left of the army, safe to Babylon, [Curt. l. 4. c. 37.]

Darius about midnight came to Arbela: and thither came also a great many of his Nobles, and other souldiers: whom he called together, and declared to them, that his his purpose was, to leave all for the present unto Alexander; and himself to flee into the utmost borders of his kingdom, and there to begin a war afresh upon him, [Id.l.5.cap.1.] and presently took horse, and fled over the mountains of Armenia into Media, some few of his kindred, and of his guard which were called Melophori, (i.e.) apple barers, because they bare each of them a golden apple upon the point of his spear, following him. There resorted to him also afterward, two thousand of his mercenary souldiers, under the command of Paron of Phocæa in Ionia, and Glaucus of Eolia, [Arri.l.3.]

Alexander returning back from the river Lycus, fell into a harder dispute, than any he had yet met with, with the Parthian and Indian, and some choice Troups of the Persian horse: in which encounter he lost sixty of his company, Hephæstion and Cænus, and Menidas of his nobles, being also sore wounded; yet even here also at the last he had the better, [Id. ibid.]

Alexander in all this fight lost, at most, but one hundred men, but of his horses, what of them that were kill'd, what of them that were spent with over-riding, he lost one thousand; of which one half were of his confederates: but on the other side, there are said to have been slain, 300 thousand men; and a far greater number taken prisoners: moreover all the Elephants, and as many of his Chariots, as were not broken in the fight, came into his hands; so saith Arrianus. But Diodorus reports, that of the Persian side there were not lost above 90 thousand horse and foot; and of the Macedons there were missing 500. besides a multitude of them that came hurt out of the field And Curtius, [lib.4.cap.ult.] that there were slain of the Persian side, 40 thousand upon account taken; and somewhat lesse than 3 hundred of the Macedonians. But of the totall of them that were slain in the three battels, this, and that at Issus, and at Granicum, Orosius, [lib.3.cap.17.] casting up the number of those that had been lost on that side, in the 3 years past, with 3 or 4 moneths, and some odd dayes over, setteth it down in this wise. In such a multitude of calamities, saith he, it is a thing incredible, that in three battles, fought within three years space, there should be slain 50 hundred thousand men, horse and foot; and that out of a kingdom, and those nations, out of which, in but a few years before, there had been, upon account, slain, 90 hundred thousand men: Though besides those 3 fights in those three years, a multitude of cities in Asia had been destroyed with their inhabitants, and all Syria wasted; Tyrus ruined, all Cilicia emptied; Cappadocia subdued, and Egypt sold away: Rhodes also brought into slavery, and many provinces bordering upon the mount Taurus brought into subjection, and the mount Taurus it self, forced to receive the yoke, which it had so long striven to avoid.

Alexander, having a little rested his Horse that were about him, set out at midnight toward Arbela, because he understood that Darius had laid up there all his moneys and royall provisions, which he purposed there to supprise: and the next day came to Arbela, where he found not Darius himself, but all his treasure he did; and his Target, and his Bow, [Arrianus lib.3.] Diodorus saith, that he found there three thousand talents, Curtius four, all the wealth of the whole army, having been carried and laid up in that place [lib. 5. cap. 2.]

With this battle the Empire of Persia seemed to have been ended. And now was Alexander proclaimed King of Asia, and thereupon offered magnificent sacrifices to his gods, and distributed among his Nobles, houses, territories, and provinces at his pleasure, [Plut. in Alexander.]

Now because he knew it could not be but that the aire thereabout, must be infected with the stench of the carcases of all sorts there lying slain, he therefore made hast to remove from Arbela, [Diod. in the beginning of his second part, lib.17. Curt. lib.5. cap.2.] and the fourth day after came to a city called Mennis; where there is a fountain, issuing forth sulphur or liquid brimstone, [Curt. ibid.]

And as he came towards Babylon, Mazeus, who had fled thither out of the field, met him, with his children, that were of age, in all humble manner, and yeilded up both himself and them, and the city of Babylon, and all, into his hands: and he received him and his children very graciously; and Bagophanes, who had the keeping of the Castle there, with the Kings treasure in it, that he might not seem to be out-done by Mazæus, strowed all the way where he was to passe with flowers and garlands: erecting on each hand of the way, silver altars, burnig on them not onely franckincense, but also all other sorts of sweet odors. Alexander guarded with armed men, commanded all the men of Babylon that came forth to meet him, to come behind the very rear of all his foot. He in his Chariot made his entrance into the city, and so went up to the Kings palace; and the next day took a view of the kings treasure, [so Curt. lib.5.c.3. Justin l.11.c.14.] saith, that having refresht and rewarded his souldiers, he spent 34 days in this work; for so the better sort of copies have it, and Orosius agreeth thereto, and Curtius also, [lib. 5. c.5.] that this army spent the same number of dayes there, in fatning themselves, and Diod. ut supra. comfirms, that they stayed there above 30 dayes, being taken with the commodiousnesse of the place, and the entertainment which they found at the Citizens hands.

Among

Among others who entertained Alexander in this city, were the Chaldeans, who discoursed to him concerning the course and motions of the Stars, and fatal arterations of the times, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 3.] From whom Callisthenes one of Alexanders followers, received the observations of the Heavenly bodies for 1903 years space; and transmitted them to Aristotle in Greece, as I mentioned before, in the year of the World 1771. out of Porphyrie.

Alexander himself also consulted with the Chaldeans: and by their advice, sacrificed to Belus: and whatever they prescribed him concerning the reparation of the Temples there, that he did. And thereupon, commanded the Babylonians to repair the Temples which Xerxes had formerly demolished; especially that of Belus, seated in the heart of the City: and commanded forthwith the rubbage to be carried away, [Arria. l.b. 3. pag. 63. and lib. 7. pag. 159.] which it self was so great a work to do, that it took up 10 thousand mens labour for two whole moneths, to clear the place where the Temple stood, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 738.] But when Alexander commanded all his army to help to carry away the rubbage, the Jews onely refused to set hand to that work; for which Hecatæus of Abdera, who was then with Alexander, saith, that they endured many a blow, and many other grievous inconveniences, till Alexander himself hearing their reasons, dispensed with them therein, [Josephus cont. Apion. lib. 1. page 1049.]

Alexander wondred at nothing more in those parts, than at a hole in the earth in Ecbatana, or rather in Batana, as other copies have it (for Batana, which is a city placed by Stephanus Byzantinus near the Euphrates, and not Ecbatana, the Metropolis of Media is here meant) where flames of fire continually break forth as out of a fountain, and a living spring of Naphta rising not far from that hole, where the fire breaketh forth; of the effects of which fiery nature here made known to Alexander, [Plutarch, in his life] speaketh more at large.

Alexander, commanding Bagophanes, (who had surrendred the Castle of Babylon) to follow him, committed the keeping thereof to Agathon, of the town of Pydna, with 700 Macedons, and 300 Mercenary souldiers: and made Mazæus, who delivered that city to him, Governour of all the Province of Babylon; setting Apollodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetes of Pella in Macedonia, to be Commanders of the Militia in that, and all the other Regions westward, as far as Cilicia: and for that purpose left with them, 2 thousand souldiers, with a thousand talents of silver, to raise Mercenary souldiers with. He appointed Asclepiodotus Philotas his son, to gather up his tributes in those parts, and sent Mithrines, who gave up the city Sardes to him, to be Governour in Armenia, [Diodor. Arria. Curtius.]

Out of the monies which he found in Babylon, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman, 6 pounds, to every stranger 5 pounds; to every Foot souldier, that was a Macedon, 2 pounds, to every stranger 2 moneths pay, [Diodor.] An Attic ounce, or pound, contained an hundred Drachmaes; which Curtius confounding with the Roman Denarius, saith, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman 600 Denarii, and to every stranger 500. and to every Foot souldier 200. [lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now was Alexander upon his way from Babylon, when Amyntas the son of Andromenes, came to him with a supply of men sent him by Antipater Governour of Macedonia; of these there were out of Macedonia it self, 500 Horse, and 6 thousand Foot: out of Thrace, 600 Horse, and 3500 Foot: out of Peloponesus, 4 thousand Foot, and 380 Horse; as Curtius, or little lesse than a full thousand as Diodorus hath it: and along with them went the children of fifty the principal Nobles of Macedonia, to be Squires of the body to the King, [Diodor. and Curtius.]

Alexander having received this supply, went onward of his journey: and in six dayes march, came into a country called Sitacine, but by Curtius Satrapene; and because this country abounded with all things necessary for the life of man, therefore he made stay there many dayes; where taking an exact trial, of every mans prowesse and dexterity in the feats of Chivalry, he gave those eight, which were judged to excell the rest, every man to have the comand of a thousand men. Then divided he his whole army into so many Brigades; for before that time, they went by 500 in a company, nor were those places formerly given upon trial made of their virtues, as now. And whereas before, the Horse of every Nation served together, apart from others; now making no difference of Nations, he appointed them Commanders, such as were most expert in the war of what nation soever. And having reformed the martial discipline of his army in many points, so as the whole body thereof fell into a great likeing of the Head, and ready in all things to serve at his command: he then put foreward and went on upon his intended journey, [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now drawing near to Susa, there met him on the way, the son of the Governour of Susa, with a Post, and letters from Philoxenus, whom Alexander immediately after the battel at Arbela, had dispacht away to Susa: The effect of which letters, was this; that that the inhabitants of Susa had given up the city to his dispose; and that all the treasure there, was reserved safe for him; [Arria. lib. 3.] and the same was delivered to him by word of mouth by the son of Abulites, the governour of the place; whether of his own accord, or whether, as some would have it, by Darius his command, to the end, that whiles he busied himself there about those money matters, himself might have the more time, to raise a new war against him; [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 7.]

The King enterteined the young man with much grace and favour; and using him for his guide, came to the river Idaspes, al. Choaspes, which runs with a delicate, but violent stream. Here Abulites himself met him, with a princely present, among which were certain Dromedaries, or running Camels, of an incredible swiftnesse, and 12 Elephants, which Darius had sent for out of India. [Curtius ibid.]

Upon the day, after he left Babylon, he came to Susa, and having there made his entry, he received 50 thousand talents of silver, with all other the kings wardrobe, and other furniture, [Arria, lib. 3.] and as much more silver in sows, saith Curtius; but Diodorus reckons upward of 400 thousand talents of silver and gold in sowes and wedges, and 9 thousand talents coined into Darics, there found, Plutarch mentions 40 thousand talents in ready coine, and five thousand talents worth of Hermionic scarlet, which had been laid up there 190 years before, and yet lookt as fresh, as it did the first day it was laid up.

There again did Alexander offer sacrifice, according to the Macedonian manner, by torch-light, and exhibited gymnick pastimes and exercises, [Arrianus.] Then sate he him down in the royal throne of Persia, far higher than for the proportion of his body to sit on; and therefore, when his feet would not reach to the step by which he mounted it, one of the pages took the table, whereat Darius used to eat his meat, and put it under, for a footstool unto him: which Philotas perceiving, perswaded him to take it for a signe of good luck unto him, [Diodor. and Curt. lib. 5. cap. 7.]

As for robes, and other purple stuff which was sent him out of Macedon, with those which wrought them, he sent it all to Darius his mother Sysigambes, whom he respected in all points, and honoured as a son should do his mother: adding withal in his message to her, that if she liked those works, she should do well to let her young nieces to learn to work them; whereat when he understood that she was not a little troubled in her minde, he went himself, and excused the matter to her, by his ignorance of the Persian manners of doing in that kind, and comforted her again, [Curt. ib. cap. 8.] and so left her, and Darius his two young daughters, and his little son Ochus at Susa, and departed; leaving some to instruct both her and them in the Macedonians language, [Diodor.]

And so himself went foreward toward the utmost bounds of Persia, leaving Archelaus with a garrison of three thousand souldiers to keep the city, and Xenophilus to manne the Castle, and Callicrates to gather up his tributes. But for the civil government of the province of Susa, he committed it to Abulites, who had given up all unto him, [Curt. Ibid. cap. 8.] But sent back Menetes to the sea side, and made him governour of Phænicia, Syria and Cilicia, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander, in four dayes march, came to the river called Pasitigris: and having passed it, with 9 thousand foot, and 3 or 4 thousand horse; went into the country of the Uxians, bordering upon the province of Susa; and running out into the principal part of Persia, between which and that, there is a narrow passage: Madates was governour of this country, who had married Sysigambes her sisters daughter.

Alexander gave Tauron 1500 mercenaries, and upon the point 1000 Agrians, and bad him with them to set forward as soon as it grew dark, and following his guides, to go, by such by-wayes and secret passages as they should shew him, and advance as far as to the city, which himself purposed to besiege. He then taking with him the squires of his body and his Targateers, and some 8 thousand other souldiers, set foreward at the third watch at the same night, and by break of day, came to those streights, which opened into the Uxians country, and having passed them, came and sate down before the city. The Uxians seeing themselves hem'd in on all parts with a siege, sent out of the Castle there 30 men in suppliant wise, to crave his pardon; but that would not doe: yet at length having received letters of request from Sysigambes, he did not onely pardon Madates her kinsman, but restored all as well prisoners, as those who had voluntarily submitted to him, to their pristine liberty, and left the city untoucht, and their land all over tribute free, [Curtius lib. 5. cap. 9.] For Arrianus reports out of Ptolomæus Lagi, that at Sysigambes her entreaty, he left them indeed their lands to till, but put a yearly tribute upon them, of 100 horses, and 500 beasts for carriage, and 3000 sheep; for this whole relation, is diversely made by Diodore, Curtius and Arrianus.

Alexander, having subdued the country of the Uxians, laid it to the Province of Susa, and parting all his forces between himself and Parmenion, commanded the luggage, and the Thessalian Horse, and confederates, and forreign mercenaries, and the corselets, to go with him thorough the champion country; but himself taking with him the Macedonian Foot, and the Horse of his confederates, and light Horse, which he sent before him to discover, with the squadron of Agrians, and archers, went by the way of the mountains, which run all along in a ridge as far as unto Persia, [Curtius, lib. 5. cap. 10. Arria. lib. 3.]

Upon the fifth day after, as Diodorus and Curtius say, he came to the streights of Persia, called the Susian Pyles, or Gates. These Ariobarzanes the Persian kept with 25 thousand Foot, and 300 Horse, as Diodorus saith; or with near about 4 thousand Foot, and 7 hundred Horse, as Arrianus: And he there repulsed Alexander with losse and shame, and made him retreat 30 furlongs off from that passage: But at last, having taken a certain shepherd prisoner, who was borne of a Persian mother, but begotten by a father borne in Lycia; and being by him guided thorough narrow and craggy by-paths, and over certain snowie mountains, he routed the enemy, and opened a fair and free passage thorough those streights. Yet Ariobarzanes with some 40 Horse, and 5 thousand Foot, brake thorough the army of the Macedons, with a great slaughter, as well of them, as of his own men, hasting by all means possible, to get into Persepolis, which was the Metropolis or Head City of that kingdom; but being kept out there, and the enemy following him at the very heeles, he fell back upon them, and in a second fight, was by them cut in pieces, with all that followed him: all which is more fully related by [Diodor. Curtius, Arria. Plutarch, and Polyenus, lib. 4. strat ag.]

As he was now marching forward toward Persepolis, letters met him from Tiridates, Darius his Treasurer in that place, shewing him, that the inhabitants of Persepolis hearing of his approach, were ready to fall upon the Kings treasure, and to share it among themselves: and desiring him therefore to make all possible haste to prevent them: He therefore leaving his Foot to come after, travelled all night with his Horse, though already tired with so long a journey, and came by break of day to the river Araxes; and there making a bridge, passed over with his army, [Diodor. and Curtius, lib. 5. cap. 11.]

And now he was come within two furlongs of the City, when about some 8 hundred (for so Diodorus, Justinus, and Suidas, in the word Alexander, report, not 4 thousand, as Curtius) poor Grecian slaves, following one Euctemon of Cuma in Eolia, came forth as humble suppliants to meet him. These were such as the former Kings of Persia had taken in the wars, and made slaves of them; and in excesse of cruelty, had hitherto kept alive, some their Feet, some their hands, some their eares, and other their noses cut off, branding them all with letters or other markes in their faces, as he saw. These besought him, that as he had done Greece, so he would now vouchsafe to deliver them from the slavery of the Persian cruelty: and afterward, when he offered to send a convoy with them into Greece, they desired him rather to lay them out, and bestow some lands among them there right; least that, in case they were, they should not prove a comfort, but an abomination to their friends and kinsfolkes, at home. The King approving their motion, gave to every of them, 3 thousand Drachmaes, (which Curtius in this place also renders, by the word Denarios) and 5 suites of raiment for a man, and as many for every woman, and two yoke of oxen, and 500 sheep and 50 bushels of wheat, whereby they might go in hand to till and sow the land, which he had laid out for them: And moreover, exempted their land from paying all manner of tribute, and left some to protect them, and to see that no man should wrong them, [Diodor. and Curtius, ib. cap. 12. with Justin. lib. 11. cap. 14.]

The next day, calling together all the Commanders, and Captains of his army, he declared to them, that this city Persepolis, the Metropolis of Persia, had ever been most outragiously bent against the Grecians, and that therefore he was resolved to give the plunder of it to the souldier, all save the Kings Palace; whereupon there presently followed a huge slaughter of the prisoners which they had taken. And this he avowed as his own act in writing, thinking it to be for his honour, that he commanded them, as enemies to be so butchered. Plutarch sayes, that he found treasure there, equal to that at Susa. Diodorus writeth, that coming into the Fort or Citadel, he found therein 120 thousand talents, reckoning the gold after the rate of the silver; which is the same summe which Curtius hath, [lib. 5. cap. 13.]

When Alexander first sat down in Persepolis, upon the Royal Throne under a golden Canopie, Demaratus the Corinthian, and an old friend of his, and his fathers before him, is reported to have fallen like an old man a weeping, and to have said withal, That those Grecians lost a great pleasure, who died before that day, and lived not to behold Alexander sitting in Darius his Throne, [Plut. in Alexan.]

Alexander left the keeping of the Citadal or Castle of Persepolis to the keeping of Nicarthides

Nicarchides, with a garrison of 5 thousand Macedons, Tiridates also, who delivered the treasure to him, held the same state and office, which he had under Darius; and leaving there a great part of his army and stuff, committed the keeping of the city to Parmenion and Craterus himself, with a thousand horse, and light armed foot, went to visit the inner parts of Persia at the rising of the seven stars: and although he was intolerably vexed with stormes, and other tempestuous weather upon the way, yet he went through to the place, which he intended: by the way, he came to a place all covered with snow, and frozen over with ice: But he, seeing his souldiers at a stand, leapt off his horse, and went himself on foot over the ice and snow: The country people, which dwelt scattered in cretes and cabans, when they saw troops and companies of the enemy, fell on killing such of their children and others, as were not able to go with them, and fled all to the wild woods and mountains, covered with snow: But some of them, being drawn to a parley, they by little and little, laid a side their fright, and submitted to the king, nor did Alexander suffer any hurt to be done unto them; [Curt. l.5.c.14.]

At length, having wasted the country of Persia all over, and taken sundry townes thereof, he came into the countrey of the Mardi; a warlike Nation, and far differing in behaviour from the Persians: which yet Alexander took in, and returned to Persepolis, the thirtieth day after he set out from thence; then he set him to bestow his rewards upon his Nobles and others, to every man according to his deserts: giving away almost what ever he had there gotten, [Id. Ibid.]

This jourey of his, taken, as I said before, about the rising of the seven stars, Curtius only describes, whereas Plutarch saies, that, because the winter now grew on, to give his army some ease, he therefore spent 4 moneths in Persia, now Pliny [Lib.18.cap.31.] tells us, that the Athenians began their winter upon the Ides of November, when the seven stars set: But the course of times, reckoned from the battle at Gaugamela, shew that Alexander could not come to Persepolis before our December: others also cast a doubt concerning the Mardi themselves: for Curtius tells us, that he subdued them not till after the death of Darius, [lib. 6. cap. 9.] unlesse we will distinguish these Mardi of Persia (mentioned by Herodotus lib. 1. cap. 125, and by Nearchus in Strabo lib. 11. pag. 524, and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 196.) from those Mardi, which bordered upon Hircania; neither doth that of Curtius, where he saith that he gave away almost all that he got at Persepolis: for he speaks expresly of that, and not of what he got at Pasargadis (as we shewed before, in the year of the world 3669, out of Jacobus Capellus) well agree, with that which himself delivered in the very end of the next precedent chapter, where hee saith, that Alexander commanded Horses and Camels to bee sent for from Babylon and Susa, to carry along those one hundred and twenty thousand talents which he found in this city, which we may compare with that of Strabo, [lib.15.pag. 731.] where he speaketh in this wise; All the moneys of Persia (saith he) he carried out of Susa, which it self was full of treasure, and rich stuffe: It is delivered for certain, that what ever he got in Babylon, and in Darius his Camp, and never came into this accompt; in Persia it self, and Susa, there were found 40 thousand talents; some say, 50 thousand. And with that in Diodore; where he saith, that when he was forced to lay out much of the money there gotten, upon the necessary uses of his wars, and purposed to send part of it to Susa to be laid up there in bank, yet was he fain to get a multitude of horses, both of draught, and carriages, and 3 thousand Camels with pack saddles, from Babylon, and out of Mesopotamia; to carry his treasure to appointed places: and Plut. moreover tells us, [in Alexan.] that his monys and stuffe from thence taken, wanted 10000 yoke of mules, and 5000 camels, to carry them away.

Darius, staying a while at Ecbatan in Media, gathered together, those which were left of the overthrow, and furnisht them with armes again, that had lost their own in the flight: he sent also for new supplies out of the neighbouring nations of his dominions: he also sent to the Governors and Officers in Bactria, and other countries, to continue firme in their allegeance to him; [Diodor. in the 2 part of his 17 book;] and his purpose was that, if Alexander stood hankering about Susa and Babylon, he would stay in Media, to see whether they who were about him, might not happily raise some new commotions; but if he found that he purposed to pursue him, then to retire to Parthia and Hircania, and even into Bactria it self: and by wasting all the countries as he went, to leave Alexander no possibility of following him, for want of forrage: wherefore he sent away before him, all the women, and other bagg and baggage, and carriages whatsoever, to the Caspian Gates, or streights; & himself with such small forces as he had gotten together, staid at Ecbatane, in expectance, how things might go, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander made a feast for his victories already gotten, and offered magnificent sacrifices to his gods; and feasted his Nobles, with a most sumptuous banquet; with store of whores and curtisans among: every one with her ruffian: Among these there was one Thais, an Athenian borne, and a sweet-heart to Ptolomæus Lagi his son; at whose drunken motion, Alexander, no lesse far gone in wine than she her self was, commanded all Persepolis, both City and Castle, to be set on light fire, with caroling, and instruments

instruments of musick playing all the while, contrary to the advice of Parmenion, if it might have been heard. It is true, that having slept upon it, it much repented him of what he had done, saying, That the Grecians could not have been more revenged of the Persians, if they had been forced to have seen him sitting in Xerxes his throne. [Curt. lib. 5. ca. 15. Diod. Plut. Arria.]

The day after he bestowed 30 talents upon that shephard of Lycia, who had been his guide and shewed him the way into Persia, [Curt. ibid.]

Alexander after this took Pasargada, a city built by Cyrus, and which was now given up to him, by Gobares the Governour thereof, with 6 thousand talents, [Id. cap. 13.] where he visited the sepulchre of Cyrus, as Strabo reports out of Aristobulus, who was present went he when to do it, [lib. 15. pag. 730.]

Then went he and took in the rest of the cities of Persia, some by pure force, others upon their voluntary surrender, [Diod.] which it seemeth was done, at the morning rising of the seven stars, from whence the ancients reckoned the beginning of summer, not at the morning setting of them, and beginning of winter, at which time it was, that he took his journey into the heart of Persia, as Curtius seemeth to say,

Alexander made Phrasaortes the son of Rheomithris, Governour of Persia, [Arrianus lib. 3.] and then went into Media; where a fresh supply came to him out of Cilicia, consisting of five thousand foot, and one thousand horse, all commanded by one Plato, an Athenian born, and then went foreward, to follow after Darius, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 16.]

Darius was purposed, leaving Ecbatane, to flee into Bactria; but fearing lest Alexander should overtake him upon the way, he changed his purpose. Alexander was at that time 1500 furlongs oft from him: but no distance of place seemed enough to prevent his speed in following, and therefore he resolved, instead of flying, to try the fortune of another battle. He had then 30 thousand men about him; of which four thousand were Grecians, under the command of Patran, (all men of approved fidelity toward him) besides 4 thousand archers and slingers: and yet more, 3300 horse, consisting for the most part of Bactrianus, commanded by Bessus, Governour of Bactria, [Curt. ib.]

Diodorus reckons them 30 thousand Persians and Mercenary Greeks: Arrianus 3 thousand horse, and 6 thousand foot, and no more; who also sayes, that Darius carried with him out of Media, no more then 7 thousand talents. But Strabo [lib. 15. pag. 731. saies, that Darius when he fled out of Media, carried with him 8 thousand talents, which they, who murdered him, rifled and shared among themselves; and Diodorus, [year. 4. Olympiade 112.] sayes, that Alexander, when he pursued Darius, had just so many talents from his cash-keepers. And Athenens[lib. 11. pag. 514. of the Greek and Latin edition,] out of Charetes his history of Alexander tells us, that the custom of the Persian Kings was, wherever they went, to have over the Kings bed-chamber, a Garret, with five Chests in it, wherein there were always 5 thousand talents of gold kept, and that they called the Kings pillows, and at the back staires one other room, where were ever kept three thousand talents, in three chests, and that was called the kings bench to sit on.

Bessus, the governour of Bactria, and Nabarzanes, commander of 1000 horse, both which followed Darius in his flight, commanded their souldiers to seize on his person, and to bind him fast, resolving, if Alexander overtook them, to purchase their own peace, by delivering him bound into his hands: but if they could get clear of him, then to set up for themselves, and to renew the war against him in their own names, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 18. 22, 23. Arria. lib. 3. pag. 67, 68. and 76.] This, saith Justin [lib. 11. cap. 15.] was acted in a certain town in Parthia called Thara, or rather, Dara, so called afterward by Arsaces, the first king of Parthia, in remembrance of this vilany there acted upon Darius: adding out of Trogus, that this was done by a kind of fatality, that the Persian Empire, should end in their land, who were pre-ordained to succeed them in the Empire.

The kings treasure and stuff, of which I speak, was rifled, as if it had all been enemies goods, Bessus and Nabarzanes, together with one Braza, (al. Barzaentes) governour of the Arachoti, and Drangian took Darius, carryed him away prisoner in a Cart: yet to shew some respect, they clapt golden chains upon him: and again, that he might not be known, they covered the Cart, with a base dirty tilt made of skins, and set strangers to drive it; who, if any man should ask, could not tell who was in it, and those who were his jaylors, came a pretty way behind. The Persians, won thereto by Bessus his large promises, and the rather, because there was no body now left to whom they might apply themselves, joyned with the Bactrians: and now Bessus was made general, in Darius his room, by the Bactrian horse, and other nations; which had accompanied Darius in his flight. But Artabazus and his sons, with those which he commanded, and the Greeks commanded by Patron, kept themselves a part from Bessus, and leaving the rode way, gat up the mountains, and marched away to Parthiene, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 23. Arria. lib. 4. pag. 68.] Alex-

Alexander bending his course into Media, fell in upon the Paritacæ, and subdued their country, and made Oxoathres, Abuletus his son, governour over them, [Arrian. pag. 66.]

Tabas was a Town in the utmost border of Paritocene, there he was told, by some who had abandoned Darius, and fled to him, that Darius was gone in all hast to Bactria, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 24.] But coming within three dayes journey of Ecbatane, he was more certainly enformed by Bistanes, the son of Ochus, who reigned in Persia next before Darius, that Darius was fled from Ecbatane five dayes before, [Arrianus lib. 3.]

Alexander, when he came to Ecbatane, finding the Thessalian and others of the confederate Horse unwilling to accompany him any further, dismissed them to return into their own countries: and at their parting, over and above their full pay, gave 2 thousand talents to be shared among them, [Arria. ibid. Plut. in Alexan.] But Diodorus and Curtius, (speaking of his dismissing the Grecians, as a thing done after the death of Darius, and in a general way without any special mention made of the Thessalian Troups) say, that he gave to every one that served on horseback a talent, or 6 thousand Deneers, as [Curtius in lib. 6. cap. 3.] expresseth it: counting here, as his manner every where is, a deneere, for a drachma. And Diodorus addes, that he gave to every Foot souldier ten mnâs; (i. e.) a thousand drachmaes, and provision enough beside for every man to carry him on his way into his own country: and, to every one of them that would continue in his service, he gave 3 talents ready money: and finding that the number of them that stayed was not small, he appointed one Epocillus to convoy the rest to the sea side in Asia; for the Thessalians that returned left their horses with him. And moreover he wrote to Menetes, Governour in those parts, that as soon as they arrived there, he should furnish them forthwith with shipping, and see them transported into Europe side, [Arria.].

For the re-embursement of those great summes bestowed on the souldiers so dismissed, Alexander was fain, for all his haste made in the pursuite of Darius, to levy a vast quantity of monies in the way as he went: of which Diodorus speaking, saith. That he received of Darius his treasurers, 8 thousand talents, over and above that which they of themselves bestowed among his souldiers, with cups, and other rewards which amounted to 13 thousand talents: and yet that which they either stole, or wrung out of mens hands perforce, was reckoned to a great deale more: so saith Diodorus, [pag. 547. in the Greek and Latin Edition] wherewith that of Curtius very well agreeth, [lib. 6. cap. 2.] where he saith; That in the next spoile which he made, he raised 26 thousand talents: out of which 12 (Justin hath it 13. lib. 12. cap. 1.) talents were spent in one largesse which he bestowed among his souldiers: and his Exchequer-men cousened him of so much more. But we read in Arrianus, [page 67.] That now he gave in charge to Parmenion, that he should take all the monies which were brought him out of Persia, and lay them up in Ecbatane, under the keeping of Harpalus, with a guard of 6000 Macedons, and some Horse of his confederates. Now this money so brought, and laid up in Ecbatane, some reckon to have amounted to 180 thousand talents, [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 731.] among which Diodorus is one, who saith also, that Parmenion had the charge of all that treasure, [page 552.] Justin also, [lib. 12. cap. 1.] saith, that that treasure amounted to 190 thousand talents, and that Parmenion had the keeping of it: wherein they both speak righter, in making Parmenion the keeper of it, than Arrianus doth in naming Harpalus to that office, whom we shewed before, to have been left at Babylon, to gather up the tribute and other duties of the King in those parts.

But here Arrianus tells us, that Alexander sent away Parmenion with certain Brigadaes of forreigners, and Thracian Horse and others, all, save onely the Troup of his own fellow Cavaleers, to march thorough the country of the Cadusians into Hircania; and that he wrote also to Clitus, Captain of the Kings Troup, that so soon as he came from Susa to Ecbatane, (for he was left behind sick at Susa) he should take such Horse as were there left to guard the monies, and to march away into Parthia, and to meet him there.

Alexander, taking with him the Troup of his fellow Cavaleers, and vant courriers, and mercenaries led by Erigyius, and the Macedonian squadron (saving those which were left at Ecbatane to guard the monies) and the Agrians and archers, went after Darius: And because he made over great haste in his march, it therefore happened that many of his company Men and Horse tired out, and not able to follow, fainted on the way, and perished; Yet Alexander would on, and upon the eleventh day came to Rages, [Arria. lib. 3.] having in those eleven dayes, gone 3300 furlongs. In which long journey, the Horse, though in many places they wanted water, followed him very chearfully; yet so, as that of that company which set out with him from Ecbatane, there came but 60 with him to his journeyes end, [Plut. in Alex.]

This City of Rages (mentioned Tobit. 1. v. 14. and 4. v. 1.) is but one dayes journey from the Caspian gates, or streights, to a man that would ride *A*lexanders pace; But Darius was already passed them; and many of those which set out with him were, in his journey slipt away from him, and gone every man to his own home: and many of them also rendred themselves to *A*lexander upon the way, [Arria. ibid.]

*A*lexander, growing out of all hopes of overtaking Darius, rested him there right, five dayes; and having refresht his army, made Oxydates a Persian born governour of Media, whom formerly Darius had committed to prison in Susa, purposing to have had his head, [Id. ib. with Curt. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

From hence Alexander went with his army into Parthia: and the first day he encamped near the Caspian gates: but the next day he entered the gates or streits themselves, and passing thorough them, came into places, well inhabited. And when he had given order for provisions to be brought into him, (for he was informed that he was to go thorough countries, where no such provision was to be had) he sent Cœnus with the horse and some few companies of foot abroad to forrage, [Arria. ib.]

Mean while Bagisthenes a great man in Babylon, came out of Darius his Camp to him; by whom he understood for certain, that Darius was not yet laid hold on, but was in great danger, either of death or bonds, [Id. Ibid. Curtius lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Alexander hereupon made the more hast after him: and therefore not staying for Cœnus his return from forraging, took along with him his fellow Cavaleers, and his vant Couriers, and the Mercenary horse, led by Erigyius, and the Macedon batalion (saving such as were left to guard his treasure) with the Agrians and Archers, and leaving Craterus to command the rest, willed him to come after, by more easie journies. Travelling therefore all that night, and the next day till noon, he rested him for a while; and then travelling all night again, early next morning came to that Camp of Darius, from whence Bagisthenes came unto him: and thence again setting forward, and riding all that night, and the next day till noon, he came to a certain village, where they who had the charge of keeping Darius lay the day before, as Arrianus sayes, or as Curtius hath it, where Bessus laid first hold on him.

Having now rode 500 furlongs, from the place where Bagisthenes first came unto him, he lighted upon one Melon, who was Darius his interpreter. He not able thorough weaknesse to follow Darius any further, and seeing Alexander came on so fast, made as if he had fled over to him from Darius, for fear he should else be taken for an enemy: by him Alexander understood the truth of matters, how they went. But weary his men were, and rest they must: but himself making choice of six thousand horse; he took again out of them 3 hundred Dimachs, (who what they were, you may learn out of Pollux and Hesychius) These ware havy Corslets on their backs, yet rode on horseback: but if need were, alighted, and served on foot, so sayes Curtius: but Arrianus [lib. 3. cap. 68.] thus, when he saw, that the foot could not possibly keep pace with him, running thus on horse-back, he made about 500, of the horse-men alight, and commanded the Captains, and prime men of the foot companies, all armed as they were, to get upon them. To Nicanor, who commanded the Targateers, and Attalus Colonel of the Squadron of Agrians, he gave in charge, to follow on the way, that Bessus was gone with his men, with those, who were lightest armed: and the rest, he commanded to come after in a square batalion.

Whiles Alexander was thus busie in giving orders, Orcillus and Mithracenes came unto him; who in detestation of Bessus his fowle act, fled over to him, and told him that the Persians were not above 500 furlongs off: and that they could bring him to them, a nearer way. Taking them therefore for his guides, he set out with the first of the evening with a select company of horse, and went the way they led him, commanding the Macedonian Phalanx or Squadron to follow him, as fast as possibly they could; and now he had gone 300 furlongs, when one Brocubelus (called by Arrianus pag. 67. Antibelus) the son of Mazeus, sometimes governour of Syria under Darius, met him, and as one flying over to him, informed him, that Bessus was not above 200 furlongs before him, and that his army doubting of no danger near, marched they cared not how, and out of all order, that they were bound, as it seemed, for Hircania, if he made hast, he might fall upon them, all stragling from their colours, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Bessus and his consorts, finding Alexander to be now upon the back of them, went to Darius, where he was in his poor tilted cart, and desired him to get to horse, and save himself by flight: which when he refused to do, Satibarzenes and Barsaentes, threw each of them his dart at him, and having wounded him in sundry parts, left him: they also houghed the horses that drew him, that they might go no further, and killed his two seravnts that still attended on him, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 25. with Arria. pag. 69. lib. 3.] onely his dog kept with him, [Elia. Histor. animal. lib. 6. cap. 25.]

This done, Satibarzanes and Barzaentes, with 600 horse, fled away as fast as possibly they could, [Arrian. pag. 69.] And that they might not be pursued upon one and the same track, Nabarzanes fled into Hircania, Bessus into Bactria: The rest, having lost their Captains, dispersed themselves, some here, some there: onely five hundred of the horse, kept in a bodie, uncertain what to doe, fight or flee, [Curtius, ut supra.]

Alexander, seeing in what confusion the enemy was, sent Nicanor to bid them stay: himself followed after; and having slain about 3 thousand of them that would not yeild, drove the rest before him like so many cattle, without hurting them, and gave the word, to kill no more; and hasted forward so speedily, that scantly 3 thousand horse followed him. But all the companies of the enemy that fled, fell into their hands, that came after him; so that the number of prisoners, was greater than of those that took them: and so far had fear bereft them of their senses, that they never perceived or considered, either how many themselves, or how few their enemies were, [Id. ibid.]

Mean while the horses which drew Darius his cart, having none to drive them, straied out of the rode way: and having gone some 4 furlongs, stood still in a certain valley, fainting, what with the heat of the wether, what with the hurts they had received; There was not far off a fountain of water; which one Polystratus a Macedonian born, having learnt out by the country people, all tired out with heat and wounds as he was, went to quench his thirst at. And as he was taking up water in his head-peece, he spied the darts which stuck in the bodies of the horses, that were in the cart, [Id. Ibid.] and coming nearer, he saw Darius lying in the cart; grievously wounded, but not quite dead: And Darius calling to him for a litle water, and having drunk it off, desired him to carry his thanks to Alaxander for the favour which he had shewed, to his mother; and to his wife and children; craving of him, nothing but an honest burial for himself; and as for revenge, it concerned not him, so much as it did Alexander himself, and the common right of Kings; which to neglect, might prove, not onely dishonourable, but allso dangerous unto him; the one concerning him in point of justice, the other, of profit and safety to his person: in token whereof, he gave him, he said, his right hand, to carry to Alexander; and so giving his hand to Polystratus, he gave up the ghost, [Just. l. 11. c. 15, with Plut. in Alex.]

And thus ended Darius his dayes, in the year when Aristophontes, was L. Chancelor in Athens, in the moneth Hecatombæon: when he had lived about 50 years, [Arri. lib. 3. pag. 69.] and had reigned 6 years, in the year from the death of Cyrus, who set up the Persian Empire, 200. in the very beginning of the 3 year of the 112 Olympiade: From whence allso Calippus (a man renowned by Aristotle, who was at that time grown famous in his schools at Athens, l. b. 12. of his Metaphisicks,) began his Periodus, or account of 76 years: as we find by divers Astronomical observations of Ptolomei, in his great Syntaxis, thereunto applied; for though Strabo, [lib. 6.] saith, that Darius lost his Empire at the battle of Gaugamela, fought nine years before, and Justin, in his eleventh book, affirmes, that then Alexander took the Empire of Asia out of his hand, yet since it appeareth, that Darius, being murthered by his kinsfolks, lost both life and kingdom all at once, as Justin in the end of his 10 book speaketh; we can no longer doubt but that Calippus, in memorial of Alexanders Empire, or Monarchy of Asia, made this the terme or Epocha of his Periodus, or calculation of years.

Calippus's Cycle of 76 years.

Now to this Monarchie of Alexander, Isidore and Beda out of Eusebius his Chronicle, allow but five years onely; Jul. Africa. six, and the Chronologer, which wrote in the time of Alexander Severus, seven, [Tome 2. Antiquat. Lectio. Hen. Cavisis, p. 600.] Strabo in the end of his 15 book, ten or eleven. Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus in his Chronicle, twelve, and Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1. Stromat.] furthest of all others from the mark, eighteene: since it is most manifest, that from the moneth Hecatombæon, wherein Darius died, when Aristophontes was L. Chancelor at Athens, to the moneth Thargelion, wherein Alexander departed this life, as we shall shew anon, and when Hegesias was L. Chanclor there, there passed only six years, and ten moneths, in which small space of time, he did such, so many, and so great feats of armes in the east, that he may well be said to have flowen, rather than to have marched over all those regions; whence it is, that in Daniel [c. 8. v. 1.] he is described under the type and figure of a Goate coming from the west, over the face of the whole earth, and never so much as touching the ground, and [c. 7. v. 6.] to a winged Pard, a beast, as Hierome upon that place noteth, of all others, the swiftest and ὁρμητικώτατον, (i. e.) impetuous: for as he there addeth, nothing was so soon dispatcht, as that conquest of his, who from the gulph of Venice, and the Adriatic sea, to the very Indian Ocean, and the river Ganges, ran through all, not so much with battle, as with victorie: now what he did after the death of Darius, is all delivered by Diodorus, in the second part of his 17 book: by Justin, [lib. 12.] by Curtius, in the five last books of his History: by Plutarch in his life: and by Arrianus in his 3 book, and the foure following: out of all all which I have thought good here to insert the order of his gifts, as followeth.

Darius was no sooner dead, but Alexander taking his horse with him, came to the place where he lay, and seeing the dead body of him, wept to see so unworthy a death befallen so high a person; and took his own coat, and cast it over him, and forthwith sent him to his mother, to be buried in a royal manner, with the kings of Persia: he took also his brother Oxathres into the number of his friends and nobles; using him with all honour belonging to his high place and parentage; and presently set himself to pursue Bessus: but for as much as he was gotten an infinite way before him into Bactria, seeing he could not for the present reach him, he came back again.

Whiles he remained at Hecatompulis which was a City in Parthiene, built in former ages by the Grecians, and had there gotten good store of provisions together; there grew a noise which went thorough all the army, as they lay idle in their quarters, that they should all forthwith return into Greece. Alexander, when he had allayed this rumor, and they all bad him lead them whither he would, and they would follow him; after 3 dayes march thorough the country of Parthiene, came into the borders of Hircania, which Nabarzanes had seized on: and there leaving Craterus with such as he commanded, and, out of Amyntas his Brigade, six hundred Horse, and as many Archers, to keep Parthiene safe from the incursion of the bordering Nations. He commanded Erigyius to look to the carriages, and to follow him thorough the champion country with a considerable company to guard them. Himself, taking with him his Targateers, and the best of the Macedonian squadron, and some archers, and, having with them marched one hundred furlongs, encamped in a plain near to a small river.

He had now refreshed his army there four dayes, when letters came to him from Nabarzanes, who, together with Bessus, had murdered Darius; by which he rendred himself unto him: from hence Alexander removed 20 furlongs onward, thorough an almost impassable way; yet having no enemy to oppose him, he gat thorough: and having proceeded some 30 furlongs further, Phradapharnes Governour of Hercania, and Parthiaboth, met him, and surrendred to him, himself, and all those, who after Darius his death, had fled unto him; all whom he graciously received, and then came to a Town called Arvas. Here Craterus came unto him, who had taken in all the countries which he had passed thorough by fair means or foul. Erigyius also with the carriages, came to him at the same place. He brought with him to his presence Phradates, al. Autophradates, Governour of the country of the Tapurins; and him Alexander restored, and sent him back to his Government again.

When Alexander was now come to the first borders of Hircania, Artabazus the Persian, who was an old guest of Philips, what time he was banished by Ochus, and had ever continued most loyal to Darius, and was now 95 years of age, came unto him with Cophenes, and eight other sons of his, borne all of the same mother, being the sister of Mentor and Memnon; and Alexander received them all most graciously; Ariobarzanes also and Arsames, Governours formerly of Darius his appointment, came in and submitted to him.

Alexander invaded now the country of the Mardians, bordering upon Hircania; which possessing themselves of the passages in the mountains, met him there with an army of 8000 men. These set upon, and slew many of them: took more of them prisoners, and made the rest flee into the craggy mountains. Whereupon, at length they sent him home his horse Bucephalus, which they had taken, and craved his pardon, by 50 Ambassadors which they sent unto him. And Alexander, taking hostages of them, made Autophrodates Governour over them, as he had over the Tapurins.

From thence he returned in five dayes to the place from whence he set forth against the Mardians, and thither came to him Andronicus the son of Agerrus, and Artabazus, and by his command, brought with them, 1500 Greeks, who had been in pay with Darius in his life time, and 90 Ambassadors, which had from sundry nations been sent unto Darius. Alexander committed the four Lacedemonian Ambassadors, and Dropis the Athenian to prison: As for Democrates the other Athenian Ambassador, because he had ever opposed the Macedonian faction, and therefore despaired of all pardon from Alexander, he slew himself. The Ambassadors from Sinope, and Heraclides, who were sent from Carthage, and other Ambassadors out of Greece, he set all at liberty: he gave the command of such Grecians as stayed in his service unto Andronicus: But Artabazus, having heaped double the honours upon him, of whatever he held under Darius, he sent away to his own home.

Having thus ordered these things, he marched against the greatest City of all Hircania, called Zeudracarta, al. Zadracarta, and there stayed 15 dayes. Here Nabarzanes came unto him, bringing with him infinite presents; among which, one was Bagoas, Bagoas, an Eunuch of a rare beauty; who was afterward in great esteem, and could do all in all with Alexander himself.

Here Thalestris, al. Minithæa, Queen of the Amazons, lying between the two rivers, Phasis and Thermodoon, is said to have come unto him, with 3 hundred Ladies, leaving the rest of her army upon the borders of Hircania, of purpose to be with child by him; and upon that errand, stayed with him 13 dayes. Curtius in this place contrary to the stream of all Geographers, would needs place these Amazons, upon the borders of Hircania, [lib. 6. cap. 10.] whereas Justin sayes, they bordered upon the Albania, [lib. 42. cap. 3.] Clitarchus saith, that Thalestris came from the Caspian Gates, and the river Thermodoon to Alexander: and that she came 25. al. 35. dayes journey to him, thorough I know not how many several nations, [lib. 12. cap. 3.] which way could not be of lesse than 6 thousand furlongs, [Strabo lib. 11.] This coming of hers to Alexander is reported by Polycrates, Onesicritus, Antigenes, Hister, and sundry others. But Aristobulus Chares ὁ εἰσαγγελεύς, (i.e.) the Reporter, Ptolomeus Lagi, Anticlides, Philo Thebanus, Philippus, ὁ εἰσαγγελεύς, (i.e.) the Reporter, Hecateus Eretriensis, Philippus Chalcidensis, and Duris Samius, say all, that it is naught else but a meer fable: to which Alexander himself seems to Agree, who in his Commentaries, writing therein all things exactly to Antigonus, saith indeed, that a certain Scythian offered him his daughter to wife; but of an Amazon not a word. It is reported also, that Onesisicritus, many years after reading his fourth book, to Lysimachus then reigning, mentioned, something of an Amazon, that came to Alexander, whereat he smiled; and I pray Sir, said he, where was I the while? [Plut. in Alex. see Strabo, lib. 11. p. 505. and Arria. lib. 1. pag. 155, 156.]

Alexander, returning into Parthiene, gave over himself there, to all kind of Persian pride and luxury, he commanded also his nobles to take and wear the long Persian robe, of cloth of gold and scarlet, and if any of the common souldiers had a mind to a Persian wench, he suffered him to marry her.

Bessus, wearing now his turbant upright and pointed, and other regal attire, took upon him the title of Artaxerxes, and king of Asia; and gathered into a body all those Persians which were fled into Bactria, and the Bactrians themselves, and his confederates the Scythians, and others inhabiting as far as the bank of the river Tanais, purposing with them to make a war upon Alexander.

Alexander, on the other side, made Amminapes a Parthian born, Governour of Parthia and Hircania under him, for that he with Mazeus, al. Mezaces, had delivered up Egypt formerly into his hands, yet joyned with him, in that charge. Tlepolemus, one of his Nobles, [Arrian. lib. 3. pag. 69,] though Curtius saies, that he made Menapis (for so he shortly calls Amminapes) governour of Hircania, who, being heretofore banished by Ochus, had fled for refuge to his father Philip, [lib. 6. cap. 8.] Justin sayes, that, having subdued Parthia, he made a certain Noble man of Persia, called Andragoras, Governour thereof: from whom the kings of Parthia, that afterward were, lineally came, seeing that his name, who was afterward put down by Arsaces the setter up, and founder of the Parthian kingdom, was also called Andragoras, [Justin. lib. 41. cap. 4.]

Alexander, after this, came to Susia, a city of the Arians, and thither came to him Satibarzanes, governour of the Arians, and to him he restored his government to hold it under him, but joyned Anaxippus, one of his own Nobles to hold it with him, giving him 40 javeliners on horse-back to attend him, to dispose of in places where he thought fit to keep the Arians from being plundered or otherwise wronged by the army, as it passed by.

Alexander, being now ready to march against Bessus, when he saw that his army, loaden with the spoile, and furniture of luxury which they had gotten, was scantly able to stir under it, he commanded first his own, then the stuff and carriages, saving onely what was meerly necessary for their present use, to be set on fire.

Nicanor, the son of Parmenion, Captain of the Argyraspides, (i.e.) of the silver shields, or Targateers, died suddenly, and was much lamented by all, especially by the King himself, who would fain have staied to be present at his funeral: but want of provisions in that place would not suffer him; wherefore leaving there his brother Philotas with 2600 men to perform his obsequies, he went on his journey, in pursute of Bessus.

Satibarzanes, to whom Alexander had restored his government over the Arians, as was said before, having murdered Anaxippus, with his 40 javeliners on horse-back, gathered all the power he could to the chief city of the Arians, called Chortacana, al. Artacoana, and from thence hearing that Alexander came on, he purposed to go and joyn himself with Bessus, as in a common war against the Macedons.

Alexander, hearing hereof, brake off his journey into Bactra, and having marched 600 furlongs in two dayes, came to Artacoana; whereupon Satibarzanes with 2000 Horse (for he could make no more at that present) fled away into Bactria to Bessus: the rest gat them away all to the mountains. And the King having pursued Satibarzanes a great while, but not able to overtake him, fell upon those who were got into the mountains and took the craggy rocks, whereinto 13 thousand of the Arians, all armed, had retired themselves, and so returned to Artacoana; which 'was in the mean time besieged by Craterus: and he having prepared all things ready for an assault, stayed onely for the return of Alexander: that the honour thereof, as reason was, might be his; as Joab did to David, [2 Sam. c. 12. v. 27, 28.] But the King, when he came and found them ready to implore his mercy, did not onely pardon them, and raise his siege, but also restored to every man his own again: and having within 30 dayes taken in all the places of that country, made Arsaces their Governour, and so departed.

Then came fresh supplies unto him: Zoilus brought him 500 Horse out of Greece, Antipater sent him 3 thousand souldiers out of Illyrium; Philip the son of Menelaus, brought him certain mercenary Horse out of Media, with 130 of those Thessalians, who when they were all dismissed from Ecbatane to return into their own country, would not go, but continued still in the Kings pay. Out of Lydia also, came to him 2600 Foot, with 300 Horse, commanded, as Arrianus seems to say, by one Andromachus.

Having thus encreased his number, he came to the Drangeans (whom Arrianus calls Zarangeans) whose Governour was Barzaentes, one of those, who with Bessus and Nabarzanes, set upon Darius whiles he was in his flight. He, for fear of punishment from Alexanders hand, got him presently away to the Indians on this side the river Indus.

Alexander had now spent 5 dayes in the chief City of the Drangean country, when some of his own people began to conspire his death: One Dimnus, a Macedonian borne, discovered to Nicomachus his bardash, that three dayes hence, Alexander would be murdered, and that he himself was of counsel with sundry noble personages in that action. Nicomachus, though he had sworn secrecy to Dimnus, yet imparted the businesse to his brother Ceballinus, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith. But Ceballinus, because he could not have accesse to the King himself, disclosed it to Philotes first; and then, finding him cold in the businesse, and like enough to be himself of the same plot, went to Metron, a noble young gentleman, and Master of the Artillery, and advised him to acquaint the King with it out of hand. Alexander, hearing thereof, commanded forthwith all to be laid hold on. Dimnus, being taken, knew well enough what the matter was, and therefore presently drew his own sword, and fell upon it. Ceballinus, being questioned, protested, that the very hour wherein he heard of it, he disclosed the matter to Philotas, desiring him to acquaint the King with it. Philotas being charged therewith, said 'twas true; but that, not out of any ill meaning, but onely thorough over-sight and heedlesnesse he comitted it: and that it seemed to him but a trifle; yet, being afterward had to the wrack, he confessed all, and thereupon with the rest of the conspirators in that action, was put to death.

Then was also called in question, before a council of Macedons, one Alexander Lyncestes, for an old conspiracy of his, for which he had already laien in prison 3 years: as Diodorus and Curtius say. This is that Alexander Aneropus, who before the battel at Issus, which was now 4 years past, was committed to prison for practising the Kings death: as appears out of Diodorus, Justin, and Arrianus: see before [An. mun. 3671.] and that he had been tampring about the Kings death, more than once before, appears by those words of Alexander to his Council of Macedons, in Curtius, [lib. 8. cap. 16.] where he sayes: Alexander Lyncestes, saith he, twice arraigned for two several treasons against my life, I have twice taken out of the hand of Justice; and being a third time convicted, I reprieved him, and kept him in prison these 3 years (for so it should be according to the true Palatine Manuscript, and not two years, as in the ordinary printed books) and till you now desired, that he might be brought to his deserved punishment. For indeed, being upon this occasion drawn again into question, before the Judges, and there faultring in his answers, he was without more adoe, thrust thorough with launces by those which stood about and heard him at the bar.

The body of Lyncestes being carryed out of the place, the King sitting still in judgement, caused Amyntas the son of Andromenes, with Attalus and Symmias his brothers, all most intimate friends of Philotas, to be brought to the bar. For Polemon the youngest of all, when he heard that Philotas was had to the wrack, fled away: but was taken, and brought to judgement too. Yet at last, Alexander acquitted them all, by his own mouth, upon the general intercession of those that then were there present: And then immediately he dispatched away Polydamas, one whom Parmenion loved, no man better, with two Arabians upon Dromedary Camels into Media, that they might might prevent the newes of Philotas his death in those parts, with letters of credence; to Cleander, Sitalces and Menidas, commanders in the army under him, to make him away; being then Governor of Media, and of greatest repute and authority, next the king, in the army. And by them was Parmenion, being now 70 years of age, whiles having read Alexanders letter, he was reading a second letter, written to him in the name of his son Philotas, stabbed and done to death; Cleander sent his head to the king, and would hardly suffer the rest of his body to be buried. Strabo tells us, that this feat was gone about and finished in eleven dayes space; which ordinarily taketh up 30 or 40 dayes journey, in the very going, [lib. 15. p. 724.]

Alexander fearing least the glory and lustre of all his actions, might be blemished and obscured with a spot of cruelty in such proceedings, did, as Gaos formerly (An. mun. 3620, ut sup.) did, (i. e.) he gave it forth, that he was to send some friends of his into Macedonia; and advised all men that would, to write to their friends in those parts; as not like to have the like opportunity in haste again, seeing they were going further eastward: every man therefore wrote; and he took order to have all the pacquets brought to him: whereby finding what every mans opinion of him and his doings was he cast all those, whom he found either weary of the war, or misliking of his actions, into one company, which he termed, ἀτάκτων τάγμα, (i. e.) the unruly company; to be led by Leonidas, formerly an intimate friend of Parmenions, and then dividing his fellow Cavaleers into two Regiments, he assigned the one part to be commanded by Hephæstion, and the other by Clitus.

Having settled matters among the Drangians, he marched toward them, which were called of old, Agriaspe, al. Arimaspi, but of later times by Cyrus, for a benefit by him received from them, surnamed Euergetæ, (i. e.) Benefactors; and was there lovingly recieved and entertained by them.

After five dayes stay, made in that country, tidings came to him that Satibarzanes with two thousand horse, sent him by Bessus, had made a fresh inrode upon the Arians, and had drawen them away from his allegeance. Against him therefore, he dispatched away six thousand Grecian foote, and six hundred horse, under the command of Erigyius and Caranus, or as Diodorus sayes, Stasanors command, together with Artabazus the Persian, and Andronicas, and Phrataphetnes, the Governour of Parthia.

He himself remained among the Euergetæ, and there sacrificed to Apollo, and committed Demetrius, one of the Squires of his body, whom he suspected for a conspirator with Philotas, and put Ptolemei the son of Lagus, into his place. Upon these Euergetæ he bestowed a large summe of money, and such lands as they desired to be laid unto them, which was not much: and being in like manner welcomed by the Gedrosians, bordering upon the Euergetæ, he rewarded them also, according to their deserts.

3675. Having spent 60 dayes among the Euergetæ, he left Amenides, who had been sometime Darius his Secretary, to govern them, as Curtius saies; but as Arrianus, he left them a free state, and Diodorus reports, that he set over the Euergetæ and Gedrosians both, Teridates, to govern them. 4385 329

Then removed Alexander from thence, and marched into Bactria against Bessus, subduing the Drangi and the Dragagi as he went; he subdued also Arachosia: and there he met with that part of his army, which was formerly commanded by Parmenion: they were in all 6 thousand Macedons, and 200 men of Honour among them, and 5 thousand Grecians, with 2 hundred horse, or rather 600: which was, no doubt, the very pith and marrow of all his army; he set Menon to govern the Arachosians, leaving him foure thousand foote, and six hundred horse, to keepe that Country in order.

Then led Alexander his army into the country of the Paropamisadæ; which was about the setting of the seven stars, and beginning of winter, as we gather out of Strabo, [l. 15. p. 724.] All the country was then covered over with snow, and an obscure shade, rather than any light of heaven, and a plain darknesse lay upon the earth, so that hardly could a man discerne any thing near hand, yet in this vast wildernesse, did Alexanders army endure and bear out what misery could possibly befall mankind; want, cold, wearinesse, and even despaire it self; many died for cold, many mens feete rotted off from their leggs: at last yet they came into a country of a better temper, and more plenty, and there the army was relieved, and the whole countrey quickly brought into subjection.

Then went Alexander to the mountain Caucasus, which some call Paropamysus, which mountain he passed in 16 or 17 daies march: and built a city near the foote thereof, at a place where that mountain opens into Media, which after his own name, he called Alexandria, he built also sundry other cities, each of them distant one dayes journey from that of Alexandria; in these he planted 7 thousand of the Nations there-about; and three thousand of those, which followed the Camp, and of those who were growen unserviceable in the wars, as many as would, and made governour of all that region Proexes, a Persian born, and left one of his Nobles Niloxenes, to be an Ἐπίσκοπος, (i. e.) an overseer, or ruler over them.

When the Macedons and Arians were in fight, Satibarzanes, who commanded the enemy, came forth between the two armies, and pulling off his helmet, told who he was, and chalenged any man that durst, to a single fight or duel. Him Erigyius, General of the Macedon army, undertook, and running his spear thorough the very body of him, slew him upon the place. The barbarians, who came thither by compulsion, rather than for any will they had thereto, seeing their Captain dead, took Erigyius his word, and laid down their arms; and submitted themselves unto him.

b. Bessus accompanied with those Persians, which joyned with him in seizing on the person of Darius, and about seven thousand Bactrians, and some of the Dahæ which dwelt to the East of the river Tanais, forraged the country, bordering upon Caucasus, to the end, that ravaging, and laying wast, all the countries which lay between, Alexander should not dare come forward, for fear of starving his army by the way. Neverthelesse, Alexander went on, not without extreme difficulty, by the too much snow, and too little victual, which he found upon the way, yet on he went.

For winter now drawing to an end, and he having India on the right hand of him, and passed over the mountains into Bactria; not a tree to be seen all the way, unlesse here and there a shrub or turpentine, [Strabo. lib. 15. pag. 724.] they found also by the way some quantity of Indian wheat, out of which the common souldiers, squeezed a kind of juice, which they used for oyl, to chafe their benummed joints. Now this juice was sold for 240 denarios, a pitcher full, and as much of wine, at 300 denarios, but of bread corn, little or none at all appeared, for want whereof the common souldier sustein-ed himself with catching river fish, and such herbs as they could get: but anon they came where there was none of that to be had neither; and then they were bid to kill their draught beasts, and eat them: and by that food they lived, till they came into Bactria, [Curt. lib. 7. cap. 7.] To which Strabo addeth, that they were fain to eat it raw, for want of fire to seeth or rost it with: but to remedy the crudity which might grow thereof in their stomachs, they had store of silphium, or an herb called Benzoine at hand, which helped their digestion.

Bessus grew affrighted at this speedinesse of Alexander, and therefore having first sacrificed to his gods after his country fashion, feasted his friends and Captains: and over their cups, fell to talk and consult of the war in hand, where in lofty terms, as one proud of a kingdom which he had so vilanously gotten, and scantly in his right wits, he said, that Darius his cowardize, had enhanced the fame and glory of the enemy; that he was resolved to march with his army into Sogdiana, there to have the river Oxus, as a wall between him and Alexander, till aides might come in from other parts unto him. And when all the rest as high flowen as himself, cryed excellently well said, one Cobares, (as Curtius, or Bagodoras: as Diodoras, calls him), a Median born, and a wizard or soothsaier by his profession, gave him advice, to look to himself, and in time, to submit to Alexander: whereat Bessus grew so enraged, that he drew his sword, and hardly could they hold him, but he would run him through; and Cobares the mean while got out of his sight; and the night following fled away to Alexander.

Upon the fifteenth day after he set out from his new built city, called Alexandria, and his winter quarter, he came to Adrapsa, a city of Bactria, as Strabo saies, [lib. 15. pag. 725.] and removing from Drapsaca, saith Arrianus, after he had there refreshed his army, he marched to Aornos, and Bactra, the two chief cities of all that country of Bactria, And having taken them both at first assault, he put a garrison into the citadel or castle of Aornos, and with them put Archelaus, one of his nobles to keep it.

Bessus had seven or eight thousand Bactrians in his army, who so long as they stood, perswaded that Alexander out of doubt would never follow them, into that cold climate: but rather go on his way to India, held their obedience well enough toward Bessus. But when they perceived that Alexander came onward still upon them, every man slunk away to his own home, and left Bessus all alone; so he with a small retinue of his servants and tenants, which stuck close to him, passed the river Oxus by boats; and being over, burnt his boats, that Alexander might not make use of them, and went to a place called Nautaca, in the country of Sogdiana, to raise new forces in those parts. And Spitamenes and Oxyartes followed him, having some certain Sogdian horse, and such Dahæ, as had come to him from the bank of Tanais.

Alexander, making Artabanus governour of Bactria, left there his carriages with a guard to keep them, and with the rest of the army setting out in the night season, came into the desert of Sogdiana; and when he had gone some 4 hundred furlongs, and and found no water at all by the way, the next day his whole army was sorely distressed with thirst: and when they came afterward, where water was to be had, many of them died with over drinking, and more indeed by many than ever he lost in any battle.

Toward the evening, he came to the river Oxus, where he took up his quarter for that night in great perplexity, expecting the rest of his army to come up unto him.

But before he passed the river, out of such of his Macedons, as either with age or wounds, were grown unserviceable for fight, and of those Tessalians which followed him as volunteers, he chose some 9 hundred, to every of which, if a horseman, he gave two talents, if a footman, three thousand Denarios, or Drachmaes, and willing them to go home and get children, he there dismissed them; thanking the rest, for that they promised to go on with him in the war.

He also sent Stasanor one of his nobles, to the Arians, to seize on Arsaces their governour, because he seemed to intend no good, and appointed Stasanor himself to be governour in his room.

And because the place afforded no timber to make boats of, therefore growing impatient of delay, he caused the hides which covered the souldiers tents, to be taken down, and lethren bags to be stuffed with straw, and to be sowed or tyed together, and so, in five dayes, ferried over his army in these lethren boats.

Spitamenes, whom Bessus most respected and honoured of all the friends he had, so soon as he heard that Alexander was past the river Oxus, having communicated the matter to Dataphernes, and Catenes, whom Bessus principally confided in, laid hold on Bessus, taking off his regal diademe from his head, and rending the robe, which he ware, taken of from the body of Darius, in pieces.

Alexander having passed the river Oxus, marched presently to the place, where Bessus was. Upon the way a message was brought him from Spitamenes and Dataphernes, that if he would be pleased to send any Captain of his with a sufficient guard, they would deliver Bessus into his hands: he therefore dispatcht away Ptolomei the son of Lagus; attended with three companies of horse, and of the foot, that which was Philotas his regiment, and a thousand of the silver Targateers, and all the squadron of the Agrians, and one half of the Archers: with these Ptolomei, having marched ten ordinary stages or dayes journies in four dayes space, came to the place, where Spitamenes with his army, had campt the day before.

Mean while, Alexander came to a little Town of the Branchidæ: those were heretofore taken by Xerxes from Miletum, and planted there, in recompence of their pains taken, for his sake, in pulling down the Temple of Apollo Didymæus: as I shewed before, An. Mun. 3526. This town, as a receptacle of traitors, was wholly plundered first, and then totally destroyed; and the inhabitants, men, women, and child, put all to the sword: which execution had it been done upon the traitors themselves, might have seemed an act of justice and not of cruelty; but now the children suffered for their forefathers fault, such I say, as never saw Miletum, much lesse could betray it unto Xerxes, [Curt. lib. 7. cap. 12. with Strabo lib. 11. pag. 117, 118.]

As Alexander was upon his march, Bessus was brought unto him; not onely haltred, but stark naked, a sight well pleasing to all sorts of men, both Greeks and Barbarians. All that brought him were rewarded for their pains; and the prisoner himself was committed to the keeping of Oxetras, Darius his brother, whom Alexander had made one of the squires of his body, that he might cause him to be crucified, having his ears and nose cut off; and then shot thorough and thorough with arrows: and that his body should be watcht, that no bird might come to touch it. Then scourging it with whips, he remanded him into Bactra, but deferred his death, to have it executed in the place, where he had murdered Darius.

Alexander, having re-enforced his army, for he had lost many, what in his passage over mount Caucasus, what in his journy to the river Oxus, and his march from thence, went to the river Tanais, not that which dividing Europe from Asia, falls into the Lough of Mæotis, and the Euxine sea, but another Tanais, called also Jaxartes, which Plinie [lib. 6. cap. 16.] is by the Scythians termed Sylis, and by the inhabitants thereabouts Orxantes, as Aristobulus writeth.

Here certain of the Macedons went a forraging, not so advisedly as they might have done, and were set upon by certain Natives, which fell upon them out of the mountains, and slew many of them, but took more. These were to the number of 30, or as Curtius sayes 20 thousand men. Against whom Alexander speedily drew out, with such companies as he had readiest at hand. In this fight, he was shot with an arrow in the thigh; and when the shaft was pulled out, the head stuck behind: yet Arrianus tells us, that the hill was taken, and of 30 thousand of them, there escaped not above 8 thousand. But Curtius tells us, that the next day after he was hurt, those Barbarians voluntarily yielded to him, and sent him home the prisoners which they had taken, and made their peace with him.

Then removing his Camp, himself was carried in an ordinary Lictier, which every man, horse and foot, were forward to put their shouldiers to: from hence in 4 dayes he came to Maracanda, the principal city of all Sogdiana, whose wall is 70 furlongs about: and there leaving a Garrison to keep it, he went and wasted the towns adjoyning and set fire on them. A few dayes after, came Ambassadors to him from the Scythians called Abii; who having lived a free State ever since the death of Cyrus, now rendred themselves to him.

The Barbarians dwelling near the River, took such Macedonian souldiers as were there left in garrison, and slew them, and fell to fortifying of their Cities: Many of the Sogdians joyned with them, being induced thereto by those who had taken Bessus his part, and they drew some of the Bactrians to them also. The Susians and Bactrians together, made 7 thousand horse, and these drew on the rest; and when Spitamenes and Catenes, who had delivered Bessus into his hands, were sent by him to represse them, they proved the principal ring-leaders of all that misorder; giving out, that Alexander had sent for all the Bactrian Horse, of purpose to murder them.

Alexander, hearing thereof, himself set upon the city Gaza, and sent Craterus against Cyropolis: having taken Gaza, he slew all that were of age therein, the women and children, were sold away for slaves, and the city it self destroyed, that others might take example by them. This and four other cities in those parts, within two days thus taken and served, he marched away to Cyropolis; whereinto 18 thousand men had put themselves, as a place of greatest strength, and surest refuge; In that siege he both lost the forwardest and prime men of his army, and himself also ran a most extreme danger. For he took such a blow in the neck with a stone, that his eyes dazeled therewith, and he fell all along, and lost his senses for the present. But, being of an invincible courage against such casualties as use to dant other men, though his wound was not yet thoroughly cured, he fell to assault it more fiercely than before, anger whetting on his natural inclination that way, and so at the first taking of the city, there were slain of the enemy, to the number of 8 thousand, the rest fled into the Castle, whom when Alexander had besieged but one day, they rendred themselves for want of water.

Cyropolis, being, by his command, laid level with the ground, of 7 Cities which the natives had fortified for themselves, there remained now but one to take; and that he took at the very first assault: or as Ptolemei sayes, it was given up unto him. But Aristobulus saith, that it was taken by assault, and all that therein were, put to the sword. Ptolemei saith, that the men therein taken, were distributed in the army, and there kept bound, till Alexander left that country, that none might be left behind, which had a hand in that revolt.

Mean while the Scythians of Asia came with a great army to the bank of the river Tanais; as having heard that the nations on the other side were up in armes against Alexander; purposing, if they were up in any considerable number, then to joyn with them against him, and to fall upon the Macedons.

But Spitamenes, keeping himself within the walls of Maracanda besieged the Garrison of Macedons, who were in the Castle there. Against him therefore Alexander sent Menedemus, Andromachus, and Caranus, and with them 60 of his fellow Cavaleers and 800 of his Mercenaries, led by Caranus: and 1500 Foot of Mercenaries; or as Curtius, 3 thousand, giving them Pharnuches for an interpreter, because he spake the Barbarians language, and could therefore best serve to treat with them.

Alexander came back to the bank of the river Tanais, and drew a wall round about his Camp, and made a City of it of 60 furlongs in compasse; which he also called after his own name, Alexandria: a work so speedily dispatched, that within 17 dayes after the walls were up, it was filled with houses also: so Curtius, [lib. 7. cap. 17.] But Justin sayes, that in 17 dayes space, he drew a wall about it, six miles round, [lib. 12. cap. 5.] and Arrianus, that in 20 dayes space, the City was closed round with a wall. That City he assigned to his Mercenary Greeks to inhabit, with such of the natives thereabouts as would, and certain of his Macedons also who were grown unserviceable for the war. He also put some of his captive prisoners to fill up this new built City; paying their several Masters their ransom, and so made them freemen and citizens of the place; also he removed the inhabitants of three Cities which Cyrus had built, and planted them there.

The King of the Scythians, whose Realm lay beyond the Tanais, conceiving that City to have been built of purpose to lie as a yoak upon his neck, sent his brother Carcasis by name, to take and demolish it, and to put off those Macedons from the river side. These rode up and down in Alexanders sight, and let fly both their arrows, and their railing speeches, at him and his Macedons, from the other side of the river after their their rude manner. Alexander was not yet well recovered of his hurt; his voice failed him, nor could he stand alone, nor sit on horseback, nor in any sort give order for what he would have done.

Spitamenes, taking with him, besides his owne men, some six hundred Dahæ, and wild Scythian horse, fell upon a part of the army that was sent by Alexander, to relieve them, who were besieged in the castle at Maracanda, and slew them. Aristobulus sayes, that when the Macedons were in fight, there suddenly arose out of the gardens adjoyning, such a number of Scythians, that they slew the Macedons down right, so that there escaped of them scantly 40 horse, and 300 foote. Curtius mentions only 2000 foote to have been lost in that defeate, yet that Alexander, to cover the greatnesse of that losse, charged those who returned into his camp, upon pain of death, not to speak a word of it.

Alexander putting his corseleteers, into such boats as he could make, and causing the rest to swim over upon lethren baggs stuffed with straw, as well as they could, passed the river Tanais, with an incredible courage, do the Scythians on the other side what they could to the contrary: and having put them to flight, weak though he was, yet followed he the chase of them 80 furlongs. In this fight there fell of the Macedon horse, to the number of sixty: of the foot, almost one hundred, and a thousand hurt.

Not long after, there came embassadors to him from the Scythians, to excuse what they had done. That this war was not made upon him by the general consent of the Nation, but by such onely, as among them used to live by robbery and spoile, but that the more civil sort of them, would be at his dispose. To these he made a faire answer; and released all such as he had taken prisoners, ransome free; that they being a warlike nation, might see that his contention with them, was out of a desire of honour, not of revenge.

The Sacæ seeing this, sent their Embassadors to him, with like tender of their service; and he as graciously dealt with them, and caused Excipinus, a young gentleman, whom he loved very dearly, and was to him, as it were another Hephæstion, to keepe them company, and to entertain them.

Alexander taking the one half of his fellow Cavaleers, all his Targateers, Archers, and Agrians, and the readiest of all the Macedonian Squadron; marched to Maracanda, whither he was informed that Spitamenes was returned, to besiege them afresh, which kept the castle there; having therefore marcht 1500 furlongs in three dayes space, he came early the next day to the City. Spitamenes, hearing of his approach, raised his siege and fled, and Alexander pursued him with all the speed he could, and in his way came to the place, where the Scythians had slain his Macedons: whose bones he caused to be gathered together and buried; with obsequies, done according to their country manner: and then followed the enemy till he came into the desert.

And by this time Craterus, marching by easie journeys, as he was bidden, came up to him with the greatest part of the army; and therefore now to lay load upon all alike, that had revolted from him; he divided his army into two parts, and gave order not to spare any place from burning, nor any male of age, from killing; and in this manner ran he over all that region which the river called Polytimetus runneth thorow: for from thence forward, and where that river looseth it self, and runneth under ground, all the country is nothing but a Desert, void of culture and inhabitants.

Having slain of the Sogdians, as Diodorus guesseth, [part 2. lib. 1.] 120 thousand persons, there were brought unto him, 30 of the most noble of them, all men of excessive strength of body; whose undaunted courage against death, Alexander wondered at, and gave them their lives, upon their promise to be from thence forward true unto him: nor proved they worse than their words; for returning home, they kept every man his people in due subjection to him, foure of them he took to be Squires of the body to himselfe, nor could any Macedon prove more faithful to him, than they were.

Leaving Pencolaus there with a Garrison of 3 thousand foote (for there needed no more) he came into Bactria; where calling together all that ever were, he commanded Bessus to be brought forth: and there reproaching him with his vile perfidiousnesse to Darius, caused his nose, and crops of his ears to be cut off; and so sent him to Ecbatane, that he might there be put to death in the sight of the Medes and Persians. Plutarch sayes, that by Alexanders command, his foure quarters were tied to two trees, bowed downe, and so they being let go again, tare him in pieces, as they returned to their natural posture: and Diodorus writeth, that the brother of Darius, and other his kinsfolks, having spent all manner of railing and reproachful speeches on him, cut his whole body into gobbits, and then put them into slings, and scattered them abroad.

About the same time came unto him Phrataphernes the Governour of Parthia, and Stasanor, who was sent into Aria to apprehend Arsaces; and brought him bound in chains to Alexander, with Barzanes, whom Bessus had made governour under him of Persia, and other consorts of Bessus in his revolt.

From the sea coast in Asia allso came Epocillus, and Melanidas, and Ptolomei, commander of the Thracians, which had conveyed the monies sent by Menetes, and those old Souldiers whom he had dismissed to go into their countries. Ptolomei and Menidas brought with them three thousand fresh foot, and one thousand horse, to serve for pay, and one Alexander with the like number of foot, and five hundred horse, aud Bessus Governer of Syria, and Asclepidorus, a Commander at sea, with as many more; and Antipater sent him eight thousand mercenary Greeks, and with them, five hundred horse, under the command of Asander and Nearchus.

His army thus encreased, he proceeded to set in order, what had been disturbed by that general revolt which was made from him: for many, especially of the Sogdians, had put themselves into walled towns and cities, and stood upon their guards, nor would submit to the Governour which he had set over them: wherefore leaving Polysperchon, and Attalus, and Gorgius, and Meleager, in Bactria, to hold them in awe, that they might not rise again, and to take in those that yet stood out against him, himself after four dayes march came to the bank of the river Oxus. This river, because it runs all along upon a mud, is very filthy and unwholsom to drink; wherefore the souldiers fel to digging of pits and wells for water, but found none: when at last they perceived a sprin rising up in the kings own pavilion, which because they observed not at first, therefore they gave it out, that it suddenly there arose, [Curt. lib. 7. cap. 25.] Plutarch reports, that one Proxenus a Macedon, and master of the Kings wardrobe, whiles he dig'd a place to pitch the Kings pavillion in, near the river Oxus, found a spring of a fatty, and uliginous, or oily liquor, and that Alexander, in his letters to Antipater, relates it for one of the greatest miracles that God had shewen him. Arrianus goeth further, and saith, that he found there two fountains, one of water, and another of oyl, newly sprung up, near to the place where his tent stood: whereof, when Ptolomei brought him word, he presently (as he was directed by his soothsaiers) offered sacrifice to his gods: and Aristander told him, that the fountain of oyl, portended him the great labour and travel that he was to endure, but the end should be crowned with victory, Afterward, having passed to the two rivers, Ochus and Oxus, he came to the river Marginia, al. Magriana about which he chose a place to build 6 towns in, two to the southward, and 4 other upon the eastern quarter of it, not far distant the one from the other: that if need were, they might be the readier at hand to help each other, [Curt. ut supra.] Strabo tells us, that he built eight towns, in Bactria and Sogdiana, [lib. 11. pag. 717.] Justin mentions twelve,]lib. 12. cap. 5.] where he noteth, that he distributed such, as he observed to be mutinous and seditious in his army, and so rid his hands of them.

3676. a. Arimazes of Sogdiana, with an army of 30 thousand men, got into the top of a high Rock, which Strabo calleth by the name of Oxi; having laid in there provision enough of all sorts, for three years siege. This Rock was 30 furlongs high, and 150 furlongs about. There were 300 gallant young lads, who, drawen on with the large promises, which Alexander made, with the help of cramp-irons, which, where need was, they strook into the Rock, to hold fast by, gat by little and little to the top of this Rock; of which yet 32 perished in getting up, by the sliping of a foot, or brickleness of the Rock, on which they caught hold, and so came tumbling down, and brake all in pieces: these Sogdians astonished, as at a miracle, to see men gotten up there; supposing they had been more in number, and better armed than indeed they were, presently rendred themselves: and Arimazes, more afraid than hurt, with the chief men of the country, came down to the King in his Camp, all which Alexander having first caused them to be well whipt, commaned afterward to be crucified at the foot of the hill, the rest he distributed for slaves among the new cities, which he had built with the monies taken with them. And Artabazus was left to keep that fort, and the country adjoying in subjection, [Curtius lib. 7. cap. ult. see also Polyænus Strateg. lib. 5. in Alexander nu. 29.] 4386

Alexander, having taken in the Rock in Sogdiana, seeing his enemies up in divers parts, divided his whole army likewise into five brigadaes, whereof Hephæstion commanded three, Cænus and Artabazus the fourth: and the fifth he took to himself, and with it, marched the next way toward Maracanda: the rest ranged here and there, as their feet led them, and by the way, if they found any fled to Castles or places of strength, there they fell on, and took them by assault, where they yielded, there they took them to mercy. But when all these five Brigadaes having taken in the greater part of all Sogdiana, came together at Maracanda, he then sent Hephæstion, to make plantations plantations in sundry parts thereof; but Cœnus and Artabazus, he sent to Scythia, for that it was said, that Spitomenes was gone thither. And himself with the rest of the army going into Sogdiana, easily re-possessed himself of such places as the Rebels were fled unto; and such as yeelded without fighting, he removed and planted in those townes which he subdued by force, and caused their lands to be divided among these new inhabitants.

Whiles these things passed, Spitamenes, and the Banditoes of Bactria, with a company of Sogdians, who were fled from thence into Scythia, and some 6 or 8 hundred Massagetan Horse which came unto him, went to a certain Castle which was built and manned against the Bactrians; and there falling suddenly upon the Garrison, slew them every man, and committed the Governour to prison; and growing proud of what they had done, shortly after went with a purpose to take the City of Zariaspes; but failing thereof, brought away yet a great booty out of the country thereabout.

To suppresse this rabble, Attinas Governour of the country, led out some 300 Horse, little thinking of the ambushment that lay for him. And with them went also certain Horse of the Kings Troup; which having formerly been left sick at Zariaspes, were recovered, and well able to travel again: and Pitho, the son of Sosicles who commanded them, and Aristonicas, a Musitian; for these having gotten together some 80 mercenary Horse of those who were left in garrison at Zariaspes, and some of the Kings fellow Cavaleers, would needs for company, go with Attinas into the country of the Massagetæ: But Spitamenes and his company, rising out of the thickets, and woods, fell suddenly upon them: Of the Kings fellow Cavaleers Troup, he slew seven, of other Mercenaries, to the number of 60, and Aristonicus the Musician, who in that fight behaved himself more like a souldier than a fidler. But to be short, in this encounter, he slew Attinas with his whole Troup; Pithon was wounded, and had quarter given him: news of all which came quickly to Craterus, who falling on presently will all his Horse, put the Massagetæ to flight, and pursued them till they came to the Wildernesse of that country, where they fought: and after a sharp dispute, the Macedons had the better of it, and the Massagetæ, seeing 150 of their Horse slain, fled and easily saved themselves, in that wild country; but there fell of the Dahæ, no lesse than a thousand men, which thoroughly quieted the rebellion in those parts.

Alexander, having now a second time quieted all Sodiana, returned to Maracanda; & there came to him an Ambassador from the King of Scythians, dwelling in the European side, above Bosphorus, and brought him a present, and offered him his daughter in marriage; whereof Alexander himself in his letter to Antipater maketh mention, as I said before: But, if he scorned the offer for himself, his second motion was, that he would suffer his Nobles of Macedon, to match with the principal Houses of the Scythians: offering, if he pleased, to come himself in person, and to receive his commands from him.

At the same time also, Phrataphernes, al. Pharœmenes, who commanded the Chorasmians, bordering upon the countries of the Massagetæ and Dahæ, sent his Messengers to let them know, he was ready to receive his commands: And he having graciously heard both their errands, stayed there right in expectance of Hephæstions, and Craterus, their return unto him.

So soon therefore as they were come, he with his army fell into the country of Bazaria, al. Bazistis, where was a Forest which had not felt the stroke of a hatchet, in four whole ages before. In this Forest, when a Lyon of a vast bignesse set upon the King by chance, Lysimachus, who was afterward King of Thracia, offered to interpose with his hunting Spear; but the King put him by, and bad him be gone: and when the Lyon came on, he not onely stood him, but slew him out-right, at one blow; and after that, having slain some 4 thousand wild beasts, he with all his army fell a feasting in the wood.

Then came he back to Maracanda, and quitting Artabazus of his government of Bactria, by reason of his age, he gave the command thereof to an old souldier of his fathers, called Clitus, the son of Dropidas of Macedon, the brother of Hellanica, al. Lanica, Alexanders Nurse; a woman whom he ever respected and loved as his own mother that bare him. But in a dream, he happened to see him all in mourning, and sitting among Parmenions sons, who were then dead.

The third day after this dream, fell out to be a holiday to Bacchus, wherein Alexander was wont yearly to offer a sacrifice to him. Now some or other had at that time brought him certain apples as far as from out of Greece; and he wondering at the fresh colour and fairnesse of them, sent for Clitus, to shew him them, and to bestow some of them upon him. Clitus left the sacrifice which he was about, and as he was going in all haste to the King, was followed by three sheep which were ready prepared to be offered, having meale and salt upon their heads. The King, hearing thereof, asked his two principal soothsaiers, Aristander and Cleomenes the Spartan, what the meaning thereof might be, They told him; it was an abominable signe, and Alexander calling presently his dream to minde, bad them go quickly and offer a sacrifice for him: But Clitus himself came to the feast which the King made, after he had done sacrificing to Castor and Pollux, where when Alexander had well drunk, being otherwise an over-valewer of himselfe, he began to speak immoderately of his owne doings, and to undervalue the acts of his father Philip; wherein the greater part of those which sate at table, applauded him: But Clitus on the other side, upheld the gests of Philip, speaking honourably of his atchievements, and slighting the present times, not sticking sometimes to let fall some disgracefull speeches of Alexander himself. And when Alexander rose from his place, all enraged, to kill him, he (as Aristobulus reports) when he was shifted out of the way at a back doore, and was gotten quite out of the trenches, into the fort, to Ptolomei the son of Lagus, his lodging, would needs come back again to the feast, where he sate before; and lighting upon Alexander, as he was calling out for Clitus, here is Clitus said he, what will you with him; whereupon Alexander ran him through with his spear, and slew him.

Alexander, afterward considering with himself, the foulnesse of this fact, grew as mad against himself, as formerly he had done against Clytus, and resolved to make himself away upon it: and therefore shutting himself up three whole dayes, refrained both meat and drink, nor took any care at all, what became of him.

When he had now continued fasting to the fourth day, the Squires of his body, brake in upon him; and were along time before they could perswade him to take meat; and his sooth-sayers telling him, that this was befallen him for omitting his sacrifice to Bacchus, he went presently, and sacrificed to him: glad he was to hear that this proceeded from the anger of the gods, rather than from the malice of his heart: and Aristander putting him in mind of his own dream, and of the sheep, told him that what was done, was done by fate, and could not be avoided. Calisthenes the Philosopher, and his school-fellow, sometimes, under Aristotle, and his great familiar, prevailed much with him in this case; but much more did the shamelesse flattery and soothing of Anaxarchus of Abdera, a subtile Sophister; who from an old saying, that Justice alwayes sits at Jupiters elbow, would needs conclude, that what ever Kings did, was to be taken for right and just. And to take him off from the moode he was in, all the Macedons, with a general voice, concluded and declared, that Clitus was well enough served, and justly put to death, and would have forbidden him burial, if the king himself, had not command it to be done.

Having spent ten Dayes in quieting his mind hereupon, he then sent Hephæstion with a part of his army into Bactria, there to make, and bring in provision for his winter quarter, and gave the Government of Bactria, to which Clitus was designed, to Amyntas, the son of Nicolaus. And leaving there Cænus, with his own and Meleagers brigade; and 400 of his fellow Cavaleers, and Darters on horseback, with the Bactrians and Sogdians, which were under Amyntas his command, he commanded all to obey Cænus, and to spend that winter in Sogdiana: partly to keep that countrey in order, partly, if it were possible, to lay hold of Spitamenes, if he happened to come for his winter provision, into those parts, [Arria. lib. 4.]

Alexander himself came through to Xenippa: which borders upon Scythia, whither the Bactrians who had revolted from him, had retired: But, so soon as it was known that Alexander was coming, the natives bade them be gone: whereupon they gathered into a body of 2200 horse: these falling suddenly upon Amyntas, a Commander of Alexanders, had a hot, and a long skirmish with him: but at length having lost 7 hundred of their company, whereof 300 were taken prisoners, they fled: neverthelesse in the fight, they had slain 80 Macedons, and wounded 350 more: yet upon submission, they obtained pardon again.

This done, he went with his army to a place called Naura, al. Nautaca: Governor whereof was Sisimithres, who had two sons, gotten upon his own mother: for with them it was lawfull for children to couple with their parents. This Sisimithres had taken the gates or streits which open through the mountains into his own countrey, with a strong party, and had well fortified the passage; which was naturally, and of it self well defended by a most swift and violent river, running under it, and had a huge Rock at the back of it, [Curt. lib. 8. cap. 6.] Arrianus saith, that this Rock, was at Parataca, being 20 furlongs high, and almost 60 in compasse, and calls the name, as well of the rock it self, as of him that kept it, Chorienes. But Strabo, together with Curtius and Plutarch, calls it Sisimithres his Rock, and placeth it in Bactria, giving it 15 furlongs in heighth, and 80 in compasse, with a large plain on the top of it, all good land, and well able to find 500 men; and saies, that in it (not in that other rock in Sogdiana) one Oxyartes, had his daughter Roxane, whom afterward Alexander made his wife, [Strabo lib. 11. p. 517.]

Alexand-

Alexander, though he saw this passage to be by nature strong, and well manned besides, yet bending his Rams of battery against the works which they had made, quickly made a breach, and with his archers and slingers, easily drave them off which defended the breach when it was made; and having gotten within those out-works, he presently made his approach to the Rock it self: but at the foot of it there was a vast bog, caused by the rain which fell from the Rock, and had no passage out; and how to fill it up, upon the sudden he knew not. Meane while, he caused store of beech, which grew in great plenty thereabouts, to be felled, and of them made long ladders, by which his army might at least go down into the bog: And all the day long himself was present, and set forward the work; but Perdiccas and Leonatus, and Ptolomæus Lagi, principal Squires of his body, dividing the rest of the army into 3 parts, took care of the work by night; nor could they go on more then 20 cubits in a day, and somewhat lesse by night, though all the army incessantly wrought at it: so craggy was the rock, so difficult was the work.

There was at that time with Alexander, one Oxyartes a great man of that country, and a Prince of himself, and the father of Roxane, who being demanded by Alexander, what spirit and courage Sisimithres was of, told him, that he was the most cowardly man that breathed: then replyed Alexander; Surely you have said enough to teach me that the body of this rock is possible to be taken, since you tell me that the head of it is so weak.

And presently he sent the same Oxyartes to him, to command him forthwith to give up himself, his mother, and children, and all that was dear unto him, into his hands: which Sisimithres forthwith did, and then Alexander himself taking with him 5 hundred of his silvered Targateers, went up into the rock to view the situation and strength thereof: and having offered sacrifices to Minerva and Victoria, left Sisimithres Governour of that Fort, and Country thereabouts, as he found him: giving him hope of a greater Dominion, if he carried himself well and faithfully in this; and upon the fathers request, took along with him his two sons to serve him in the wars.

Then leaving his Macedonian squadron, to take in other places which had revolted from him; himself went forward with his Horses: a steep and a rocky way it was that he went; nor had he gone far, but his Horse all grew foundred and tired with he way, and could no further follow him: and his company grew every day thinner than other. Also the young Gallants which were never wont to be from him, lay behind, all save Philip, the brother of Lysimachus; for he, wearing his corselet and other armes (a thing incredible) yet all on foot as he was, kept company with the King, though he rode, and often changed his horse, by the space of 500 furlongs: and coming into a Wood, where the enemy set upon the Kings person stept between, and rescued him out of that danger: and when those Barbarians were routed, and the Wood cleared of them, and they gone; then Philip having over-laboured himself swoned, and falling down between the Kings own hands, there died. Upon the back of this, fell another no small dolor, upon the King; Erigyius, was one of his greatest Captains, of vvhose death he had tidings before he returned into his Camp. He caused both their Funerals to be celebrated, and exequies to be performed, vvith all the honour that might be.

Spitamenes vvith a crue of three thousand vvild Scythians that follovved him, came to Gabæ, a strong tovvn of the Sogdians, standing in the middest betvveen the Sogdians and the Massagetæ: vvhom he easily persvvaded to joyn vvith him, and to fall in upon the country of the Sogdians. And Cœnus hearing of his coming, drevv out vvith his army to meet him: and upon an encounter, slevv 800 of them upon the place, and therein lost onely 25 of his Horse, and 12 of his Foot; vvhereupon the Sogdians vvho escaped, vvith some Bactrians, left him upon the vvay, and came into Cœnus.

The Massagetæan Scythians, seeing things fare so ill, pillaged all the carriages of the Bactrians and Sogdians, and accompanied Spitamenes into the Deserts of Scythia: But hearing that Alexander came after, with a purpose to follow them into those very Deserts, they took off Spitamenes his head, and sent it to Alexander, hoping hereby to make him desist from any further pursuance after them, [Arria. lib. 4.] But Curtius, [lib. 8. cap. 8.] writes, that when Alexander was not far off, Spitamenes his own wife met him, with her husbands head in her hand; which he seeing, abhorred the sight, and caused her to be turned out of the Camp, least the fœdity of such an act, remaining in the Grecians eyes, might happily work some barbarous effect also in their hearts, and efferate their minds more than they were before.

The Dahæ, hearing what was become of Spitamenes, took Dataphernes the principal author of that revolt, and delivered him up bound to Alexander, and withal submitted themselves to him; and Cœnus and Craterus, with Phratafernes, Governour of the Parthians, and Stasanor, President of the Arians, having fully executed what Alexander had set them about, returned to him, where he was at Nautaca.

b. Alexander resting his army at Nautaca, because it was now in the heart of winter, which Arrianus expresseth, by ἀκμαῖον τῦ χειμῶνος, (i. e.) in the strength of winter, set 4386.

3676 his minde to revenge the souldiers wrongs, which they had suffered through the pride and avarice of their officers, or commanders, and thereupon he gave in charge to Phrataphernes to look to Hircania, and the countries of the Mardi and Tapuri, and willed him to send him Phradates the Governor there (who had been oft sent for upon complaints made of him, but never would come) under a sufficient guard.

He removed Arsanes from the government of the Drangi, and put Stasanor in his roome, Arsace, as Curtius, Atropates, as Arianus calls him, was sent Governor into Media, to take Oxidates from thence, because, as the King thought, he stood not well affected to him. The province of Babylon, upon the death of Mazæus, was committed to Deditamenes, or, as Arrianus calls him, to Staminnes. But Sopolis and Epocillus and Menedas, were dispatcht away into Macedonia, to bring him a fresh supply of souldiers from thence.

These things thus ordered, after three moneths, he drew into the field, to march into a country called Gabaza. But the third day after, as he was upon the way, there fell such a hideous and dreadfull tempest upon him, with such an extremity of cold, that his whole army was in danger to have perished in it. Curtius in his history, [lib. 8. cap. 9, describes it to the life, both the direfullnesse of the tempest it self; and withall, the Kings constancy, in bearing it in his own person, with his wisdom and humanity, in keeping the army together, and comforting the poor weather-beaten souldiers, in that extremity: which notwithstanding he tells us, that what of the poorer sort of souldiers, what of the scullery and hangers on of the army, there perished no lesse than a thousand persons, where he addeth further, that which is remembred also by Valerius Maximus, [lib. 5. cap. 1. and by Julius Frontinus, lib. 4. Stratag. cap. 6.] that whiles Alexander was warming himself at a fire, a common souldier of the Macedons, half starved with codd, and benummed in his wits, no lesse than in his limbs, came thrusting to his fire; Alexander took him and set him down in his own chair; telling him that that should be to his good, which in Persia heretofore would have cost a man his life; to wit, to have sate down in the Kings chair.

The next day, calling his Nobles and Captains together, he caused proclamation to be made, that what ever any man had lost in that tempest, he would make it good again unto him: and he performed it to a hair, for example, Sisimithres had brought alongwith him many beasts of burden and draught, and two thousand Camels, and whole flocks of sheep and heards of beasts, which, being distributed among the army, both repaired their losse susteined, and saved them from the famine, which at that instant lay upon them, whereupon the King, declaring openly how much he was for that curtesie beholding to Sisimithres; bad every souldier take eight dayes victual with him; and then went to take in the Sacæ, who had revolted from him; and having taken all the spoile of that country, gave Sisimithres out of the spoile, thirty thousand head of cattle.

c. Alexander then took to wife Roxane, the daughter of Oxyartes; which Strabo reports to have been done, in the Rock or Fort of Sisimithres, when it was first surrendred to him, [lib. 15.] and this example of his, moved many of his Macedon Nobles to take them wives also out of the more illustrious families, of forraign nations, as Diodorus in several chapters, of his 17 book at large declareth.

And now bending his thoughts wholly to a war upon India, to the end he might leave all safe and quiet behind him, he caused out of every province some to be listed for his service, so many as to make up in all 30 thousand men, whom he purposed to carry with him into India, there to serve him both for souldiers against the enemy, and also for pledges of their fidelity whom he left behind him: then moving into Bactria, he sent Craterus with 600 of his fellow Cavaleers, and his own foot companies, as also the regiments under Polysperchon, Attalus and Alcætas, to pursue Austanes, & Catanes, who onely remained of the Rebels of Paratacene, between whom and Craterus, there was a great battle fought, wherein Catanes was slain, and Austaces taken prisoner, and brought alive to Alexander, and of their men were slain 150 horse, & about 1500 foot: which done, Craterus went into Bactria, and Polysperchon reduced the country of Bubacene to the kings obedience.

And now began Alexander to act, what he had of long time agitated in his mind, which was, to affirm to himself divine honours; and would no longer be called, onely, but also believed to be, Joves son: as if he had the soveraintie over mens hearts, as well as over their tongues, and therefore refused now to be saluted and reverenced, after the manner of the Macedons, but would be adored with prostration after the fashion of the Persian Kings: nor wanted he court flatterers, to set this wheel a going; flatterers, I say, that pest of all kings, and by whose tongues, more Kings have perished, than by the sword of their enemies, [Curt. lib. 8. cap. 12.] chief of which about him, were Agis of of Argos, the worst Versifier that ever was, next to Charilus, and Cleo of Sicilia, and Anaxarchus, a Sophister: and of them, which opposed him herein, was Calisthenes, a true Philosopher, and a Scholar of Aristotles, which cost him his life, and that which hastened it, was this.

Hermolaus, a gallant youth, and one of the Kings company of Pages, and instructed in the rudiments of Philosophy by Calisthenes, being upon a time a hunting with the King, slew a Boare, which the King himself had aimed at; whereupon the King commanded him to be had away and wipt: which he taking to heart, fell into a conspiracy, first with Sopater, the son of Amyntas, a youth like himself, and of his own rank and quality, and then with Antipater, the son of Asclepiodotus, Governour of Syria, and others of the same company of Pages, to kill Alexander: which conspiracy coming to light by the discovery of one Epimenes, one of the conspirators, they were all presently put to death. Alexander in his letters to Craterus, Alcetas, and Attalus, written at that instant, signified, that they had confessed that the conspiracy grew of themselves alone; without the setting on, or privity of any other. But in another letter, written afterward to Calisthenes, he charges him as the author of it: yea, and he glanceth, at Aristotle himself, whose Cousin Germane was mother to Calisthenes, in this manner, οἱ μὲν παῖδες, &c. (i. e.) The youths indeed, saith he, were stoned to death by the Macedons: but that Sophister I my self will punish, and those which sent him, and such also as received them that conspire against me, into their towns.

When he had seized on Calisthenes his person, he kept him in irons seven moneths, to have him judged and condemned in a Court of Justice, when Aristotle himself should be present. Now Chares the Mitilenian tells us, that at what time, Alexander was in the country of the Mallians and Oxydracans in India, and lay there of a wound received in a fight, (between which time, and the conspiracy of the Pages, there had passed upward of 17 moneths) Calisthenes being a fat man, fell there sick of the Pthiriasis, or lowsie disease, and died of it. But Aristobulus and Ptolomei, say and affirm, that the Pages confessed upon the rack, that Calisthenes had put them upon it, by his perswasions: and again, the same Ptolomei sayes that he was first racked, and afterward hanged, but Aristobulus, that he was carried about with the army in chains, and so dyed: and so we see that these great Authors, and who were themselves present in the army, and attending upon Alexander at the very time, when these things were acted, yet cannot agree about a matter, whereof there could be no doubt at all, at the time when it was done.

Amyntas being left in Bactria with 3500 horse, and 10 thousand foot, Alexander, toward the middest of the spring, as Arrianus tells us, removed with his army, from thence toward India; to make the Ocean and utmost border of the east the boundary of his Empire. And to make his whole army in their very accoustrements suitable to so great a designe, he made all their targets to be covered over with silver plates, and their horse bridles, to be made all of beaten gold; and their very corselets, he caused to be enricht, some with gold, some with silver, and the number of men, which so armed, followed him to this Indian war, amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand men.

Alexander having passed the Caucasus in ten days, came to his city of Alexandria, which he had built in Paropamisus; and put out the Governour there, for his ill behaviour in the place, and then peopled his new city with more inhabitants, out of the neighbouring countries, and such of his own Macedons as were grown unserviceable for the war, and made Nicanor, one of his, Governour of the place, but made Tyriaspes Commander of the whole region of Paropamisus, and of all that territory, or Province, as far as the river Cophene.

From thence he went to the city of Nicæa, and there offered sacrifice to Minerva, and then marched to the river of Cophene, and sending an herald, commanded Taxiles, and the rest of the Satrapes or Governours of the countries, lying between Cophene, and the river Indus, which is improperly called India, to come unto him.

Taxiles, and other petty Kings, under his government, came forth and met him, and received his commands, telling him, that he was now the third son of Jove, that had come into those parts. That as for father Bacchus and Hercules, they had onely heard of them, but that their happinesse was to see him now personally present among them, they therefore brought him large presents, promising him withall, to send him 25 Elephants, and he entertained them very graciously, and bad them attend him, purposing to use their help in his passages thorough the country. d.

But when he saw that the rest came not, he divided his army, and sent Hephæstion and Perdiccas, into the country called Pencelaotis toward the river Indus; with the armies led by Gorgias, Clitus, and Meleager, and half the company of his fellow Cavaleers, and all the mercenary horse; commanding them, to take in, by fair means or fowl, foul, all the towns which they found in their way: and that when they came to the bank of the river Indus, they should there fall to building of ships, whereby to passe over, into further countries, and with them was sent Taxiles, and other Commanders of those parts.

After, the Governour of the country of Peucelaitis offering to revolt, lost both himself and the city which he put himself into: for Hephæstion came and besieged it, and after a moneths time, took and sackt it, and killing him, made one Sangæus Governour of it, who a little before, forsaking Astes, had fled over to Taxiles, which made Alexander the more confiding in him ever after.

Alexander, with his Troup of silver Targateers, and the horse of his fellow Cavaleers, Hephæstion, and the Troup of those who were called Assateri, and his Archers, and Agrians, and Lances, marched into the country of the Aspians and Thyræans, and Arasocans; and going on his way to the river Choes (which way was, for the most part, all mountanous and rockie) and having at last passed that river, he commanded Craterus to come after him fair and softly with the Foot. And himself taking with him the whole body of his horse, and eight hundred Macedons, Targateers on horseback, marcht away a great pace, because he heard, that the people of that country were fled, some to the mountains, others to fenced cities, and all to make head against him.

Those which came fourth to oppose him, he easily routed, and beat back into the Town, upon the way wence they came out; and the townesmen, which stood all in array before their walls, he easily likewise vanquished, and made them take sanctuary within their walls again. And now was Craterus come up with the Foot: and therefore to strike the greater terrour into the minds of a nation, which knew not yet, what manner of men the Macedons were, he gave order, to spare no flesh, setting fire on the out-works which they had made; yet as he rode about the walls, an arrow came off, and shot him thorough his armor, into the shoulder, but made there no great wound; Ptolomei allso, and Leonatas, were both wounded at the same time: then Alexander, spying a place where the wall was weakest, pitched his Camp just against it, and the next day early in the morning, took the vawmure, which was of no great strength, with no great adoe; at the inner wall, the inhabitants made some resistance: But when the Macedons had once scaled the walls and the townesmen felt the arrows showring down about their ears, the souldiers within, brake out of the gates, and ran every man his way to the mountains, which were not far off, and thither many of them escaped, and saved themselves there; but the Macedons following after, overtook and slew the greater part of them: but the Townesmen that were left behind, were slain every man of them, and the city it self, laid levell with the ground.

Then, having subdued another poor base nation, he went forward, and came to the city Nisa, situate at the foot of a hill called Meros, and built in old times, as was said by Bacchus; but at the entreaty of Acuphis, the chief man of the place, who was sent unto him, with 30 other prime men, he spared the inhabitants of Nisa, and they were onely commanded to furnish him with 300 horse: which done, he restored them to their natural freedom, and suffered them to live after their own laws, and made Acuphis himself, taking along with him his son and grandchild for hostages, governour of the city it self, with all the whole province of Nisa; moreover he sacrificed there to Bacchus by the name of Dionysius, and made merry, and feasted his Nobles, and all his Macedons, and wearing garlands of Ivy on their heads, sang praise to Dionysius, with all his titles and appellations, Bacchumque vocant, &c.

Calling him Bacchus, Bromius, and Lyæus,
Born of the fire, Twice born, and not like others:
But the onely one that ever had two mothers.

As Ovid speaks of him, upon the like, though a different, occasion, 4 Metamorph. see allso Philostratus in Vita Apollonii, [lib. 2. cap. 4.] to the same purpose.

From whence he went to a country called Dadala, but all the inhabitans were gone and fled to the woods and mountains, wherefore he passed over Acadera, a country deserted by the inhabitants as the other was.

The city Ardacena being taken in upon surrender, he left Craterus there, with other Commanders of the Foot, to force such places, as voluntarily would not submit, and to order matters there, as he saw fittest for the present.

Himself, with his silver Targateers, and his Squadron of Agrians, and Cænus and Attalus their Brigadaes, and the body of his own Horse, and at most four companies of his fellow Cavaleers, and the one half of his Archers on horseback, went to the river of Euaspla, where the Governour of the Aspians lay, and, upon a great journey taken, the second day he came with his army to a city called Arigæum. But the inhabitants tants, so soon as they heard he was coming, set their city on fire, and fled to the mountains; but the Macedons followed after, and slew a vast number of them; and Ptolomei slew the Captain of them, hand to hand, and brought of his armour with him.

And now Alexander was come up with his Foot, which rode on horse-back, and they alighting, set upon the natives, and with much adoe, made them at last, flee for refuge to the mountains: and then came Craterus to him with the main body of the army; having done the errend which he was sent on, to the full: Him Alexander commanded to see Arigæum, which the inhabitants themselves had burnt, repaired: and to repeople it, with the inhabitants, of places near adjoyning, such as would, & with such Macedons, as were grown unserviceable for his wars. But himself went on, to the place whither he heard the natives were fled, and coming to the foot of a mountain, he there pitcht his Camp.

Mean while Ptolomei, who was sent a forraging, went further off, with a small Troup, to discover, and sent back word to Alexander, that there seemed to be more fires, in the enemies Camp, than there were in all his: whereupon Alexander leaving a part of his army in the Camp, went with the rest to take a view of those fires himself: and having considered well of them, he cast the company which he brought with him, into three parts; one he gave to Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, giving him the brigade of Attalus and Balacrus to attend him, the second he commanded Ptolomei to take charge of; and to him assigned a third part, of his own Argyraspides, or silver Targateers; and the brigade of Philip and Philoras, with two thousand archers, and all the Agrians, and one half of the whole Cavalrie; The third part he took to himself, and led them to a place, where he saw the greatest throng of the enemy to be. And they on the other side, confiding in their multitude, & supposing the Macedons to be but few in number, left the mountain, and came down into the plain, where after a bloody field fought, the Macedons gat the victory: Ptolomei, who led one of the three Brigadaes of Macedons, reporteth, that there were taken in that fight, upward of 40 thousand prisoners; and of cattle, above 230 thousand head, out of which, Alexander was purposed, to have culled out the principall of all kinds, because they were exceeding fair, and to have sent them into Macedon, to make a breed there, for the tillage of the ground.

3677. From thence Alexander went into the country of the Assacenians, who were said to have mustred 2 thousand Horse, 3 thousand Foot, and 30 Elephants, to encounter him. It was said also, that Assacenus, (which as it seems, was the common name which all their Kings went by) being lately dead, his mother Cleophis, commanded all at that present. 4387 327

Craterus, having finished the city, as he was commanded, brought all his corselets to Alexander, with engines of battery and other instruments for a siege if need should be. Then set Alexander forward with the Horse of his fellow Cavaleers, and his Darters on horseback, with Cœnus and Polysperchons companies, with a thousand Agrians, and Archers toward the Assacenians: marching thorough the country of the Guræans, and was much troubled in the passage of the river Guræus there. The natives hearing of his coming, durst not abide him in a body, but brake up their army, and dispersed themselves, every one as he could into several cities, purposing there to stand upon their guard.

Alexander went first with his army to Massaga the greatest City of the Assacenian country, and enclosed with a wall of 35 furlongs in compasse: there were 30 thousand men within to defend the walls, of which number there were 7 thousand mercenaries, out of the inner parts of India: These coming to a fight at the foot of a hill distant from the river Guræus some seven furlongs; were fain to flee back into their city, having lost about 2 hundred in their flight. Alexander presently drew up his maine battel of Macedons before the gates thereof, and took a Dart into his thigh from off the wall; and when it pained him, he cryed out, that they told him, he was Joves son, but that when he was wounded, he felt the pain of it like another man: adding withal, (as Plutarch in his book of Alexanders fortune writeth) when he saw the blood running down his body: a saying out of Homer in his 5 book of his Iliads, that this was blood indeed, but not Such blood as from the blessed gods doth flow.

By nine dayes end the besieged, seeing his works, the incessant labour and travel of the besiegers, what vast valleys they filled up, what towers they built, and how they made them run upon wheeles, they began to consider of it: but when their Captain was shot thorough with a Dart coming out of an engine of battery, from the Works without, their courage failed, and despairing of any longer holding out, retired into their Castle,

Castle, and from thence sent Messengers to crave pardon, and submitted. Cleophis also the Queen with a great multitude of noble Ladies, all pouring wine into golden basins, came forth unto him: and the Queen laying her young son at his feet, obtained not onely his pardon, but also to be restored to her fathers estate, and pristin fortune of his House; for which yet it was thought she was more beholding to her own beauty, than to his bounty: for men commonly said, that all that was but the fee of a nights lodging; and that she got her kingdom again, by her allurements, which she could not do with all the strength she had: whence it was, that among the Indians, she went afterward by the name of the Kings whore. In all which siege yet Alexander lost not above 25 men.

The Indians which were there, hired out of the inner parts of Indie, and in the siege, had annoyed Alexander more than all the rest; being according to the articles suffered to depart with their armes, encamped themselves about 8 hundred furlongs off from thence, whereof Alexander being advertised, grew into an implacable rage against them; and set upon them, saying, that he indeed suffered them to depart with their armes, but not that they should ever after use them against the Macedons: and they, nothing terrified with the greatnesse of their danger, lockt themselves close together, and casting themselves into a ring, took their wives and children into the midst of them: And so when the enemy came on, they withstood them in very manful wise: and the women themselves, as any of the men were slain, took up their armes, and with them went and served among the men; yet at last overborne with the numbers of the enemy, they all died in the place; And Alexander bestowed the women and the rest of the rascality which were left, upon his Troup of Horse; which act of his, blemished his glory, and stuck as a spot upon all his former noble actions in his wars.

Alexander sent Cœnus to a strong and rich City called Bazira, supposing that the inhabitants there, hearing what passed at Assacan, would have submitted, as the Aassacans had done; which yet they refused to do: but he sent Alcætas, and Attalus, and Demetrius General of the Horse, to the City Ora, and willed them to draw a wall round about it, and do no more till he came. The inhabitants made a salley upon Alcætas his quarter: but the Macedons easily put them back, and quickly mured them up on that side. And when as Alexander heard, that Abissarus would privily put in there, more of the natives to defend it; he presently sent word to Cænus, to build a strong castle upon it, and leaving a good garrison in it, which might be able, to hinder the Tillage of their ground, to returne to him with the residue of the army.

They of Bazira, seeing Cænus gone with the greatest part of his army, contemning those that were left in the Castle, drew out into the open field: where having lost 500 upon the place, and 70 more taken prisoners, the rest which returned into the city were closer shut up, and streightened than before, and not suffered to peepe out of the Gates.

Alexander took the city Ora at the first assault, and took such Elephants as he found therein: which when the inhabitant of Bazira heard, fearing to be taken, they all in the dead of the night, fled out of the gates, and got up into a Rock, called Aornus and the rest of the cities thereabout, did the like, every man with his armes: and Alexander having put Garrisons in Ora and Massaga; built up the walls of Bazira, and seised on the townes, which the Inhabitants had left.

Taxiles being dead, his son Omphis or Mophis, who had perswaded his father to submit to Alexander, sent unto him to know his pleasure, whether he should take the kingdom presently upon him, or live a private man till his coming: and though word was returned him that he should reigne, yet he forbare for the present: mean while, when Hephæstion and Perdiccas being sent to make a bridge over the river Indus, came that way, he received them with all honour, and furnished them with provisions gratis; but went not out to meet them upon the way, least he should seem to depend on any man for favour, but Alexander himself.

Alexander coming to Embolyma, a city not far distant from the Rock Aornus, left Craterus with a part of the army there, and gave him order to make provision of corne and other necessaries, for a long time, if occasion should be to stay at the siege of Aornus, and in case he should not be able to take it at the first. Himself, taking with him his Agrians and Archers, and Cænus his brigade, and out of the Macedonian Squadron, such as were of the nimblest sort, and with all best armed, and 200 of his Cavaleers, and archers on horseback 100, marched to the Rock.

The fame went that Hercules heretofore, when he was in those parts, tried to take that place, but could not, and that he was put off thence by an earthquake, which set Alexander the more on fire to take it, that therein he might be seen to out-do Hercules. The compasse of the Rock, was an hundred furlongs, and the heigth thereof sixteene, if we believe Diodor. for Arrianus sayes, that the compasse of it was a hundred furlongs; and the heighth thereof, where it was lowest, eleven; at the foot of it toward the South, ran the River Indus, not far from the head where it riseth, as [Strabo, lib. 15.] telleth us, the rest is taken up with vast bogs, and inaccessible crags: in one of which there dwelt a poor old man, with his two sons, in a cave wherein there were three beds, cut out of the Rock. Alexander promised him 80 talents, if he would shew him a way up into the Rock: whereupon he told him there was but one way; and shewed him where it was. Alexander finding there was no way but that, manned that place so strongly, that they could not possibly receive any the least relief, from without. And then setting his army to work, he cast up a mount of earth, and rubbage so high, that now he could come at least to fight with them at a small distance, and to assault them, which assault lasted nine whole dayes and nights together, without cessation. Alexander having lost many of his men, what in fighting, what in climbing the rocks (among which were Chares, and one Alexander) though he had no hope to take it, yet he made shew, as if he would not off from the siege, leaving yet the passage which led into the Rock open, for them to flee out there that would: which they perceiving, and being adawed at his constancy, and resolution, took the advantage of a darke night, and fled every man of them, by that way out of the rock.

The King, seeing no stirring there the next day, sent Balacrus to see what the matter was; and he brought word, that the enemy was all gone. Then he taking with him certain Squires of the body, and 700 of his silver Targateers, went himself first up into the rock, and then the rest of the Macedons, lending one another a hand, to climbe up, as well as they could; and then giving the word, to pursue the enemy, they did, and slew many of them in the chase: many of them also, flying over the Rocks fell and burst themselves in pieces. Alexander having conquered the places rather than the men that dwelt therein; offered yet many sacrifices, and built Altars to Minerva and Victoria, in that Rock: and leaving a Garrison there, made one Sisicoptus, al. Sisocostus, Governour of that place, and country thereabouts: which Sisocostus, came formerly out of India to Bessus in Bactria, and when Alexander had subdued it, he came in with his men unto him, and ever after served him faithfully.

Alexander removed from Aornus, and went into the country of the Assaceni; for he was told that the brother of Assacanus, the last King, with a number of Elephants, and no small company of the Inhabitants, and bordering Nations, were fled to the mountains in those parts: and when he came to the city Dirta, he found no creature there, nor in the country thereabouts.

The next day he sent out Nearchus and Antiochus, each of them commanding a thousand silver Targateers: and to Nearchus he assigned certain light armed Agrians; to the other, besides the thousand silver Targateers which he commanded, he added a thousand more of the same sort. These he sent out to scout about, and to see if they could light upon any of the natives, of whom they might enquire among other things, especially concerning the Elephants.

Himself marcht forward to the bank of the River Indus, sending an army before him to mend the wayes, without which it had been impossible for him to have got thorough them. But when he found, that the streights and narrow passages thereof were taken up by one Erix, he left Cœnus to bring after the main body of the army, by easie journeys; but himself going forward with his slingers and archers, cleared the Forest, and made a safe way for the army that came after. Diodorus calls this Indian Aphrices, and sayes, he had with him 20 thousand men, and 15 Elephants; But the Indians, whether out of a hatred to this Erix or Aphrices, or whether to ingratiate themselves with Alexander, slew him, and brought both his head and armes to Alexander: He pardoned them, but thanked them not, for example sake.

From hence, in sixteen dayes march, he came to the River Indus side; and took in the city Peuceliotes, not far from thence, upon surrender: and leaving there a Garrison of Macedons, he left Philippus to command them. He subdued also a multitude of lesser towns standing upon that River, Cophæus, and Assagetes, the Governours of that country attending on him from place to place. He understood also by some of the natives, which he had taken prisoners, that the men of that country were all gone, to Barisades, (perhaps Abisarus) and that the Elephants were left a grasing, upon the bank of Indus: whereupon he commanded them to shew him the way to the place where the Elephants were. In catching of them, two fell over the Rocks and perished; the rest were taken, and being handled, and made fit for service, were taken into his army: And having found there a wood of timber-trees, he caused it to be felled, and ships to be built thereof: which being lanched, he went in them to the bridge of Boates, which Hephæstion and Perdiccas had built for him. And they, foreseeing that they should have more Rivers than one to passe, made their ships, or boats so as they might take them asunder at their pleasure, and carry them in carts, as occasion was, and then put them together together again, besides which they built two others, of 30 oars a piece, and many more of a lesser sort.

Alexander stayed there 30 dayes to rest his army, and in that time offered magnificent sacrifices to his gods, and made pastimes and shews, both with Horse and Foot, by the river side; and then made one of his Nobles, Nicanor, Governour of all that region on this side Indus. Afterward he passed the river, by the bridge that was made at Peucolaites (as Strabo saith, lib. 15.) with his army, end there sacrificed again to his gods, after his own country manner. Now that Alexander came into the Region which lies between the Indus, and the river Hydaspes, in the beginning of the spring, is testified by Aristobulus, who was then with him, vouched by Strabo [lib. 15. pag. 691.]

c. And now, was Alexander 30 furlongs off, when Omphis the son of Taxiles, with an army all in arms, and Elephants disposed by equal distances among the companies, met him, and at first Alexander, not well knowing whether he came as a friend or a foe, prepared for a fight; but Omphis, finding Alexanders error, caused his army to make a stand, set spurs to his horse, and went all alone to Alexanders presence, and rendred both himself and kingdom, (which yet was not much bigger than Egypt) into his hands. And when Alexander asked him, whether he had most labourers or souldiers in his kingdom, he answered, that having a war to maintain against two Kings, he must of necessity keep more souldiers, than labourers in his kingdom. Those enemies of his, were Abisarus and Porus, who reigned on the other side of the river Hydaspes; Omphis, upon Alexanders permission, took upon him the title and habit of a King, and withal, after the manner of his country, the name of Taxiles, for that name goes with the kingdom, whoever gets it.

The city Taxila, from whence the King takes his name, is the greatest of all other, lying between the rivers of Indus and Hydaspes: all the inhabitants whereof, as well as himself, entertained Alexander very joyfully. Upon the fourth day after his arrival there, Omphis let him know what corn he furnished Hephæstion with all for his army, and presented both him and all his Nobles, with Crowns of pure gold, and moreover upon Alexander himself, he bestowed 30, as Arrianus, or 56 Elephants, as Curtius saith, and with a multitude of goodly cattle, three thousand Oxen, and upwards of ten thousand sheep. Arrianus addeth, that he sent him also seven hundred Indian Horse, and 200 talents of silver, whereas Curtius mentions onely 80 talents of silver in sowes.

Alexander was infinitely taken with this entertainment of his, and sent him back his 200 talents of silver again, with a thousand talents more of his own, and many a cupbord of plate for his table besides, both of gold and silver, with a great deal of Persian attire, and 30 Horses which were for his own saddle, and furniture of his own, thereunto belonging: which liberality of his, as it much pleased and obliged Omphis, so it infinitely offended his nobles, among which, Meleager, sitting at supper, and being somewhat high flowen with wine, told him, that he was very glad, to see that he found a man here in India, whom he thought worthy of a thousand talents. Alexander remembring what penance he had done for Clitus, forbare revenge, onely he said, That envious men were nought else but their own tormentors.

The next day, Abisarus, King of the Indian mountainers, sent his own brother to him, with other Ambassadors, to present him with monies, and Elephants, and to submit both him and all that he had to his disposing and pleasure, and Alexander having made a firm league with him, sent them back again unto him. Ambassadors also came to him from Doxareus, a Governour in those parts, with presents from him.

In the country of Taxila, Alexander again offered his usual sacrifices, and made shews and games of exercises both by Horse and Foot. And, leaving Philippus the son of Machates, Governour in those parts, and a Garrison in the city and country of Taxila, left there also such other of his army, as through any infirmity were grown unserviceable, and then removed toward the river Hydaspes.

And now supposing that Porus upon the fame of his name might easily be drawn to submit unto him, sent a message to him by Cleochares, to require tribute of him, and to command him to meet him at the border of his kingdom. Porus answered, that the one of these two things he would not faile to do, which was, to meet him at the first entrance of his kingdom, but it should be, in warlike manner.

There was another Porus, King also of a neighboring nation of India, his nephew, who for the hatred which he bare to his Uncle, sent Ambassadors to Alexander, and offered himself and all his kingdome to do him service.

Alexander sent back Cænus to the river Indus, with charge, to take in pieces, the ships that were there made, and to bring them over land in Carts unto him, so the lesser sort of them, were divided into two parts, and the greater into three, and all to be brought to the river Hydaspes.

There putting them together again, and lanching them, he with his army returned to Taxila, and there having gotten five thousand Indians, which Taxiles and others had brought him, he returned to the bank of Hydaspes. And upon the way, Barzaentes, sometimes Governour of the Drangians, and procurer of the revolt of the Arachosians, being taken prisoner, together with 30 Elephants of his, was delivered into his hands. This prise fell pat, for his war against the Indians, who trusted more in their beasts, for the most part, than in their men. Gamaxus also, a petty King in those parts, and a confederate of Barzaentes, was taken, and brought bound unto him. Both were committed, and the Elephants taken into his service, and delivered to Taxiles, al. Omphis, and then he went forward, and came to Hydaspes, where he caused Barzaentes, for his old treason against his master Darius, to be put to death, as we find by Arrianus [lib. 3. pag. 72.]

Porus lay encamped on the other side of the river Hydaspes, to stop Alexanders passage, a man of a huge statue, and a mind answerable thereunto, for it is said, that he was five cubids high, and vantage: though Plutarch say, that he was but four cubits high: and a hand breadth: but so thick in the bulk, that his coat of armour was twice as big as any other mans. He rode upon an Elephant, higher than all the rest, on which he sate, like an ordinary man on Horse-back. Curtius sayes, that in the forefront of his battle, he placed 80 huge Elephants: whereas Diodore sayes, he had 13. And Arrianus, that he had upwards of 200. Chariots he had 300, and 30000 Foot, in his army. Diodorus reports, that he had above 1000 Chariots, and 50000 thousand Foot: though Plutarch gives him but 20000, but then he allows him 2000 Horse, Diodore, 3000, and Arrianus 4000, by him brought into the field. The river Hydaspes ran between the two armies, and Porus with his Elephants, appearing alwayes in the head of his army, lay ready to hinder the passage of Alexander, and Alexander caused noises dayly to be made in his army, to make the like noises, from the Barbarians more usual, and therefore lesse terrible to his men, and after a while, in a tempestuous dark night, he put over certain of his Foot, and choicest Horse, a great way up the river, into a small Island, whence in the midst of a tempest of rain, and thunder, and lightning, and whirl-winds, though, he saw sundry of his men strook dead in the place, and others sore hurt there with, yet over he would, and land he hid on the other side. The river, swollen with the rain, foundred, and brake down the banks in many places, with the swiftnesse of his course, and the water withall brake in between. Alexander got on land, where he could hardly stand, for the slabbinesse of the ground, and gulfs, occasioned by the breaking in of the river, between which the Macedons perceiving, they also forced themselves to land, being up to the very arme pits in water.

Having passed the water, he with the Horse, gat some 20 furlongs before the Foot, and there put to flight a thousand of the enemies Horse, and 60 Chariots, which he lighted on: The Chariots he took every one, with 400 of their Horse. Now Porus finding that Alexander was gotten over, fell upon him with all his army, save onely such as he left to attend the body of the Macedonian army, where they stood ready to passe. Alexander fearing the multitude of the enemy, and their Elephants, fell himself upon the one wing of them, and commanded the rest to do the like upon the other. And when the natives being hard laied to any where, retired alwayes in a body to the Elephants, as to a place of refuge, the fight grew confused every where, and scantly could he rout and make them turn their backs and fly, till two a clock in the after noon: and this is the relation of this fight made by Alexander in his own letters.

The former of these two fights, wherein he slew 400 horse, and took 60 Chariots, Aristobulus saies, was with Porus his son, adding, that he was slain in that encounter. But Ptolomei makes the forces which were sent out with Porus his son, to have been twice as many, as Alexander in his letter mentions; for he sayes, that he came out at that time, with two thousand Horse, and 120 Chariots, as for the latter, which was fought with Porus himself, and which Alexander doth but touch. Arrianus describeth it more at large: and concerning the number slain in both the battles, he thus writeth. There were slain (saith he) of the Indian Foot, little lesse than twenty thousand, and of their Horse three thousand, all their Chariots were scattered, two of Porus his sons slain. Spitarches also, who commanded all that region of India, and all the Captains, both of the Elephants and Chariots, and of his Horse and Foot, died in the battle: and the Elephants, which were not killed in the fight, were all taken of Alexanders foot, which were to the number of 6000. in the first encounter, there were lost but 80 at the most, of the archers on horse-back, which gave the first onset, there were slain 10, of his fellow Cavaleers 20, and of the rest of the horse 200 with which we may compare the accompt which Diodorus makes: there died, saith he, of the Indians, upward of 12000, and among them, Porus his two sons, and all the chief Commanders of his army, and bravest Captains that he had: But prisoners there were taken 9000, and 80 Elephants. Of the Macedon Horse were slain 280, and somewhat more than 700 Foot.

When Porus was taken, Alexander asked him how he lookt to be used, and he answered, Like a King, Alexander asked him again, whether he would ought else, and his answer was, that word, Like a King, comprehends all, whereupon Alexander, seeing his noble and royal disposition, used him accordingly, and took him into the number of those whom he called his friends, and restored him to his kingdom again, which, reaching from Hydaspes to the bank of the river Acesives, contained in it 300 cities; witnesse [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 698.]

Arrianus sheweth, that these things fell out, θέρα ἐτυς ῆ: (i.e. in that season of the year, when the sun declined from the summer solstice: at which season, the greatest rains usually fall in India, and swell the river Hydaspes, which in the midst of winter a man may wade over, [lib. 5. pag. 107.] with which Jacobus Capellus compares another place of his, [lib. 7. pag. 163.] where he writes the like of the River Euphrates: saying, that it is foordable in the winter; but ἦρος ὑποφαίνοντ۞: (i.e.) when the spring approaches, and much more, when the sun returns from his summer tropick, it grows deep, and runs all over his banks. For whereas the Grecians call the four Seasons of the years by the common name of τροπαὶ, or conversions, or Tropics; well may they which divide the year but into two parts, to wit, Summer and Winter, reckon their Summer conversion from the vernal, and their Winter one, from the autumnal equinoctial: Whereupon it is, that Arrianus, speaking after the Eastern manner, saith, ἦρος ὑποφαίνοντ۞: (i.e.) the Spring approaching; and much more after the aquinoctium, which is the entrance with them, into the summer season, the rain there began to fall, and the waters to rise. Now concerning those Indian Regions, Aristobulus, was an eye-witnesse of them, (as being at that present with Alexander at the River Hydaspes.) ἅ ἔαρ۞ ἀρχομένε: (i.e.) that at the beginning of the Spring, the rains began to fall, and so grow stronger from day to day: as we read in [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 114.]

And that this battle was fought between the vernal equinoctial, and the summer solstice, Arrianus plainly shewes, where he sayes, τῶτο τὸ τέλ۞ τῆς μάχης, (i.e.) This was the end of the battle, fought by Alexander against Porus and his Indians, on the other side of the river Hydaspes, in the year when Hegemon was L. Chancelor of Athens, in the moneth Munichion: which in that year answered almost entirely to our moneth of May, according to the Julian Calendar: for that the summer solstice, was not till Alexander came to the river Acesines, I shall hereafter shew out of Nearchus.

Alexander was glad of this victory, which opened him the way to the utmost borders of the East, and thereupon, caused all his men that fell in the battle to be honourably interred; sacrificed to the Sun, as the giver of this victory, and made games and enterludes, both on foot and horseback at the river Hydaspes, near the place where he first put over: and because there was in that place, exceeding store of all manner of provisions, therefore he stayed there 30 dayes, to rest his wearied companies: And moreover to hearten up his souldiers for the remainder of this war, he called them together, and in an harangue unto them, commended their prowesse and vallour, and told them, that all the force of India was quasht by that one dayes work of theirs, that all the rest, was but a rich spoile for them to take; he gave the cheif commanders of his army crownes to weare; and to every one of them 1000 peeces of gold, honouring and rewarding every one of the rest according to his place, desert, and quality in the army. And as concerning the Trophie which he there erected, you may see, [Philost. l. 2. and Apollon. c. ult.]

Now because Alexander had a purpose, so soon as he should set foot upon Indian ground, to go see the Ocean Sea, he therefore went in hand here, to set his shipwrights on work, the rather, for that in the Emodian hills adjoyning, there was abundance of tall Fir trees, with some store of Cedar and Pine trees among, and other timber, all fit for shipping: but when they went to felling, they found there Serpents, great store, of an exorbitant bignesse, and some of them 16 cubits long: There were also found in those woody mountains, Rhinocerotes, a rare beast to be found in other countreys: with sundry kindes of Apes, infinite in number, and of an unusual bignesse of body; whereof the Macedons upon a time espying a multitude, ranged on the side of a hill, in a kind of array like souldiers, thought at first that they had been an enemy, and thereupon cried out, arme, arme; and set themselves in a posture to fall upon them: untill Taxiles, who was then with Alexander, told them what they were, and so that fray ended, [Strabo, l. 15. p. 698, 699.]

Alexander built here two Cities, on each side the Hydaspes: the one on this side the river, at the place where hee passed; the second on the other side, where where hee fought the battle; This from the victory there gotten against the Indians, he called by a Greek name, Nicæa. The other he called Bucephalis, or Bucephalia, from his horse Bucephalus, for he died there, not of any wound received in the fight (as some, and among the rest, A. Gellius [lib. 5. cap. 2.] would have it) but spent with travel and very age, for he was then 30 years old; as besides Arrianus, one Sicritus himself, cited by Plutarch, testifieth: And the King made him a solemne funeral, and a Monument; and there built a City round about it; saith Pliny, [lib. 8. cap. 42.] Near to which Cities it was, as Strabo noteth, that he built his Navy for the Ocean, [lib. 15. pag. 698,] upon the Hydaspes, which ran between the two kingdoms of Porus and Taxiles, both whose help and great industry, he used in building this fleet, as Curtius, [l. 9. c. 7.] observeth.

Alexander leaving Craterus there, with a part of his army, to finish the buildings of these two Cities, and to wall them, went further into India, against those, who bordered upon Porus his kingdom, which by Aristobulus are called Glaucanicæ; but by Ptolomeus, Glausæ; taking one half of his fellow Cavaleers along with him, and the choicest men out of every Squadron, with all his Archers on Horseback, and his Squadron of Agrians, and other Archers. In this voyage, 37 Cities gave themselves up into his hands; the least of which, had 5 thousand inhabitants in it, and many 10; besides a multitude of townes and villages, which were no lesse populous than the Cities themselves: all which he laid to Porus his kingdom; and having made Taxiles and him good friends, sent Taxiles back into his own kingdom again.

At the same time came Ambassadors from Abisarus to Alexander; promising to be wholy at his command, provided that he would not command him to yeild up his person to him: for that he would neither live without a kingdom, nor reign if he were enslaved to another man: whereupon Alexander sent him back word, that seeing he would not come to Alexander, Alexander with his army would take the pains to go to him, to his great cost. There came also Ambassadors to him from those Indians which lived as free States, and from an other Porus, King of Indians likewise.

Phrataphernes, Governour of Parthia and Hircania, came at this time to Alexander, with such Thracians, as he had left with him: there came also messengers to him from Sicicus Governour of the Assacenians, to tell him, that they having murdered his L. President, had revolted from him. Against these he dispatcht away Philippus and Tyriespes with an army, willing them to suppresse the rebellion of the Assacenians, and keep that Province in order. About which time also, Cleophis the Queen of the Assacenians bare Alexander a son, which bare his name, and was afterward King of that country, [Justin. lib. 12. cap. 7. with Curtius, lib. 8. cap. 20.]

That other Porus, nephew to him whom Alexander had overcome; for very fear, not so much of Alexander, as of his Uncle Porus, left his kingdom, and fled into the country of the Gangaridæ; taking with him as many as he could get to follow him, that were fit to bear armes.

d. Alexander with his army put over Acesives, a violent River, and which was 15 furlongs broad. they who had bladders made of skins, to use, did well enough: but they which put over in boates, dashing many times upon the rocks in the way, brake them, and lost themselves, as Arrianus out of Ptolomei reports, [lib. 5. pag. 115.] But Alexander left Cœnus with his Brigade, on the hither side, to provide for the passage of such as were making provisions of corn and other things for the army, against they should come thither.

Nearchus, who was then himself in the army, sayes, (cited by Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 692.) that whereas Alexander had first encamped by the River side, he was fain to remove his Camp afterward to a higher ground, for the overflowing of the water; and that this happened about the Summer solstice: and Arrianus confirms as much, in his [Indica, pag. 171.] where he saith, that Alexanders army ran away from the River Acesives, when the water thereof, at Midsummer came and overflowed all the country.

Here were Woods of a vast extent, and shady trees, of a wondrous bulk, and strange high: some 70 cubits high; and so thick, that 4 men could hardly fathom them, and cast a shadow, 3 acres, or 300 foot off; their limbs, for the most part, like huge beams bowing downward to the ground, grew from thence up again, not as from the same bough, but as if it were out of a new root: of which kind we may read more in [Pliny, lib. 12. cap. 5. and Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 694.] where he saith out of Aristobulus, that under one of these trees, 50 men might sit at dinner.

Here also was great store of Serpents, which were but small of body, but of divers and curious colours, and so deadly biting, that it caused sudden death to any that was bitten by them. The Macedons therefore, to prevent this danger, hung their beds from the limbs of the trees, and so slept above ground, what they could sleep, which was but little, till at length they learnt a remedy of it, from the country people, which was was a root, which they shewed them to take, if any man happened to be bitten.

From hence Alexander dismissed Porus, to return into his own kingdom, with charge to return, with an army of the choicest and ablest Indians, that he could make, and with such Elephants, as he had; and then passed the deserts, and came with his army, to the river Hyarotis, al. Hydraotes, another river of India, as broad as the Acesines, but not so violent altogether, as that is, leaving garrisons every were, as he went, in couvenient places, that so Craterus and Cænus might safely come unto him, with corn which they were to take up, in all places where they came: and then committing part of his army to Hephæstion, to wit, two squadrons of Foot, and both his own, and Demetrius his Cornets of Horse, and half his Archers, sent them into the country of that Porus, which was fled away, and bad him assign it over to his friend King Porus; and if he found any other Indian nation, bordering upon the river Hyarotis, which lived as free states, he should lay them all to Porus his kingdom, himself passed the Hyarotis, but with lesse trouble, than he had done the Acesines.

To this river there was adjoyning a grove of shadie trees, not usually seen in other parts, and wild Peacocks, flying up and down therein. But the King going still forward, took in sundry other nations, some upon surrender, and some by force; others he was fain to run after, and overtake, and make them yield unto him.

Mean while, Alexander was told, that there were other Indian states, and a people called the Cathæans, who intended to bid him battle, if he came into their coasts; and they dealt with other free states of India likewise, to confederate with them in this action: as also another nation of those parts called Oxidracans, and the Mallians, against whom, a little before, Abisarus and Porus with their joynt armies, and many other confederate Indians, went, but could do no good upon them, and so returned: but the place where they purposed to abide his coming, was said to be Sangalæ, a city of the Cathæans, and a great one too, as in those parts; and compassed about, not only with a wall, but also with a bog. These Cathæans are by Polyænus [lib. 4. stratag.] called Calthæi, and by Diodorus, Cathari, who sayes that it was made a law, by the common consent of all these nations, that if the husband died, the wife should be buried with his Corps; which very thing is observed by Strabo, of the Cathæans, [lib. 15. pag. 699.]

Alexander, going into these parts, came the second night to a city called Pimprama. That nation of the Indians are called Adraistæ, and by Diodorus Andrastæ, who presently came in and yielded upon conditions.

Alexander, resting his souldiers there the next day, on the third day, marched to Sagala, where the Cathæans, and their fellows, expecting his coming, stood all ranged in battle array upon the rising of a hill before the city, having instead of a trench, placed before them, three rows of Chariots lockt close together. But their Chariots being quickly dispersed by Alexander, they all presently fled back into the city, where Alexander forthwith fell to besiege them, and cast up a double trench round about the city, save where the bog hindred them. And there he set Ptolomei, with three thousand of the silver Targateers, all the squadron of Agrians, and one company of Archers, to guard that quarter: moreover he set all the Chariots which he had taken athwart that passage, to hinder them from flying. The inhabitants indeavouring, in the fourth watch of the night, to flee away, fell upon those Chariots, and were beaten back by Ptolomei, who slew 500 of them, and made them retreat within their gates again. Mean while Porus came to him, with the rest of his Elephants, and five thousand Indians; and now his Engines of battery were fitted, and approached to the wall. The Macedons therefore not having quite battered the inner wall, but onely undermined a vaumure made of brick, and reared their ladders round about, took the city by assault, wherein were slain 17 thousand souls, and taken 70 thousand more, three hundred Chariots, five hundred Horses. Alexander lost in all this siege, not passing 100 men, but there were hurt, some 1500 more, among which was Lysimachus, one of the squires of the body.

Alexander, burying his dead after the Macedonian manner, sent Perdiccas with a sufficient company to ravage and plunder all the country thereabout, but sent Eumenes the secretary, (to wit, that Eumenes, secretary sometime to King Philip, and whose life, Plutarch and Probus have both written) with 300 Horse, to two cities, which had confederated with those of Sangala; that, offering them pardon, he should receive them to mercy; but the townesmen, hearing what was done at Sangala, were fled all out of the town, before he came: whereupon as many as were not able, thorough infirmity, to follow the rest, were by him taken and slain, to the number of five hundred, but Alexander despairing to overtake the rest, returned to Sangala, and utterly destroyed it.

Then

Then vvent he to besiege another strong tovvn, into vvhich a multitude of people, out of other vveaker places vvere gathered; but vvhen they vvithin, craved his mercy, and opened him their gates, he pardoned them; and taking hostages of them, he marched avvay to the next tovvn, vvhich vvas a very great one, and full of people. There he caused the hostages vvhich he received to be presented before the vvalls; which when they within knew, (as being neighbours children, they could not but know them) they desired to speak with them; and the hostages telling them what a merciful man Alexander was, and how dreadful withal to his enemies, easily perswaded them to yeild unto him; and now the report that was cast abroad of Alexander, that he went about, more like a robber, than a Conqueror, was altered; and the rest of the cities, gave up themselves, without holding up either sword or buckler against him, [Curt. lib. 9. cap. 2. Polyc. Stratag. lib. 4. in Alexan. sect. 30.]

From hence he went into the kingdom of Sopithes, who was of a goodly stature, above all the men of those parts; for he was more than 4 cubits high; and coming out of his chief City, with his two sons, both of full age, he delivered up into Alexanders hand, his golden rod, all set with Berills: and resigned to him, himself, his children, and all his kingdom. And having received his kingdom again from his hand, a few days after he feasted Alexander and all his army in a sumptuous manner. And having presented Alexander himself with many great and costly gifts; he gave him also 150 Indian dogs, which were, as was said, of a mixt kind, between dogs and tigers, and of a wonderful strength and courage: for proof whereof, there were four of them presently set upon an exceeding great Lion, [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 700. Elia. Histor. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 1.]

Mean while Hephæstion, returned to him, with such companies as he carried out; having subdued countries of the Indians far and near where ever he came: and Alexander thereupon spared not to honour him with all deserved praises, before the army.

Leaving Sopithes in his kingdom as he found him, Alexander went forward still to the next nation, where Phegeus was King, and when all the inhabitants there welcomed the Macedons, and Phegeus himself, went out to meet Alexander with gifts and presents; submitting himself wholy to his pleasure: Alexander re-established him in his kingdom, and being roially entertained with all his army, stayed there two whole dayes.

Upon the third day he departed from thence, and came to the River Hyphasis, al. Hypanis, which is 7 furlongs over, and 6 fathom deep: and being besides very rocky under water, was very difficult to passe; and being informed by Phegeus of such things as he desired, he found that on the other side the river, there was a vast Desert of 11 or 12 dayes journey; and at the end thereof, the River Ganges, the greatest of all India; that beyond that there dwelt sundry nations; The Gaugaridæ, al. Gongaridæ, and Prasians, al. Præsidians, al. Præsieans, al. Pharrasians, al. Tabræsians, for by all these different names they go. That the King was called Agrammes, (Diodor. calls him Xagrames,) that his army was 20000 Horse, and 200000 Foot, and 2000 Chariots, and 3 or (as Diodorus saith) 4000 Elephants, all trained up and fitted for the war.

When these things seemed incredible to Alexander, he had further speech with Porus about it; Porus told him, that the force and power of that King and kingdom was indeed very great, and no lesse than was spoken of: But that the King that now there was, was a base-born thing, and no better than a poor barbers son, hated and scorned by his subjects. And one Androcottus, who vvas then but a youth, and had not onely seen Alexander, but also for a certain saucy prank played vvith him, vvas commanded to be put to death, and had died for it, had he not took himself to his heeles, as Justin, [lib. 15. cap. 4.] tells us, vvas vvont aftervvard to say, That Alexander missed but a little of getting all that country into his hands, for that the King there at that time, vvas so vvicked, so base, so hated, and so much scorned of his people.

Here Alexander began to consider vvith himself, that his souldiers vvere all tired out and spent vvith the length of the vvar; and that novv every man began to look for an end of these dangers, with a reward and fruit of all their labours; for they had now been eight whole years (for so long it was since he came first to be King) in a continual perilous and laborious war. And it then fell out withal, that for 70 dayes together, there poured down from heaven, nothing but fearful storms of rain, with lightnings and thunders upon them; as we read in Diodorus: whereupon, as the same Diodorus saith, to pacifie the souldiers mindes, he gave them leave to plunder a most rich and plentiful country of the enemies, and to take all to themselves. And whiles they were busie at this work, he called together their wives and children, and made there an ordinance, that the wives should receive their monethly allowance in corn, and their children the same wages, that their fathers did.

When

When the souldiers were returned home loden with wealth and riches, the King called them all together, unto whom he made almost a set speech, to request them to accompany him cheerfully to the conquest of the Gangaridæ, unto whom Cænus the son of Polemocrates, made an answer in the name of the whole army, and concluded, that they all desired an end of the war. And when the Macedons would in no wise listen to his desires, yet as Ptolomei reports, he went on, and offered sacrifice for a passage over: and when the entrailes portended all direfull things, if he proceeded, he then called together his friends, and such as were the ancientest, and of greatest familiarity with him, and told them first, and afterwarward declared to all, the army that since all things seemed to be adverse to his proceeding any farther, he was now content and resolved to return.

Yet Pliny, very improbably, will needs have it, that notwithstanding all this, he passed the river Hypanis, and erected altars on the other side thereof, [lib.6.c.17.] for that which followes in the same place; to wit, That the Kings own letters do confirme as much, I conceive that those words refer not to his passing over the river Hypanis or Hypasis, but to that which went before, concerning the order and distance of his removals and journeys from place to place, described and set down by Diognetus and Bæton, his two principal Harbengers, and Camp-masters: For who can believe that Alexander alone, without his army, and without any purpose of going any further, would offer to passe such a dangerous river as that was, or if he would that the enemy which attended him on the other side, would not have set upon him, and hindred him in his work, especially, seeing that Strabo, [lib.15.pag.700.] noteth, that he went no further Eastward, to wit, because he was forbidden to passe the river Hypanis or Hypsasis, and Plutarch also tells us, that in his time, the Kings of the Prasiæans or Prasians, passing the river westward, worshiped those Altars, which Alexander then set up, and did Sacrifice upon them, after the Grecian manner.

Wherefore manifest it is, that Alexander, dividing his army into several companies, caused 12 altars to be built all of square stone on the hither side of the river Hypanis, and not on the further; each of which alters was 50 cubits high, and like to so many great towers, and of a greater bulk than towers use to be of, upon which, having offered sacrifices after the Grecian mode to his gods, he presented them also with games of all sorts, wrestling, and dancing, and sports on horseback: Then made he his Camp three times greater in every respect than it was ever wont to be: his trenches 50 foot broad and 40 foot deep, and of the earth cast up out of the ditch, drew a reasonable wall also, round about the trench: He commanded his foot also, that in their several tents they should set up two bedsteads, each of them 5 cubits high: and the horsemen, that they, besides such beds, should also in their tents make mangers for their horses, as bigge again as at other times; with armes, and horse bitts, and other furniture belonging to them, after the same proportion, and to hang them up, and leave them behind them, to abuse posterity, with an imaginary belief of his greatnesse: concerning the inscriptions and titles of his altars, we may see more in [Philostratus, his life of Apollonius.]

These things thus done, he returned by the same way he came to the river Hydraotes: which having passed, he came back to Acesines.

There found he this City ready built, by Hephæstion, whom he left to do it, and thither he drew such of the neighbouring places as would, and of his mercenary souldiers, as many as were growen unfit for the war, to store it with inhabitants.

Arsaces, who ruled all in the province, bordering upon the kingdom of Abisarus, and the brother of Abisarus, and his associates came to Alexander; and brought him presents, such as were of greatest esteeme in those parts, and 30 Elephants sent from Abisarus, telling him Abisarus would have come to him, had it not been for a sicknels which then held him: and when such messengers as Alexander sent to him, at their returne affirmed as much, and that he was sick indeed, he was easily perswaded of the truth of his excuses; and thereupon made Abisarus Governour under himself of that province, and made Arsaces subject unto him: and appointing what tributes they should pay, offered sacrifice again at the river Acesines.

Having passed the Acesines, he came to Hydaspes, where he repaired, by the help of his souldiers, what ever the overflowing of that unruly river had demolished in his two Cities lately there built, Nicæa, and Bucephalis: for because that from the time that he went from thence, till his now return thither again, it had done nothing else but raine, especially the Etesian or yearly winds at that season blowing, as Aristobulus saith, cited by Strabo. [lib.15.pag.691.] And so it fell out, that together with that rain, which continued for 70 dayes space, there fell also horrible tempests of thunders and lightenings, as I shewed before out of Diodorus.

Alexander,

Alexander, when he had caused a multitude of ships, what of two, what of three stages high, to be built, and rigged, upon the Hydaspes, besides others, for the passage of his Horse and Foot over the river, he resolved to fall down from thence, into the southern Ocean; and for that purpose gathered all the Phœnicians, Cypriots, Carians, and Egyptians which followed his Camp together, and put them aboard his ships.

At the same time died Coenus, one of his best, and bosom friends, whose death he much lamented, and caused him to be enterred with all honour and sumptuousnesse, which that time and place afforded, yet not forgetting the speach which he made in the armies behalf, for a return, gave him this biting taunt, That had he known how short a time he had to live, he would never have made so long an oration to that purpose.

Then came to him new supplies out of Greece, as well auxiliaries, as mercenary souldiers, under their several Commanders, to wit, 30 thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse: bringing with them besides, rich arms, for 25 thousand Foot, and 100 talents in Apothecary stuff for medecines, as Diodorus noteth: and Curtius [lib.9.cap. 5.] Memnon also brought him out of Thracia, six thousand horse, besides those which came from Harpalus, and seven thousand Foot, and 25 thousand arms, in-laid with silver and gold, which he caused to be distributed in the army, and the old ones to be burnt.

Now that Harpalus, which Curtius tells us, sent a supply unto him, was none other, but he, whom Alexander had trusted with the keeping of his tributes, and treasure in the city and province of Babylon, and whome he had left, ἐπιμελητὴν, (i.e.) his overseer, and Procurator, or L. Steward of all that country, as Plutarch in Alexand. writeth, yet left he the rule and government of it to Mazeus, who had delivered it up into his hand; and when he died, Ditamenes succeeded him in that charge. Though Diodorus calls this Harpalus, the President of that province, in his History of [year 2. 113 Olympiade] upon which now we are: where he further tells us, that he, hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, gave himself over to all kind of intemperance and luxury, sparing for no cost. And first, saith he, he fell to committing of all manner of whordom and luxury with the women kind of that country, and then laying it on, upon all other sorts of unseemly and unseasonable delights and pleasures: he made havock of the Kings monies, committed to his charge; and took order for sundry sort of fish to be brought unto him, from as far off as the red sea, and was so lavish in his feasting, and usual diet, that every man cried shame of him, for it, and sent for a noted strumpet, Pythonice by name, from as far as Athens, and when she died, for another from the same place, called Glycera: whereof Theopompus, complained in a letter of his to Alexander, telling him, he spent above 200 talents, in making two tombs for Polynice, when she died, one at Athens, and another at Babylon it self, and that he dedicated a Grove, and an Alter, and a Temple to Pythonice, by the name and title of Venus Pythonica, and that he set up Glyceraes statue in brasse, at Tarsus in Syria, and gave her leave to have her habitation in the Kings own palace, commanded the people to call her by the title of, and reverence her as, a Queen, [Athenaus lib. 13. cap. 23.]

The like did Cleander, Sitacles, and Heracon, in Media, all hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, and in assurance thereof, fell to plundering of private mens estates, and pulling down of Temples, ravishing the young virgins, of the noblest families, with many other kinds of vilanies, upon the goods and persons of the subject; insomuch, that the very name of a Macedon grew odious to all nations, for their avarice and luxury in all kinds. But above all, Cleander, who having first ravished a noble Virgin himself, gave her afterward to his slave for his whore, [Curt. lib. 10. cap. 1. Arria. lib. 6. pag. 142.]

Alexander, preparing for his voyage into the Ocean, and seeing old grudges kindling afresh between Porus and Taxiles, made them friends again, and linked them together by bonds of affinity, which he procured to be made between them before he went, and then sent them away each to his own kingdom. And for Porus, he not onely made him king of all the countries lying between Hydaspes and Accsines, as before, but also, of all the free states, which he had subdued between the rivers of Acesines, and Hypanis, which were several nations, and in them, cities above two thousand, as in Arria. [lib. 6. pag. 124.] others reckon in that space 15 several nations, and in them, great cities, to the number of 5000, besides towns and villages to them belonging, as [Plutarch in Alexand.] And the truth is, that the region lying between Hydaspes and Hypanis, conteineth now more than nine nations, but there were therein 5000 cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in Meropis, as Strabo, out of Apollodorus, who wrote of the affairs of Parthia, reports, [lib. 15. pag. 686.] who yet in his own opinion thinks, that in this reckoning, he did overlash; saying, δοξῶ δὲ, (i.e.) it seemeth, that this number is put a little Hyperbolically, and therefore Pliny draws this number to the cities, which he subdued in all India, [lib. 6. cap. 17.] in these words. These who were with Alexander in his voyage report, that in that tract of India which he subdued, there were 5 thousand towns and cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in the compasse of 9 nations. Philippus, one of his company of Nobles attending him, and who was by him made Lord and Governour of a Country beyond the River Indus.

The Horse of the City Nisæa, were sent back: Craterus and Hephæstion, were commanded to march before him into the capital City of Sopithes his kingdom, and there to attend the coming of the Fleet; Craterus held on, upon the right hand of the Hydaspes with a part of the Horse and Foot, and Hephæstion on the left, with the remainder and far greater part of the whole army, and 2 hundred Elephants. The whole army at this time consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with those which he brought from the sea coast. And now they returned to him also, whom he sent to levy fresh companies, bringing with them men of divers nations, and diversly armed, [Arria. lib. 6. and in his Indica. pag. 181.] and Plutarch sayes, that at this time he had 120 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse.

Curtius sayes, that this Navy was one thousand ships, of which Diodorus sayes, 200 were open, the rest were of the nature of Row-barges, as Diodorus saith. Arrianus, in his Indica, saith he had but 8 hundred in all, some for carriage of horses, the rest of loading for corne and other provisions, but of all sorts, amounting to little lesse than two thousand.

Ammiral of this fleete, was Nearchus, born in Creete, and Euagoras of Corinth Purser to it; but of Alexanders own ship wherein he went, was Master or Steeresman, one Onesicritus, an Astypulæan born, and Arrianus in his Indica, sets down the Master of every particular Ship.

This done, Alexander sacrificed to his country gods, and such other as the Priests advised him to: and among the rest, to Neptune, and to Amphitrite, and to the Nereides or sea Nymphs; and above all, to the Ocean it self, and to the River Hydaspes from whence he set forth; as also to the River Acesines, into which the Hydaspes falls, and to the river Indus, which receives them both. Also he proclaimed several sorts of Games, of Musick, and Wrestling, and the like, with Prizes, for such as would put in for them; distributing beasts, for every company to sacrifice by themselves.

In the morning, the army went aboard, to wit, the silver Targateers, and Archers, and such of the Horsemen as were called his nobles or friends, amounting to the number of 8 thousand, not many dayes before the setting of the Pleiades, as [Strabo, lib. 15.] out of Aristobulus, sheweth; which falleth much about the end of our Octob. Alexander himself coming aboard, poured out a golden viol of wine from the prowe of the ship into the River, calling upon Acesines, Hydaspes, and Indus, all at once. Afterward when he offered to his Progenitor Hercules, and to Ammon, and the rest of the gods, according to his accustomed manner, the trumpet sounded, at his command, to draw down the ships into the water, and to be going, whereupon every man did accordingly; for order was given, how far every barge, how far every horse-lighter, how far every ship of war should steere off from each other, for fear least any should perchance fall foul of any other in their course, and that one should not strive to out sail, or out rowe another; but keep every one in his rank and order wherein he set forth.

Alexander, going on in this order, came on the third day to the place where he appointed Craterus and Hephæstion to attend him: there he stayed two dayes, that Philip might there overtake him, with the rest of the army; for he had sent him to the River Acesines, commanding him to march down by the bank thereof: and sent away Craterus and Hephæstion again with directions, what course to hold in their march by land.

He, holding on his course upon the River Hydaspes, which was every where 20 furlongs over at the least, landed his souldiers and went to Sibarus, or country of the Sobians. These, they say, were of the posterity of them, who with Hercules heretofore besieged the Rock of Aornus; and when they could not take it, were left here by him when they were not able to march with him any further: their cloths were nothing but skins of wild beasts, and their weapons nothing but clubs: and although the Grecian manners and fashions were worn out, yet might a man easily perceive some traces and marks of their original among them; But when Alexander pitcht his Camp near unto the chiefest City of their country, the principal men of them came forth unto him, and being admitted to his presence, they put him in mind of their first origin, and what reverence they had to the nation of the Greeks, and offered him their service, in what ever his pleasure was, as became men of the same blood with him and his Grecians, testifying as much, by the no ordinary presents which they gave unto him. Alexander received them very graciously, and made them a free State, to live according to their own laws.

From

From thence he made a rode further into the country some 250 furlongs; and having wasted all the field, came and besieged the chief City of that country.

The Agalassians opposed him, with 4000 Foot, and 3000 Horse, upon the bank of a River: but he passing the River, quickly distressed and routed them, and having slain the most part, made the rest run into the towns, which having taken, he slew them that were of age, and sold the rest for slaves.

Other inhabitants there were which would needs take up arms too, and were gathered together into one city, to the number of 20 thousand: Into this city also, he brake by pure force; but when they barricadoed their streets, and fought upon them from the battlements of their houses, he was forced to get out again, and left many of his Macedons dead behind him, wherefore in a rage he set fire on the houses, and burnt both it, and most of the people therein, with fire. Three thousand there were which got into the castle; they sued for pardon and had it.

And then returning a shipboard with his nobles, he went with all speed into the countries of the Mallians and Oxydracans: because he was informed of them, that they were two very populous and warlike Nations, and that having carried their wives and children into fenced places, they purposed to abide him in the field, and he made the more haste, to the end he might fall upon them, whiles they were but in their preparatives, and not fully yet provided for him.

Upon the 5 day, falling still down the river, he came to the confluence of the two rivers, Acesines and Hydaspes: where they both meet and make one river, but in a very narrow Channel: and by that means, runs with a most violent and rapid current, and maketh strange whirlepooles with all: whereupon many of their ships were bilged, and two of the greatest of them falling fowle each of other, split in sunder, and perished with those who were therein. Alexanders own ship, falling into one of these whirlepooles, was in extream danger to have been lost, and he in her. But having gotten a litle lower, where the Channel openeth somewhat wider, the stream grew calmer; and the ships coming to the bank on the right hand, found a safe harbour to ride in, under a bank which running out into the river, brake the violence of it, and so had they leisure to draw their ships on land.

The King set up altars upon the banks side, and sacrificed to his gods for escaping so grand a danger: and then marched 30 furlongs further, into the countrey, and falling upon the natives, that would not submit unto him, he charged them onely, not to help the Mallians, and so returned to his ships again; and there found Craterus, Hephæstion and Philippus came with their several Armies, and readie to attend him.

The countreys of the Oxydracans and Mallians lie between the place where the Hydaspes falls into the Acesines, and that where they both together fall into the river Indus, as Arrianus in his Indica teacheth us; [pag. 171.] These were wont to be alwayes in war, each against other; but now Alexander, a common enemy to both, coming on, made them friends: for a further confirmation whereof, they gave ten thousand virgins each to other to be crosse-married; their foot were in all 80 thousand; their horse, 10 thousand; besides 7 hundred chariots; Curtius saith 9 hundred, [Justin, lib. 12. cap. 9.] and Orosius [lib. 3. cap. 19.] give unto these Mandri or Ambri, and Sabracans, and Subagrans, and Sugambrians, for by all these names, the Malli and Oxydracans (who in Diodorus are also corruptly written Syracusians) in divers editions go, 60 thousand horse.

The Macedons, who thought they had been past all danger, and lookt for no more fighting businesse, when they now saw themselves engaged in a new war, with more fierce and warlike Nations, than any they had hitherto met withall in any part of India struck (as they were) with a suddain fear, began afresh to murmure and mutiny against Alexander; but he by a faire Oration which he made unto them, pacified them, and made all well again.

Commander in chief of all this army of the Natives, was a man of approved valour, chosen out of the Oxydracans: and he pitcht his camp at the foot of a hill, making store of fires that he might make his army thereby seeme the greater, and making alwaies great shouts and noises, after their country manner to terrifie the Macedons, if it might have been. But the next morning Alexander, full of hope, and all assurance of victory, encouraged his souldiers, and took the field against them: whereupon the suddain, the enemies, whether for fear, or whether upon some falling out among themselves, ran all away, left the field, and betook themselves to the mountains and woods, which because the Macedons could not overtake, they therefore fell to the rifling of their Camp.

Alexander having rigged his Navie, sent Nearchus with it, down the river, into the countrey of the Mallians, charging him to be there 3 daies before the army, and passing the Hydaspes, commanded Craterus, who was on the right hand of the Hydaspes, to take charge of the Elephants, and of Polysperchons Brigade, and his Archers on horseback, and of Philips Regiment. He willed also Hephæstion to go 5 dayes march before him; and Ptolomei, to come 3 dayes journey behind him: that whosoever escaped Hephæstion, might be sure to fall into the hands of one of them two. But commanded them that went foremost, when they came to the confluence of Acesines and Hydraotes, which was the utmost bound of the Mallians, as the confluence of Acesines and Hydaspes was of the Oxydracans, there to stay and attend his coming, and till Craterus and Ptolomies armies were come in and joyned to him.

Himself taking with him his Regiment of silver Targateers, and his squadron of Agrians, and Pythons brigade, and all his Archers on Horseback, and one half of his fellow Cavaleers, went through a sandy thirsty country into the Region of the Mallians, to set upon them, before either the Oxydracans could come to help them, or they the Oxydracans.

Now the first day he encamped near a little river, distant from the Acesines, some 100 furlongs, where, having rested himself a while, and his army, he commanded every man to fill what bottles he had, with water, and then put on again; and in the remainder of that day, and the night following, marched 400 furlongs, and in the mornig, lighted upon a great many of the Mallians, who, because they conceived, that surely he would never come over that dry and thirsty wilderness, were walking abroad idely with out the city. The most of them he slew, the rest ran into the gates, and there lockt them up; then caused he his Horse to surround the walls, instead of a trench, till his Foot came up.

But so soon as they were come, he presently dispatched away Perdiccas, with his own, and Clitus his Horse, and with the Agrians, to besige another town of the Mallians, where he understood, that many of the Indians were gathered together, willing them to keep them in, but not to make any assault, till he came onely to take care that none gat out, to carry news into other parts, that he was come into the country, and then began he to make his approaches, and to assault the city, which he lay before.

Having slain many of them in the assault, the rest left the walls, and fled to the Castle, and that being also taken, he slew therein two thousand men.

Perdiccas, coming to the city, which he was commanded to besiege, found all the birds flowen; and because he found that they were but newly gone, he followed after them, with all the speed he could make: all he overtook he slew: the rest escaped into the bogs, and fennie places, and there saved themselves.

Alexander, having rested and refresht both himself and his army, a while, removed in the first watch of the night: and having made a long march that night, at break of day came to the river Hydraotes, where he found that many of the Mallians, were already passed over; the rest he set upon, as they were passing, and slew them every man: then himself passed the river with his army, and overtook such as were gone before; and of them he slew many, and took other prisoners: Neverthelesse, most of them got away into a city, very strongly situate, and well fenced with works.

But when his foot came up, Alexander sent Python against them, with his own, and two other Regiments of Horse, who at first onset, scrued them into the Town, and took it; and made all that had fled thither, and were not slaine in the taking of it, slaves: which done, Python returned to the Camp.

Then led Alexander his army against a City of the Brachmanni, whither he understood other of the Mallians were fled: and as soon as he came, besieged it round with his Squadrons very thick. The souldiers forthwith left the walls, and fled to the Castles, which taken, the inhabitants, some set their own houses on fire, and threw themselves into it: others would sell their skins, as dear as they could, and died fighting: there died in all five thousand of them, few came alive into the enemies hand.

Alexander stayed there one day, to give his souldiers breath, and the next day he marched against other Towns of the Mallians: all which he found, to have left their cities, and fled to the woods and mountains: there also he spent one day.

The next day he sent Pithon, and Demetrius, Captain of a Regiment of Horse, back to the river side, to whom he joyned also, certain other Troups, and Companies, requisite for the service he imployed them in, willing them, if by the way, they chanced to light upon any of those, who were fled to the woods, if they submitted not, to kill them; whereupon they slew a very great many, as they passed.

Himself marcht against the Capitall City of the Mallians, to which, as he understood, many others had retired themselves. But even this great city also, hearing of his coming, abandoned the place, and fled, & flying over the river Hydraotes, there put themselves in battle array, upon the high clifts of that river, as if they would there stop his passage. Alexander followed them instantly with his Horse, commanding his Foot to come after; but when he was in the midst of the river, the Indians forsook the place, and though in good array, yet ran away: whereas yet they were not fewer in number than 50 thousand, and Alexander seeing them in a strong compacted body, yet having no Foot come up to him, offered here and there, and every where to charge upon them; but thought it no discretion to engage in a fight against them.

But so soon as the Agrians, and other well-ordered Squadrons, and the Archers came, and the main battel of the Foot, were now in sight, the Indians took them to their heeles, and ran away all to the next fenced City. Them Alexander pursued, and slew a many of them; and when they were there, Alexander presently surrounded the City with his Horse before the Foot came up.

Demophoon a Southsayer, having speech with Alexander, told him, by certain signs and prodigies by him observed, that there was some great danger towards him, and withal desired him to forbear, at least to defer the siege thereof. The King reviling him with shrewed words, for disheartning the souldiers whiles they were in action; and dividing his army in two parts, took one to himself, and gave the other to Perdiccas, and both together went to scale the wall: which brunt the Indians not enduring, left their stations on the wall, and fled all to the Castle. Alexander with those about him, brake open the first gate himself, and got into the City, and began to set ladders against the Castle wall: And when he saw his Macedons not come on so roundly, as he wished, he took a ladder himself and set against the wall, and gat upon the top of it. Pencestes, bearing the target, which he borrowed out of the Temple of Minerva in Troy, and which in all encounters he ever caused to be born before him, followed, and after him Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, upon the same ladder, and Abreas (one of the Διμοιρίτῶν or Duplarians: (i.e.) of that order of Knights or Esquiers, who had double pay or allowance) upon an other. And then the silver Targateers, hearing of the danger the King was in, strove to set up the ladders so thick, that they brake, and so all came tumbling to the ground, and thereby both lost themselves, and hindered others from getting up that would, [See Appianus toward the end, lib. 2. Bell. Civil.]

Alexander, who was shot at on every hand, from the towres, adjoyning, (for no man durst come to handy-blows with him upon the wall) leapt off the wall down into the Castle yard, and setting his back to a wall there, slew sundry that came to assault him, with his own hand; and among the rest, the Captain himself of the Indians, which came boldly on upon him: so that afterward none other durst come near him; but all set themselves to shoot him a far off.

Mean while Pencestes, Leonatus, and Abreas, leapt down the wall into the yard after him, and came to his rescue; of which Abreas, shot thorough the face into the head, died upon the place. And Alexander himself (as Ptolomei reporteth) received so great a wound in the breast, that his very breath came forth at it together with his blood. Pencestes, who interposed, with Minerva's buckler in his hand, and Leonatus, who took in his own body the blows which were meant to him, were likewise sore wounded: and little wanted it, but that Alexander himself, had there poured forth his soul, together with his blood. And all agree, that Pencestes defended him with his Palladian buckler: whence Pliny calls him, [lib. 34. cap. 8.] the preserver of Alexander the Great. Concerning Leonatus, and Abreas, the Duplarian, all do not agree: but that Ptolomei the son of Lagus, was at the rescue of him, Clitarchus and Timogenes, and Pausanias in his Attica, do affirm: which yet himself denies, and sayes, he was not; and that all that while he was in fight with the enemy elsewhere: So great saith Curtius, was the carelesnesse of those old Historians in writing, or which is as bad, calnesse in believing.

The Macedons at last breaking into the Castle, put every man therein to the sword, not sparing man or woman, old or young, and brought the King out upon their targets, living or dead, they knew not well whether. The cure of his wounds was more grevious, than the wounds themselves: but enduring the paine, he came at last to have hope of life again: which yet the army could hardly be brought to believe, it having been once bruited abroad that he was dead of his wounds. Wherefore so soon as possibly he could, he caused himself to be carried to the River side, from thence to fall down in a Barge to the place where his army lay, which was at the confluence of the Hydraotis with the Acesines, where Hephastion was, commanding the army, and Nearchus the Navy; so soon as he came on land, he admitted the souldiery to kisse his hand, hand, and refusing his litter, gat upon his Horse, to be seen of all, and then alighted and went a foot to his pavilion.

The King having his wounds cured in seven dayes space, though not yet healed, hearing that the Indians were perswaded of his death, caused two Barges to be joyned together, and upon them his Tent Royal to be spread; open on every side, to be seen of all thereby, to stay the report, that went among his enemies, that he was dead; and from thence went down the river, giving order, that none should come near the barge he was in, for fear of shogging his weak body, with the beating of the Oares: and so on the fourth day, came to a country, deserted indeed, by the inhabitants, but plentifully stored, with all manner of provisions, both corn and catle, wherefore that place pleased him well, to stay at, and refesh both himself and his army in.

Nearchus the Ammiral, reporteth, that his Nobles blamed him, for doing the office of a souldier, rather than a King or Captain in the army, and when he grew angry thereat, and shewed his dislike by his looks; a certain old Bœotian pleased him again, by reciting an old Iambick verse, to this purpose, That he who would do any great thing reason was, he should suffer something too. And indeed, Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 12.] mentions an oration uttered to him by Craterus, in the name of his Nobles, to the same purpose, with his answer thereunto: wherein, shewing that a man can never want matter to win glory by: After the ninth year, (saith he) of my reign, and twentieth of my age, do ye think it possible for me to be wanting, to my self in advancing my glory, which I have ever addicted and devoted my self unto? for so Curtius brings him in speaking, whereas yet in true point of Chronology, this was the tenth year of his reign (which agreeth well enough with this saying) though the 30 of his age.

Whiles the King stayed here many dayes; all which he spent in the full curing of his wounds, and in encreasing the number of his ships; the Grecian souldiers which he had planted in certain Cities of Bactria, and Sogdiana, which himself had there built, to the number of about 3000 men, partly because they grew weary of living among those Barbarous people, and partly, because they took courage, upon the news of Alexanders death, fell off from the Macedon government; and having killed some of the chief of their own country men, began to take arms: and seizing on the Castle of the City Bactra, which was not so carefully kept, as it should have been, drew the inhabitants to joyn with them in this revolt; chief in this conspiracy, was one Athenodorus, who also assumed to himself the Title of a King, not so much out of a desire of any soveraignty, as out of a purpose he had, to draw men thereby to follow him in his return to Greece. But there was one Biton or Bicon, a Grecian likewise, who out of a grudge and envy, which he bare him hereupon, invited him to a banquet, and there, by the hand of one Boxus, slew him. The next day this Biton called a company together, and there perswaded some, that Athenodorus would have killed him: others there were, who thought it was nought else but a meer roguery of Bitons, and they quickly drew others to their belief: whereupon they all took up arms, ready to have slain him, if they could; but the chief among them perswaded the rest, and so all grew quiet again.

Biton, having got out of these bryers, fell to practise the destruction of those who had saved his life; which they perceiving, laid hold on him, and Boxus both. But Boxus they put instantly to death: Biton they purposed to have first to the Rack; and now they were ready to fall to work with him: when upon the sudden, the Grecians, like men out of their wits, rose all in arms, no man knew why; whereupon they forbare Biton, for fear of a rescue by the multitude; and he all naked as he was, fled to the Grecians: and they seeing what case he was in, and ready to be rackt, changed their minds, and rescued him from the danger he was in.

Mean while, the Mallians, that were left, sent their messengers to Alexander, to yield up all the nation to his mercy; and in like manner from the Oxydracans, came the Captaines themselves, and chief men of every City; and with them, one hundred and fifty of the principall of the whole nation, giving up the whole Country into his hands. Alexander willed them to send him one thousand of their principall men. Curtius saith, 2500 horse, which he might keep by him, either as hostages, or as souldiers to serve him, till he had ended his war with the Indians.

Then invited he all the principall men, and petty Kings of these nations, to a feast, where he caused one hundred golden Beds to be set, at a reasonable distance each from other: every of those beds was enclosed with Curtains wrought of scarlet and gold: in which feast was set out to be seen, what ever the old luxury of the Persians, or new fanglenes of the Macedons, both jumbled together, could afford.

Dioxippus the Athenian was at this feast; of whom Pliny, [lib. 35. cap. 11. Athena. lib. 6. cap. 6. Elian. lib. 10. cap. 22. and lib. 12. cap. 58. and Plut. in his book of Curiosities] make mention: Dioxippus, I say, a famous Champion, and one whom the King, for for his great strength of body, and courage of spirit, made very much of: and one Choragus a Macedon, a man of mighty strength likewise, and who had, in many a fight, given great testimony of his worth. This Choragus being in drink, would needs chalenge Dioxippus to a single fight. And the next day Dioxippus stark naked, and all over anointed with oyl, came into the list, having nothing but a trunchon, and a cloak for his armes, and there closed with the Macedon, who came in armed, with sword and buckler, and pike, and javelin, and laid him at his foot.

The Macedons, and Alexander himself, took this for a fowle slur and disgrace, put upon the Macedons nation, in the sight of these Barbarians, and repined at it: and shortly after, at another feast, there was a golden cup missing; and the suspition of stealth thereof laid upon Dioxippus; the indignity whereof, wrought so far upon him, that returning to his lodging, he there wrate, and left a letter for Alexander, and then slew himself.

Alexander shipt his horses, and of his fellow Cavaleers some 1700, and of others, as many, and 20 thousand foot, and went not far upon the Hydraotes, before he came to the confluence of it, and the Acesines: and then falling down upon the Acesines, came at length to the confluence of the Acesines with the river Indus, and there he stayed with his Navie, till Perdiccas came to him with the body of the army: having by the way as he came, subdued the Abastenians, who were a free state among those Indians.

While he there stayed, there came to him, other ships of 30 Oares a piece, and certain ships of burthen, which had been newly built in the countrey of the Xathri, another free state in those parts: and Embassadors also, from the Ossadians, a free state likewise, all submitting to him.

Likewise the messengers of the Oxydracans and Mallians, returned to him with presents, among which, besides some small quantity of linnen cloath, there were 1000 Indian targets, and 100 talents of steele, and Lions of a vast bignesse, and Tigers, all brought to hand, and tame: As also the skins of huge Lizards, and Tortaise shells: There were also 300 Chariots, and 1030 horses to draw them: foure for every Chariot, as we read in Curtius, [l. 9. c. 15.] Arrianus saith also, that they sent him 3 thousand men for hostages; the bravest and goodliest men they could find among them; with 500 chariots, and men in them to fight, over and above what Alexander had required at their hands; adding, that Alexander accepted their Chariots, and returned their hostages home again.

Alexander commanded them to pay him such tribute as they formerly paid to the Arachosians, and set Philip to be their Satrapa or Governor, his government to extend to the confluence of the 2 rivers, Indus and Acesines, and no further: so that we can hardly believe Plutarch, where he saith that the extent of this Philips government was thrice as bigg as Porus his kingdom, especially if it were so bigg, as he himself delivers it to have been. But Alexander left unto him, for a guard of that Province, all the Thracian horse, and such companies of foot as he thought fit and requisite for that purpose. Moreover he caused a City to be built at the confluence of those two rivers; supposing it would quickly grow very populous, and of great renown, and therefore caused Docks, for the building of Ships, to bee there made, in great number.

At that time came to him Oxyartes, father unto Roxane, whom Alexander had married, and was by him acquitted from all suspition of having any hand in the revolt of the Grecians that were in Bactria.

6. Afterward Polysperchon was sent to Babylon with an army, as in Justin. [lib. 12. cap. 10.] and Craterus was commanded with a great part of the army that was left, and the Elephants, to march down on the left hand of the bank of the river Indus, because that seemed the easier way for the Corseleteers to go, and the bordering Nations were no surer to him, than need was; and then himself, with some choice companies, took ship, and set forward toward his so long intended journey to the Ocean: and it is said that he went never a day lesse than 600 furlongs: and yet was full five moneths in going with some odd dayes over and above, [Plin. l. 6. c. 17.]

In this voiage of his down the river, he first came to the countrey of the Sabracans, or Sambestans: This was a Nation, inferiour to none of all India, both for number, and warlikenesse of men: and was governed by a popular State, throughout all their Cities. These, hearing of the coming of the Macedons, presently armed 60 thousand foot, and six, or (as Curtius saith) eight thousand horse, with five hundred Chariots; and set over them, to command, three most expert Captains. But the Navy coming upon them (of which more is to be seen, besides Curtius, [lib. 9. cap. 15.] in Pliny, [lib. 19. cap. 1,]) they took a fright at the strangenesse of the sight, and casting withal in their minds, the fame and invincible glory of the Macedons, took advice of the old men among them, who for the avoiding of so imminent a danger, advised them to submit; where-whereupon they sent messengers; and gave themselves up wholy into his hands: whom he graciously received: and they again bestowed on him, besides other gifts, honours also befitting a demy God.

Four dayes after he came to a Nation, which lay on both sides the River, which were called, Sodrans (or Sogdans, as in Arrianus,) and Massanians: and received them likewise to grace and favour as he had done the former. And here, upon the bank of the River Indus, he built another Alexandria: and chose out a thousand men to people it, and made havens for Merchants, and docks for shipping; and there he cured such of his ships as had any wayes been bruised: And made Oxyartes, his father in law, and Pithon, Governours of all the country from the confluence of the Acesines and Indus to the sea: adding thereto also, all the sea coast. But himself falling still down the River, came so speedily into the country of King Musicanus, that he was there, before Musicanus ever heard that he was coming: wherefore not knowing what else to do, he forthwith went out to meet him, presenting him with the choicest gifts that India did afford, and in special, with all his Elephants; and gave up himself and all his whole kingdom into his hands, craving pardon for that he had done it no sooner. Alexander pardoned him that offence; and wondring both at the country it self, and the city there: of which we may see more [in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 694. and pag. 701.] which he collected out of Aristobulus, and Onesicratus, restored him to his kingdom, as he was before.

Here he heard the complaints brought against Tiriolte, al. Tiryeste, whom he had made Governour over the Parapamisadæ, with his accusers face to face: and finding him guilty of many acts of cruelty and avarice committed by him, he put him there to death, and gave that Government to his father in law, Oxyartes.

He commanded Craterus to build a Citadel or Fort, upon the City of Musicanus: which was dispatcht before he went from thence, because he saw that plat fit to serve for a bridle in the mouths of the neighbouring nations, to keep them in order with.

From thence, with his Archers and Agrians, and all the Horse, which he had a ship-board, he came to another Nation of the Indians, called Præstans, and marched against their King Porticanus, al. Oxycanus, because he neither came himself, nor sent Ambassadors unto him: and took two of the greatest Cities that he had in his Dominions: Porticanus himself was in one of them, which Alexander took the third day of his siege thereof. But Porticanus flying into the Castle, sent Ambassadors to treate of conditions: but ere ever they came to his presence, two great panes of the wall fell flat down to the ground; by the breaches whereof the Macedons flew into the Castle, and when Porticanus, with those few which were with him stood still upon their guard, they were all presently put to the sword: The Castle was pulled down; all in the town were sold away for slaves: the spoile thereof given to the souldier, onely the Elephants Alexander took, and carried away for himself.

Diodorus sayes, that Alexander first gave those Cities to be spoiled by his souldiers, and then set fire on them, and after that went and took in all the rest of his Cities and Towns and destroyed them: and thereby struck a terror into all the neighbouring Nations; and that the rest of the countries hearing of his approach onely, presently sent, and yeilded themselves unto him, without the least resistance, as Arrianus writeth.

After this, he entered the country of the Brachmanes, where Sambus, al. Sabus, or Samus, as Curtius, al. Sabbas, as Plutarch, al. Ambigerus, as Justin, al. Ambiras, as Orosius calleth him, was King: of whom Alexander had been told that he was fled away: but when he came near his chief City, called Sindomana, al. Sindonalia, he found the gates set wide open to him, and Sambo his servants came forth to meet him with money and Elephants to present unto him, telling him withal, that Sambus was fled indeed; not out of hostility to him, but for fear of Musicanus, whom Alexander had let go and pardoned, and for that there was mortal enmity between them two.

Alexander having taken in, this and many other places, went and by force took another City which had fallen off and revolted from him; and put to death many of the Brachmanes who had been the occasion and authors of it. For by their instigation it was that Sambus, who had but lately submitted to him, and the Cities of his subjection, had revolted from him. Curtius sayes, that Alexander took the City, by undermining the wall; and that the natives stood amazed to see men rise out of the ground in the middest of their City.

Clitarchus, cited by Curtius, saith, that there were eight, or rather (as Diodorus with others have it) 80000 men slain in that country: and a multitude of others sold away for slaves. These plagues therefore the Brachmanes suffered: the rest, which simply submitted to him, and craved his pardon, had no harme: And King Sambus, getting getting away as farre off as he could, with thirty Elephants, saved himself.

Alexander got into his hand, to the number of ten, of those which were called Gymnosophistæ, who had principlly perswaded Sambus to flee away: and had caused much trouble to him and his Macedons; to these he propounded certain hard and obscure questions, threatning to hang them every man, if they did not resolve him; those questions of his, with their answers upon them, Plutarch sets down in the life of Alexander, where he also tells us, that having heard them, he dismissed them, with many honours heaped upon them for their pains.

Musicanus in this interim revolted, and Pithon with an army, was sent against him: who setting upon the cities of his subjection, destroyed some, others he put Garrisons in, and built citadels or Castles, for a yoake upon them. And having taken Musicanus, and brought him alive to Alexander, he caused him forthwith to be crucified in his own kingdom, and as many of the Brachmanes as had put him on to that revolt.

Alexander, coming back to the river Indus, where he had commanded his Navy to attend him, fell down the river again, and came to a City called Harmatelia, belonging to Sambus and the Brachmanes: And when the inhabitants (trusting in their own strength, and situation of their city) shut gates against him, Alexander commanded 500 of his Agrians, to go close under the walls, with their armes; and if the townsmen sallied out upon them, to retreat: Three thousand fell out upon the 500, who according to direction, fled back, as if they had been afraid, and the enemies pursuing them, fell unawares upon other companies, which were laid of purpose for them; and where Alexander himself in person was: there were they forced to fall to a new fight, wherein there were 6 hundred of them slain upon the place, and 1000 taken, the rest fled, and kept them close within the walls: But of the Kings side there were many grievously wounded, and in danger of death therewith: for the Indians had poisoned the heads of their weapons, with a deadly poyson; and whereas among other, Ptolomei the son of Lagus, was in like manner wounded, and was ready instantly to die thereof, it is said that Alexander in his sleepe saw an herbe, which was a present remedy for that kind of poison, and that herbe squeezed into drink and taken, presently recured him: whereupon others also made use of that medicinable herbe, and recovered. It is most likely that some or other, who knew the virtue of the herbe, acquainted Alexander with it; and then flattery made up the rest of the fable, for his honours sake, saith Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 723.] who yet relates this as done among the Oritæ, of whom we shall speak anon.

When as therefore, Alexander now set himself to besiege Harmotelia, being a strong and well fenced city, the inhabitants came all forth to him, and humbly begged his pardon, submitting themselves and their city, and all to his mercy, whereupon he pardoned them.

Mœris King of Pattalena, the next bordering countrey thereunto, coming to Alexander, put himself and kingdome wholy into his hands: whom when Alexander had freely restored to his state again, he gave order withal to have all things necessary provided for his army.

Alexander commanded Craterus to take with him the Regiments of Attalus, and Meleager, and Antigenes, and some of his Archers, and some also of his allies, and Macedons, which were growen unserviceable, and to carry them into Macedon, by the way of Caramania, through the countreys of the Aracotti, and Zarangi, or Drangi; the rest of the army, some were led by Hephæstion, on the one side of the river Indus and the darters on horseback, and the Agrians, by Pithon on the other: who had also in charge, to provide inhabitants, for the cities which he had built, and that if any new commotions were raised in those parts, he should settle matters there, and that done, should come and joyne with the rest of the army at Pattala.

And when Alexander had now sailed down the river three dayes journey, word was brought him, that Moeris, and a great company of the Patalenians with him, had left the city, and were fled to the mountains and woods: whereupon he made all the haste thither, that possibly he could.

Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 691.] tells us out of Aristobulus, that Alexander came into Pattalene, about the rising of the dog-star; having then spent full ten moneths, in his navigation, for that he set not forth but very few dayes before the rising of the seven stars: so that Alexander arrived in Pattala, about the end of our July, having been in this navigation, ever since the beginning of the tenth moneth before, hereby it appears, that going still down the water, along the Hydaspes, Acesines and Indus, he had spent full nine months, as appeareth by the known rising and setting of these starrs: whereby we find that Plutarchs account in this point was not very exact, where he tells us, that ἡ διὰ τῶν ποταμῶν ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν ὑπαγωγή, μηνῶν ἑπτὰ χρόνον ἀνήλωσε (i. e.) His passing down the Rivers to the sea took him up seven monethes time.

Alexander coming to Patala, found the city and country thereabout void of all inhabitants, though he there found great store of flocks and herds of cattle, and corn in great abundance left. But he presently dispatcht away the nimblest souldiers which he had to overtake those, who were fled away; and ever as they took any, they sent them away to overtake the rest, and to perswade them to return; promising them all security, and fruition of their estates in manner as before, both in City and Country.

Then commanded he Hephæstion to build a fort or citadel upon Patala: others he sent into a Region of theirs which was altogether destitute of water, to dig wells, thereby to make it more habitable: but some of the natives fell upon them, and slew many of them; yet having lost many of their own also in the fight, the rest fled all away to the Woods and Mountains: and Alexander, hearing of what had befallen his men, sent more to joyn with the former, and so to go thorough with the work begun.

Alexander dealt with Nearchus, his Ammiral, to chuse some fit season of the year, to set out from the mouth of the River Indus, and to coast along till he came to the Persian gulf, and to the mouth of the river Euphrates and Tigris: as Arrianus in his Indica, reports out of Nearchus his own writings, [pag. 182.] Making, saith Plutarch, Nearchus Ammiral of the Fleet, and Onesicritus chief Pilot of it. Whence it is that Onesicritus himself in his story sayes of himself, that he was Navarchus: (i. e.) Pilot, as Arrianus [lib. 6. pag. 124.] relates him, and Pliny [lib. 6. cap. 22.] renders him, Præfectum classis: (i. e.) Commander of the Fleet. But Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 721.] more rightly terms him Ἀρχικυβερνήτην: (i. e.) chief Pilot: See [Arria. lib. 7. pag. 162. and in his Indica. pag. 191.]

At Patala the River Indus parts it self into two great arms; both which keep the name of Indus till they fall into the Sea: making between them an Island of a three-square figure, or a △, which from the city is called Patalene, bigger than Delta in Egypt is. Onesicritus tells us, that every side of this △ or triangular Island, is 2 thousand furlongs in length. But Aristobulus sayes, that the basis of it: (i. e.) the side next the sea, and where both the Rivers fall into it, and make a marshland on either side of this Island, is not above 1000 furlongs: But Nearchus, and after him Arrianus, saith, 1800. and Pliny saith, that it is 220 miles in length, [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 701. Plin. lib. 6. cap. 21. Arria. lib. 5. pag. 103. and lib. 6. pag. 135, 137.]

Alexander, purposing to fall down to the sea, by the right hand channel, made choice of the swiftest ships he had, all of two decks high; and all his gallies of 30 oares a piece, and some nimble barques, and such guides as best knew the River, and so set forward; willing Leonatus, with a thousand Horse, and some 8 thousand Foot, to keep along with him, by the bank of the River.

The morrow after that he set forth, there arose a mighty tempest, and the wind and tide coming crosse each to other, raised a huge billow upon the River, so that his ships fell foul each of other; whereby most of them were bilged, and many of the 30 oares a piece were quite split therewith, before ever they could get to an Island, which lieth in the middest of the channel.

There was Alexander forced to stay a long while, both to build him new vessels instead of them that were lost, as also for that those which were taken in, as guides upon the River, were all run away: And when he sent to get others, he could find none; and so they were fain to go and do as well as they could without them. And now they had gone 4 hundred furlongs, when the Pilots all agreed, and told Alexander that they found a sent of the sea; and that therefore certainly the Ocean could not be far off. He thereupon sent some to go a land, and to take up some of the country people; out of whom he thought something might be learned. They searched their cretes and cottages so long, that at last, they found some people in them; whom they asked, how far they were from the sea: and they answered, that they knew not what the sea was, nor ever had heard of any such thing; but, that, if they went on, in three dayes journey they should come to salt water, which marred the fresh.

Arrianus tells us, that certain Macedons, being set a land, lighted upon some Indians, whom Alexander from thence forward used for his guides upon the River. But when they came where the river opened to the breadth of 200 furlongs, (which is the greatest breadth thereof) and the wind blew very strong off the sea, they were fain again to thrust into a creek, and harbour, which his guides directed him to. But Curtius sayes, that when upon the third day he came, as he was foretold he should to brackish water; he there found an other Island in the River, where they observed that the ships went not so fast, as they were wont to do, because the tide met them, and turned back the River upon them.

Whiles they lay there at anchor, and some went a forraging, they fell into a new danger, for there came in upon them a mighty tide (which to this day is usual in Cambay, where this river of Indus emptieth it self into the sea) and overflowed all the Country thereabout, onely the top of some Hillocks, like so many little Isles, appearing above water:

water: to which, leaving their Boats, they for safeguard betook themselves; and when the sea was gone out again, and the land left dry, as it was before, then their ships, as it fell out, some fell forward upon their noses, others sidelong, from the side of a bank, where they stuck: and when the next tide came in, those ships which stood upright upon their keels, in the mud, floated presently, with the rising of the water, and had no hurt; but such as lighting on hard ground, when the sea was gone out, were fallen all along: those, upon the returne of the tide, were there right driven one against the other, or beaten and broken all together upon the shore.

All which being repaired, as the time and place would permit, Alexander sent away two Barques down the river to view the Island, which the guides had told him, he must touch at, if he would saile out into the Ocean. That Island the natives called Cilluta, Alexander himself, Scillustin, and others Philtucin. And when they brought him back word, that the Island was large, and had in it, very commodious ports, and store of fresh water, he commanded the whole navy, to make for that Island; himself with some choice vessels, went further, to discover whether at the mouth of the river, there were no bar, but a safe passage out into the open Ocean; and having now gone some two hundred furlongs, he espied yet another Island, lying further out in the open Ocean.

Then returned he to the former Island lying in the mouth of the River, and coming on shoare, at a certain foreland thereof, he there offered sacrifice, to certain gods, such as, said he, Jupiter Ammon commanded me to sacrifice unto. And the next day he sailed to another Island, lying out in the same Ocean, and there offered other sacrifices, and to other gods, and in another form and fashion, than formerly he had done; saying still, that what he did, was by the direction and command of Jupiter Ammon, and so sailed quite and quite out of the mouth of the river Indus, into the vast Ocean, and there having sacrificed certain Oxen, on shipboard to Neptune, threw them over board into the sea: whereunto he addeth also, a drink offering, and having powred that first into the sea, he threw a golden vial, and sundry golden goblets after it, with thanksgiving, into the Ocean; and praying that, whereas he had a purpose to send Nearchus into the gulf of Persia, he might safely there arrive, [Arrianus lib. 6. pag. 136.]

Justin [lib. 12. cap. 10.] reports, that having returned with a faire tide, to the mouth of the River Indus, he there, in memory thereof, built a new City called Barce; and erected certain Altars upon the place, and Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 16.] saith, that at midnight, he put forth with a small company of ships, with the first of the Eb, and went quite out of the mouth of the River Indus, four hundred furlongs into the open Ocean; and, so having done there what he intended, and sacrificed to the gods of those seas, and land adjoyning, returned to the rest of his Navy: and Diodorus Siculus, that he went with some of his familiar friends, out into the main Ocean; and lighting upon two little Ilets, offered there a magnificent sacrifice to the gods: and that withall, he cast a multitude of golden cups, and of a great price, with drink offerings into the sea: and in the end, having there erected certain altars, in honour of Tethys, and Oceanus, supposing that now he had finished his intended voyage into the East, returned with his navy up the River, and that in his returne, he came to a goodly and famous City, called Hyala, whose government was much alike to, or rather, all one, with that of Lacedæmon.

For there were in it, two Kings of two several families, succeeding alwayes in a line and had the administration of the wars, but the chief ordering of civil affairs, was in the senate, and supreme council of state.

Alexander returning to the Patala against the stream, found there the Castle, or Citadel, ready built, according to his directions given; and Pithon returned with his army, having done all, that he went about: and whereas he purposed to leave a part of his navy, at Patala, (which city retaines the same name, among the Indians of Cambais, to this very day) where the River Indus severs it self into two channels, he gave Hephæstion, the charge of making there the ports, and docks fit to receive it.

Mean while he made another journey to the Ocean, by the channel on the left hand of the same River, to try which of the two channels, was the best, and easiest to passe into the Ocean by, and to return again: and when he was now allmost come to the very outlet of this second channel, he found a certain lough in it, which is made either by this River diffusing it self, into a larger space, or by waters which fall in there, from other parts, and make the River more spacious there, than in other parts; and to look like an arme of the sea: there he left Leonatus with most of his army, and with all his lesser sort of ships; and himself went forward, with his ships of 30 oares a piece, and of two tire of oares: and having gotten quite out of the River on that side also, sailed again out into the vast Ocean, and found by experience, that that was the more commodious dious channel of the two, to drive a trade by, to Patala. And then going a shoar with certain Horse, he made three dayes journey along the sea coast, and having considered of the coast all along, where he had sailed, he caused wells to be digged in sundry places, for fresh water for his Navy, if need should be, [Arria. lib. 6 pag. 137]

The next day after his return out of the Ocean, Curtius sayes, that he came up the River, to a certain lough of salt water: which put sundry of them to a great inconveniency, whiles they went into it, not knowing the nature of it; for it drew a scab upon them, and the same infectious also unto others; yet they quickly found an oyl, which cured it: which if it were the same lough, which I mentioned before out of Arrianus, then is all this History to be referred to Alexanders latter return from the Ocean, which no author mentions, save onely Arrianus.

Alexander at his second return to Patala, sent a part of his army to dig those wells by the sea side: charging them withal, as soon as they had done, to return to Patala; and he sailing again into the lough, made there new Ports, and other Docks for his shipping: and leaving a Garrison there, laid up likewise provision of corn for four moneths, and other necessaries for the use of navigation, [Arria. ut sup.] Now it seems, that at this lake it was, that he built the City called Potana; to the end he might have a fit Port for his shipping, in that part of the Ocean: as we gather out of Diodorus, [lib. 3. pag. 181.] in the Greek and Latin edition, compared with Agatharchides, his Excerptions in Photius, [Cod. 250. cap. 51.] and with this place in Arrianus.

Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 16. & 17.] writes, that Alexander with his army, stayed in the Island of Patalena, expecting the coming on of the Spring; and that during that time, he built many cities there, and that the Winter quarter drawing now to an end, he set fire on his ships which were grown unserviceable, and marched away by land: and [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 721.] signifies, that towards the Summer season, (which after their account, begins ever with the Spring) he left India: which I conceive, he would not have said, had he better considered, of what he himself a little after affirmeth out of Nearchus, who was Ammiral in it, concerning this voyage; where he saith, That when the King was now upon his way, he himself began his voyage in Autumne when the Pleiades or seven Stars began to appear in the evening.

Wherefore plain it is, that Alexander in September, having sent Leonatus before him, to cause wells to be digged in convenient places for the use of the army in their march overland, thorough a dry and thirsty country, and set fire on his ships, which were leaky; removed from Patala, and came with all his army, to the bank of the River Arbis or Arabius: which River parts the Arbites, or the Arabites, (whom Dionysius Periegetes, calls Aribes, and others call Abritæ,) and with them India it self from the Orites. For the Arbites inhabit along the sea shoar of India, which lieth between the River Indus, and the River Arbis, by the space of a thousand furlongs in length, as Nearchus saith, [in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 720. and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185. in fi.] and these are the utmost people of the Indians westward, as appears out of [Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 184.] and out of [Plin. lib. 7. cap. 2.] and next to the Oritans, as saith [Pliny, lib. 6. cap. 23. and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185.] and which speak in a language of their own, and not that of the Indians.

These Arbites or Arabites, being a free State, or people, living under their own laws, neither strong enough to withstand Alexander, nor willing to submit unto him, so soon as they heard of his coming, fled away to the Woods, and Wildernesses.

Alexandrr, delivering the rest of his army into Hephæstions hands, took with him one half of his silver Targateers, and a part of his archers, and some certain Regiments of those who were called Asseteri, and a Troup of his fellow Cavaleers; and out of every Regiment of Horse one Troup, and all his archers on horseback, and turned his course on the left hand toward the Ocean; and commanded a multitude of wells to be digged along the sea side, to relieve his Navy with fresh water, as they passed by, on their way to the Gulf of Persia.

No sooner had Alexander his back turned, but the Patalenians, taking fresh courage, and desirous of liberty, set upon Nearchus, with the army that was left with him, and sent him packing with his Fleet, when he had yet no wind to carry him: as Strabo reports out of Nearchus himself, [lib. 15. pag. 721.] for before the beginning of Winter, which began, together with the setting of the Pleiades in the moneth of our November, in those parts, was no time fit for Navigation, [Arria. lib. 6. pag. 137.]

3679 So soon, therefore, as the Etesian, or trade winds, (which blowing all summer long 4389 325 from the sea to land-ward, put a stop upon all navigation in that coast) were ended, Nearchus having sacrificed to Jove the deliverer, and having performed certain Gymnic games, set saile from thence, in the eleventh year of Alexanders reign, when Cephisodorus was L. Chancelor of Athens, the 20 day of the moneth Boedromion, or the first of October, according to the Julian Calendar, as I have already shewed in my discourse of the Solar year among the Macedons, [cap. 2.] out of Arrianus his Judica. Now we meet with the name of this Cephisidorus, not onely 40 years before this, viz. year 3. of the 103 Olympiade, but also 3 years after this, to wit, year 2. of the 114 Olympiade, which was the next year after Alexanders death, as we find in the Rowls or Tables, of the Chancelors of Athens: so that if this name be rightly set down by Arrianus in this place, and there be no scruple to be made of two Cephisidori, by reason of the vicinity of the times, then there will fall out in the 4 years of 113 Olympiade, this difference ensuing in the ordering of the Chancelors of Athens, between Diodor. Sic. Dionysi. Halic. and Arrianus, as followeth.

Pliny tells us, that Alexander built a City, at the place, from whence Nearchus and Onesicratus set forth upon their intended voyage; and that is the same which we find called, Xulinopolis. [lib. 6. cap. 23.] of which yet it is a wonder, that in the same place he should add, That no man can tell, where, or upon what River it was built: For where should it be, but in the Isle of Patalene, where they were left by Alexander, to attend the season fit, to begin their voyage: or upon what River, but upon the Indus, where the Navy rode, and along which that fleet passed, when it fell down into the Ocean, as Arrianus teacheth us, out of Nearchus himself, in his Indica, pag. 183.]

The first day after they set forth from the port of Xulinopolis, to go down the River Indus, they came to a wonderfull deep channel, called Stura, distant from the port, one hundred furlongs; and there lay at achor, two dayes.

The third day, they removed; and came to another channel, 30 furlong lower; where they found the water a little brackish, for the tide coming up so far, and there mingling with the fresh water, leaves a tast of salt in the place, even at low water: and when the tide is gone out, and that place was called Caumana.

From thence they parted, and came to a place lower upon the river, 20 furlongs, called Coreatis.

And then weighing again, they had not gone far, but they kenned a Rock, just at the place where the Indus opens and falls into the sea, and bears upon the shoare, which was of it self very rock: but where it began to be soft ground, and better bedding for ships, there they put in with the tide, and drew a ditch of five furlongs long, before them.

And falling down again, 150 furlons farther, they came to a sandy Island called Crocala, and stayed there one other day, near to which, upon the main land inhabited, an Indian nation, called the Arabii, from the River Arabius, which divides them, as was said before, from the Oritans.

Their journey forward, is at large described by Arrianus out of Nearchus himself, as he witnesseth. [lib. 6. pag. 143.] and after him by Jo. Ramusius, in his Navigations, [vol. 1. fol. 169.] a breif of which voyage, is also delivered by Pliny [lib. 6. cap. 23.] gathered out of Onesicritus by King Juba: as those words in him shew right well, where he saith, It is fit I should here set down, what Onesicritus delivers, of this navigation, wherein himself was by the command of Alexander, out of India, into the very mediterranean parts, of Persia, and out of him again related by King Juba: out of which we may also gather the meaning of those other words of Pliny next following, (i. e.) That voyage of Nearchus and Onesicritus, hath neither names of places, where they touched by the way, nor distances from one place to another; to wit, as it is described by Juba, or Onesicritus himself, for that both were delivered by Nearchus, appears by Arrianus, who out of him, hath delivered both the one and the other, particularly.

But that we may returne to Alexander, he having put over the river Arbis or Arabius, and having the very night following marched thorough a great part of the sandy Country, came the next morning into places well inhabited and cultured. Then he leaving the foot to follow in good array, took the Horse with himself, cast into several Troups, and squadrons, in very good order, but so wide spread, that they might take up and drive all the Country before them, and so set upon the Oritans, of which a great part, which took up arms, were slain, and many were taken prisoners, and then coming to a smal river side, he there encamped.

Then

Then dividing his company into three brigades, he gave one to Ptolomei, to lead along by the coast; the second to Leonatus, to passe through the midst of the countrey, and champain part thereof; and the third he took to himself; and with it marched into the hill country of that region, and mountanous parts thereof, with the places adjoyning, and spoiled and wasted all that came in his way, whence the souldiers enriched themselves, and slew many a ten thousand of men withall.

But when Hephæstion, who had the greater part of the whole army under his command, was come up unto him; Alexander went forward to Rambacia, which was the principal division of all that countrey, where, when he found a place by the sea side, safe from all wind and weather, he presently gave order to Hephæstion, to build a city there, which being finished, and called by the name of Alexandria, he made there a plantation of the Arachosians, to dwell therein.

And then again, taking with him one half of his silver Targateers and Agrians, and a squadron of horse, and Archers on horseback, marched away to the borders of the Oritans and Gedrosians, where he was told there was a narrow passage, which parted the two countreys: and that both nations with their several armies were encamped there, to keep that passage against him: But no sooner came the newes unto them of his approach, but the most part of them abondoned the place and fled: whereupon the chief of the Oritans, went unto him, and submitted themselves and their whole country to him: and the onely charge which he laid upon them was, to call home their countrey men, every one to his own place, assuring them, that in so doing, all should be well with them; and they receive no harme.

Then made he Apollophanes Governor of the Oritans, joyning Leonatus, a Squire of the body with him: with whom he left all his Agrians, and some of his Archers, and Horse, and other companies of his foot, and mercinaries out of Greece, in the country of the Oritans, giving them in charge to attend the coming of the fleet into those parts; and in the mean time to go in hand with the building of a new city, and to order all matters there for the benifit of the people.

Then set he forward with a great part of his army (for now was Hephæstion again come up unto him) and marcht into the countrey of the Gedrosians, which was for the most part abondoned by the Inhabitants. In which desert, as Aristobulus saies, the Phænicians which followed the army, to buy what was there to be sold, loaded their camels with mirrh, and spikenard, for of such spicery and Apothecary ware, there was infinite store growing in those parts: so as the whole army used it for coverings, and beds to lie upon: and of the spikenard which they trode under their feet, a most sweet smell diffused it self far off, [Arrian. lib. 6, pag. 138. and Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 721.]

He sent Craterus before him with a part of the army, into the mid-land countreys, both to subdue Arimania (under which name, all the Regions to the west of India, properly so called, even as far as Carmania, go) and so to go from thence forward into those places, which himself purposed to come unto; But Craterus marching through the countreys of the Aracotti, and the Drangæ, subdued by force the countrey of Choarina, which refused to submit themselves, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 721. 725.] And whereas Ozines (whom Arianus calls Ordones) and Tariaspes two noble men of Persia, endeavoured a revolt in Persia, he subdued them by force, and laid them in irons, [Curt. l. 9. c. 18.]

Himself with another part of the army, going through the country of Gedrosia, some 500 furlongs distant from the sea, and yet sometimes quartering near to the sea it self, marched through a barren, craggy, dry, and desolate countrey: for his desire was to visit the sea coast, all along, that he might discover, what places there were in those parts fit to make ports of; and there to make provision for his fleet, which was to come that way by his appointment, and for that purpose, to cause wells to be digged, and markets to be kept, and ports to be made, fit to receive them when they came, [Strabo, ut su. p. 721. and Arria. l. 6. p. 139.]

To this purpose, he sent before him one Thoantes, with a competent company of Horse, to scout about the sea coast; and to see wether there were any fit place for landing there, or fresh water near the shore; or other fitting provisions for them: who returning brought him word, that he found there certain poor fishermen: and that they had to dwell in, a kind of little cottages, built up and covered over with shells of fishes, and the back-bones of them serving for rafters; and that the men used litle water, and that it self, such as they digged out of the sand; and that not very sweet neither.

Alexander, coming at length into a countrey of the Gedrosians, where was store of corne, he seised it all into his own hand, and sealing up the sacks, wherein it was, with his own signet, and laying it upon carriages, sent it all away to the sea side. But whiles he went to the next ports, the souldiers, for all the seals, brake up the sacks, and took out out the corn, and spent it, for very hunger; in which action, they were the formost, who were principally trusted with the keeping of it: and Alexander, understanding that what was done, was for pure hunger, winked at it. And sent about all the country over to take up more corn, and sent that away by one Cretheus, to the sea side, to relieve the Fleet, with the army in it, which at that very time came to land in those parts: commanding also the natives, to go farther up into the country, & from thence to bring as much corn ready ground, and dates, and cattel, as possibly they could, and carry it to be sold at the sea side, to the army; and withal, dispatcht away Telephus one of his Nobles, to make further provision of corne ready ground, whereof he found some quantity, though not much; and carried it to another Port, according to directions.

Mean while some of the Oritans, dwelling in the mountains set upon Leonatus his Brigade, and slew a great number of them, and then retired into their fastnesse again: as Diodorus saith: and then the whole nation of the Oritans, joyning with other neighbouring countries, made a body of some 8000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and made a general revolt. But Leonatus meeting with them, cut off 6 thousand of their Foot, and all their Leaders: and lost of his own men, but 15 Horse, and some few Foot; but withal, there died in that fight, Apollophanes, Governour, as was said before, appointed by Alexander, of that whole country, [Curt. lib. 9. cap. 18, Arria. lib. 7. pag. 149. and in his Indica, pag. 184.]

Nearchus, coming a shoar at this place with his Fleet, took in provision of corn, provided by Alexander, to serve his army aboard for ten dayes: repaired his ships, that were any wayes leaky, and left such of his Mariners as he found not fit for sea, with Leonatus to serve at land, and took others in their room, out of his companies, [Arria. in his Indica, pag. 185.]

Philippus, whom Alexander had made Governour over the Oxydracans and Mallians, was set upon by his own mercenary companies, and by them murdered; and the murderers presently were set upon by the Macedons which were of his guard; and either then present, or immediately after, taken and hewed in pieces for their pains.

It is said, that Alexander endured many a hard brunt, and suffered more losses, in the country of the Gedrosians, than in all Asia besides; so that of all that army, which he carried with him into India, he brought scantly a fourth part out of Gedrosia; what with greivous diseases, ill diet, burning heats, deep sands, want of water, and famine, which he suffered in those parts. But Nearchus sayes, that Alexander, though he were not ignorant of the incommodities of this way, yet out of a selfwill'd ambition, which reigned, or rather raged in him, he would need force his way thorough it forsooth; because some had told him that Semiramis, and Cyrus both, had gone that way into India; and therefore he would needs return the same way out of it: though it was told him withal, that she was fain to save her self by flight from thence, with 20 men onely in her company; and Cyrus with seven, thinking it would prove a great glory for him, if, when they suffered so much there, he should be able to come off with his army safe and sound: wherefore partly out of this ambition, partly to favour and relieve his Navy, which he had appointed to meet him in those parts, it was, that Nearchus sayes, he would needs return homeward thorough that country. When his guides, missing their way thorough those vast sands, by reason the wind had confounded and covered all the tracks, which lead thorough them; Alexander guessing out of his own mother wit, that the way must needs lie on the left hand, took a small company of Horse with him, and went to see whether he could recover the sea shoar or no: but their horses being all spent to five, with the length and torridnesse of the way, lay behind, and he with those five onely in his company, came at length to the sea side, where digging a while, and finding fresh water to drink, he presently sent back for his whole army to come thither to him: and when they were come, he marched forward seven dayes journey, along the sea coast, and found plenty of fresh water all the way; and then his guides having found the way again, led him up into the midland countries, as he desired, [Strabo, ibid. pag. 722. Arria. pag. 142.]

At two moneths end therefore, after he parted from the country of the Oritans aforesaid, he came to the chief city of the Gedrosians, called Pura, and there he rested his army; and refreshed them with feastings, as was very fitting, and high time for him to do, [Strabo, ut sup. pag. 723. Arria. pag. 140. and 142. and Plut. in Alexan.]

From thence he dispatched away the swiftest courriers that possible he could finde, to Phrataphernes, whom he had left Governour of Parthia, and to the two Presidents of the Provinces of Drangia and Aria, lying at the foot of the mount Taurus, with commands to them, that they should forthwith get together as many Camels, Dromedaries, and others, with all sorts of beasts of draught or carriage, as possibly they could, and load them all with victuals, of all sorts, and send them in all haste to meet him at his his first entry into the countrey of Carmania; These letters speedily carried, and duly executed on all hands, caused, that when he came into Carmania, he found there all kind of provisions necessary, ready to receive him and his army, at the place appointed.

Menon, the Governor of the Arachosians, being lately dead, Alexander made one Sibyrtius, Governor of Arachosia and Gedrosia, both.

As Alexander was upon his march towards Carmania, news was brought him of the death of Philippus, Governour of the Oxydracans and Mallians: whereupon he presently wrate away to Eudemus and Taxilas, and by his letters, commended the charge and care of those two Provinces unto them, untill he should send a Governor to succeed in Philips roome.

So soon as he set foot in Carmania, Astaspes the Sattape of that province, met him, of whom there was a suspition that he would have revolted from him, whiles he was in India. Alexander concealing the grudge which thereupon he bare him, received him very graciously, and used him according to his ranke and quality, whiles in the mean time, he sought by all means possible to find out whether the suspition that was raised of him were true or false.

Here Craterus came unto him, with the rest of the army, and the Elephants, and bringing with him Ordones, al. Ozines, and Zariaspes, whom he had taken into custody, for having endeavoured a revolt in Persia. And thither came also Stasanor, Governor of the Provinces of Parthia and Hircania; and with them, the Captains and Commanders of all those forces which he had formerly left with Parmenion, in the Province of Media, to wit, Cleander and Sitalces, and Heracon and Agetho; which brought him 5 thousand foot, with a thousand horse.

Now the several Governors and Presidents in the parts of India, sent him in here, an infinite number of horses and other beasts of draught and carriage, some for pack-saddles, and some for panniards, out of every countrey of his dominions in India, some. Stasanor also, and Phrataphernes, brought him a huge number of drought Horses, and Camels: And Alexander presently distributed them all among those that wanted them to carry their goods upon, some he bestowed upon particular Captains, the rest he distributed among the soldiers, by troups and companies, as he saw cause; He also new armed his soldiers with as much bravery as ever: for why? they now drew near unto Persia, a country full, not onely of peace, but also of all manner of plenty and wealth.

Here Alexander (as Arrianus reports out of Aristobulus) offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving to his gods for his victory over the Indians, and for the safe coming of his army out of Gedrosia: and withal, entertained his armies with sports of musick and wrestlings, and such like: and moreover took Pencestes, who covered him with his target in the countrey of the Mallians, to be the chief Squire of his body, an honour, which at that time, seven only men had borne; Leonatus, Hephæstion, Lysimachus, Aristonus (all born in Pella) Perdiccas of the countrey of Macedonia; Ptolomei the son of Lagus, and Pithon, and the 8 was Pencestes, for his brave behaviour in saving the King from the Mallians. Others, and among them, Diodore, and Curtius, and Plutarch, say, that Alexander, whether in imitation or emulation of Bacchus, but in a drunken manner, spent seven days with his army, in his passage through Carmania, [Diodor. and Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and in the book of his good fortune; and Curtius, lib. 9. c. 18. with lib. 3. ib. c. 24. & lib. 8. c. 19.] which Arrianus therefore holds for very improbable, because that neither Ptolomeus, Aristobulus, nor any other credible Author in this kind, make any mention of it.

Aspastes the Governour of Carmania, was put to death, and Tlepolemus made Governor in his room, [Curt. lib. 9. cap. ult. Arria. lib. 6. pag. 142. and again in his Indica, pag. 193.]

Cleander and Sitalces, who slew Parmenion, by Alexanders command, were accused to him for many vilanies (which I mentioned before) by them committed both by the Provincials, and also by the army it self: nor could that slaughter by them committed, how acceptable soever it was to the King, expiate in his mind such a multitude of vilanies and grosse misbehaviours, as were laid to their charge: wherefore he put them forthwith in chains, to be done to death when he thought fit: but seven hundred private soldiers, whom they had used as executioners of their vilanies, he caused there presently to be executed, and at the same time also was execution done upon Ozines and Zariaspes, whom Craterus had brought prisoners, for endeavouring a rebellon in Persia as was said before.

Mean while Nearchus, having sailed along the coast of the Arabii, the Oritans, the Gedrosians, and the Icthyophagians (so called because they lived onely upon fish) arrived in the Gulf of Persia, and came to Harmozia, al. Armusia (which is now called Ormus, or Ormusa) and there drew up his ships, and went over-land with a small retinue tinue to Alexander, who as he heard by a Grecian, which came from the army, was not above five dayes journey off, and found him in a certain sea Town, called Salmuntes, busie in making stage-plaies there, and sitting himself on the open theatre.

Alexander also offered sacrifice there, to Jupiter, by the name of a deliverer, and to Hercules and Apollo, by the name of Apollo, Ἀλεξίκακος, (i. e.) the deliverer from evil, and Neptune for bringing his army safe out of the Ocean. He also made sports and games of Musick, and other Gymnick exercises; and made a pageant, which was led in by Nearchus, all the army setting themselves on work, to get flowers and garlands to strow upon him.

Alexander, having fully heard the relation which he made of his whole voyage, sent him back to the fleet, with a smal army to convoy him, because the whole country, which he was to passe, was, as he thought, friend, and willed him to saile up as far as the very mouths of the Euphrates, and to be in a readinesse from thence to row up to Babylon, when order should be given.

Tlepolemus was scantly warm in his Satrapie or Government of Carmania, when the natives all rose, and possessed themselves of the principal and strongest places, of that country; these also set upon Nearchus in his return, in sundry places, so that he was often put to it, and forced to fight twice or thrice in a day; yet with much ado, he came at length safe to the sea side, where he sacrificed to Jupiter his deliverer, and made games of dancing, running, wrestling, and the like: then loosing from Ormuse, he kept along by the shoare of the Persian gulf; and by such stages, as Arrianus in his Indica, out of Nearchus himself, delivereth, came to the mouth of the River Euphrates.

Alexander, understanding by letters from Porus and Taxiles, that Abisarus was dead, gave his kingdom to his son. He sent away also Eudemon, al. Eudemus, who was commander of the Thracians, to succeed Philip, slain, as aforesaid, in the government of the Oxydracans and Mallians.

He sent Hephæstion with the greater part of the army, and with the carriages and Elephants, to go out of Carmania into Persia by sea for that the Persian sea in the winter season it alwayes calm, and there was great store of provision in those parts.

Stalanor being sent back to his Government, Alexander himself, with the choicest of his Foot, and with the Horse of his confederates, and a part of his Archers, marched to Pasargadas in Persia, where he gave money among the women, as the fashion of the Persian Kings was, when ever they came into Persia, to give unto every woman there, a piece of gold.

At his very entrance into Persia Orsines, al. Orxines met him. He it was, who after the death of Phrasaortes the Governour there, (Alexander being then a far off in India) by his authority kept the Persians in their due subjection and allegance to him, till he gave order for another Governour to succeed in the deceaseds room. He was descended from one of the seven Princes of Persia, and deduced his pedigree from Cyrus himself, and now came, and met Alexander, and presented not him alone, but all his nobles also, with rich gifts, onely he gave nothing to Bagoas the Eunuch, and the Kings bardaschy; which proved afterward the cause of his destruction. [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 27. and lib. 10. cap. 3. Arrianus lib. 6.]

Whiles he was at Pasargadas there came unto him Atropates, the Governor of Media, bringing with him prisoner Baryaxes a Median, who had worn his Turbant upright, and called himself king of Medes and Persians; him therefore he brought prisoner to the King; and all those, who had been partakers with him in that action. All which Alexander caused forthwith to be put to death.

But he was most of all offended at that vilany committed upon Cyrus, his monument, which he found all broken down and spoiled, and the pretious things which he had formerly seen there, all save a litter, and a golden urn, wherein his body was put, purloined, and that also was broken, and the covering of the urne taken off, and his very body tumbled out of it by those sacrilegious theeves, and they had also gone about to hew in pieces, and batter the urne or coffin it self, the better to carry it away, by pieces, if it might have been; which because they could not, therefore they left it behind them. But Alexander presently gave order to Aristobulus, to rebuild his sepulchre in such form as it was before, and for those parts of his body which were left, to put them into the urne again, and to make a new cover for it; and to reform what was defaced, and to embellish it in all points, as formerly it was: and moreover, to mure up the dore, which led into the Chappel, where the body lay, with lime and stone, and to put the impression of the Kings seal upon it. All this Strabo reports, out of Aristobulus himself, [lib. 5. pag. 273.] And Arrianus, at the end of his 6 book.

After this, Alexander commanded the Magi or Priests, which had the keeping of the Sepulchre, to be taken and had to the rack, to make them confesse the authors of this sacrilege, who yet could never be drawn to confesse any thing, either against themselves, or any other person, and thereupon were discharged: yet Plutarch sayes, that Polymachus, though no mean person, and a Pellæan borne, was put to death by Alexander, onely for opening and looking into the Sepulchre.

From Pasargada, Alexander marcht to Persepolis, the Royal Seat of the Kings of Persia, which he himself had set on fire, and burnt to the very ground; but now at his return thither, he blamed himself for so doing. Here were many foul matters laid to Orxines his charge: as, That he had spoiled and robbed the Kings houses, and sepulchres of the dead, and done many of the Nobility of Persia to death. But in particular, Bagoas the Eunuch put it into the Kings head, that perhaps it was he, that had robbed the sepulchre of Cyrus too: wherein, said he, I have heard Darius say, there were 3000 talents layed up; and wrought so far with the King, that he forthwith caused the Noblest person of all the Persian Nation, and to him a most affectionate servant, to be crucified.

At the same time also, Phradates, who had formerly been Governour of the Hircanains, and Mardians, and Tapyrians, being now drawn into suspition of making himself a King, was put to death, [Curt. lib. 8. cap. 8. and lib. 10. cap. 4.]

Alexander now made Pencestes, (of whose worth in all kinds he had had so good proof, especially in that danger of his among the Mallians) Governour of Persia. And he presently, and onely of all the Macedons, put himself into the Median attire, and fell a learning of the Persian tongue; and began withal to order matters all after the Persian garb; for which Alexander much commended him, and the Persians were glad at heart, to see him use the Persian, rather than the Macedon attire.

And now a toy took Alexander again in the head; and he would needs fall down the Euphrates, and Tigris, and go see the Persian sea, and how those Rivers fell into the Ocean there, as formerly he had done, at the River Indus, and the sea which that falls into. Also, he had a purpose to sail round the coast of Arabia first, and then of all Africk; and so to return into the Mediterran Sea, and to Macedon by the way of Hercules his pillars, [Arria. lib. 7.] And being in this mood, he gave order to the Governours of Mesopotamia, to fell timber in Lebanon, and to carry it to Thapsacus a City in Syria, and to make keeles for huge ships to be built thereon; not all of seven tire high, as Curtius hath it; but some of one size, some of another, as we shall see anon out of Aristobulus, and all to be brought overland to Babylon: and order was given to the Kings of Cyprus to provide, brasse, and towe, and sailes, for this Fleet, [Curt. l.b. 10. cap. 2.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, coming with the Fleet to the mouth of the Euphrates, anchored at Diridotis, which is the chief Mart Town of the whole Province of Babylon; and where the Merchants of Arabia, with their frankincense and spicery, use to discharge; And there hearing that Alexander would go to Susa, they fell back, and went to the mouth of the River Pasitigris; and rowing up that River, they came to a country well inhabited, and plentifully stored with all provisions; and having rowed 150 furlongs, they there came to an anchor again; attending the return of them whom Nearchus had sent to bring him word where the King was. Mean while Nearchus there again sacrificed to the gods his deliverers, and made Games; so that the whole Sea-army, gave themselves wholy to pastime and merriment, [Arrian. in his Indica.]

Calanus an Indian borne, and a Gymnosophista, or of the sect of Philosophers, which went naked in those parts, having now attained the 73 year of his age, and had never in all that time felt ach in his bones, or other sicknesse or distemper in his body; happened now to fall into his first sicknesse at Pasargadas; wherefore finding some feeblenesse in his parts, and them to grow weaker every day more than other, when he came to the borders of the territory of Susa, (for there it was that this fell out, as Diodorus saith; and not in a suburbe of the City of Babylon, as Elian. lib. 5. Varia. Histor. cap. 6. will have it) he petitioned Alexander, that he would cause a great pile of wood to be made, and that when he was got up upon it, he would cause some of his servants to put fire to it. The King at first endeavoured to disswade him from his purpose; but when he could not, and the man told him, that if not that, he would die some other way: Alexander commanded a pile of wood to be dressed as he desired, and bad Ptolemei the son of Lagus, to take care for it, [Diodor. lib. 17. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 686. & 717. & Arria. lib. 7.] But as he was going to the Pile of wood, he saluted and kissed the hands, and bad farewell to all the rest, of his friends: but Alexanders hand he would not kisse; saying, that he should meet with him time enough at Babylon, to kisse it there; meaning, that he should die there, [Arria. lib. 7. pag. 160. Plut. in Alex. Cic. lib. 1. De divinat. Valer. Max. lib. 1. cap. 8.]

Now

Now Nearchus tells us, that so soon as the fire was put to the pile of wood, the trumpets sounded, for so Alexander had appointed; and the whole army there present, gave a shout, as if they had been ready to joyn in a battle: the Elephants also at the same time made a noise, such as they use when they enter a fight in the field; as if all had conspired to honour the funeral of Calanus. [Arrianus.]

Chares of Mitylene, addeth further, that Alexander, to honour his funeral, caused a prize of Musicians and Wrestlers to be proclaimed: and that, desirous herein to gratifie the Indian Nation, he made one match of drinking, a thing usual among them; and that he appointed a talent for him that could drink most, and 30 pounds for the second, and ten for the third: and when he had called many of his Nobles and Captains to that feast, he that drank most, was one Promachus, who drank off fower gallons and one pottle, and having received his talent for his prize, lived three days after, and then died; of the rest, 35 finding a starke chillinesse coming on them by the surfeit which they took instantly, and six others of them, shortly after, were found dead in their tents, [Athenæus, lib. 10. cap. 12. Plutarch in Alexander. Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 2. cap. 41.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, with their Navale army; continuing their course up the river Pasitigris came to a bridge newly made, over which Alexander with his army was to passe, to come to Susa; and there they anchored, [Arria. in his Indica, pag. 197. Pliny, [lib. 6. cap. 23.] saith, they found him at Susa, keeping holiday seven months after he left them at Patala, and in the 3 moneth after they set saile from thence: or rather in the sixth month, seeing we have already made it appear that they set out from Patalene, the very next moneth after he parted from them at the City Patala.

Now when both armies both of land and sea, were come together, Alexander offered sacrifice yet again, for his Navy and Army both, so preserved, and made playes and games for it: and whereever Nearchus went through the spaces of the camp, every man strowed flowers, and cast garlands on him, [Arria. ut sup.]

Alexander, having sent away Atropates to his Government, marcht to Susa: where when Abulites; who had made no provision at all for his entertainment, onely presented him with 3 thousand talents of silver, he bade him lay it before his horses, and when they would none of it; for what purpose then, said he, is this mony: Plutarch saith that Alexander laid Abulites in irons, and struck his son Oxathres al. Oxyartes through with a javelin: Arrianus saith, that he put both the father and son to death, for their ill behaviour, in their government at Susa.

Many of the Nations, which he had conquered, came in and complained of their Governors who little dreaming of Alexanders ever returning out of India, committed many and monstrous outrages, both upon the temples of their gods, and upon the sepulchres of the dead, and also upon the persons and fortunes of the subject: all which Alexander commanded to be executed in the view of those who came to complain against them, without all respect of nobility, favour or service, which otherwise they might have done; and now also Cleander and Sitalces, whom he had condemned whiles he was yet in Carmania, he caused to be executed for company, as guilty of the like disorders. Heracon also, who hitherto had scaped scot free, but was now accused by the men of Susa, for robbing and ransacking their temple, and thereof convicted, suffered according to his deserts. And now Alexander grew ready to hearken to every slight accusation, upon trivial matters, and to punish with death and torment, every small offence, conceiving with himself, that they who acted small matters, intended greater in their minds.

And when the fame of such his severity against his officers in their several places flew abroad, many, considering what themselves had done, began to fear what might come thereof: some of which packing up what moneys they had gotten, fled away into unknown parts, others who commanded over mercinary companies, openly revolted from him: whereupon letters were presently dispatcht away to all the Governors and Presidents of countreys throughout all Asia, to disband and send away all mercenary companies, [Diodor. yer 2. Olym. 113.]

No sooner then, was this order put in execution; but forthwith many strangers, finding themselves cashiered, went straggling over all Asia, and for want of pay, lived upon the spoile of the countrey, till at length they all came into one body, at Tenarus in Laconia: and so likewise all the Commanders and Governors of the Persians which were left, gathering together what men and moneys they could make, came all to Tenarus, and there joyned their forces together, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 113. and year 2. Olymp. 114.]

Alexander now took to wife, Statira, the eldest daughter of Darius, and besides her another, as Aristobulus tells us, called Parysatis, the youngest daughter of Ochus; and gave Drypates the youngest daughter of Darius, and his own wives sister in marriage to Hephæstion. To Craterus, he gave Amestris, the daughter of Oxyarta, al. Oxathra, a daughter of Oxathres the brother of Darius. Perdiccas married the daughter of Atropates the governour of Media. Nearchus had given him to wife the daughter of Spitamenes the Bactrian; to Ptolemeus the son of Lagus, the squire of his body, and to Eumenes, were given the two daughters of Artabazus, and sisters unto Barsina, by whom, though not in lawfull wedlock: Alexander himself had a son, called Hercules. Ptolomei his wife, was called Artacama, al. Apama; but she whom Eumenes married, Artonis: where we must note by the way, that the name of Barsine in Arrianus, [lib. 7. pag. 148.] is put for Statira: But in Plutarch, in the beginning of the Life of Eumenes, where he nameth his wife, it is, I know not how, crept in for Artonis.

Upon all the rest of his Nobles likewise, Alexander bestowed wives, of the most illustrious families that were of the Medes and Persians, in all to the number of 80, as Arrianus, or 90, as Elian, 92 as Chares, 100 as Plutarch, in his discourse of the Fortune of Alexander affirmeth. Now these marriages of Alexander and his Nobles were all made and solemnised, at one and the self same time, the King bestowing a dowry with every one of them; and for five dayes together, celebrated these marriages, with that pomp and magnificence of feasting, and Mascarades, as is set down by Elian, [lib. 8. cap. 7. Var. Hist. and by Atheneus, Deipnosoph. lib. 12. cap. 18. out of Chares of Mytylene, lib. 10. of his History of Alexander.] To every one of the guests, who amounted in all to the number of nine thousand; it is said, that he gave a golden vial to sacrifice a drink offering withall. To the rest of the Macedons, who had formerly married wives out of Asia, which amounted to above ten thousand men, he gave them every man wedding gifts.

Moreover, he thought it fitting at this time, to pay every one of the souldiers debts out of his own store: and when he had given order that every one should give in a ticket of what he owed, that thereupon they might receive every man his money, at the first very few gave in their tickets, fearing that this was but a devise of the Kings to find out who they were, that could not live of their pay, by reason of their riotous expenses. But among those, who did give in their names, there was one Antigenes, with one eye, and who had lost the other under Philip, at the siege of Perinthus, with the hurt of a dart from the wall. He feigning himself to be more in debt then indeed he was, brought one to the pay-master; who affirmed to him, that he had lent the said Antigenes so much money: whereupon Antigenes received it. But the King being afterward informed of this abuse of his, grew wroth thereat, and forbad him ever after to come within his court, and took from him an office, which he had; which brand of ignominy, he took so to heart, that he thought thereupon to kill himself; which Alexander perceiving, remitted his displeasure, and suffered him to enjoy his money.

But when he heard that many, who were truely in debt, would not yet give in their names, but would keep their own counsel, and would not be know what they ought, he then openly blamed them for being so distrustful of him, saying, that a King should be no other than true to his subjects, nor the subjects have other opinion of their King, but that he would be in all things true unto them. And then he caused tables to be set out in sundry places of the Camp, with monies on them; and whoever brought in his ticket of what he owed, received presently his money, without being asked so much as what his name was, and then they began to believe that Alexander was Alexander, and a man of his word, indeed.

That largesse of his among his souldiers, amounted, as Justin and Arrianus report, to upward of 20 thousand talents, whereas Diodorus more probably saith, that it came to little lesse than ten thousand, for Curtius and Plutarch say, that of 10 thousand talents brought forth, there were, 130 left all paid, with this lennoy over and above of Curtius, So that, saith he, that army, conqueror of so many nations, brought yet more honour and glory, then spoil and riches out of Asia.

Sundry other gifts did Alexander at that time bestow upon several men in the army, either according to degree and quality, or in regard of some memorable services which they had done, and upon those which excelled in this kind, he bestowed over and above Crowns of gold to wear: as first, upon Pencestes, who covered him with his Target against the Mallians, and next him upon Leonatus, who at the same time also fought most manfully in his defence, and had upon sundry occasions behaved himself bravely in the country of the Oritans, and thirdly upon Nearchus, who had brought his Navy and army therein safe out of Indie thorough the Ocean into those parts: and in the fourth place Onesicritus, the Pilote of the Kings ships, and then Hephæstion, and other squires of his body.

Mean while, there came unto him the Governours of sundry Cities, which he had built, and divers Provinces, by him subdued, bringing with them to Susa 30 thousand souldiers out of Persia and other Nations (of which I spake formerly in the year of the World 3676.) all young men, and of an age, goodly persons all, to look on, and of great great performance. These being thus selected by the Kings command, and trained and marshalled after the Macedonian manner and discipline in feates of armes, and all gloriously armed, encamped before the walls of Susa; where when they had given a proof of their readinesse and good addresse in Marshal Discipline before the King, the King highly rewarded them every man, and gave them the name of Epigoni; that is, of an after brood, growing up in their room; who in feates of Chivalry, and Conquering the World, had gone before them.

d. Alexander, having delivered over the greater part of his land army to Hephæstion, to be led to the coast of the Persian Gulf, and given order for his Navy to come to the country of Susa; took shipping there with his silver Targateers and his Phalanx or Main Squadron, and part of his fellow Cavalleers, and fell down by the River Ulay, into the Gulf of Persia. But before he came at it, left many of his ships, which were any wayes bilged and leaky, and with the rest went forward and came about from the mouth of that River by sea, to the River Tigris: the rest he sent up the channel or cut, by which the Tigris is drawn into the Ulay, and so they also came into the River it self of Tigris.

Alexander, compassing about all the shoar of the Persian Gulf, which lieth between the two mouths, that of the River Ulay, and that other of Tigris, came to his Camp; where Hephæstion with the army attended his coming. Then returned he again to Opis, a City seated upon the bank of the Tigris; and as he went on, caused all the dams, locks, and sluces, which the Persians had made upon that River, to hinder the accesse of any enemy by sea to Babylon, to be taken away; saying, That they were but shifts and devises of those, who were of little worth in themselves, [Arria. lib. 7. with Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 740.]

But so soon as he came to Opis, he called all his army together, and declared to them that his purpose was, to discharge all such, as thorough age, or otherwise, found themselves grown unserviceable for the war, and to give them free leave to return every man to his own home: but for such as were able and would stay, he promised to make their condition such, and to bestow such largesse upon them, as should make their eyes ake, that lay idleing at home; and should encourage the rest of the Macedons to come and share with them in their fortunes.

This he did with a purpose to gratifie the Macedons: But they took it, as if thereby he went about to disgrace them, and held them for no better than a company of uselesse men for his wars; and champing upon this bit, called to mind all other grievances, and occasions of discontent by him formerly given them in any kind: as that he went attired in a Median Robe; and that all those goodly marriages that he made, were all solemnized forsooth, after the Persian fashion: that Peucestes his Governour of Persia, was turned altogether Persian, both in attire and language, and that Alexander himself delighted, but too much, in these new fangles, and outlandish fashions. That the Bactrians, Sogdians, Arachosians, Zarangians, Arians, Parthians, and those Persian Horse, which were called Euaca, were mixed with, and reckoned among his fellow Cavaleers. That now there was a fifth Brigade of Horse set up; not altogether indeed consisting of forreign nations; but yet that encreasing the number of his Horse, there were taken into them, Cophes the son of Artabazus, Hydarves, and Artiboles; the two sons of Mazæus, Itanes the son of Oxyartes, and brother to Roxane, Alexanders wife, Ægobares, and his brother Mithrobæus; and that he had made Hydaspes a Bactrian by birth, Commander over that Regiment: and that instead of the Macedonian Spear, they used a Javelin, after the manner of forreign nations. That he had erected a new company of young forreigners, calling them Epigoni, and armed them after the Macedonian manner. And lastly, that in all things he despised and scorned the Macedonian Discipline and Customs, and the Macedons themselves: wherefore one and all cryed out, and desired to be discharged, and to serve no longer in the wars: bidding him and his father Hammon, go fight hereafter if they would, seeing he grew weary of, and cared no more for his own souldiers, who had hitherto fought for him.

In this combustion, Alexander enraged as he was, leapt off the place, where he stood speaking to them, and with such Captains as were about him, and flew in among them, and took thirteen of the principal mutineers, and which stirred up this sedition among the rest; and delivered them to the Serjeants, to be bound hand and foot and thrown into the Tigris: so great was either the dread of the King upon them in making them take their death so patiently as they did, or the resolution of the King himself, in doing them to death, according to Marshal Discipline: and then attended onely with his Nobles and Squires of his body, he went to his lodging; and there neither eat nor slept, nor suffered any man to have accesse to his presence all that day, no nor yet the next.

Upon the third day, he called his forreign souldiers together, commanding the Mace-

Macedons, not to bugde out of their Tents; and when they came, he spake to them by an interpreter, and commanded their perpetual loialty to himself, and to their former Kings, and withal reckoned up, and put them in mind of the many favours and honours, which he had conferred upon them, how he had never used them as conquered persons, but as fellow souldiers and partakers, of all his conquests, and had mingled the conquered with the conquerors, by mutual affinities & entermarryings, the one with the other: Wherefore, saith he, reckon not your selves, as made, but born, my souldiers: The kingdoms of Asia and Europe are become all one; what was novelty before, is now growen natural by long use and custom, and you are no lesse my country men, then you are my souldiers.

And presently he chose out of them a thousand tall young men, and appointed them for a guard of his person, the chief commands of the army, he bestowed among the Persians, and called the severall Troups and Companies, by Macedonian names, and these he also called his Cousins and Nobles, and gave them onely the priviledge, to be admitted to kisse his hand, [see Polyanus Stratag. 4. in Alexander nn. 7.]

When the Macedons saw the King come abroad guarded onely with Persians, and that out of them, all Serjeants, and other attendants were taken, and they promoted to all places of dignity and honour, about his person, and themselves cast off, with scorn and infamie; their courage abated, and conferring a while among themselves, ran all together to the Kings lodging, and casting off all their cloths to their very wast-coats, threw down their armes at the Court gates; and standing themselves without, lift up a pitifull cry, and desired to be admitted, offering to give up every author of that mutiny, and desired the King to satiate himself with their deaths, rather than their disgraces. But he, though his choler were down, yet would not admit them: and they on the contrary would not away, but continued there crying and howling two whole dayes and nights, and calling upon him, by the name of their Lord and master, protesting never to leave his gate, untill he had mercy on them: wherefore upon the third day he came forth unto them, and seeing their humiliation, and dejection before him, with their unfeigned sorrow, and hearing their pittiful complaint and lamentation which they made, was moved to compassion of them; and wept a long time over them: and when he stood a good while, as if he would speak unto them, but could not; and they continued all that time upon their knees before him.

Then one Callines by name, a man venerable for his age, and of no mean esteem in the regiment of his fellow Cavaleers, spake thus unto him, This is that, saith he, O King, which grieves thy Macedons, that now thou hast made some of the Persians, thy Cousins, and these thou hast received to kisse thy hand, and hast deprived thy Macedons of this honour, and when he would have proceeded, Alexander interrupted him, and said, I now make you all my Cousins, and from henceforward, will call you by that name. This said, Callines stept out, and went and kissed his hand, and so did as many else, as had a mind to it, and then taking every man up his arms again, they all returned with joy and triumph into the Camp.

Then went the King and sacrificed to the gods, as he was wont to do, and made a general feast for all the army; sitting down himself, first with his Macedons, and then the Persians, and after them, the rest, according to their several ranks and qualities in the Army. Then took Alexander a boll, and drank, and so it went round among the Macedons. The Grecian Prophets, and Persian Priests; powring forth their prayers, and among all other prosperities, and favours from their gods, desired of them, to grant a concord and unity of Empire between the Macedons and Persians, and both kingdoms. It is said, that there were nine thousand guests, which sate at this feast, and that they all pledged this health, and sang the same Pæana, or Song of joy and gladnesse unto Apollo, as they used to do, when they returned from a victory into their Camp.

Alexander, passing over the Tigris, encamped in a country, called Cares, and then having passed the region called Sitacene in four dayes march, he came to Sambana; where he camped seven dayes: and then after three dayes journy, he arrived at Celovæ, where Xerxes heretofore had made a plantation, of those, which he brought out of Bæotia, and then turning a little out of the right way, leading to Babylon, he went to see Bagisthenes, a country abounding with fruit, and all other commodities, belonging either to the pleasure or profit of mans life.

Mean while, Harpalus a Macedon born, chief Baron and Tresurer, of all the Kings monies in Babylon, and revenues of that whole province, being privy to himself of his wastfulnesse, and other ill behaviour there, and knowing what Alexander had done, to many other Governours, upon complaints made of them, by the provincialls, got together five thousand talents of silver, and six thousand hired souldiers, and fled quite out of all Asia, and coming with them to Tænarus in Laconia, left them there, (whither, others also, which could not well stay in Asia, had already retired themselves, as I said said before) and came himself to Athens, in suppliant wise: But when Antipater and Olympias demanded him out of their hands, he so dealt with the people of Athens, by feeing Demosthenes, and other Orators there, that he escaped, and returned safe to his company at Tenarus, [Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 113. Pausanias in his Attica, Plutarch in the lives of Demosthenes and Phocyon,] In Arrianus there is a blank left, [lib. 7. pag. 155.] in which place this flight of Harpalus from Babylon, should have been joyned to that journey of Alexanders thitherward, [as appears by Photius in his Biblioth, cap. 91.] and that there was an action brought against this Harpalus, περὶ δώρων, (i. e.) of bribes received by him, Dionysius Halicarnassæus, in the end of his Epistle to Ammæus concerning Demosthens, when Anticles was L. Chancellor at Athens, which was, as I said before, in this 4 year of the 113 Olympiade, according to his account, plainly sheweth.

A contention falling between Hephæstion and Eumenes, concerning a certain gift, whatever it was, and wherein many foul words passed between them, Alexander composed the difference and made them friends, much against Hephæstions will, and not without some threatning speeches used by Alexander to him; but much to the content of Eumenes, [Plut. in Eumenes. Arria. l. 7. p. 155.]

When Alexander had encamped here 30 dayes, he set forward again, and upon the 7 day after, came to Ecbatane, the chief city of all Media: the circumference whereof was said to be 250 furlongs, where, as his manner was, after any good successe, he offered sacrifices, and made games of musick, and gymnic sports, and exercises in honour of his gods; and feasted himself with his nobles; and then having ordered all matters in that kind, he returned again to see his stage-plaiers, and Anticks act their parts, and moreover, instituted certain set feasts and clubbings, because there were newly come unto him out of Greece, 3 thousand Cooks, and other ministers, and artificers of that kind.

Apollodorus of Amphipolis, a noble man about Alexander, and whom he had made General of that army, which he had left with Mazæus, when he made him Governour of the City and province of Babylon, hearing what course he took with such Governors or chief officers as he had set over the several regions of his dominions, took a fright, as his fellow Harpalus had done before him, and having a brother called Pythagoras, who was a kind of a soothsayer, consulted him by his letters, to know what was like to become of him: And Pythagoras by his letters back again to him, desired to kow for fear of whom it was that he would have his fortune told? and he answered, it was for fear of Alexander and Hephæstion: whereupon he first looked into the entrailes of a beast for Hephæstion, and when he found that the liver of it had no filets, he wrate back again to his brother from Babylon to Ecbaton, and bade him never fear Hephæstion, for that he should shortly depart this life himself; which letter, Aristobulus reports, was written the very day before Hephæstion died, [Arria. l. 7. with Apian, toward the end of his second book De Bell. Civi.]

For Hephæstion being over much given to wine, fell thereby into a fever: and being a young man and a souldier, would keep no diet, which was prescribed him, but whiles his Phisition Glaucus, al. Glaucias, was a little away, fell to his dinner as at other times, and eating of a roasted dunghil cock, & taking a huge draught of frigifacted wine after it, felt himself presently not well, and upon the seventh day after, died of it.

Upon the same day there were certain gimnic games, exercised before the King, by the boyes, or pages of the Court, from which he suddenly arose, and went to see Hephæstion, but when he came, found him dead, whereupon he refrained all eating for 3 dayes space; nor took any care of himself; but lay all that while, either sullenly silent, or impatiently lamenting the losse of his Hephæstion: Afterward he changed his attire, and caused not only himself and his souldiers, but even very horses and mules, to be all shorne: and caused the pinnacles of Ecbatane, and all other cities and towns thereabouts, to be taken down from their walls, to the end that they looking in a worse, and more deformed fashion than they did before, might seem in a sort, to lament and bewail his death; and withal crucified his poor Physition that could not help it: commanded there should no sound of pipe or flute be heard in all the camp, gave order for a general mourning among all Nations to be made for him, [Diodorus, year 3. Olymp. 113. Plut. in his Alex. and Pelopidas. Arria. l. 7. and upon Epictetus, l. 2. c. 22. Elian Var. Hist. l. 7. c. 8.]

He gave his body to Perdiccas, to be carried to Babylon; for that there he intended to bestow bestow on him a most magnificent funeral, and had often speach with the principall architects about him, of making a most sumptuous monument for him, especially, with Stalicrates, who made profession of new and rare inventions, in devising and erecting vast and excessive buildings.

Now Eumenes, fearing lest Alexander might conceive that he was glad of Hephæstions death, put him on the more upon this project, and suggested to him new devises, as perteining much to the honour of Hephæstion, devoting both himselfe and his armes to Hephæstion, and sundry other of the Nobles, following Eumenes his example, did the like. [Plutarch in the Life of Eumenes, and Arrianus lib. 7.]

And moreover, whereas Hephæstion was Colonel of the Regiment of the Kings fellow Cavaleers, he put none to succeed him in that place, lest happily the name of Hephæstion should be forgotten among them, but caused that Regiment to go by the name of Hephæstions Regiment, And the Cornet which he gave to be born still before them, when ever they went to fight.

b. At last, to put himself out of this melancholly fit, he would needs go and make a needlesse war, and parting his army with Ptolomei, went a hunting of men, and to drive the country as he would drive a forest for wild beasts; and fell upon the Cossæans, a people bordering upon the Uxians, and inhabiting the mountainous parts of Media: which all the Persian Monarchie could never bring under their subjection; nor were in all these wars ever daunted in courage, or thought the Macedons such bugbears, as to be afraid of them. But he first took the passages leading thorough the mountains into their country, and wasted their borders: and going further on, routed them in sundry conflicts, and destroyed them wherever he came without mercy, and called that, Hephæstions funeral feast. Now as well Nearchus, as Arrianus, tells us, that he thus set upon these Cossæans in the depth of Winter, when they little dreamt of any enemy to come upon them, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 524. Arria. lib. 7. pag. 157. and in his Indica, pag. 196. See also Polyænus, Stratag. lib. 4. in Alexan. nu. 31.]

The Cossæans, seeing they had ever the worst of it, and grieved to see what multitudes of them were taken prisoners, were fain at length to redeem their fellows lives, with their own slavery; and giving themselves up wholy to Alexanders will and pleasure, had peace granted them, upon these terms, That they should be obedient in all things, to the King, and do whatever he commanded. So Alexander having subdued all that nation within 40 dayes space, and built sundry Cities upon the most difficult passages of the country, returned with his army.

Alexander sent one Heraclides, with certain Shipwrights into Hircania, to fell timber there, for the building of ships, all men of War, some with decks some without, after the Grecian manner; for he had a great desire to be acquainted also with the Caspian sea, and to know to whom it belonged.

c. When he had passed with his army over the Tigris, then marched he strait forward to Babylon; yet so as he made divers encampings by the way, and rested his army in sundry places to refresh them; and when he removed at any time, made easie marches. And now he was come within 300 furlongs of Babylon, when the Chaldean Priests, and Prophets, sent unto him, by one of their own company, called Belephantes, advising him by no means to come to Babylon; for that if he did, it would prove fatal to him.

Alexander, when he had understood by Nearchus, (for himself durst not have speech with Bellephantes) what these Chaldeans errand was, he sent many of his Nobles thither; but himself turned aside from it, and would not go into it, but encamped some 200 furlongs off from it, at a place called Bursia, which perhaps is the same which Prolomei calls Bersita, a City long since destroyed and there stayed.

There was he perswaded by Anaxarchus, and other Grecians, and their philosophical reasons, not to regard those predictions of the Priests and Magicians, but rather to reject and despise them, as vain and false. Whereupon he brake out with that Iambick Verse of Euripides,

Μάντις δ' ἄριστος, ὅστις εἰκάζει καλῶς: (i. e.)
Who best can guesse, he the best Prophet is.

Then the Chaldæans desired him, that if he would needs enter that City, yet at least he would not enter it with his face toward the West: but take the pains to go about, and come into it, looking toward the East. And Aristobulus tells us, that he was content to hearken to them in that point; and therefore the first day he marched as far as to the River Euphrates: but the next day, having the River on his right hand, he marched along the bank thereof, as desirous to passe by that part of the City which looked toward the West, that so he might come in looking toward the East: but when

when he found that way flabby, and full of flowes and fens, and cumbersome for his army to passe, he neglected that very point of their counsel also, and entered it; with his face toward the West, [See Appian. toward the end of his second book, De Bello Civi. and Seneca, Suasor. 4.]

When he came to the walls of the City, he lookt and beheld a flock of Crows, fighting and killing one another: whereof some fell down dead hard by him. And when Apollodorus told him, that he had a brother in that Citiy called Pythagoras, who was versed in the skill of soothsaying, by looking into the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice, and that he had already consulted the gods that way concerning him; he forthwith sent for him, and asked him what he found concerning him: Sir, said he, I found the liver of the beast without strings or filets: without strings? (quoth Alexander) what means that? The meaning, Sir, is, quoth Pythagoras, that some great mischief hangs over your head: or as Appian, that you shall shortly die; for which so far was it off, that Alexander, grew offended with him, that from thence forward, he made the more of him; because of his free and clear dealing with him in the way of his profession: And thus much Aristobulus relates, that he learnt from Pythagoras himself.

When the Babylonians had enterteined his army in all courteous manner, as at his former being there, they did, all betook themselves to ease and luxury, for that there was no want of any thing that the heart of man could wish in that place, [Diodor.]

While Alexander resided at Babylon, there came in Ambassadors to him from all the parts and nations of the world; for besides those that came out of Asia, from Cities, and Princes and Countries there, there came also sundry others, out of Europe and Affric: out of Affric, from the Ethiopians dwelling about the Temple of Hammon, and from the Carthaginians, and other Punick nations, bordering all along the sea coast, as far as Hercules his pillars, and the western sea, out of Europe, from the several Cities of Greece, and out of Macedon it self; as also from the Thraciants, Illyrians, Scythians, and out of Italy, from the Brutians, Lucanians, and Hetrurians, with the Islands of Sicily, and Sardinia, and from Spain and France, whose very names and habits, the Macedons never knew nor had heard of before.

Alexander, calling for a list of them, appointed, which of them should have audience first, and so forward, till he should have heard them all; and he resolved to give audience first of all to such as came about any matter concerning religion: and in the second place, to such as came to him with presents, in the third, to them, who came about differences, or wars, which they had with their neighbouring nations. In the fourth, to them which came about their particular and private interests. And in the last place, those, who came to shew cause, why they did not restore any Grecians, whom they had banished out of their cities or countries, to their homes and estates again; for the hearing of all which, he caused a throne of gold to be set up in the garden there, and seats for his nobles, all born up with feet or frames of silver; whereon taking his place with his Nobles, he purposed to give them audience, as Athenæus [lib. 12. cap. 18.] reports out of one Ephippius Olynthius: wherein his chief purpose and care was, upon hearing of the cause, to give such answers, as might give all content, and send every man away satisfied and well pleased therewith.

The first which he gave audience to, were they, which came from the City Elis, then to those, which came from the Temple and City of Ammon, from Delphos, from Corinth, Epidaurus and others, hearing of every of them in order, according to the dignity and fame of the Temples, rather than of the cities from whence they came.

When he had heard the Ambassadors from Epidaurus, and granted their suit, he sent moreover a present and oblation by them to their God Esculapius; but with these words added, That Esculapius had dealt but untowardly with him, in taking lately away from him, a friend, whom he loved as his own life: and then look what Statues soever of illustrious persons, or Images of the gods, or any other consecrated thing Xerxes had heretofore taken and brought out of Greece, and set them up, or otherwise bestowed them in Babylon, Susa, Pasargada, or elsewhere in all Asia, those he gave order to the Ambassadors of Greece, to take and carry them home again with them, and among the rest, he now caused the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton, to be returned to Athens, with the Image of Diana Cercæa.

But as concerning the restitution of the banditoes of Greece, he sent this short Epistle, by Nicanor, a native of the city Stagyra, to be read and proclaimed, at the next Olympian games to be held, in this wise. Βασιλεὺς Ἀλέξανδρος τοῖς, &c. (i.) King Alexander, to the Banditoes of Greece, sendeth greeting. We were not in fault that you were banished, but we will take care, to see you restored to your former estates, all save such as are banished for outragious crimes, of which things we have written to Antipater, requiring him to proceed by way of force, against all such as shall oppose your restitution, [Diod. lib. 17. year 2. Olymp. 113. and lib. 18. year 2. Olymp. 114.]

Having dispatched this matter of Embassies, he set himself to take care of Hephæstions funeral, commanding the Cities thereabouts to contribute what they possibly could, to the adornment thereof. And moreover sent an expresse command to all the Cities and nations of Asia to put out the fire, which among the Persians, is called Holy fire, till the exequies of this Funeral were fully finished, as was wont to be done, in the Funerals of the Kings of Persia: which was taken for an ill bode to the king himself, and as a portender of his death.

Whereupon all his chief Commanders and Nobles, set themselves, for the Kings pleasure, to make Medailes, or Portraictures of Hephæstion, graven in Ivory, or cast in gold, or other costly mettal: Himself called together the most exquisite workmen, that were to be had, and a great number of them, and brake down the wall of Babylon, ten furlongs long; and took the brick of it, and first levelling the place, built thereon a four square pile, each square taking up a furlong in length, and 130 cubits high, whereon the body was to be burnt. This work of his Diodorus describeth at large, summing up the particulars, of the cost of this sumptuous Funeral; because the Mourners, the Souldiers, Ambassadors, and Natives of the Country, strove a vie, who should give most toward the charge thereof, amounting in all to above 12 thousand talents: which very summe, Justin also hath, [lib. 12. cap. 12.] Though Plutarch and Arrianus, have but 10 thousand.

Alexander, throwing his armes first into the fire, threw in also gold and silver to be burned with him; with a Robe, of a great value and esteem among the Persians, [Elia. Var. Histor. lib. 7. cap. 8.] and besides he made Gymnick Games, and of musick, far beyond all that ever he had made before; both for number of the Prizers, and value of the Prizes themselves, to those, which wan them; for it is said, that there were no lesse than three thousand, which put in for the Prizes in all kinds, [Arria. lib. 7.]

And then also it so fell out, that Philip, one of the Kings Nobles, returned to him from the Temple of Hammon, whither he had been sent, and brought word from the Oracle there, that Hephæstion might well be sacrificed to, as to a demy god: whereat Alexander was infinitely glad; and first of all offered to him upon that stile: and then sacrificing to the number of 10 thousand beasts of all kinds, he made a Magnificent Feast to all the multitude, [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 114. compared with Arria. lib. 7. pag. 157. 164.] He gave in charge also to Cleomenes the Governour of Egypt (as we have noted formerly in the year of the World 3673. a.) a lewd man, to erect Templs to his name; and generally no contract in writing to be good or valid, if Hephæstions name were not subscribed to it: adding this also in the letter which he wrote unto him about this matter: ἢν γὰρ καταλάβω ἐγὼ τὰ ἱερὰ, &c. (i.e.) For if I shall find, that thou shalt have duly erected Temples to Hephæstion in Egypt as to a demy god; I will not onely pardon thee all thy past offences which in thy government thou hast committed; but whatever thou shalt hereafter commit in any kind, shall never be laid to thy charge by me. Whereupon many Cities presently fell in hand with building of Temples and Chappels, to Hephæstion, erecting altars, offering sacrifices, and enjoyning Holidayes, to be kept in his name: and the most religious oath that a man could make, was if he sware by Hephæstion, it is true or false: And death it was for any man to faulter or faile in his devotion unto him; many dreames were said to have been of him, and that his ghost appeared to many; and of words which his ghost should utter, and answeres which it made. To conclude, sacrifices were offered to him, as to a tutelar god, and a Revenger of all evil. Wherefore Alexander at the very first was wonderfully pleased with such phancies in other men; but after a while, he began to believe them himself; and spared nota to brag and boast, that he was not onely himself Joves son, but also that he could make gods of other men. At which time also, one Agathocles a Samian borne, and one of Alexanders prime Captains, was in extreme danger of his life, for being accused, that passing by Hephæstions Tombe, he was seen to weep; and had undoubtedly died for it, had not Perdiccas holpen him out by a lye of his own making, & swore it too, by Hephæstion himself, that Hephæstion appeared to him as he was a hunting, and told him, that Agathocles, did weep for him indeed, but not as for one that was dead, and now vainly called upon, and worshipped as a god; but wept onely in a due remembrance of the former intimacy and familiarity that was between them two: but for which tale, Agathocles a great Souldier, and ever well deserving of the King, had without peradventure lost his life, for being so kind to his deceased friend, [Lucian. in his book περὶ διαβολῆς: (i.e.) of false accusing.]

The 114. Olympiade was celebrated at Elis, in which year all agree, that Alexander died: as [Josephus sayes, lib. 1. cont. Apio.] when Hagesias, al. Hegesias, was L. Chancelor at Athens: as [Diodor. lib. 17. sayes,] and Arrianus in [his 7 book] of the Gests

Gests of Alexander, confirmes, to wit, toward the end of his year of Chancelorship: and in this very Olympic year, as shall eftsoones appear by the moneth wherein he dyed.

In that general assembly of all Greece, at the Olympic games, was that letter of Alexander, for the restoring of all banditoes, or outlawed persons, to their homes and estates again, read openly by him whose office it was to proclaim him that had won the prize in any kind of those games: neverthelesse, the Athenians and Etolians protested against it, [Diodorus, year 2. Olymp. 113. Justin, lib. 13. c. 5.]

Whiles he was at Babylon, he received, as Aristobulus reporteth, his fleete, which partly went out of the Euphrates, into the Persian sea, under the command of Nearchus, and partly had been built in Phœnicia and Cyprus: of the Phænician ships, there were two, each of them of five tire of Oares, and three, of four tire, of three tire high, twelve; and 30 vessels, of 30 Oares a peece; all which had been taken in pieces, and carried overland to the city Thapsacus, and there put together again, and came by the Euphrates unto Babylon, Alexander caused certain other ships also to be built at Babylon, of those Cypresse trees which he found in their gardens there, for as for other timber fit for shipping, there was none to be found in those parts. And moreover there was brought unto him, lying at Babylon, all other provisions for shipping, out of Phænicia, and other cities, lying along the sea coasts in Asia, and wrights, and mariners of all sorts, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 741. Arrian, lib. 7, pag. 161. out of Aristobulus.]

Moreover Alexander caused a Port to be made among the Babilonians, big enough to recieve a thousand saile of ships of war, adding galleries and docks thereto, and sent Miccalus a Clazomenian born, with 500 talents into Phænicia and Syria, to perswade or hire as many seamen as possibly he could, to come and serve him: for he had a purpose to make several plantations upon the Persian gulf, assuring them that those, would be as rich to dwell in, as any places in Phenicia were, [Arrianus, ibid.]

All which preparation by sea, was to set upon the Arabians, under this colour, that among all other nations, they onely had never sent any Embassadors unto him; nor shewed any duty or respect unto him: whereas indeed, it was out of an immoderate desire he had to be soveraign over all alike, and whereas he had heard that they worshipped two gods onely, Jove or Heaven, and Bacchus, he thought himself not unworthy to be worshipped as a third God among them; if he could overcome them, and restore to them, as he had done to the Indians, their pristine liberty, [Strabo and Arria. ut sup.]

And whereas he had heard say that Arabia, lying upon the sea coast, was of as large an extent as all India, and had many Islands lying upon their coast, he sent Archias, and Androsthenes, to wit, that Androsthenes of Thasus, (of whom Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 766. and Theophrastus, lib. 2. of Plants, cap. 7. maketh mention.) and Hieron of Solos, with three ships of 30 Oares apiece, from Babylon, with charge, that sailing round about that Chersonese, or Peninsula of Arabia, they should discover and inform themselves of the ports of all that region: of these, Archias brought him word, that there were two Islands which lay out in the sea, at the mouth of the river Euphrates, the one a lesser, consecrated to Diana, one hundred and twenty furlongs off from the land (which Alexander, as Aristobulus saith, caused to be called Icarus:) the other a greater one, a day and a nights sail off from the shoare, in the same latitude, called Tylus: But Hieron, which went further than any of the rest, brought him word that the Chersonse was of a vast extent, and had a foreland which ran far out into the Ocean: which they also who came with Nearchus by sea, out of India, descried to be not far off, before they stood in for the mouth of the Euphrates, [Arrianus, lib. 7. and in the end also of his Indica.]

Whiles his ships of war were in building, and the haven a digging in Babylon, Alexander himself fell down the Euphrates, to the mouth of the river Pallacopa: distant from Babylon, some 800 furlongs, where rowing up and down, and, as Aristobulus saith, steering sometimes his own boat himself, he espied some certain ditches, which he caused to be scoured by such as were in his company; damming up the mouthes of some, and opening others of them: And espying one dike among the rest, in the Arabian side, toward the fenny and moory places thereof, having an outlet, hard to be stopt up, by reason of the rottennesse of the soile, he opened a new mouth, 30 furlongs off from the other, in somewhat a more firme and hard ground, and forced the water course that way: He saw there also many monuments of old Assyrian Kings and Princes, which lay buried in that fenny Country, and midst of those loughs, [Strabo, lib. 16. p. 741. Arria. l. 7.]

And sailing through those loughs into the body of Arabia, he there built a city, and a wall about it, planting there a colony of mercenary Greeks, and volunteers, and such as through age or otherwise, were growen unserviceable for the war, [Arria. ib.]

And now he began to laugh and scoff at the Chaldeans, and their predictions, for that he had both entred Babylon, and was come safe out of it, with his fleet; and therefore sailed the more boldly thorough those loughs of Arabia, having Babylon still on his left hand, [Id. ibid. Appian. toward the end, lib. 2. De Bell. Civil.]

And when at last, a part of his army wandred up and down in those parts, they knew not whither, for want of a Pilot, he sent them one, which brought them into the right channel again: then there arose a mighty wind, which severed the ship wherein himself was, from the rest of the fleet, and hurled the Kings hood or bonnet off from his head into the water; but his Turbant or Diademe, which was fastned to it, was rent from it, and driven by the wind upon a great reed, which grew up close to a sepulchre, of one of the Kings, which there lay buried, as I said before; which one of the marriners espying, swam unto it, and took it up, and in his return for fear of wetting it, clapt it upon his own head, Aristobulus saith that the marriner which did it, was a Phenician born, and that he was well scourged for presuming to put the Kings Diademe or Turbant upon his head: yet Alexander upon this accident, consulted a wizard about it, and was by him advised to offer a magnificent sacrifice to the gods, and to be very diligent and devout therein, [Diodor. see Appian, in his Syriaca, pag. 124. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

When it was told Alexander, that the Athenians and Etolians would not obey his edict, concerning the restoring of their banditoes, he presently gave order for a thousand tall men of war to be built, with which he purposed to make a war in the west, and to begin it with the destruction of Athens it self, which yet never took effect, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 5. see Curtius lib. 10 cap. 4.]

3681. Alexander returning to Babylon, there gave himself over to ease and company keeping; so addicted to gluttony and drunkennesse, that in the Diaries kept by Eumenes Cardianus, and Diodorus Erythræus, it is often found, such and such a day or night, Alexander was carried drunk to bed, Athenæ. lib. 10. cap. 11. with Phillinus in Plut. lib. 1. Sympos. cap. 6.] one example whereof, Elian. [lib. 3. Var. Histor. lib. 23.] reciteth out of the said Eumenes, which I thought good here to insert, to the end it may appear, that some use may be made of my treatise of the Macedonian year, comparing therewith, the dayes of our Julian Calendar, mending first that place in Elian, where it is written Δῖε, without all sense, and making it mensis Δίυ nomine, (i. e.) of the moneth called Dios, as thus: On the fifth of the moneth Dios (our Septemb. 28.) he drank drunk, at Eumaus his howse; nor did any thing all that day, but rise and give order to his Captains, whither they should march to morrow, and telling, he would be going very early. And upon the seventh day (our Septemb. 30.) he dined with Perdiccas, and there he fell to drinking again: and on the eighth, (our Octob. 1.) he slept all day, and upon the 15 of the same moneth (our Octob. 8.) he fell a drinking again, and the day following (our Octob. 9.) he slept it out all day according to his wonted fashion. Upon the 24. (our Octob. 17.) he supped at Bagoas his lodging, which was 10. furlongs off from the Kings palace, and then upon the third (or rather the fifth) he slept it out again.

Alexander, seeing Babylon to excell, both in greatnesse, and all other things, purposed to enbellish it all that might be, and to make it the place of his residence, for ever 4391. 323.
after, [Stra. lib. 15. pag. 731.] and resolved to rebuild the Temple of Belus, and raise it out of its old dust; and, as some say, to make it more magnificent than ever it was before: and when in his absence the Babylonians went on more slowly in the work than he would have had them, he intended to set himself and all his army to work about it. But because the work, would take up a great deal of labour and much time, therefore he was not able to go thorough with it, as he desired, for he was taken short by death, [Id. lib. 16. pag. 738. with Arrianus lib. 6. pag. 159.]

Alexander dreampt, that Cassander killed him, whereas he had never seen the man in all his life, and shortly after, when he happened to see him; he called to mind his dream, with a great deal of horror at the first: but then again understanding that he was a son of Antipater, he cast off all such fear of any hurt from him, especially of poyson, which yet was at that time ready prepared for him, merrily uttering certain Greek verse, purporting, that so many dreams, so many lies, or to that effect.

When Cassander saw the outlandish people prostrating themselves, when they came unto him, having never seen the like done before, he fell a whickering; whereat Alexander grew into such a cholor, that wrapping both his hands in his long hair, he beat his head against the wall, [Plut. in Alexand.]

c. As there went a report that Antipater had sent a poison by Cassander to deliver it to his brother Iolla Cup-bearer to the King, and by him infused into the last draught that he ever took, so was it said also, that at the same time, Alexander had sent Craterus with a company of old souldiers to make away Antipater, [Curt. lib. 10. cap. ult.] Concerning the poison, of which Alexander is said to have died, see Andreas Schottus, and and his collections thereupon made out of sundry authors, in the Comparison which he makes, of the lives of Aristotle and Demosthenes, [to the first year of the 114 Olymp. and Mathæus Raderus, upon Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 7.] As for Craterus and his old souldiers sent away with him into Macedon, though Justin, and Arrian, and Plutarch, report this passage, as of a thing done before the death of Hephæstion; yet that it ought to be referred to this time, and not to that, appears, as by many other arguments, so especially by this; for that at the time of Alexanders death, Craterus with his old maimed souldiers was not come into Macedonia, but was still in Cilicia.

Those that would of the Macedons, which found themselves disabled thorough age or other impotency of body to follow the war any longer, were dismissed by Alexander, to return into their own country: and the number of them at this time, came (as Diodor. lib. 17. year 2. Olymp. 113. sayes) to 10 thousand; or as [Justin, lib. 12. cap. 12.] to 11 thousand: to every of which, he not onely gave their full pay for the time past, but also money in their purses, to carry them home withal: And if any of them had children, begotten of wives which they had married out of Asia, he willed them to be left with him, fearing least that mungrell kind might happily in time stir up some rebellion in Macedon, in contending with the wives and children which were left there: and promised that when they were grown up, and trained in Marshal Discipline after the Macedonian manner, they should have them again sent home unto them. Justin saith, that such as returned, had their full pay continued to them, as before, during life. Plutarch, that the children of the deceased, succeeded in their fathers pay: adding further, that Alexander wrote to Antipater, that they which so returned, should have the prime places assigned them in the Theaters, and should there sit with Garlands upon their heads; and that at their parting, they all wept, and so did the King himself.

Together with these, were dismissed also, sundry of the Nobility, upon the same occasions, as Clytus, Gorgias, Polydamas, Adamas, Antigenes, and the principal of all, Craterus, who was assigned as a Captain to conduct them, as a man of all others most loyal, and most dear unto the King, and next unto him Polysperchon; least if Craterus should happen to die by the way, as he was at that time but weak and sickly, they should want a noble Commander to conduct them. Then commanded he Craterus to take charge of Macedon, Thrace, Thessaly, and of the liberty of Greece, in Antipaters room, sending for Antipater to repair to him; and to bring with him an army of young lusty Macedons, in lieu of these old ones which he had sent home unto him.

Craterus, when he was sent to carry some certain old decayed souldiers into Cilicia, he received some instructions and commands from Alexander in writing, the chief heads whereof, Diodorus Siculus, out of the Kings own Commentaries relateth to be these, That he should cause a thousand tall ships somewhat bigger than the ordinary sort, of 3 tire of oares, to be built in Phoenicia, Syria, Cilicia, and Cyprus for his wars against the Carthaginians, and others bordering upon the sea coasts of Africk and Spain, and Islands adjoyning as far as Sicily: To take order, that his way along the sea coast of Africa, as far as Hercules his Pillars, might be ready for him; to lay out 1500 talents, upon six Magnificent Temples to be built: And that he should make Ports in several places fit to receive so great a Fleet. That he should transplant men out of Europe into Asia, and likewise out of Asia into Europe, to inhabit such new Cities as he should build in either of them, to the end that by enter-marriges, and mutual affinities, he might establish a peace and concord between the two main Continents of the World. These were his then designs, of which Lucan speaks, in this manner, [lib. 10.]

——Oceano classes inferre parabat: (i. e.)
His purpose was th' Atlantic Sea to sail;
Nor fire, nor water, nor the Lybian sand,
Nor Ammons Syrts could bound his vast desires.
He would into the Westerne Clime have gone,
Where the Sun stoops to fall int' Tethis lap;
And to have marcht quite round about the Poles,
And drunk Niles water, where it first doth rise,
Had not death met him, and his journey stayed.
Nothing but nature could a period bring,
To the vast projects of this mad-cap King.

A little before his death, came Ambassadors to him out of Greece, to acknowledge him for a god, and they wearing Crowns themselves, set all Crowns of gold upon his head.

And Peucestes, returning out of Persia, with about 20 thousand Persians, brought also also a great company of Cossæans, and Tapurians along with them to babylon for his service, because these nations bordering upon Persia, were reckoned the most warlike of any other. To him also came Philoxenus, bringing an army out of Caria, and Menander with another out of Lydia, and Menidas with an army of Horse: Alexander commmended the forwardnesse of the Persian nation, and especially Pencestes for his just discreet government among them, and ranked both them, and also those which came from the sea side with Philoxemus and Menander, with his Macedon squadrons. Also he caused his navy to be often exercised; and whereas there were often sea fights made in the river of Euphrates, between the Triremes, and the Quadriremes, (i. e.) between the ships of three, and those 4 of tire of oares, upon the River Euphrates, and as well the Marriners, as the Commanders in them laboured hard to outdoe their adverse party, he ever bestowed Crowns, and honoured them that did best herein.

When upon a time, as he was bestowing those companies which came with Philoxenus and Menander, among his Macedon Squadrons, he happened to be a thirst, as Arrianus reports out of Aristobulus, and went a little aside, from the throne whereon he sate, and some also of his Nobles which sate on either hand of his throne, left their seats also and attended him, it fell out, that a certain mean party, (some say one that was committed to custody, but without irons upon him) came through the middest of all the bed-chamber-men, and other Officers, which stood thick about the throne, and sate himself down upon the kings seat: and when the Bed-chamber-men, durst not pull him out, because there was a Persian law to the contrary, they rent every man his cloaths, and beat their faces, and thumpt their breasts, as at a thing exceeding ominous to the King; which when Alexander heard, he caused the fellow to be had presently to the rack, to know whether he had done it upon any designe or compact with others or no, and for what purpose: But when he answered that what he had done was only out of a light humor, and toy which came in his head, the wisards told him that it was by so much the worse signe; and Diodorus saith, that by their advice, the poor fellow was presently killed for his labour; to the end, that if there were any ill luck in it, it might all fall upon his own head: The same also, saith Plutarch, adding, that upon the rack, being asked who he was, answered that his name was Dionysius, a Messenian born, with some other answers, which he made them.

Some few dayes after, when the King had sacrified to his gods, in thanksgiving for his good successes; and had added thereto something more than ordinary by the advise of the Priests or Wisards, he fell a feasting with his Nobles; and sate up at it, till late in the night: he also distributed beasts for sacrifices among the souldiers, and gave wine among them to be drunk. And when he was now breaking up, and going away one Medius a Thessalian, had prepared a banquet, and invited him and all his company to it; at the banquet there sate twenty guests; to every of which, Alexander drank a several health, and they the like to him again, as Athenæus reports out of certain memorials, commonly attributed to Nicobulus, [lib. 10. cap. 11. &. lib. 12. cap. 18.]

Now when Alexander had called for a cup, containing two gallons and an odde quart, as Ephippius Olynthius, in a book which he wrate of the deaths and burials of Alexander and Hephæstion, reported by Athenæus, [lib. 10. cap. 11.] and commanded Proteas a Macedon, to pledge him; Proteas cried, let come, and having in many words spoken much honour of the King, took the cup, and drank it off with such a grace, that all the table commended him highly for it: a while after, Proteas called for the same cup again, and drank it off to the King; and Alexander took and pledged him a great draught, but could not drink it off, but let the cup fall out of his hand, and lay along upon the cusheon, and presently fell sick and dyed, and this was that Herculean fatal cup to Alexander, of which besides Diodore, and Plutarch, [Seneca also in his 83 Epistle,] maketh mention; with which we may compare also, what Athenæus saith, [l. 11. c. 17. and Macrobius, l. 5. Saturnal. c. 21.]

Aristobulus saith, that when he grew light headed with his fever, and withal very thirsty, he called for a draught of wine, and that cast him into a phrensie; and so upon the 30 day of the month Dæsius, that is, upon the 24 of our May, departed. Others say that he dyed upon the 6 day of the month Thargelion, with the Athenians, as Elian hath it, [lib. 2. Var. Histor. cap. 25.] which answers to our 18 of May: In the Diaries or Day books, kept of the Kings actions, it is said that he died the 28 of the month Dæsius, or 22 of our May: wherefore sure it is, that dye he did in the month Dæsius, according to the Macedon account, and in the month of May with us; though upon what day of the month, Authors do not agree.

Out of the said Diaries, what things fell out in the time of his sicknesse, Arrianus and Plutarch do very particularly declare, but who was the true author of those Diaries, or daily remembrances of what he did or said, neither of them tells us; whether Eumenes nes Cardianus, or Diodorus Erythreus, or else Strattis Olynthius: for he also wrate a Diary of his actions in foure books, and one particular book of his death, as Suidas teacheth us: But whose soever Diaries they were, forasmuch as we can have nothing more plainly or more assuredly delivered, than what we find in them, therefore have I thought it good here to set down what I find in Plutarch, delivered out of them, comparing all along, the dayes of the Macedonian Dæsius and our month of May, together, out of my own discourse of the Macedonian year.

'Ογδόῃ ἐπὶ δεκάτῃ Δαισίου μηνὸς, &c. (i. e.) the eigteenth day of the month Dæsius (May, 12.) he slept in a bath for his fever. The next day (May 13.) having washed, he went to his chamber, and spent that day there at dice with Medius, then washing again, toward the evening; and having been at his devotions, he ate his supper somewhat greedily, and the night following had a sore fit of a fever. Upon the 20 day (May 14.) having washed, he offered Sacrifice very solemnly again, and lying along in a bath, he heard Nearchus while he related to him such things as had happened in his voyage; and what wonders he had seen in the Ocean, (τῇ δεκάτῃ φθίνοντος) (i.e.) (our May 15.) when he did the like, his fever increased upon him. The day after (May 16.) his fever grew very sharp upon him, and he was carried to lie in a Chamber near the great pool, or swimming place, where he had speach with his Commanders, of putting approved men in places of office, when they happened to fall void, 'Εβδόμῃ (φθίνοντος) (i. e.) upon the 24. (May 18.) finding his sicknesse to encrease upon him, he offered sacrifice, to which he was carried, and commanded the chief Commanders and Captains which were then in Court, to stay with him; but the Centurions and Corporals, to attend without and watch. Being carried into the innermost lodgings of the Court, (τῇ ἕκτῃ φθίνοντος) Upon the 25 day (May 19.) he had a little ease, but his fever left him not. But when the Captains came to him, he spake not at all unto them. ἄφωνος καὶ τὴν πέμπτην, and likewise upon the 26, (May 20.) whereupon the Macedons, thinking that he had been dead, came flocking with a great noise to the Chamber door, and threatned the Nobles which were there, if they would not let them in. The doors hereupon being set open, every common souldier passed by his bed side. The same day, Pithon and Seleucus, who were sent to Serapis his temple, to know whether Alexander should be removed thither or noe, brought answer back from the Oracle, that he should stay where he was, τῇ δὲ τρίτῃ (φθίνοντος) πρὸς δείλην ἀπέθανεν, (i.c.) Upon the twenty eighth day, (May 22.) in the evening he died.

Now whereas I said, that the Macedons all passed by the Kings bed side, it is to be understood, that they came in at one dore, and went out at another, [Lucian in Pseudom.] And allbeit he was grown weak and faint with the violence of his sicknesse, yet he raised himself upon his elbow, and gave every one of them his hand to kisse as he passed by, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.] and which is more, and may seem incredible in it self, look in what posture he put himself, at their first coming in, in the same he continued, till every man to the very last, of all that army, had kissed his hand, [Curt. lib. 10. c. 7.]

When the souldiers were gone, he then turned him to his Nobles, and demanded of them, whether they thought they should find them a King like to himself or no? and when no man answered him to that question; then again he said, that as he could not tell that himself, so that one thing he foresaw, and could foretell, how much Macedon blood would be shed, before this controversie would receive an end, and with what vast slaughters, and effusion of blood, they would solemnise his funeral, and sacrifice to his ghost, when he was gone; and so gave order for his body to be carried to the Temple of Ammon, and there buried, [Justin l. 12. c. 15.] And when his Nobles asked him to whom he would leave his kingdom, his answer was, fortissimo, (i. e.) to the strongest, and withall, took off his signet, and gave it to Perdiccas: whereby they all conceived, that his meaning was, to commend the government of his kingdom to his care and trust, till his children should come to age, [Emil. Probus in Eumene.] And again, when Perdiccas asked him, When he would have Divine Honours performed to him? his answer was, When they were all grown happy.

Eratosthenes in his Canons, (mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus lib. 1. Strom. saith) that 12 years passed between the death of Philip, and the change, (i.e.) the decease of Alexander, which is the very number given him, [lib. 1. Maccab. cap. 1. 8. and in both the Chronicles of the Jews, as also in Tertullian, lib. cont. Judæos. cap. 8. in Porphyrie, cited by Euseb. pag. 124. in Scaligers Greek edition of him, In Rufinus, In Josepus, his Antiquities, lib. 12. cap. 2. in Orosius, lib. 3. in Ierom and Theodoret upon Daniel cap. 11.] though A. Gellius, [lib. 17. cap. 21.] giveth him but 11 years. Julius Africanus, and out of him Eusebius, 12 years and six months, [Diod. Sic.] 12 years and seven moneths, Livie, and after him Emil. Probus in Eumene, allow him 13 years.

Nor is there any lesse difference among Authors, concerning the years of his life, than there is of his reign. Whereof Cicero in his fifth Philippic speaking, saith, What shall I speak of Alexander the Macedon, when he set himself upon great achivements from his very youth, was he not taken off by death in the 33 year of his age, which is lesse by ten years, than then with us a man can by law, be made a Consul. Justin [in the last chap. of his 12 book,] saith that he died at the age of 33 years and one month: yet [Philostratus, lib. 2. de Vit. Sophista: in Herodes. Euseb. in Chron. and in his first book, de Vita Constant. and Jerome, upon c. 8. and c. 11. upon Daniel,] and sundry other writers following Eusebius, [in Chron.] allow him to have lived no more than 32 years: All which are neverthelesse to be reduced to that rule delivered by Arrianus, [lib. 7. pag. 167.] Ἐβίω δύο καὶ τριάκοντα ἔτη, &c. (i.e.) He lived 32 years, and took up 8 months of the 33 year: as Aristobulus saith; But he reigned twelve years, and those 8 months over.

Immediately upon Alexanders decease, there arose such a difference and dispute between the Horse and Foot Companies of the army, for the settling of the present State of things, that they were ready to fall all in pieces, and to take up armes about it. Yet by the advice of the Nobles and Commanders, it was at length accorded, that the Supreme authority, or rather a bare name and shadow thereof, should be committed to Aridæus, brother to Alexander, and son to his father Philip, begotten upon one Philinna of Larissa, a common dancer; as [Athenæus, lib. 13. cap. 13.] reports out of one Ptolomæus, son of Agesarchus, in his History of Philopater, and a whore to boote, [as Justin. lib. 13. cap. 2. and Plutarch in the end of his Alexan.] say. And having by common consent proclaimed him King, they called him by the name of Philip; to whom also was joyned, the son that Roxane then went withal, and was eight moneths gone with child, begotten by Alexander, as Justin in the place aforesaid hath it, or six, as Curtius, [lib. 10. cap. 10. sayes.] As for his son Hercules, who then lived at Pergamus, because he was gotten upon Barsine, who was never married to Alexander; therefore was there no regard had of him in this settlement of the kingdom. And because Aridæus himself was but a weak spirited man, not thorough any natural infirmity of his own, as Plutarch noteth in the end of the life of Alexander; but by such slibber-sauces, and drugs as Olympias had procured to be given him, therefore was Perdiccas, to whom Alexander delivered his Signet at the hour of his death, made Regni ἐπιμελητής: (i. e.) Lord Protector, or Steward, and in effect absolute King it self. The charge of the army, and of all affairs, was committed to Meleager, the son of Neoptolemus, with or under Perdiccas. The command of the Horse, which was the most Honourable charge in all the army, and which after Hephæstions death was given to Perdiccas, was now assigned to Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, yet with, or under Perdiccas, as the other was. The oversight also of the kingdom, and treasure thereof, was commended to Craterus his trust, [Diod. in the beginning of his 18 book, Justin. lib. 13. cap. 1, 2, 3, 4. Curt. lib. 10. cap. 10, 11, 12. Plutarch, in Eumene & Alexan. Dioxippus and Arria. in their books written of what passed after the death of Alexander, in Phot. Bibliot. cod. 82. & 92. Appian. in his Syriaca, pag. 120. 124.]

Censorinus in his discourse, De die natali, notes, that the years of Philip, are to be reckoned from the death of Alexander, taking alwayes the rise therein from the first day of that moneth, which with the Egyptians is called Thoth. For the Egyptian Astronomers applying this computation of times for more easie reckoning sake, to their own account, make the head thereof to be the first day of Thoth, in the beginning of the 425. year of Nabonasar; to wit, upon the 12 of November, according to the Julian account, 4390. in the seventh moneth before the true time of Alexanders death. And from the beginning of that moneth Thoth it is, that Ptolomei in his Manual Canons of Astronomy (not yet published) deduceth the Epochs or risings of all the Stars, of which he in his Preface Ad Syrus. saith, Συνεστάθησαν αἱ ἐποχαί, &c. Here are fixed the Epoches, or heads of all accounts, according to the Meridian of Alexandria, which is in Egypt, from the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thoth, of the first year of Philip, who succeeded Alexander, the Founder of this City. Not of Philip the father of Alexander, (as some have imagined) but of Philip, brother and next successor unto Alexander; whom the Alexandrians for Honours sake, call, as indeed he was, their Founder: adding, Ἀπὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς τούτου, &c. (i. e.) For from the first day of his (meaning Philippus Aridæus) reign, the times of the Manual Canons of Ptolomei, (who in them followeth the common account, or Calendar of the Egyptians) being taken, and according to the rectifying of the Egyptian year (reduced to the Alexandrian account, which Theon also used in his Canon) are reckoned; as we find also, in the Greek Collections published by Scaliger, in his Eusebian Fragments, [pag. 48.] Whence it is also, that in the Epistle to Apollophanes (falsely attributed to Dionysius Areopagita: found in Hilduinus, in his Areopagatica) these Astronomical Tables are called, The Canon of Philippus Aridæus.

And now had the dead body of Alexander laien seven dayes, as Justin sayes, (for Elian sayes 30.) [Var. Histor. lib. 12. cap. 64.] upon his Throne, whiles all mens thoughts were taken up about the settling of the present state, and could not heed, what belonged to the solemn Obsequies belonging to the deceased: and yet was there not in all that time found any putrifaction, or the least discolouring of the flesh upon his body: but the very vigor of his countenance, which is the proper effect of the spirit that is in a man, man, continued still the same; wherefore the Chaldeans and Egyptians; were commanded from thence forward to take care of the body; and they when they came about it, durst not at first approach to touch him, as if he had been still living: but anon after, saying their prayers, that it might be no sin unto them being but mortals to lay their hands upon so divine a body, they fell to work, and dissected him; and the golden Throne wherein he lay, was stuffed all with Spices, and hung about with Pennants and Banners, and other emblemes of his high State and Fortune, [Curt. lib. 10. in fi.]

The care of his funeral, and providing a chariot to carry the body into the Temple of Ammon, was committed to Aridæus, whether the King, as Justin hath it, [lib. 13. cap. 4.] and Dexippus, as we find in Scaligers Greek fragments of Eusebius, [pag. 84.] or rather to some other Aridæus, of whom we shall see more anon, out of Diodorns, [year 2. Olymp. 114.] in which provision making, he spent two whole years, [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 114.] and Olympias seeing him lye so long unburied, in great grief of heart, cried out, and uttered these words; O my son (said he) thou that wouldest needs be counted among the gods, and keptst such a do about it, canst not now have that which every poor man hath, a little earth and burial, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 13. c. 30.]

Mean while Sisygambes the mother of Darius, hearing of his death, sunk under the burthen of her sorrow for it; and covering her self with mourning attire, when her neece and nephew, Drypetis and Oxathres, came and fell at her knees, she lookt away from them, and would neither eat nor see the light any more, and so the fifth day after, dyed of hunger, [Diod. l. 17. in fi. Curt. l. 10. cap. 8.]

Roxane being great with child, and seeing her self therefore, courted by the Macedon army, grew into emulation with Statira, eldest daughter to Darius, and one of Alexanders wives, as her self was: and by her letters invited and requested her to come unto her: but as soon as she came, she caused both her and her sister Drypetis, Hephæstions Relict, to be murthered; and threw both their carcases into a well, and cast earth upon them: not without the privity and assistance of Perdiccas, as Plut. [in the end of the life of Alex.] saies.

Roxane was a while after, delivered of a son, whom they named Alexander: and the common souldiers proclaimed him King, [Arria. in Biblioth. Photii, ca. 92.] with Pausanias in his Attica, and Dexippus, in Scaligers Greek fragments of Eusebius, [pag. 48.]

Perdiccas gave order for the purification or cleansing of the whole army by a solemn sacrifice; because of the death of the King, and great dissention fallen among them thereupon. Now the Macedonian manner of cleansing the army was this: They cut a dogg in two: and laid the one half on the one side, and the other, on the other of the field, where the army was to come, and to make them passe solemnly, and, as it were, in procession between them: Now as the army passed, Perdiccas caused some 300 souldiers, which followed Meleager, when in the first assembly of the Macedons, after the decease of Alexander, he arose, and in a mutinous manner left them, and threw them among the Elephants, to be trod in pieces by them: all which he did in the open sight of the army, and in the presence of Aridæus himself, whom (nothing differing from a very Innocent) Meleager had caused to be, as it were, wrapt in purple clouts like a child, and put into the Royal Throne, as Plutarch [lib. 2. de fortuna Alexandri,] saith. And Meleager for the present, because no violence was offered to his own person, stirred not: but presently after, seeing his life was sought, fled to a Sanctuary, and was there taken and slain; [Justin, lib. 13. cap. 4. Curt. lib. 10. cap. 12. Arrianus in Photius.]

Diodorus [lib. 2. year 4. Olymp. 18.] affirmeth that Alexander made his last Will and Testament, and left it to be kept at Rhodes; and Ammia, [Marcellinus, lib. 23.] seems to say, that therein his will was, to leave all in the hands and power of one man: and Q. Curtius, Some, saith he, have been of opinion, that a distribution of the Provinces was made by Alexander, in his last Will and Testament: but we have found, that, that was but an Idle report, though delivered by sundry Authors, [lib. 10. c. 13.] Neverthelesse, the Author of the first book of Machabeis, seemeth to follow that first opinion, as delivered and believed by so many Authors, as it was; and saith that Alexander in his own life time, parted his kingdom among his most illustrious and noble officers. And the Chronologer of Alexandria (out of whom, those barbarous and broken Latin fragments published by Scaliger, pag. 58, and 59, are taken) affirmeth, that, that division of the Provinces, which Justin [lib. 13. cap. 4. Curtius lib. 10. cap. 13. Arrianus in Photii Biblioth. ca. 92. Dexeippus ibid. ca. 82.] and other writers report to have been made by Perdiccas, was none other than that which was comprised in that will: which, as may be gathered out of them all, comparing one with another, was in this manner.

In Europe all Thrace, with the Chersonese and other nations bordering upon Thrace as far as Salmydessus, a city standing upon the Euxin sea, was committed to Lysimachus, the son of Agathocles, a Pellæan born: but that Region which lay beyond

 Thrace,

Thrace, belonging to the Illyrians, Triballi, and Agrians, and Macedonia it self, and Epirus, stretching as far as the Ceraunian mountaines, with all Greece, was assigned to Antipater, and Craterus: and so much for Europe.

In Africa, all Egypt, and what ever else Alexander had gotten, in Cirenaica, or Lybia, with all that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt, was allotted to Ptolomei, the son of Lagus, who, as Pausanias in his Attica sayes, was by the Rhodians, honoured with the surname of Σωτὴρ, (i.e.) a Deliverer. The truth is, that the Macedons ever held Ptolomei for a base son of Philip, Alexanders father: for his mother Arsinoe, being great with child by Philip, was by him put off, and married to a poor fellow of Macedon, called Lagus: whereupon it was, that when after a while, (as Plutarch in a discourse of his, De ira cohibenda: (i. e.) of suppressing a mans choler, saith, Ptolomei to put a jeer upon a poor schoole-master, would needs ask him, who was Peleus his father: he asked him again, and I pray Sir, said he, Who was Lagus his father? intimating thereby the basenesse of his birth by the fathers side, [See Curtius, lib. 9. cap. 1. Pausanias in his Attica, pag. 5. in the Greek edition of him at Fracford, and Suidas in the word Lagus.]

But, to return to where we left, Cleomenes, who was left by Alexander, to gather up the tributes and other incomes of those parts, was commanded to deliver over that Province unto him, and to hold his office, as under him: and because Ptolomei presently upon the death of Alexander entered upon that Province, and died not till full 40 years after; thence it is that Lucian, ἐν Μακροβίοις: (i.e.) in his discourse of long-lived men) and in the fragments of Eusebius, published by Scaliger, [pag. 49. and Porphyrie, ibid, pag. 225. and Clemens Alexan. Stromat. 1. and Euseb. in Chron. and Epiphanius in his books of weights and measures:] and others say, that he reigned 40 years in Egypt, after whom his posterity down to Cleopatra, held that kingdom, under the title and name, and common notion, of Ptolomeis.

In the lesser Asia, all Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and all the Regions lying upon the Euxin Sea, as far as Trapezond, a Colony of the Sinopenses, which Alexander, being taken up with the more weighty war against Darius, had not leisure to subdue as he went, were assigned to Eumenes Cardianus; with a charge to make war upon Ariarathes, who onely ever stood out against Alexander. As for Antigonus, he was made Governour of Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia the Great. The lesser Phrygia, which lies upon the Hellespont, was committed to Leonatus. The government of Lydia, not onely of the inland country, but also along the sea coast, taking in Eolia and Ionia, was given to Menander; who had it formerly by grant from Alexander himself, [as Arrianus, lib. 3. pag. 56. saith,] for whom, the name of Meleager, is mis-put by Diodorus. Caria was given to Cassander the son of Antipater, and Cilicia, and Isauria, to Philotas.

In the upper and greater Asia, all Syria, and Phœnicia, was committed to Laomedon, a Mitylenæan borne. The pety kings of the Isle of Cyprus, for a while held every man his State, as they had it granted to them respectively by Alexander. Neoptolemus was set over Armenia, Arcesilaus over Mesopotamia, Archon over the Province of Babylonia; Atropates, father in law to Perdiccas, was left Governour of Media by Alexander himself. In this partage making, [Justin, lib. 13. cap. 4.] and Orosius [lib. 3. cap. 23.] say that Atropates was made Governour of Media the greater, and Perdiccas his father in law, of the lesser; not remembring that Atropates, and Perdiccas his father in law were all one man. But having afterward better considered of the matter, in a second distribution made by Antipater in Triparadiso, he acknowledgeth that Media was assigned to Pithon, [lib. 15. pag. 660.] Nor is it likely, that the son in law would any way diminish the authority of his father. The Rule and Government of the hither Bactria and Sogdiana, was put into the hands of Philippus: yet so, as that Oropius was joyned with him in the Satrapie of Sogdiana, who yet, as Dexippus saith, when he had received that kingdom of Alexanders bounty, was put from it again for treason: But in the Government of Persia, Pencestes of Hircania, and Parthia, (for they went together, as Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 514. witnesseth) was Phrataphernes, in Carmania, Tlepolemeus, in the further Bactria and Parapamisus, Oxyartes, or Oxathres, the father of Roxane, Alexanders wife, in Aria and Drangiana, bordering upon Taurus, Stasanor of Solos, in the Province of Susa, Scynus, in Arachosia and Gedrosia, Sibyrtius, as they were there placed by Alexander, so were they now suffered to continue in them. All the coast of India from Paropamisus, and from the place where the Acesines and Indus meet, down to the very Ocean, was committed to the charge of Pithon the son of Agenor, as that of the Oxydracans and Mallians to Eudemus, al. Eudemon, Commander of the Thracian companies: and the rest of India, to King Porus, and Taxiles, and to the son of Abisarus, who, as appears by what hath been said before, were all placed in those charges, by Alexander himselfe in his life time.

When, upon this division so made, every man had his share, as it were allotted him from heaven, they hence took occasion to encreale their power, at their pleasure for the most part: for not long after, as if they had not had governments, but kingdoms given them, so they bare themselves not as Deputies, but as absolute and soverign Kings and did not onely acquire great matters to themselves, but also left the same to their posterities after them, [Justin. lib. 13. *cap.*4.] and so that vast Empire and name of the Macedons, immediately upon the death of Alexander, came to be rent and torn into several kingdoms, [Livius lib. 45.] yet no man took upon him the title of a King, so long as any of his children, survived, so respective were they of him, that though they had every of them the power of a King in his hand, yet they willingly refrained the title, so long as he had a lawfull heir of his body living, to succeed him, [Justin. lib. 15. cap. 2,] All which was long before foretold by the Holy Ghost, [Daniel 11. 4.]

Concerning the instructions given by Alexander to Craterus, Perdiccas referred the consideration of them, to the generall assembly of the Macedons; which though they could not mislike, yet because they were exceeding high, and difficult beyond measure, to be brought to passe, therefore they ordered by a general consent, that none of them should be gone in hand withall, [Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 114.]

The old Greek souldiers, which Alexander had left and planted in garrisons and colonies in the upper Asia, and several provinces thereof, being toucht with a desire of returning home; and seeing their native Country the rather for that they saw themselves, as it were ejected and cast out into a far remote corner of the World, joyned in an association, and revolted from the Macedonian state; chusing for a head of this conspiracy, one Philo an Enian born: and now they were gotten to the number of 20 thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse together, all old tried and expert souldiers. Against these, Perdiccas dispatcht away Pithon, who had been one of the squires of the body to Alexander, and a man of a high spirit, and long versed in the mysterie of war, with three thousand Macedon Foot, and eight hundred Horse, drawn out by lot, with letters and instructions to the governours in all those parts, to furnish him, with 10 thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse more. Now Pithon purposed to win unto him by all fair means possible, those old Grecians, that so joyning them with such other forces as he had of his own, he might be the better able to set up for himself, and reduce all those upper provinces, under his own subjection: which Perdiccas perceiving, to crosse his purpose therein, gave him expresse order; that having overcome those Rebels, he should put them every man to the sword, and divide the spoil of them among his souldiers. But Pithon, having by intelligence, with one Lipodorus, who commanded a brigade of three thousand men among the Rebels, gotten the victory of them, went no further, but upon capitulation, licensed them to repair every man to his own home: which notwithstanding the rest of the Macedons, remembring the order given them by Perdiccas, fell upon them, and slew every man of them, and shared what they had among themselves. So Pithon, failing of his ends, returned with his Macedons to Perdiccas, [Diod. ibid. Prolog. Trogi, lib. 13.]

As for Ptolomei, he, having quietly gotten into the possession of Egypt, demeaned himself fairely in all things toward the people of the land; and possessing himself there of eight thousand talents, got an army together, of such as would serve for pay, sundry others also, for pure love, seeing his fair and impartial distribution of justice in his place, came into him. And being duly enformed that Perdiccas had a purpose, to wrest Egypt out of his hand, he leagued himself firmly with Antipater, [Diod. ut. sup.] and by good turns and gratifications, obliged the neighbouring Kings and Princes to his devotion, [Justin lib, 13. cap. 16.] and finding that Cleomenes, whom Perdiccas had put to him for a Lieutenant, was no better than a spie upon him, cut his throat, and placed strong garrisons of his own, over all the land of Egypt, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 5. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

Leonatus and Antigonus, were commanded to put Eumenes by strong hand into the possession of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. But Antigonus, out of the haughtinesse of his spirit, and presuming of himself, refused to obey Perdiccas his command herein. But Leonatus, coming with his army down out of the upper provinces, promised Eumenes to undertake the service for him. Neverthelesse, when Hecatæus, Tyrant of the Cardians, coming to Leonatus, advised him rather for the present to go and aide Antipater, and relieve the Macedons, which were besieged in Lamia; he resolved forthwith to crosse the seas, and to put over into Macedonia; and moved Eumenes himself, to go along with him, and to make an end with Hecatæus. But when Eumenes would not, and alleadged withall, that he stood in some fear of Antipater, Leonatus believed him, and kept nothing from him, of all that was in his heart: yet finding that he could not draw him over to his party, went about privily to murder him, and had done it, had not Eumenes, perceiving his purpose, got him privilie out of his quarters, for he stole away by night, with his carriages, having onely 300 Horse in his company, and 200 of his guard; and five thousand talents in gold, after the rate of silver. And so coming to Perdiccas, disclosed all Leonatus his counsels to him; whereupon Perdiccas took him in for a bosome friend, and swore him of the Council, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumene.]

 had

Leonatus, coming to help Antipater, was there slain in a fight by the Grecians, [Diodorus year 2. Olymp. 114. Justin, lib. 13. cap. 5. Plutarch in Phocion, Arrianus in Photius.]

Thimbro, having caught Harpalus in Crete by a slight (which Harpalus had, as I shewed before, fled thither out of Asia, and carried all the Kings mony with him:) slew him, and got into his own hands all that treasure, and with his army and fleet, left Cydonia, a city in Crete, and with 6, or (as Diodorus hath it) 7 thousand men, sailed to the countrey of Cyrene, being invited thither by the banditoes of the Cyrenians, and the Barcenses, [Diodorus & Arrianus, ut supra. Strabo, lib. 17. cap. 837.]

There, in a fight against the Cyrenians, Thimbro made a great slaughter of them, and took many prisoners; then seizing of their Port, and ready to take the City it self; he drew them to a composition, upon these tearms, That they should pay him down five thousand talents ready money, and deliver into his hand, half their chariots ready furnished for a service: He sent Embassadors also to other neighbouring cities to joyne with him, pretending that he would make war upon Lybia, and subdue it: and moreover he laid hold on all the Merchants goods, that were in the Port, and gave them to the souldiers, to scramble for, thereby to make them the forwarder in his service, [Diodor.]

Mnasicles, a man of Crete, one of Thimbrons Captains, but of a turbulent disposition, fell off from him to the Cyrenians, and by declaiming against Thimbrons cruelty and perfidiousnesse, perswaded them to break covenant with him, and to stand for their former liberties and freedom; whereupon, when they had payed only six hundred of the five thousand talents, they would pay no more. And Thimbron, to cry quittance with them, seized on 800 of their men, whom he found in the Port: and coming with his own men and the Barcenses, and Hesperitans, all which joyned with him before the walls of the Citie, did what he could to take it; but failing of his purpose, retired to the Port. [Id.]

The Cyrenians, leaving a sufficient guard to keep the town, drew out the rest, and went a forraging into the neighbouring parts, and when these sent to Thimbro for help, he presently went with all the strength that he could make to relieve them against the Cyrenians: Mnasicles, espying this oportunity, and that there were few or no souldiers left in the Port, moved those who were left in the City, to sally out, and set upon the Port: and they being quickly perswaded, followed him, and fell upon it; and by reason of Thimbrons absence with his men, easily took it: and such goods as they there found in specie, belonging to the Merchants, restored it all faithfully to the owners; and Mnasicles fell presently to work, and fortified the Port against Thimbron, if he should return: This went ill on Thimbrons side, for that he had not onely lost the place, but with it, all his Provisions that were in it; yet upon the taking of another town called Taricha, he renewed his hopes again, [Id.]

Thimbrons Mariners and sea Souldiers, being turned out of the Port, knew not what to do for victuals, but were fain to go a free-booting into the country for it: and this, when they were daily forced to do, at last the Boors of the Country, knowing their haunts, laid wait for, and slew a great number of them, and took as many prisoners, as they had slain: They that were left, got a shipboard, and sailed away toward other confederate places. But being on their way, there fell a violent tempest, which sunk many of them in the sea; those that escaped, some were driven a shoare in Egypt, and some in the Isle of Cyprus: All which put such heart into the Cyrenians bellyes, that they stuck not now to encounter Thimbron in the open field; which they did, and in a battle slew many of his men, [Id.]

Craterus departing from Cilicia, with six thousand of those old Souldiers, which came at first with Alexander into Asia, and four thousand more, of such as came to him upon the way, besides 1000 Persian Archers and Slingers, and 1500 horse, hasted all he could to the succour of Antipater, and came into Thessaly; where yeilding the precedencie in all things to Antipater, they both sate down in camp together, upon the bank of the river Peneus. And in the month of Munichion (our April) next, fought a battle with the Grecians, and overthrew them, [Id. with Arria. and Plut. in the lives of Phocion and Demosthenes.]

After Jaddus his son Onias succeeded in the Priesthood at Jerusalem, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11. in fi.] and there sate one and twenty years, [Scalig. in Grac. Eusebius, pag. 50.]

Thimbro, having hired new souldiers from Tænarus in Laconia, where they wandred up and down, out of pay, began a fresh to make war upon the Cyrenians, and they on the contrary; praying in aide from the Africans and Carthaginians, made up an army, with their own men, to the number of 30 thousand, and put all upon the hazard of a battle: wherein after a long and bloudy fight, they lost a many of their men, and Thimbro had the better of the day. Then the Cyrenians, having lost all their own Commanders, made Mnasicles their General. Thimbro growing proud of this victory, set upon the port of Cyrene, and took it, and made every day an assault upon the City it self, to take it. But the siege continuing, and provisions failing, the Cyrenians began to mutiny among themselves; the end whereof was, that the common people, who bare the sway for matter of power, thrust the richer sort out of the City, and they, being so thrust out, repaired, some to Thimbro, and others into Egypt, [Diod. ut. sup.]

They who fled into Egypt, dealt with Ptolomei, to restore them into their Country; and by his means, returned with forces both by land and sea, under the command of one Ophellas a Macedon, which coming to the ears of those which were gone to Thimbro, they prepared to fly over, and to joyn with Ophellas, but their intention being disclosed under hand to Thimbro, he put every mothers son of them to death. Then the leaders of the Commons of Cyrene, taking a fright at the return of their banditoes, made their peace with Thimbro, joyned with him, and in a main battle, were all utterly vanquisht, by Ophellas. [Id.]

Thimbro, in his flight, was lighted on by some certain African Carters, who took and carried him to one Epicides, who held a Town, called Teuchira, in those parts, under Ophellas: and the men of that place, with Ophellas his leave, first scourged him with whips, and then sent him to be crucified at the port of Cyrene. But for as much as the Cyrenians continued still in combustions among themselves, therefore Ptolomei himself made a journy thither by sea; and having by his presence setled all matters there, came back again by sea as he went, [Arrianus, in Phot. Biblio.]

Perdiccas, having King Philip, and the Royal Army all at his command, made a journey against Ariarathes, the petty King of Cappadocia, for that he had not received Eumenes for Governour there, as he was commanded. Ariarathes, at that time, had gotten together a great army, 30 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse: In two severall fights, Perdiccas slew four thousand of his men, and took six thousand prisoners; and among them Ariarathes himself: and both him and all that were allied to him, he first tortured, and then crucified. The rest he pardoned, and having setled all matters in Cappadocia, committed the Government of it to Eumenes, according to the first establishment, [Diodor. with Arria. and Plut. in Eumene, and Appian in his Mithridatica, pag. 175.]

Eumenes committed the several cities of his Government, to his most trusty friends, and appointed them Garrisons, with Judges, and gatherers of his tributes, such as pleased him best, without any interposing of Perdiccas: which done, he returned with Perdiccas, both in respect to him, as also, that he might not be a stranger at Court, [Plut.]

Perdiccas, and Philip the King, leaving Cappadocia, went into Pisidia, with a purpose there to destroy two Cities, one of the Larandæans, the other of the Isaurians, for these in Alexanders life time, had slain Balacrus the son of Nicanor, whom he had set over them. Laranda therefore they took at first assault; and putting all that were of age to the sword, they sold away the rest for slaves, and laid the City levell with the ground: those of Isaurus, seeing themselves besieged, set the City on fire over their own heads, with purpose to consume both it and themselves with it, to ashes. But the souldiers, to whom Perdiccas had given the spoil of the City, quencht the fire, and by that means, found great store of silver and gold there, [Diodorus year. 2. Olympiade 114.] Justin sayes, that this was done by the Cappadocians, when they saw Ariarathes overcome, [lib. 13. cap. 6.] and Orosius, treading in his steps, sayes the same. [lib. 3. cap. ult.]

Jollas, the son of Antipater, and Archias, came to Perdiccas out of Macedonia, bringing with them Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, to be his wife. Perdiccas, long before, whiles his estate was yet unsetled, had betrothed her. But now, that he had gotten the Royal Army, and administration of the kingdom quietly into his hands, he purposed to marry Cleopatra, daughter to Philip, the father of Alexander, and Alexanders own sister, especially by the procurement and setting on of Eumenes, yet that he might the more easily procure a supply of the Macedonian youth, and that he might not have Antipater for an opposite in his undertakings, he married Nicæa when she came, being drawn thereto principally by the advise and perswasion of his brother Alcetes, [Diod. and Arria. with Justin, l. 13. c. 6.]

Cinna

Cinna also, another daughter of Philips, and sister likewise of Alexanders, but not by the same mother, brought her daughter Adea, which was afterward called Euridice, to be married to Philippus Aridæus: But Perdiccas and his brother Alcetes, between them, dispatcht her out of the way: whereupon the Macedons began to grow into a combustion, and Perdiccas to quiet them, was fain to give her daughter in marriage to Arideus, [Arrian. in Photius.] where she is named, not Cynna, but Cynane: which yet in the same Arrianus, [lib. 1. de Gest. Alex. p. 5. is called Cyna: and by Diod. year 1. Olymp. 116. and by Athenæ. l. 13. c. 2. Cynna.]

Perdiccas sent away Eumenes out of Cilicia, under a colour of looking to his own government in Cappadocia, but indeed, that he might have a care of Armenia, to keep it in due order; because Neoptolemus sought to make some innovations there: But Eumenes by fair words, prevailed so far with him, though a man of a high, and an intemperate spirit, as to keep him quiet, [Plut. in Eumen.]

Eumenes, finding that the Macedonian Squadron grew insolent and fierce, raised an army of horse out of the Provincials in those parts, remitting to them all paiment of tribute, and granting them other immunities. He furnished also them whom he most trusted, with horses at his own charge; kindling their affections towards himself with his largesse and bounteous favours bestowed among them, and keeping them in breath and exercise, by continual labours and journies, which he put them upon: so that in a short time he had gotten together six thousand three hundred and sixty Horse, [Id. Ibid.]

Antipater and Craterus together in Greece, made war upon the Ætolians; whom when Craterus his old souldiers, compelled by continual alarmes, to lye abroad in the snow, in the winter season, they were ready to perish for want of victuals, [Diodorus, Ibid.]

Eumenes carried Perdiccas his presents to Cleopatra lying at Sardes; for that Perdiccas was now resolved to rid his hands of Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, and to take Cleopatra to be his wife, and so much Menander, the Governor of Lydia, signified to Antigonus, who was an intimate friend to Antipater. [Arrianus,] And when Perdiccas, laying every day false crimes to Antigonus his charge, sought unjustly to put him to death, he made shew, as if he desired to come to a hearing; but under hand, finding a ship of Athens in the rode, got privily into her, with his son Demetrius, and some other of his friends, and fled away into Europe, there to joyn with Antipater, [Diodorus.]

When Aristander, a Southsaier of Telmessa, had given it out, that it was revealed to him by the gods, that the land where Alexanders body should rest, should prove the most happy of all others, and forever free from all forreign invasions and incursions of the enemies; much emulation grew among the Nobles of Macedon, who should get the body of him into his hands: but principally between Perdiccas and Ptolomei the son of Lagus, [Elian. l. 12. c. 64.] Perdiccas dealt with his friends to have it carried to Egos, [Pausan. in his Attica, p. 5.]

But Aridæus, who had the body in his keeping, contrary to Perdiccas his will, went and carried it to Ptolomei: taking his journey, from Babylon, by Damascus, into Egypt. And although he met with many rubs cast in his way by Polemon, a fast friend of Perdiccas, yet he went through with it, and carried it into Egypt, as his purpose was, [Arrian. in Phot.]

For having spent two full years in preparations for this funeral, the sumptuousnesse, and magnificence whereof is at large set down by Diodorus; at length he removed the body out of Babylon, with an infinite company of workmen, to open and levell the waies where need should be, and others to attend the funeral following him: But Ptolomei with his whole army, went as far as into Syria to meet him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 114.] and there receiving the Corps, buried it first at Memphis, with all rites and ceremonies, after the Macedonian manner [Pausan. in his Attica, pag. 5.] and some few years after, removed it to Alexandria, [Curt. l. 10. c. ult.] which removal of it, yet was made by his son Ptolomæus Philadelphus, and not by the father, [as Pausanias intimates in his Attica, p. 5. of which, see more in Strabo, l. 17. p. 794.]

Perdiccas, calling a Council of Captains and friends in Cappadocia, propounded to them, whether he should march with his army first into Macedonia against Antipater, or into Egypt against Ptolomei: some were of opinion to passe over first into Macedonia, but it was resolved, that it was the best way to begin with Ptolomei in Egypt, least when he had put over into Europe, and was engaged there, Ptolomei should come and possesse himself of Asia. Hereupon, Perdiccas gave unto Eumenes, besides what he had already, the provinces of Caria, Lycia, and Phrygia, and the government of all that part of Asia which lyeth betweeen the mountain of Taurus, and the Hellespont, commanding him moreover to take charge of all the gendarmery in Cappadocia and Armenia in chief, and with them to attend the motions of Antipater and Craterus, and and to fortifie all places upon the Hellespont, and to stop their landing, in case they should offer to passe the sea in those parts. Moreover Perdiccas gave order to his brother Alcetes, and Neoptolemus, that they should in all things attend the commands and orders of Eumenes; but Eumenes he willed to do things, as he should think fittest for the present service, in his own discretion. Cilicia was taken from Philotas, and committed to Philoxenus: And Perdiccas himself moving from Damascus, to the end he might seem to have the better colour for what he went about to do, took Aridæus, and Alexander the son of Alexander the great by Roxane, along with him; and so set forward towards Egypt, to fight with Ptolemei, [Diodor. Justin. lib. 13. cap. 6. Arria. Plut. Emil. Probus, in Eumene, Pausan. in his Attica, cap. 5.]

When Antipater and Craterus had heard by Antigonus, that Perdiccas having married Cleopatra, purposed to come for Macedon, and there as absolute King to remove them from their Governments; they presently struck up a peace with the Eolians, and leaving Polysperchon, to manage all matters in Greece and Macedon, hasted into Hellespont in Asia side, amusing and abusing those who were appointed to keep that passage, by sending daily Embassies unto them. They sent also Ambassadors to Ptolemei, who was otherwayes a deadly enemy to Perdiccas, and a friend to them, and in like danger of Perdiccas, as they themselves were, and desired him to joyn with them. As also to Eumenes and Neoptolemus; both which, were at that time at Perdiccas his devotion: and with Neoptolemus they prevailed to fall over unto them; but with Eumenes they could not, [Diodorus, Justin, ut sup. and Arrianus.]

Alcetes, Perdiccas his own brother, flatly refused to bear arms against Antipater and Craterus: and Neoptolemus envying the power of Eumenes, did not onely underhand joyn in society with them, but laid a traine to have blown up Eumenes, and to have taken his life, and to have betrayed all his army into their hands: which when Eumenes had discovered, he was forced to fight it out with the traitor in a pitcht field: wherein he made a great slaughter of Neoptolemus his men, took all his baggage, and drew the residue to serve him, and grew strong by the accesse of so many good Macedon souldiers to his former army. Neoptolemus getting away with 300 Horse onely, fled to Antipater and Craterus, and they again sent Ambassadors to Eumenes, to draw him over to their Party, promising that he should not onely hold what he had, but also have more Provinces added to him. But when he answered, that he would rather lose his life than break his word to Perdiccas, they divided their army in two; with one Antipater marched into Cilicia, that going from thence into Egypt, he might there joyn with Ptolemei, against Perdiccas; and the other stayed behind with Craterus, to try it out with Eumenes.

Eumenes seeing the enemy coming on, and fearing least his souldiers, knowing against whom he was to go, would not onely not go with him; but disband and flee from him, led them about by unknown wayes, where they might not easily hear how the squares went: and the rather for that there was a buzzing already among them, that Neoptolemus was recruted, and came on together with Pigris, with an army of Cappadocian and Paphlagonian Horse: and withal he so wrought it, by chusing his ground every where as he went, that he could force the enemy to come to a battle of Horse, wherein he knew he overtopt his enemy, and not of Foot, wherein he knew he was the weaker. His Foot was 20 thousand strong, some of one nation, some of another, and 5 thousand Horse; upon whose valour he principally relied for the victory. Craterus had but little above 2 thousand Horse, and as many Foot as Eumenes: but they were all Macedons, old souldiers all, and of approved valour, and such as he well durst put the day upon.

These met in Cappadocia; Craterus had the right wing, Neoptolemus the left. Eumenes put none of his Macedons to fight against Craterus, but onely two Regiments of forreign Horse, led by Pharnabazus, the son of Artabazus, and by Tenedius of Phœnicia; willing them, without any shouting, or word speaking, to fall on roundly upon him: and himself with a company of 300 Horse, flew in like lightening upon Neoptolemus. And Craterus truly for his part, led on very bravely, and in his own person valiantly behaved himself; but his Horse floundering, a certain Thracian, or rather as Arrianus, a Paphlagonian ran him into the side with his Lance, and bare him to the ground: In the fall, one of Eumenes his Captains knew him, and did what he might to have saved him, all wounded as he was, and giving up the ghost. Mean while, Eumenes and Neoptolemus met, and grapling each with other, fell both off their horses to the ground; that a man might easily see with how deadly a hatred they encountered each other, and that their spirits were more hostile than their bodies could be: being down, Eumenes wounded Neoptolemus in one of his hams, and his hamstrings being cut, he fell along; yet his courage bearing him up, he raised himself upon his knees, and fighting on, gave Eumenes three wounds; one in his arme, the other two in his thigh: but none of them being any way mortal, at the second blow,

Eumene[s]

Eumenes made a full blow at him, and strook off his head; which was about ten dayes, after the former victory which he gat of him, [Id.]

Eumenes, seeing Craterus brought half dead out of the field, did what possibly might be done, to have saved his life: but when it would not be, he wept bitterly over him, and with out-spread arms lamented his case; and in regard both of his high place, and also, of the former love that had been between them, buried him honorably, and sent his bones home into Macedon to his wife and children, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumene.]

Both the Leaders being slain, and many others, especially of the better sort, taken prisoners; the rest of the Horse fled back to the main squadron of the Foot, as to a sure defence: and Eumenes contenting himself with what he had done, sounded a retreit, and set up a trophy upon the place, and buried his dead. But the Foot army, which was brought as it were, into a noose, whence they could not escape, without Eumenes his leave, desired quarter: and taking their oaths for their loyalty towards him, had leave to buy victual, in the places adjoyning. But having gotten victual, and recovered their strength, contrary to their oath, they went away, and returned to Antipater, [Diod. with Arrian. and Emil. Probus.]

Perdiccas, with the two Kings, Aridæus, and Alexander a young child, coming with his army into Egypt, encamped not far from Pelusium: where, whiles he busied himself in scowring an old ditch, an extraordinary inundation of Nilus, spoiled all his work. And although Ptolomei cleared himself, to the world of all those crimes which Perdiccas laid to his charge, yet contrary to the good liking and will of his Army, Perdiccas would needs proceed and make a war upon him, [Diodorus and Arrianus.]

When Perdiccas at last saw that many of his friends forsook him, and fled over to Ptolomei, he assembled all his Commanders and Captains, and what with gifts, what with large promises, what with fair words, and his sweet behaviour towards them, made them all sure to himself again. And then removing his Camp without any noise, in the grasp of the evening, encamped upon the bank of the River Nile, not far from a certain Castle, called Murus Camelorum, (i.e.) a wall of Camels. And at day break, crossed the River with his Army and Elephants, and set upon the Castle, but was valiantly repulsed by Ptolomei, and glad to retreit to his Camp again. And the night following, he removed, and with all silence possible, came to a place over against Memphis, where the River parting, made an Island, fit to encamp in, but in passing the River, to come at it, he lost above two thousand of his men, of which no lesse than one thousand being long tost up and down in the water, were devoured by Crocodiles, and other monsters of the River. But Ptolomei took such bodies as were cast a shoar on his side the River, and bestowed all solemn Rites and Ceremonies of funeral upon them, and sent their bones to their friends and kinsmen in the Army. Whereupon, the minds of the souldiers, grew much more enraged against Perdiccas, and enclined to Petolomei than before, [Diod.]

Then arose there a mutiny and sedition in the Camp, wherein the chief Commanders, to the number a hundred, fel off from Perdiccas, and among them, Pithon himself; than whom there was not a braver man, for virtue and valour, and high esteem, among all Alexanders Nobles. But some of the Horse, conspiring together, made no more adoe, but went to his pavilion where he lay, and there slew him; when he had now held that principality three full years, at least, the third year running. [Id. with Arrianus and Iustin. lib. 13. cap. 8. Pausan. in Attic. pag. 5. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

The next day, when the whole army was called together, Ptolomei crossed the River, and came to the two Kings; and presenting both them, and other of the Nobles with honourable gifts, and behaved himself himself in all fair and humble manner to them all. And when he had excused himself for what he had done, finding that the army was distitute of provision, he supplied them with plenty of corn, and all other necessaries for their use. And he made it openly to appear, that he was hartily sorry, and bemoaned the present state and condition of Perdiccas his friends: and as he saw any Macedon in any distresse or danger, he did, what possibly he could, to relieve him, and help him out. Now albeit, being so gracious with all there, as he was, he might easily have gotten to be L. Protector of the two Kings, as Perdiccas was, yet he so far prevailed by his counsel with them, that when they met about that matter, all with one accord, cast the Protectorship of the two Kings, Aridæus, and Alexander the young child, upon Pithon, who was the man that had formerly quieted the commotions of the Greeks in the upper Asia, and Aridæus, which had formerly the charge of convoying the body of Alexander from Babylon, with sovereign power over all the armies; in such manner and form, as Perdiccas had, according to the first establishment, [Diodor. and Arrian.]

Two

Two daies after the death of Perdiccas, there came news of Eumenes his victory, gotten in Cappadocia, and of the death of Neoptolemus and Craterus; which had it come but two dayes sooner, had, no doubt, saved Perdiccas his life; for who, upon that successe, durst have stirred against him? But the Macedons, enraged for the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes for an open enemy, with 50 other Noble persons that were near about him; among which, was Pitho Illyrius, (for so I read them joyntly, in Justin; as also in Arrianus his Indica, [pag. 185.] Πείθων Κρατεᾶ Ἀλκομένιος: (i.e.) Pithon, the son of Crateus, of Alcomene; which in Stephanus de Urbibus, is a City in Illyria) and Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas: Generals, against them, were Antigonus and Antipater; and to this purpose was Antigonus sent for out of Cyprus, and commanded, together with Antipater, to come to the two Kings presence in all hast, [Diod. and Arria. with Just. l. 13. c. 8. and Plut. in Eumene.]

In Egypt also were put to death, all that had any reference to Perdiccas, and his sister Atalanta, whom Attalus the Admiral of Perdiccas, lying then with the fleet before Pelusium had married: He hearing of the death of his wife, and of Perdiccas, weighed anchor, and came to Tyrus, where Archelaus a Macedon, and Governor of the place, entertained him with all respect and love, and gave up the City, with 800 talents, which Perdiccas had deposited and left in trust with him, into his hands.

Attalus, staying at Tyrus, recieved and relieved all such of Perdiccas his friends, as could escape and get away from the Camp, lying before Memphis, [Diodorus.]

Euridice, the wife of King Aridæus, would not that the two Protectors should do any thing of moment without her: and they at first said no Nay thereto. Yet afterward, they told her plainly, that she had nothing to do with matters of State; only they said, they would have a care of her, till Antigonus and Antipater came. [Arria.]

Pitho and Aridæus, the two Protectors, removing from Nilus with the two kings, and the army, came to Triparadisus in the upper Syria: where, when Euridice would needs be over-busie and medling in matters of state, and would many times crosse the Protectors in their waies, Pithon, offended therewith, and the rather, for that he saw the Macedons enclined to obey her commands, called the Macedons together, and before them all, resigned his Protectorship: Thereupon they chose Antipater to bee Protector in his place, with all sovereign power belonging thereunto, [Diodorus.]

The army now demanded of Antipater, performance of all those rewards for their long labour in the wars, which Alexander had made them. Antipater, when he had nothing to give them for the present, told them that their demands were just and reasonable, and that he would shortly look into the Kings Treasure, and find out whatever he had laid up: which speech of his gave the army little satisfaction: whereupon when Euridice also helped to lay load upon him, the minds of the common souldiers were stirred up to a mutiny and sedition against him. At the same time Euridice made an open declamation against him, which was pronounced in the peoples hearing, by Asclepiodorus her Secretary. And Attalus seconded her, with another of his own; so that Antipater had much ado to escape alive out of their hands: But Antigonus and Seleucus stood up in his defence, and therein ran a hazard of their own lives alsoe.

Wherefore Antipater, having thus got clear of them, got him presently away to his own army, and then the chief Commanders of the Cavaleerie coming together, with much adoe, pacified the multitude, and so Antipater was sent for again, and willed to resume the sovereign power, and use it, as formerly he had done. [Diod.]

After this, Antipater made a new distribution of the Governments of the Provinces in Triparadisus: wherein he partly ratified what had formerly been done in that kind, and made some alterations, as the the present state of things required: And for Ptolomei, he was bid to hold what he had, for it was hard to remove him to any other Government, seeing he had in a manner gotten Egypt by way of conquest to himself. But Mesopotamia, and the Country of Arbela, were assigned to Amphimachus the Kings brother, Babylon to Seleucus, Parthia to Philippus, Aria and Drangiana to Stasander of Cyprus, Bactria and Sogdiana to Stasanor of Solos in the same Island, Media, as far as to the Caspian Gates, Perdiccas his son in law being now dead, was taken from Atropates, and given to Pithon the son of Crateas, or Cratenas, whereupon Atropates, calling the lesser Media from his own name Atropetia, turned it quite away from the Macedonian Government, and made himself absolute King of it: and in succession from him, it continued down to Strabo his time, as himself testifieth, [lib. 11. pag. 523.] Antigenes, (for whom Antigonus is fallely written in Diodorus) Captain of the silver Targateers, because he was the first that set upon Perdiccas, had the Province of Susa given him for his pains; and three thousand of the most turbulent Macedons in the late sedition to carry with him: The rest of the Provinces of the upper Asia, were left in the hands of such as had them before, save that Patala, the greatest City of all India, was upon this settlement, assigned to King Porus: as Arrianus saith; which we can hardly believe.

In the lesser Asia, Cappadocia, and with it Paphlagonia, were taken from Eumenes, and given to Nicanor. Lydia, (not Lycia as it is read in Diodorus) to Clytus; Phrygia the lesser, as far as to Hellespont, to Aridæus. Caria to Cassander, with Phrygia the greater, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, and Lycia, to hold them as he did before. In Diodore, is here read Cilicia, instead of Lycia: which himself a little before said was given to Philoxenus; or rather as Arrianus hath it, was confirmed to him: for I shewed a little before out of [Iustin. lib. 13. cap. 6.] that Perdiccas had taken that Province from Philotas, and given it to Philoxenus.

This Antigonus (who because he wanted one eye, was nick-named, the Cyclops, [Elian. lib. 12. Var. Hist. cap. 14.] was by Antipater made General of the Kings army, and Commander of those Forces in particular, which Perdiccas had. He committed to him also the care of the two Kings, and sent him to make war upon Eumenes, being of himself very desirous of that imployment: whereupon it is, that [Appianus in his Syriaca, pag. 121.] sayes, that Antipater made him, Ἐπίσκοπον τῆς ὅλης Ἀσίας: (i. e.) Overseer of all Asia: and [Diod. lib. 18. pag. 626.] calls him στρατηγὸν αὐτοκράτορα τῆς Ἀσίας: (i. e.) absolute Commander of all Asia: but joyned with him his own son Cassander (the Governour of Caria) as his Master or General of the Horse; to the end, that if Antigonus should go about to set up for himself, he might have an eye upon him, [Diodor. and Arrianus.]

At the same time Antipater made Autolychus the son of Agathocles, Amyntas, the son of Alexander, and brother to Pencesta, Ptolemei the son of Ptolemei, and Alexander the son of Polyspercon, Squires of the body to the two Kings, [Arria.] and having gotten a great applause among all sorts of men for his well ordering, and due administration of things in his Protectorship, he set onward of his journey with the two Kings, toward Macedonia, [Id. & Diodor.]

Eumenes, hearing that he was declared an enemy by the Macedons, and that Antigonus was sent against him, declared the matter of his own accord to the army; least perhaps the fame of it coming otherwayes to their eares, might make matters worse than they were, or the novelty of it should damp their courage: at least he should thereby find how his army stood affected to him, and to dispose of himself, as he should see occasion, upon the general carriage of them thereupon; yet he told them plainly, that if an mans heart failed him upon this news, he should have free leave to depart, and go whither he would; with which word, he so wan and fastned all mens hearts unto him, that they all bad him be of good cheer, saying, That they would cut that Decree of the Macedons in pieces with their swords, [Iustin. lib. 14. cap. 1.]

Moreover when news of that Decree came to Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, he presently fled, and ingratiated himself with the Pisidians; for whiles he was among them, when ever he got a booty from the enemy, he gave one half thereof to them, and was ever affable and courteous to them in his speech, often inviting the principal of them to Feasts, and honouring them with gifts and presents, whereby he wan the hearts of all unto him, [Diodor. pag. 623.]

Attalus also, who was chief Ammiral of the Navy, and who was with the first of them that fell off from Antipater, fled and banded himselfe with the rest of the now Banditoes: and gat together an army of 10 thousand Foot, and 800 Horse; and with these going to possesse himself of Cnidus, Caunus, and Rhodes, was by Demaratus the Ammiral of Rhodes, valiantly put off, [Arrianus.]

3684. Eumenes took as many horses, as he wanted out of the Kings breed, which was in the mount Ida: And when he sent an account for them in writing to the Kings Officers 4394 320 of the Revenue, Antipater laught at it, and said, that he wondered to see Eumenes so cautious, as to think, that either he himself would ever be accountable to them of the Kings goods, or look for an acconut of them from others.

From hence he marcht with his army, not into Etolia, as it is in the printed Copies of Justin; but as a Manuscript Copy hath it, into Etulia, or Etulane, which is a part of Armenia the lesse in Cappadocia (as Isaacus Vossius, a most learned young man, and my very good friend, observed out of Ptolemei) and there levyed monies of the Cities in those parts: and if any refused to pay contribution, he plundred them as so many enemies. And from thence again, he went to Sardes, and to Cleopatra, sister to Alexander the great, hoping that her presence would confirm his Centurions and other Officers of his army in their obedience unto him, as supposing that the right of Royal Majesty was on that side, on which the sister of Alexander stood, [Iustin. lib. 14. cap. 1.] And when it so fell out, that Antipater took also Sardes in his way to Macedon,

Eumenes

Eumenes would fain have put the matter upon a battle, in the fields of Lydia; both because he was the stronger in Horse, and because also he was desirous to let Cleopatra see, of what mettal he was made. But Clopatra, fearing lest Antipater and the Macedons might hereupon charge her to have been the author and abettor of this war against them, perswaded Eumenes to leave Sardes, Plutarch and Arrianus. Nevertheless Antipater when he came, forbare not to reproach her, with many fowl words, for having held correspondence with Eumenes and Perdiccas. But she, beyond what could have been expected from a woman, answered him again very stoutly, justifying her own actions, and laying the fault upon Antipater: yet so, as at last they parted fair, and upon good terms, [Arria.]

Eumenes therefore left the Country of Lydia, and marcht away into the upper Phrygia, and there took up his winter quarters in Celænæ, [Plut.] and dispatcht away messengers to Alcetas, and his associates; advising them to draw their forces into a body, and to make head against a common enemy. But when they could not agree among themselves; nothing was done, [Arrian.] for Alcetas, and Polemo, and Docimus, could not agree, who should be chief: Whereupon Eumenes cryed out and said, This is according to the old saying, Exitii nulla habetur ratio, (i.e.) There is no fence against destruction, [Plutarch.]

Eumenes promising to pay his army within three dayes, set all the Towns and Cities of that Country, which was full stored with men and Cattle, to sale. Whereupon the Captains and Commanders took them off his hands, and receiving Engins of battery from him, went and entered by force upon them, and making sale of all, paid every man his company to the full, [Id.]

Antipater, not daring as yet to fight with Eumenes himself, sent Cassander, to try the fortune of a battle with Alcetas and Attalus; and fight they did, and parted upon equal termes, yet so as Cassander had the worse of it, [Arria.]

Cassander, falling out with Antigonus, upon his father Antipaters perswasion, grew friends again with him; yet meeting with his father in Phrygia, he advised him, not to keep himself far off from the Kings, nor to rely too much upon Antigonus. But Antigonus by his temperate and discreet carriage, and obsequious behaviour upon all occasions, did what he could, to make Antipater have a good belief of his sincerity to him, and loyalty to the cause. Whereupon Antipater, putting of all displeasure towards him, delivered into his hands, of those forces which he had brought with him out of Asia, 8500 Macedons, and as many Horse of his confederates, with one Moitie of his Elephants, being 70 in number, that with them he might go thorough with the war against Eumenes; so Antigonus took upon him the management of that businesse; and Antipater with the Kings, took his journey to returne to Macedon, [Id.]

But then his whole army cryed out for gelt, and he promised them pay, when he came to Abydus; and told them, that perhaps he would there bestow on them the whole donative, which Alexander had promised; if not, yet at last the greater part thereof, feeding them therefore with this hope; he drew them on quietly to Abydus: but when he came thither, he with the two Kings in his company, stale away by night, and put over the Hellespont, and went to Lysimachus. And the morrow after they followed him, without any further calling for their pay, So saith Arrianus [in Biblio. Photii, cap. 92.] and here Arrianus ends his ten books, which he wrate of the gests of Alexander.

Antigonus drew all his forces out of their winter quarters, to march against Eumenes, and to subdue him, who at that time lay in Cappodicia, [Diodor.] Now there were billets cast about every where in Eumenes his Camp, promising 100 talents, and good conditions and offices besides: to him that would bring in Eumenes head to Antigonus, [Justin lib. 14, cap. 1. Plut. in Eumene.] Which when Eumenes perceived, he forthwith called all the souldierie together, and first thanked them all, for that in so great a multitude, there was none found, that would falsifie his oath taken to him, in hope of so bloudy a reward, and yet withall cunningly intimated to them, that these billets were of his own divising, to sound thereby their affections toward him, to the end, that if the enemy should do the like hereafter, the army might imagine, that it was still but a device of his to try them: Whereupon they all cryed out, and vowed their service, in the defence of his person, and preservation of his life, [Justin.] And thereupon they decreed among themselves, that there should out of the principal of the army, be chosen a thousand men, for his dayly guard, and that they should watch every night by turns about him, and they which were so chosen, were glad of the imployment, and wilingly received from his hands, such gifts, as the Macedon Kings used to bestow upon their Nobles: for Eumenes now took upon him scarlet Hats, and robes upon them, which among the Macedons was ever esteemed for a principal favour from their Kings, [Plut.] yet one of his chief Commanders, called Perdiccas, with 3 thousand foot, and 5 hundred horse fell from him, and was gotten 3 days journey on his way: and Eumenes dispatcht away Tenedius a Phenician, with 4 thousand choice foot, and a thousand horse to overtake them: which he did, and falling on them unawares, in the night time, whiles they were all asleep; took Perdiccas prisoner, and brought back all his souldiers to Eumenes, who pickt out the chief Authors of that defection, and put them to death, and distributed the rest by small parcels, among his other companies, speaking them faire, & using them courteously, and thereby wan their affections to himself again, [Diodorus.]

After this Antigonus dealt, by a privie messenger, with Apollonides, one of the commanders of the Horse, under Eumenes, and by large promises, drew him to play the traitor with Eumenes, and in the midst of the fight, to forsake, and turne against him. Eumenes at this time encamped in the country of Orcynia, in Cappadocia, a place fit for horse to fight in; and thither came Antigonus with his army, and took up all the upper ground, near the foot of the mountains, his army consisting of 10 thousand foot, most part whereof were Macedons, and men of admirable force and courage, and two thousand horse, and 30 Elephants: And Eumenes in his army had no lesse than 20 thousand foot, and 5 thousand horse. The battle began very fiercely on Eumenes his side: but Appolonides with his regiment of horse, falling suddenly off to the enemy, gave the victory to Antigonus: in that fight Eumenes lost 8000 men, and all his Carriages, [Id.]

Yet Eumenes suffered not the traitor to escape, but whiles he was in acting of that vilany, took him, and hung him up: Himself fled by a contrary way to that which they that pursued him took, and turning bak short, passed by the enemy, and came to the place where the battle was fought, and there encamped, and gathered together the bodies of his slain, and for want of other fewel in the place, took the doors and gates of the towns and villages thereabouts, off their hinges, and cleft them, and made piles of them to burn his dead withal, the Captains by themselves, and the common souldiers by theirs. In so much that Antigonus coming to the place afterward, stood amazed at this bold attempt of his, and undauntednesse of his high courage, [Plut.]

After falling by chance upon Antigonus his carriages, though he might there have taken many a prisoner, many slaves, with much stuffe, yet fearing lost his men, having gotten so much wealth, should grow lesse forward to fight, and if need were, lesse able to fly, by reason of their luggage, gave order that every man should see his horse well fed, and refresh himself, and then be ready to set upon the enemy: mean while he privily sent to Menander, who was set to keep the enemies luggage, to remove immediately out of the plain, to the foot of the mountain, for fear of being suddenly surrounded by the enemies Horse, which when he, seeing the danger, speedily did, the enemy said that they were very much beholding to Eumenes, for saving their children from slavery, and their wives from ravishment: But Antigonus told them that Eumenes did it not for their sakes, but to the end he might not shakle & hinder himself thereby in his flight, [Id.]

Eumenes went from thence, sculking here and there, and perswaded a great many of his men to leave him for the present, and to get them gone: whether out of an honest care which he had of them; or because they were now grown too few to oppose the enemy, and yet were too many to conceale him in his flight. But when he was come to Nora, which was a strong castle, and which Strabo, [l. 12.] saith in his time, went by the name of Neroassus,) a place seated upon the confines of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, with 500 horse, and 200 foot (though Diodorus saith that there were not above 500 in all there,) as many of his friends as desired his leave to be gone, because they could not brook, either the desolatenesse of the place, or the scarcity of victuals, that they there found, he gave it them freely, and embracing every one of them, in all faire and courteous manner sent them away: For the place it self was not above two furlongs in bignesse, and there was in it provision enough of corn, and salt, and water, but there was no store of fresh Cates to be had, [Id. with Diodorus, and Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.]

Antigonus, coming to the place, before he began any siege, sent to Eumenes to come to a parley, and when he required Hostages, Antigonus refused, but bad him come out as to his Superior; But Eumenes sent him word again, that as long as he ware a sword by his side, he would acknowledge no Superiour. Whereupon, when Antigonus sent him his own brothers son, called Ptolomei, as was required, Eumenes came forth: and they embraced each other very lovingly, and in all familiar manner. And having disputed of sundry matters, when Antigonus saw that he never mentioned any thing of his own security or pardon, but still demanded his former Governments to be confirmed, and recompence for his losses to be made unto him, the standers by stood amazed at it, and wondred at the constancie of his courage and magnanimity that was in him. Antigonus told him, that concerning these articles, he would advise with Antipater: And so with much ado, returned him again into his Castle, safe from the violence of the multitude: And having built a double wall, with trenches round about the Castle, and left men enough to maintain the siege, removed his Camp, [Ibid.]

After a while Eumenes sent messengers (among which, one was Hieronymus the Historian, a town-born child of Cardia, as himself was) to Antipater, for a pacification; [Diodorus, and Justin, Lib. 14. cap. 2.] and in the meantime, he provided victuals for his company, and though his fare was short, yet he made good chear with what he had, admitting them all in their turnes to his table, where he entertained them with pleasant discourses, and familiar speeches, instead of better meat, [Diod. and Plut.] and then as often as he had a mind to it, out he would sally, and either burn or overthrow Antigonus his works, [Emil. Prob.]

But fearing least by lying alwayes in one place, he should dry founder and lose all his horses, for want of breathing them, he gave order every day once to trusse up his horses with their fore feet above ground, and made them stand upon their hinder; that so with striving and much strugling, they might gather heat and fall a sweating: and gave them boiled barly to eat, that they might the sooner dispatch it, and the better digest it: whereby it came to passe, that when at last he came out of the Castle every man wondred to see his horse so fat and sleek, as if they had been all the while kept in the best pasture of the country, [Diodor. Jul. Fronti. strateg. lib. 4. cap. 7. Plut. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Ptolemei the son of Lagus, perceiving that Phœnicia, and Cœlosyria, would be very commodious to him, both for the keeping of Egypt, and also for the acquiring of Cyprus bet his brains about it, how he might compasse them. Wherefore he tried, whether he could draw Laomedon, who was made Governour of those two Provinces, first by Perdiccas, and afterward by Antipater, to deliver them into his hand: offering him a vast summe of money for it. But not able to compasse it that way, he raised a greater army, made his trusty friend Nicanor General of it, and sent him to wrest it by pure force out of his hand: and he marching into Syria, took Laomedon prisoner; but he by bribing his keepers got away, and fled to Alcetus where he was in Caria: and Nicanor having in a short time subdued all Phœnicia and Syria, and put Garrisons in them, he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. with Appia. in Syriac. pa. 121. and Pausan. in his Attica, pag. 5.]

Ptolemei, setting upon the parts of Phœnicia and Syria, and having gotten Hierusalem by a slight, carried thence to the number of 100 thousand men into Egypt: out of which, he selected 30 thousand of the ablest of them, whom he armed, and took into his army upon greater than ordinary pay, and committed his Garrison Towns and Castles in Egypt, especially to their trust. The rest he gave away for slaves among his souldiers, not so much of his own accord, as upon their importunity, who desired to have them rather than any other, for their necessary uses, and attendance in things belonging to the wars, [Aristeas, in lib. de 70. interpret. with Ptol. Philadel. his epistle, eod. lib. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 1. Euseb. 2. in Chron.]

Of his taking of Hierusalem, Agatharchides Cnidus, writeth in this manner, in his book of the successors of Alexander the great, in Josephus [lib. 1. cont. Apion. pag. 1050. with lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 1.] They which are called Jews, saith he, dwell in a most fortified City, which the natives call Jerusalem; these keep every seventh day Holiday: And meddle with no armes upon that day, nor with any part of husbandry, or any other manner of work whatsoever: onely holding up their hands in halowed places, they there stay praying till the evening with outstretched hands. And when Ptolemei the son of Lagus entered their City with his army, all men observed the folly of them that were set to keep it, and so the country came enslaved under a bitter master, and their law was found, to be naught else, but a foolish custom. Appian addes, that Ptolemei demolished the walls of the City: and that leaving Garrisons in Syria, he returned into Egypt by sea, [in Syriac. pag. 119, 121.]

Of this carrying away the Jewes captive into Egypt, Josephus speaketh in this wise, [lib. 12. Antiquit. cap. 1.] Ptolemei, saith he, carried away many captives out of the hill-country of Judea, and places bordering upon Jerusalem, and from Samaria, and the mount Gerizim, into Egypt, and made them to dwell there. And finding that they of Hierusalem were most strict observers of any oath which they had taken, by the answer which they made to Alexanders Messengers, after the last overthrow of Darius, he thought fit to place many of them now in his garrisons and castles: and when he had planted many of them in Alexandria, there to live enjoying the same priviliges which the Macedons had; he bound them all with an oath to be true liege men to his posterity, that had bestowed so great favours on them. And again in his [2 book cont. Apio. pag. 1063.] Ptolomæus Lagus, saith he, committed all his castles and places of strength to his Alexandrian Jewes, conceiving they would be kept most safe in their hands, in regard of their fidelity and manhood: and to the end he might reign most securely in Cyrene, Cyrene, and other parts of Lybia; he therefore sent many of those Jewes to inhabite in that country. And from them descended that Jason Cyrenæus out of whose writings was collected the second book of the Maccabes, [2 Maccab. cap. 2. v. 24.] and Simon Cyrenæus, who bare the crosse of Christ, [Matth. chap. 27. v. 32.] and of whom mention is made, [Acts, 2. v. 10. and cap. 6. v. 9.]

Antigonus, whiles Eumenes kept in Nora, besieged there with a double wall round about him, marched with his army against Alcetas, and Attalus, and first into Pisidia; where Alcetas with his strength lay: and having in seven dayes space marched two thousand and five hundred furlongs, he came to a City called, The City of the Cretenses: and coming thus speedily and unawares upon them, he possessed himself of some fitting hills and places of advantage thereabouts; and had in his company besides his Elephants, 40 thousand Foot, and 7 thousand Horse; yet durst Alcetas meet him in the open field, having but 16 thousand Foot, and 900 Horse of his friends in his army. But Antigonus having the advantage of the ground, and by far the stronger party, routed him, and took both Attalus and Docimus and Polemon, and many other great Captains prisoners; all which he took to mercy, and used great clemencie and humanity towards them, and disposed of the rest among his companies, and thereby much encreased his own army.

Alcetas himself with his life-guard, and sons, and other Pisidians which served him, fled to Telmessus a city of Pisidia, which the Pisidians, being to the number of 6 thousand, and all very strong and valiant men promised never to forsake him, and therefore when Antigonus with all his army came before the walls of Telmessus, and demanded Alcetas to be delivered up unto him, and the elder sort thought it fit so to do, the younger crue met together by night, and there bound themselves each to other by an oath, not to forsake him, for any danger that might come thereof: which notwithstanding, the Elders of the City sent a messenger privily to Antigonus, to let him know that they would deliver Alcetes into his hands alive or dead, if he would but toll out the souldiers to a skirmish, and making as if they themselves fled, draw them a reasonable distance off from the walls of their City; which was done accordingly; and in the mean time, the Elders fell upon Alcetas, with their men, which he perceiving, rather than he would fall alive into his enemies hand, drew his own sword and slew himself: His body laid upon a beer, and wrapt in a vile cloth, while the young men were fighting, was sent and presented to Antigonus, which he having for three daies together, exposed to all the contumelies and indignities that could be imagined, at last caused it to be cast out unburied. The younger crew returning from the fight, and hearing what had passed in their absence, grew enraged against the elders; and seizing on a quarter of the city, resolved at first to set it all on fire, but changing that purpose, they all fell to wast and spoile the enemies country thereabouts, and finding that Antigonus had left the corps of Alcetas behind him, they took it up, and buried it as honourably as they could devise, [Id.]

Antipater falling sick, and drawing to his end, ordained Polysperchon, to be Protector of the Kings, and soveraign Commander in his roome: which Polysperchon was almost the eldest man of all that ever served under Alexander; and was in very great esteem among the Macedons: But Cassander, Antipaters son, not content with the office of General of the Horse, which he held, but storming to see that Polysperchon was preferred before him in the Protectorship and soveraignty of the realm, began to treat with his friends, of getting the kingdom into his own hands, and sending underhand his Agents to Ptolomei, renewed his former friendship with him, and desired that he would make an association of armes with him, and come away with his fleet out of Phenicia into Helespont; The like he did to other Commanders and Cities, intreating them to joyne in armes with him, [Idem, with Plutarch in Phocio.]

When Antigonus, returning with his army out of Pisidia into Phrigia, came to the City of the Cretenses, he was there advertised of all these matters by Aristodemus of Miletum; which pleased him well, for hereupon he presently founded his hopes of soveraignty in his mind, [Diodorus, with Plutarch in Eumene.] for being left sole and absolute Commander over all Asia by Antipater, and having a greater army there, than any other, he made no doubt of seizing upon all the Kings treasure there, whiles there was none to oppose him. He had then in his army, 60 thousand foot, and 10 thousand horse, and 30 Elephants; and saw that he had means to encrease, if need were, his army at pleasure: for that drawing forreign Nations to his service, Asia was well able to feed and pay them all abundantly: Wherefore calling a Council of his friends, he declared to them, That his purpose was, to put for all; and thereupon, assigned such and such of his friends, to several Offices and Commands, and desired them, with huge promises made to every of them, to stand by him and assist him what they could, in what he went about; for that he resolved to go thorough all Asia, and to put out out such Governours, as were then in office, and to put others of his own choice in their rooms, [Diodor.]

Aridæus, who had the government of Phrygia upon the Hellespont committed to him, perceiving what Antigonus went about, and purposing to provide for one, went and set upon Cizycum, which was a great City, and of all others lay most oportunely for his occasions. He had in his company above 10 thousand mercenary Foot souldiers, and one thousand Macedons, Persian archers and slingers five hundred, and eight hundred Horse, with all manner of Engins of battery; and in great abundance. And the men of Cizycum, under a colour of a treaty for a pacification, obteined of him cessation of arms, for a time, and then drave out the time in drawing up articles upon which the surrender was to be made, but had in that time sent to Byzantium for aide and supplies of men and munition, of all sorts for their defence: and sailing along their own coasts with their men of war, took in men out of the Country, and stored the city with them, and with such provision as they brought with them. The end was; Aridæus having been fooled by the men of Cyzicum, and lost many of his men upon the place, was fain to leave Cizycum as he found it, and to return to his own government again, [Id.]

Antigonus, being then at Celenæ, hasted him away, with 20 thousand choice foot, and three thousand Horse, to the relief of Cizycum, thinking hereby to have that City hereafter at his devotions. But coming a litle too late, he sent messengers to Aridæus, to expostulate the matter with him, and why he did it: and withall, to require him, to give vp that government which he had into his hands, and to live there hereafter, in the quality of a private man, contenting himself with the revenue of one onely City to live upon. That he refused to do, and presently disposed guards about the gates and walls, and other places of the City, wherein himself was; and then dispacht away a part of his army, with a Commander over them, to joyn with Eumenes, and to raise the siege from before Nora Castle, and having rid him out of that danger to draw him into a league and association of arms against Antigonus, [Id.]

Emil. Probus tells us, that Eumenes toward the beginning of the Spring, under colour of submitting himself to Antigonus, and treating of conditions from day to day, at last put a trick upon him, and got both him self and all his people safe out of the Castle, [in Eumene.] But Justin, [lib. 4. cap. 2.] sayes, that Antigonus, when he found that Antipater had sent relief to Eumenes, raised his siege. And Diodorus, and Plutarch deliver, that Eumenes by the Mediation of Hieronymus Cardianus, his countriman and true friend, was suffered to come out upon his word, and thus it was.

Antigonus casting with himself how to get all into his own hands, sent for Hieronymus the Historian, to come unto him, and imployed him in a message to Eumenes, to deal with him to this effect, to wit, that forgetting what had passed between them two in the fight at Cappadocia; he would now be pleased to joyn with him in a firm league of love and friendship, and association of armes; offering to restore him far more wealth than he had lost, and a greater Province and Dominion, than ever he had before; and to make him chief of all his friends, and partaker of all his desines and fortunes. [Diodor.] And when Antigonus had drawn up a form of an oath, whereby to bind each other to a strict performance of conditions, and sent them to Eumenes; Eumenes took and corrected them in some points; and then put it to those Macedon Captains, which were in the siege against him, to judge which of the two was the better, and more indifferent draught. For Antigonus among other things, made mention of the Kings perfunctorily, and as by the way, but performance of all services and conditions, referred onely to himself, and were made in his own name: whereas Eumenes in his draught, first joyned Olympias with the two Kings: and then secondly drew the oath in such terms, as purported that he would reckon them all friends and foes, as were friends and foes, not to Antigonus, but to Olympias and the two Kings. And when this seemed to be the more reasonable of the two; and Eumenes took his oath, so that they presently raised their siege, and sent to Antigonus, praying him that he would bind himself in the same form of oath to Eumenes. Mean whiles, Eumenes, what ever hostages he had of the Cappadocians, sent them all home again. And Antigonus wrate back a sharp and a taunting letter to those Macedons, for presuming to amend or altar any thing in the form of the oath, which he had prescribed for Eumenes to take, and willed them to besiege him again, as close as ever they did; but this came too late, [Plut.]

Eumenes, having after a years close siege, got out at last beyond expectation, stayed a while in Cappadocia: and there gathered together, such of his old friends and souldiers, as were now scattered about the Country, [Diodor.] And to begin the world anew, the friends of those hostages which he had restored, lent him Horses, and carriages, and Tents: and in a short time, there came into him, of his old Regiments, which which hitherto lay sculking up and down the Country, to the number of 1000 horse [Plut.] For in regard that he was of himself a most active and industrious man, and sundry others there were, who were in like manner affected to the state, as he himself was: hence it came, that great multitudes of souldiers came flocking to him. To be short, within a few dayes, besides those five hundred friends, which were with him in the Castle, he had gotten together two thousand men, all ready bent to serve him, [Diodor.]

Antigonus, having sent some of his forces to besiege Aridæus, the Governour of the lesser Phrygia, marcht himself with a mighty army into Lydia, to turn Clitus out of his Government there, but Clitus having gotten notice aforehand of his coming, presently stuffed every Town of his, and place of defence, with a strong garrison, and went himself into Macedon, there to acquaint the Kings, and Polysperchon the L. Protector, with Antigonus his doings, and how his purpose was to revolt, and fall off from the Macedonian Government, and thereupon prayed aide against him, [Diodor.]

Then did Antigonus take in Ephesus at his first coming, having some within the city, which help to bring him in. But a while after, when Escylus of Rhodes came thither, and in four ships brought with him six hundred men out of Cilicia, and 400 talents, which from thence were sent to the Kings in Macedon; Antigonus seiz'd on it all for his own use: saying that he had need of it, to raise and pay forreign souldiers withall: by which act of his, he plainly discovered his intention to be, wholly to set up for himself, and to rebell against the Kings. This done, he then proceeded to take in the rest of the Cities, some by force, others by fair words, [Id.] And from this revolt it is, that Dexippus, Porphyrie, and Eusebius, reckon the 18 years of his principality in Scaligers Græca Eusebiana [pag. 48, 164, 226.]

Cassander, crossing the Hellespont, went to Antigonus, in Asia, desiring his assistance, and assuring him of Ptolomeis concurrence therein. Antigonus was glad of his coming, and presently offered to assist him by land and sea. This he did under a colour, as if he would help him for his father Antipaters sake; but his main drift was, to imbroile him in as many wars and troubles, as possibly he could in Europe: to the end, that he might the more freely go on, and compasse his own ends in Asia, and make himself King there, [Diodor.]

Polyspercon, Protector of the Kings, and ἐπιμελητὴς, (i.e.) Curate of the Macedonian Empire, wrate away a letter to Eumenes, in the two Kings names, requiring him thereby to stand firm to the Kings, and to make a party against Antigonus, as hitherto he had done; and therein to take his choice, whether he would come over into Macedon, and there joyn with him in maintenance of the two Kings safety, or would stay in Asia, and have supplies sent him thither of men and mony, and munition, to oppose Antigonus, who had now openly declared himself a rebel against the Kings, And that if he stood in need of greater forces, himself would be ready with the Kings, and all the power that the kingdom of Macedon could make, to crosse the seas, and to come into Asia, to joyn with him. The like letters were sent to the Tresurers in Cilicia, requiring them, out of those monies, which were at Quindi (where the Kings exchequer for Asia was kept, as Strabo lib. 14. p. 72. testifieth) forthwith to furnish him with 500 talents toward the reparation of his losses lately susteined, and out of the rest of the Kings monies, as much as he should call for, to hire and pay forreign souldiers withall. He also wrate his letters to Antigenes and Tentamus, who between them, commanded three thousand silver Targateers under Antigonus, that they should put them over to Eumenes, and be assistant to him all that possibly they might; as the man, that was made absolute Commander and Governour of all Asia, under the Kings. And Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, failed not on his part, to write the like letters, requiring all men to come and aide both herself, and the Kings, [Diodor. with Plut. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Eumenes hereupon removed out of Cappadocia, having 500 Horse, and two thousand Foot onely in his company; for he had not the leisure to attend their coming, who had promised to list themselves under him, but were not then come: because Menander was coming on with a great army, which would not suffer him to nestle in Cappadocia, having professed himself an open enemy to Antigonus. But those who were left behind, following Eumenes three dayes journey, when they saw they could not possibly overtake him, returned into Cappadocia, [Diodor.]

Eumenes, making long stages, pass'd the mount Taurus, and came into Cilicia. Then came to him Antigenes, and Tentamus, Captains of the silver Targateers, with their friends, in obedience to the command of the Kings, and having congratulated his happy escape out of so many and imminent dangers, they offered him their service, and promised to stand by him in his utmost dangers, and then came the Regiment of the silver Targateers, all Macedons, to the number of about three thousand, to present themselves, with promise of all duty and service to him, [Id.]

Eumenes

3686. Eumenes, fearing the envy of the Macedons, if he, being an alian borne in Cardia, in the Chersonese of Thracia, should bear himself as absolute General in the place; first waived the receit of those 500 talents, which were ordered to him for his losses, saying that he needed not so great a summe, seeing he pretended to no principality there, [Diodor. and Plutarch.] Then pitched he his tent in the name of Alexander, and called it Alexanders pavilion, pretending that he was warned so to do, by a vision in a dream: and there caused a golden Throne to be set, with a Scepter and a Diadem; and there they met every day to consult of matters, hoping that the envy towards him would be the lesse, if he seemed to administer all things, under the majesty and title of Alexander, [Diodor. Plutarch, Emil. Prob. Polyænus, lib. 4. Stratag.] By this means therefore, and by carrying himself in all meetings, as an ordinary man, and by speaking every man faire, and with courteous language, he put off all envy from himself; and carrying himself in like manner toward the silver Targateers, being all Macedons, he grew very far into their books, so that every man said, that he was of all men most worthy to have the tuition of the Kings, [Diodor.] for in the fairnesse of his language, he stuck not to call them sometimes, his fellow souldiers, sometimes his masters, and companions of his, in those Easterne wars; telling them, that they were the onely men who conquered the East: the onely men who out-went Bacchus and Hercules, with their victories; That they were the men, who made Alexander Great; That by them it was, that he attained divine honours, and immortal glory in the World: desiring them withal, that they would not look upon him, as upon their Commander, but as upon their fellow souldier, and a man of their own company and body, [Justin. lib. 14. cap. 2.] 4390.

Then pickt he out certain choice men of his friends, whom he furnisht with money in abundance, and sent them to take up and hire souldiers, upon large pay. Whereupon they presently dispersed themselves, some going into Pisidia and Lycia, and places bordering upon them, others into Cilicia, Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and did their utmost endeavour to list what souldiers they could get; many Grecians also, seeing what large pay was offered, listed themselves; so that in short time, they had gathered together 10 thousand Foot, and 2 thousand Horse: besides the silver Targateers, and those which Eumenes brought with him out of Cappadocia, [Diodor.]

Ptolomei, coming with his Navy to a Port called Zaphyrium in Cilicia, sent some of his Agents, to sollicite the silver Targateers, not any longer to follow or look after Eumenes, a man long since, proclaimed and devoted to death. He sent also to the chief officers at Quindi, advising them not to issue out any monies to him: But no man hearkened to one word he spake, because the Kings and their Governour Polysperchon; and Olympias her self, had written to, and required them to be obedient in all things to Eumenes, as to the Commander in chief and General of the kingdom, [Id.]

After this Antigonus sent one of his chief friends Philotas, with 30 Macedons in his company, to the silver Targateers, to feel the pulse, first of their Captains and principal souldiers among them, if by any largesse, or hope of reward, they might be drawn to destroy Eumenes, now that he was in their hands. But they found no man pliant to their desires, save onely Tentamus, one of the Captains of the silver Targateers; who not only promised for himself, but undertook also to draw over Antigenes his collegue, to their foul design. But Antigenes was so far from hearkning to him therein, that on the contrary he prevailed with Tentamus, to give off his purpose; shewing him that there were better things, and upon better grounds to be hoped for and expected from Eumenes, a man of a moderate fortune and a limited power, than from Antigonus, who was already grown too great; and that he, having once gotten all into his hands, would presently thrust them out of their places, and put in whom pleased himself of his own friends. Then did Philotas deliver to the chief Captains Antigonus his letters, directed to the souldiers in general, whereby he required them upon sight thereof, to lay hold on Eumenes, and kill him; threatning withal, that if they did it not, he would come presently and fall upon them with his army, and do exemplary justice on them for their disobedience herein: whereat they were not a little terrified; but Eumenes, coming in upon them, perswaded them, rather to follow the command of their Kings, and not hearken to the words of a man who had now professed himself an open rebel. And in the end, having spoken many things pertinent to the present purpose, he not onely saved himself from an imminent danger, but also, obliged the multitude to him in a firmer band of duty and affection, than ever they were before, [Id.]

And presently gave order to march, and went into Phœnicia, and there gat together what ships possibly he could out of all the sea towns, and made him a strong Navy: to the end, that Polysperchon having a Fleet at command, might upon all occasions put over with his forces out of Macedon into Asia against Antigonus. This therefore was the cause which made him stay the longer in Phœnicia, [Id.]

Polysperchon, mean while, made Clitus the Governour of Lydia, Ammiral of the Fleet, and sent him into the Hellespont, commanding him to stay thereabouts, and to take care, that no shipping passed that way out of Asia into Europe: willing him moreover to assist Aridæus Governour of the lesser Phrygia, and who was at that time fled with such men as he had into the City of the Cyonians for fear of Antigonus, [Id.]

After that Clitus was come into Hellespont, and had taken the Cities of Propontis into his protection, and had joyned Aridæus his army to his own, then did the Captain of the Garrison of Manychium, sent by Cassander, with all his Navy put to sea likewise; taking with him also Antigonus his Fleet, so that he was in all above one hundred ships; coming therefore to a sea-fight not far from the City of Byzantium, Clitus had the better of it, and sunk 17 of the enemies ships; and took no lesse than 40 more with all the men in them, [Id.] whereat if he grew over-joyed, it is no marvel, considering that having but a little before taken but three, or at the most four ships of the Grecians near the Isle of Amorgus, one of the Cyclades, he was content and suffered himself to be called Neptune, and bare a Trident in his hand; as [Plut. lib. 2. De fortu. Alexan. saith.]

Antigonus, hearing of the losse of his Navy at sea, sent for certain Barques from Byzantium, and put into them archers and slingers, and targateers, and such light armed men, as many as he thought fit, and landed them in Europe side; and these setting upon Clitus his men who were gone ashoar, and busie in making their Camp; put them into a fright, and thereupon they hasted to their ships again: but were sore troubled, what for losse of their baggage, what for the misse of their fellows, many of which were taken prisoners. And in the mean time he provided other ships of war; whereinto he put many of his principal best souldiers, and sent them to the same place, with a strict charge to set valiantly upon their enemies; for that in so doing, they should no doubt overcome them. These therefore, coming thither by night, under the command of Nicanor their Captain, set upon their enemies at the break of day; put them to flight at the very first assault, and bilging some of them with their beakes, took others with the men in them, which called for quarter: and at last, took all the rest of the ships and men, save onely the Ammiral. Clitus himself left his ship, and fled to land, thinking to get into Macedonia; but in the way fell among Lysimachus his souldiers, who slew him, [Diodor.]

Antigonus, having given the enemy this great blow, bare himself for master of the Sea: and hasted now to make himself absolute Monarch of all Asia: Wherefore, taking with him 20 thousand foot, and 4 thousand Horse, the best of both sorts, that he could pick out of all his army, he marcht away towards Cilicia, to disperse those companies of Eumenes which there were, before his whole army came together, [Id.]

3687. Jubilie 23. 4397 317

Eumenes, knowing Antigonus his design, endevoured to reduce Phœnicia where he then was, to the obedience of the Kings; because at that time it was injustly possessed by Ptolemei: but failing thereof, he removed thence, and went thorough Cœlosyria, purposing to get into those parts, which are called the Upper Provinces, [Diodor. lib. 18.] and having the silver Targateers with him, with their Captain Antigenes, wintered in a country of Babylonia, which is called Cares, [Id. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, being there, sent to Seleucus the Governour of Babylonia, and to Pithon the governour of Media, to come, and, together with himself, to assist the Kings, against Antigonus, who rebelled against them. Seleucus sent him word that he would do what service he could for the Kings: but commanded by Eumenes, who stood long since a condemned person by the Council of the Macedons, he would not: and withal sent under-hand to Antigenes and the silver Targateers, to depose Eumenes; but they would not, [Id. ibid.]

Eumenes, commending the loyalty of his souldiers, went forward to the bank of Tigris, and there encamped, 300 furlongs off from Babylon: and there lost some of his men, by the rising of the Natives upon him. From thence he purposed to go forward to Susa, both that he might there recollect his souldiers out of the upper Provinces, and also take and make use of the Kings monies, which lay there, for his urgent and necessary occasions. But Seleucus coming upon him near the Euphrates, he was put in danger of losing his whole army by a sudden inundation, which Seleucus brought upon him, by opening the head of an old dam or sluce, and letting in the water upon his Camp, which was ready to drown all. Wherefore he and his men were fain to flie from thence to a piece of upper ground, and there they spent that day; casting in their minds, how to remedy this inconveniency. And the next day they got 30 flat-botom'd boats, wherein they transported the chief part of the army, without impeachment of the

the enemy: For Seleucus had nothing but horse with him, and them also far inferior to Eumenes in number: And now the night came on, when Eumenes, taking care of his carriages which were left behind, went back with his Macedons again over the river, and there by the means of the Natives, found a place, where to let out the water another way, and so to make all that country dry and passable again: which Selucus perceiving, and withal, desirous to rid his countrey of such guests, as soon as possibly he could, sent messengers to offer them a truce, and so suffered them to march away without interruption. And so Eumenes, having escaped out of Seleucus his hands, beyond expectation, came with his army into Persia; or rather into the country of Susa, having then with him 16000 Foot, and 1300 Horse, and then, having refreshed his army after their hard and miserable march, he sent to the Commanders of the upper Provinces, to send him in, forthwith, both men and mony, for the service of the Kings. [Id.l. 18. and 19.]

Attalus Polemo, Antipater and Philotas, all Captains, taken in the overthrow of of Alcetes, and committed to prison in an exceeding strong Castle, hearing that Antigonus was marched up into the upper Provinces, (Diodorus saith, that at that time he was in Mesopotamia) and having gotten every man a sword, and being but eight in number, at midnight, set upon 4 hundred men, then in the Garrison; and seizing first upon Xenopithes, the Captain of it, threw him down the rock of the Castle, which was one furlong high, & having killed some, & forced the rest, set fire on the houses within the fort, whereupon they which were without, attending the issue of their attempt, came, and were received into the Castle, to the number of fifty men; But being in, and not agreeing among themselves, whether they should make good the place, attending supply from Eumenes, or leave it, and shift every man for himself, the souldiers of other Garrisons, not far off, to the number of 500 foot, and 400 horse, and upwards, and the Natives thereabouts, to the number of 3 thousand came in, and making a Captain one of themselves, besieged the place round; Docimus, who advised to leave the place, espying a way down the hill, without a guard to keep it, treated by a messenger with Statomice the wife of Antigonus, who lay not far off, and with one only in his company, gate out, and went to her: but she, not keeping her word with him, laid him fast again; But he that went with him, made himself a leader and guide to the enemy, and led them up the castle, and with them, being a considerable number, possessed himself of a strong place in it. Neverthelesse Attalus, with the rest, which were of opinion to maintain the fort, kept on fighting from day to day, in manful wise. [Id. lib. 19.]

Pitho, who was Governor of Media, having slain Philotas, who was Governor of the upper provinces, put his own brother Eudramus in his room: Whereupon the other Governors combined together, fearing least they might also be served with the same sauce, because Pitho was a man of a turbulent humor, and used to put himself upon great matters, and having overthrown him and slain a great part of his men, they drave him quite out of all Parthia: whereupon he came into Media, hoping to have relief there, but finding none, he retired to Babylon, and there desired succour from Seleucus his hand, [Id. l. 19.]

Eumenes, continuing in the Country of Susa, for want of victuals, divided his whole army into three brigades, and yet so marching through the countrey, found great scarcity of corne every where; but was fain to give them instead thereof, rice, and a kind of Indian wheat, and the fruit of palm tree, whereof there was great abundance in those parts. Now although he had afore-hand sent the Kings letters to them of the upper Provinces, to be aiding to him; yet he again sent other letters to them of his own, to request them to come unto him with all their power into the country of Susa. But his Agents found them all in a body, met together against Pitho, [Ibid.]

The chief among them all, and the man on whom allyes were most fixed, was Pencestes, whom Alexander had heretofore made the chief Squier of his body, and Governor of Persia; he had about him Persian Archers, and Slingers, to the number of ten thousand, and of other Nations, taken into the rank of Macedons, 3 thousand, with 6 hundred horse, of Greeks and Thracians together, and of Persian horse, 4 hundred; Polemon a Macedon, Governour of Carmania had 1500 foot, and 700 horse; Sibyrtius the Governor of Arachosia had one thousand foot, and 610 horse. Androbazus was there, with 1200 foot, and 400 horse, sent from Oxyarta, the Governor of Parapamysus; Stasanor the Governor of Aria, and Drangia, with some Bactrians, made 1500 foot, and one thousand horse. Out of India came to them, Eudamus (whom Arrianus calleth Eudemus, and Curtius Eudemon,) Governor of the Oxydracans and Mallians, with 300 horse, and 3 thowsand foot, and 120 Elephants, which he got, when he trecherously slew Porus the King of Indians: so that they amounted in all, to 18700 foot (though the particulars make 21000.) and 4603 Horse, [Ibid.]

These, when they were all come to Eumenes, in the Country of Susiana, called a publick council, where arose a hot dispute, especially between Pencestes and Antigenes Captain of the silver Targateers, about the choice of a General. But Eumenes had long before taken away all occasion of that dispute, by erecting a pavillion for Alexander, and erecting his throne therein, wherein all meetings were to consult of publick affairs as in his presence, [Ib.]

And then coming all together to Susa, Eumenes took out of the Kings treasurie there, so much as the Kings service then necessarily required, for the Kings letters to the keepers of their treasure there, had required, that they should issue to Eumenes alone, so much money, without stint, as he required. Wherefore he gave the Macedons six moneths pay before-hand, and to Eudamus, which brought those Elephants out of India, he gave two hundred talents, under colour of defraying the charge of those beasts, but indeed to oblige the man himself to his devotion: for he saw well, that if any controversie should arise among them, that party was most like to carry it, to which he with his beasts should apply himself. The rest of the Governours paid every man his own souldiers that he brought with him. This done, Eumenes continued a while in Susiana, to refresh his army after their hard journey, [Ibid.]

Philippus Aridæus (one of the two Kings) with his wife Euridice, by the command of Olympias, were murdered: having reigned six years, after the death of Alexander, [Justin. lib. 14. cap. 5.] and four moneths over, as [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.] Id. and Porphyrie [in Græc. Euseb, pag. 228.] about the 22 day of our September.

3688. Cassander, the son of Antipater, besieged Olympias with her grand-child Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, and his mother Barsine, in a Town of Macedonia, called Pydna. In the beginning of the Spring following, all provisions failing, Olympias was forced to dismisse her souldiers; and her self shortly after, upon promise of life, which she could hardly obtain, yeilded her self into Cassanders hands, [Diod. and Justin. lib. 14. cap. 6.] 4398. 316.

Antigonus, removing out of Mesopotamia, came into the Country of Babylonia, and there confederating with Seleucus and Pitho, and receiving some supplies from them, he made a bridge of boats over the River Tigris, and there crossing the River, he marched away with all speed against Eumenes, wherefore Eumenes being before-hand advertised, gave in charge to Xenophilus the keeper of the Castle in Susa, to issue out none of the Kings monies to Antigonus, nor to come out to a parly with him, at any hand; and so went with his armies, and manned the bank of Tigris all along, from the head thereof, to the very sea, with forts every where built upon the bank thereof: and because that work, by reason of the length thereof, required no small number of men, therefore Eumenes and Antigenes obteined of Pencestes to send them 10 thousand archers more out of Persia, [Diodor. year. 1. Olymp. 116.]

Antigonus, going with his army to the Kings palace in Susa, there made Seleucus, Governour of that Country, and leaving a sufficient army with him, willed him to besiege the Castle there: and when Xenophilus the Tresurer, refused to obey his commands, he about the rising of the dog-star, with his army marched by night-journies to the River Copatres, where it falls into the Tigris; but lost a great multitude of his men, by the way, in regard of the excessive heat of the season: and whereas he found that river, when he came to it, to be four acres broad, therefore he got together a small quantity of flat-bottom'd boats, and in them put over some of his Foot, bidding them there to attend the coming of the rest. Whereof Eumenes being advertised by his scouts, (and he was at that time but 80 furlongs off from the place) presently with four thousand Foot, and 1300 Horse, passing the bridge of Tigris, found three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse, of Antigonus his army put over, and no lesse than six thousand of others, who were forraging about the Country; all these he suddenly set upon, and routed them. As for the Macedons which made resistance, he forced them to the river; where running headlong into their boats, and overcharging them, they sunk, so that few of them escaped: and they that would not venture upon the River, were taken prisoners, to the number of four thousand: so saith Diodorus. But Plutarch saith, that when Antigonus passed the Pasitigris, and the rest of the army perceived it not, Eumenes himself met him, with his own company, and slew many of his men, and filled the River with dead carcases, and besides, took four thousand prisoners.

Antigonus, seeing he could not passe that River, retired with his army toward a city called Balaca, seated upon the River Ulaie, where staying some certain dayes, he refreshed his army, which was tired out with the vehemencie of the heat, and purposing from thence to go to Ecbatane, he went not by the high-way, both by reason of the immoderate heat, and because it would take him up no lesse than 40 dayes journy, in going: but by the Cossæans, which was the shorter cut, and not so exposed to the scorching of the sun, as the other was, wherein neverthelesse, he lost a multitude of his men, men, and hazarded all the rest, and yet at nine dayes end, hardly came to any habitable place in Media: where when the whole army began to grumble, for that within the space of 40 dayes, they had received three such blows, he commanded Pithon to go over all Media, which he did, and brought him in two thousand Horse, and a thousand Horses ready furnished, and so many loads of munition, that all the army might thereof be compleatly furnished; and withall, five hundred talents out of the Kings treasure. Antigonus disposed of those Horse among his other Troups; and distributed the Horses, among those who had lost their own, and gave the beasts of draught or carriages, freely among those that wanted them, whereby he quickly regained the love and favour of his army again, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116.]

Eumenes with his men, removing from Pasitigris toward Persia, came to the Regal seat of the kingdom, called Persepolis at the end of 24 dayes march; where his whole army was entertained, and most magnificently feasted by Pencestes the Governour of that Province, after sacrifice offered to the gods, and among them to Alexander and Philip, and as Plutarch addes, a sheep was given to every man of them, for his own particular sacrifice. But when Eumenes perceived that his purpose was hereby to ingratiate himself with the army, and to gain to himself the soveraign power and command thereof, he caused a forged letter to be written to himself in the name of Orontes the Governour of Armenia, an intimate friend of Pencestes, in Syriac characters, purporting that Olympias, with Alexanders youngest son, having destroyed Cassander, had recovered again the kingdom of Macedon, and that Polysperchon, with the main power of the Kings army and his Elephants, had put over into Asia, against Antigonus, [Diod. ib. Polyæ. stratag. lib. 4.] These letters therefore going for current, every man cast in his mind, that Eumenes would be all in all, and the great man to advance whom he pleased, and to punish whom he thought fit, and therefore resolved to depend on him: and he, as he found any averse from him, called them in question, in form of law; beginning with Sibyrtius the Governour of Arachosia, and so made them all afraid; and in the mean time courted Pencestes, and held him on, with all terms of love and friendship: telling him what heaps of honour and wealth he would cast upon him when time should serve; and by that means held him quiet, from attempting any further against him, as he had begun to do, [Diod. Ib.]

And being further desirous to oblige the rest of the Governours of Provinces, and Commanders to himself, he made as though he had wanted money; and therefore exhorted them to contribute what they could spare, for the Kings service: and having by this means gotten out of them to the summe of 400 talents, he made them who seemed most fickle to him before, most sure to him now, for fear of losing the monies which they had lent, [Id. ib. and Plut. in Eume.]

3689. c. In the lesser Asia Attalus, and the rest of the Commanders with him, after one year and 4 moneths siege endured, and much hardship suffered therein, were forced at last to render themselves, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.]

In the greater Asia, Antigonus removing with his army out of Media into Persia, Eumenes preparing to march against him, and offering sacrifices, fell a feasting with his Captains: and, therein following their humor, over-drank himself so far, that he was fain to lie by it, and so hindered his march for certain dayes: Whereupon his souldiers said, that other Generals could feast, but Eumenes could do nothing but command and fight. Yet after a little while, he recovered himself, and went on upon his march, wherein Pencestes and Antigenes led the Van: and he in a Lictier came after with the Elephants. And now the two armies were within a dayes journey each of other: when the scouts came in, and brought tidings of their approach, and what numbers they were, and what wayes they took; whereupon each party prepared for the field. But when Eumenes, lying in his Lictier, came not into the Camp among them, the chief souldiers in every company, resolved not to stir a foot further, unlesse Eumenes himself came into the Camp among them. Whereupon he was carried in his Lictier, and so went from one quarter to another thoroughout the army, and gave order every where for the ranging of it, whiles Antigonus lookt on, and laughed at him for his labour: and so the battles were ranged on both sides, but could not come to fight, the ground was so bad that lay between them, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116. Plut. in Eumene.]

Wherefore drawing off each from other three furlongs space, they spent four dayes, in light skirmishes, and forraging the Country thereabouts, being pinched on either side, with hunger, and want of other necessaries: and on the fifth day, Antigonus fell again a practising with Eumenes his army to betray him, upon hopes of huge rewards: but his agents were sent away by the Macedons with great indignation and threats, if they offered to come again in that errand. After which Eumenes, having gotten intelligence that Antigonus had a purpose to remove his Camp, by night, three dayes journey off, to a place called Gabiene, a country abounding with all provisions, sent some trusty men under colour of run-awayes, to inform Antigonus, that Eumenes would would fall upon his Camp that night: and whiles Antigonus was preparing to receive him there, Eumenes stole away with his army, to get to Gubiene before him, and there to take up his station for his Camp. Antigonus finding at length that Eumenes had put a trick upon him, though Eumenes was gotten six houres march before him, yet he followed after him; and willing Pitho to come saftly after, with the main body of the army; he, with a company of the swiftest that he could chuse, gat before him, and shewed himself upon a hill, where Eumenes must needs see him. Eumenes gathering thereby, that Antigonus with all his army was there, made a stand, before he came to the very place, where he intended to pitch his Camp, and there ranged his battle in array, and the mean while, came Antigonus his army up unto him: thus these two great Generals used their wits, and put tricks each upon the other, [Diodorus Ibid.]

And here now, being in the Country of the Paraeteceni, these two Generals ranged each his army, in excellent array, and with great judgement, as Diodorus sets it down at large. Eumenes had with him 35 thousand Foot, and six thousand, and one hundred Horse, and 114 Elephants. Antigonus on his part, had 28 thousand Foot, and upwards: 8500 Horse, and 65 Elephants. These fell to work, in most manfull wise, and continued on the fight without shrinking on either side, till almost midnight, the moon being then at full. When being spent on both sides, they were fain to give off fighting, and to fall to work upon encamping: there died on Antigonus his side, 3700 Foot, and 54 Horse, and about four thousand maim'd. Eumenes lost of his Foot 540, and a very small number of his Horse, and upward of 900 hurt. [Id. ibid.]

Eumenes would fain have gotten the corpses of such as he had lost to bury them, in signe of a totall victory: but the army would not, but would needs return to the place, where their stuff was laid, being somewhat far off, and so Eumenes was fain to let that alone.

But Antigonus forced his men to camp near the place where the battle was fought, and where his men lay dead, & there burying them, bare himself for master of the field; and gave it out, that the victory was his, saying, That he who had power to bury his dead, was ever to be counted conqueror of the field: so having buried them by break of day, and detaining by him the herald which came to him, to beg the bodies of the dead, sent him back at night again, and gave leave to come and bury the bodies the next day.

But himself having sent away the herald, presently marched away with all his army, and by long stages came to Gamarga in Media, far off from Eumenes; which Country, being of Pithons government, was wonderfull plentifull of all provisions, and able to maintain great armies, [Ibid.] And so Eumenes having beaten Antigonus in the Country of Paraetecene, sent him away to take up his winter quarters in Media, [Emil. Prob. in Eumene.] in a place there called Gadamalis, al. Gadarlis, as Diodorus, or Gadamarlis, as Polyaenus nameth it.

Eumenes, hearing by his scouts that Antigonus was gone, would not follow after him, both because his army was not in case, and also for that he had a great desire to enterre his dead, in the most solemn wise, that possibly he could. Among whom there was one Ceteus, which commanded those who came to him out of India, at whose burial there grew a great contention, between his two wives, there present, which of them should have the prerogative and honour, to be burnt alive with him; the younger of the two having gotten the preeminence of the other, who was great with child, went into the fire, and left the other to live, whether she would or no; but she also, for very grief thereof, pined away and died, as Diodorus more at large declareth.

Eumenes, having finishished these obsequies, removed from thence into Gabiene, which was distant from where Antigonus lay with his army, if one would go thorough the Countries which were inhabited, 25 dayes; but if thorough the desert, then but nine dayes journey: so far did they winter each from other, and gave their armies leave to breath, and to recover their spirits again, against the next spring. [Id.]

In this mean while, Cassander the son of Antipater, desirous to make himself absolute King of Macedon, made away with Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, and married Thessalonice, the daughter of Philip, (not of Aridaeus, as Justin mistaketh it) and Alexanders own sister: and that done, sent Alexander the son of Alexander the Great, being a very child, with Roxane his mother, to be kept in the Castle at Amphipolis, [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 116. Justin lib. 14. in fi.]

When Eumenes his souldiers had taken a little breath, they grew heady and insolent withal, and in spight of their Commanders, camped where they listed all the country of Gabiene over, so that some of their tents were no lesse than a thousand furlongs off from their head-quarter, [Plutarch] for they chose their quarters, not according to any discipline

cipline or order of war; but to satisfie the luxurious appetite of their own humours, [Emil. Prob.]

Antigonus, being advertised hereof, & finding himself too weak for the enemy, whiles he was in any good array, resolved to set upon them, in this disorder as they were: and therefore casting it abroad, that he would march with his army out of Media into Armenia, upon the sudden, & in the depth of winter, τῆς ὥρας οὔσης περὶ χειμερινὰς τροπὰς, saith Diodorus, (i. e.) about the season of the Winter Tropic: leaving the ordinary way, marched thorough the Desert, making fires in the day time, and putting them out at night, least that any perhaps seeing them a far off, might discover his approach to the enemy. But when they had spent five dayes in this tedious journey, the souldiers for very cold fell to making of fires by night as well as by day: which some of the dwellers in the Desert espied, and presently getting upon Dromedaries which commonly run 1500 furlongs in a day; gave notice thereof to Eumenes and Pencestes, [Diodor. Plut. and Emil. Prob.]

b. Pencestes stood like a stock at the hearing of this news, and seeing the rest no lesse amazed thereat than himself, began to think of running away; but then came Eumenes, and dispersed this cloud, bidding them not fear, and assuring them, that he would take order, that the enemy should not come into those parts, these three dayes, no nor four: or as Emilius hath it, not in five; wherefore he sent messengers about into all parts, to require them to repaire to their head-quarter: and then he went about himself with certain nimble officers, and caused fires every where upon the hill Countries to be made, so as Antigonus might see, and take notice of them: and all within the compasse of some 70 furlongs, that from thence Antigonus a far off might gather, that all his army was there come together. Antigonus esping those fires, began presently to imagine that he was betrayed, and his counsels discovered by some of his own people, and that Eumenes was coming to fall upon him with his whole army: and fearing to hazard his tired army, against Eumenes his fresh and lusty souldiers, turned a side out of the plain, into a more winding way, and there stayed one whole day, to rest his men, and to refresh his beasts, that all might be in the better case to fight, if need should be, [Idem. and Polyanus, stratag. lib. 4.]

Mean while Eumenes his army, for the most part, was come to their Rendezvous: and his souldiers seeing his surpassing dexterity and wisdom in ordering things, desired him to order all matters himself: whereupon Antigenes himself, who had ever hitherto stood firm unto him, and Theudamus, the two Commanders of the silver Targateers, moved with envy, practised with other Captains of the army to kill him; which when Eudamus, who commanded the Regiment of the Elephants, and one Phædimus, (being two of those, who had lent him monies, and were in fear of losing it, if he miscarried) understood, they forthwith disclosed the practice to Eumenes: and he, saying, that he had to do with a company of bruit beasts; went presently and made his will, and then burnt his Cabinet of papers, least after his death, they should tell tales, and prove dangerous to those that had written them, [Plutarch.]

And now the day came, that should try the matter between Antigonus and Eumenes, which Diodorus at large describeth. Antigonus had with him 22 thousand Foot, and 9 thousand Horse, with 65 Elephants. Eumenes his army consisted of 36. thousand, and 700 Foot, and 6 thousand and 50 Horse, and 114 Elephant. The field where they fought was very spacious, sandy, and waste; whereupon such a dust presently arose, upon the first stirring of the Horse, that if a man were never so little off, he could not possibly discerne what was done: which Antigonus observing, sent forthwith away some Median Horse, and certain Tarentines out of Italy, to set upon the baggage of the enemy, which were left, about five furlongs off, from the place, where the fight was. And Pencestes the Governour of Persia, being frighted by Antigonus, got out of the dust with his horse, and drew with him some 1500 more. But the silver Targateers which were on Eumenes his side, making a strong impression upon Antigonus his main battle, slew upward of 5 thousand of them upon the place, and routed all the rest, not losing so much as one man of their company. And so Eumenes had the better of the day, having not lost in all that battle above 300 of his men, [Diodor. Plut. Polyan. stratag. lib. 4.]

When the Macedons, after the fight was done, saw their carriages all taken, and their wives and children, and whatever else was dear unto them, taken prisoners, and carried away by the enemy, great sorrow and lamentation there was among them the Camp all over: whose dolorous complaints Eumenes seeking to pacifie and asswage, put them in mind that they had slain 5 thousand of the enemies, and if they would but bear up a while, they should force them to sue for peace, and then all would be well again. That the losse they so much lamented, was but onely some 2 thousand women, and a few children and servants, which they might better regain by pursuing the victory, then by letting it go now they had it in their hands. But the Macedons plainly told told him, that they would neither flee now they had lost their wives and children, nor bear armes against them, and withal fell a railing at him. Then Teutamus, of his own head, sent a messenger to Antigonus to desire him to send back their goods again which he had taken; and so the bargain was driven between them, that giving up Eumenes into his hands, they should receive every man his own again: And so the Macedons, and ten thousand Persians which came with Pencestes, and the other Governours of places, and souldiers for the most part, left Eumenes, and went to Antigonus in his Camp, [Idem. with Justin lib. 14. cap. cap. 3.]

The silver Targateers therefore, before they went, broke in upon Eumenes, and wrested his sword out of his hand, and bound his hands behind him with a garter, and upon the fourth day after the fight, delivered him bound to Nicanor, who was sent by Antigonus to receive him; Eumenes desired nothing of Nicanor, but that he would lead him through the midst of the Macedons, and give him leave to speak his last unto them: which done, he went before his keepers into Antigonus his Camp, then followed the army which had betrayed their own Commander, and who were now themselves no better than so many captive slaves; and went in triumph of themselves, into their Conquerors Camp; and to make it a compleat triumph of themselves, the Elephants also, and the auxiliaries out of India, brought up the rere. But Antigonus, for very shame and reverence of the old familiarity and friendship that had been between them two, would not suffer him to be brought unto his sight, but assigned him certain souldiers to keep him, [Plutarch in Eumene : Justin , lib. 14. cap. 4.]

Among those that were wounded, was brought also Hieronimus of Cardia, the Historiographer, who having been ever in great esteeme with Eumenes during his life, found after his death, great favour also at Antigonus his hand, [Diodor. lib. 19. year 1. Olymp. 116.] This Hieronimus wrate a book, τῶν διαδόχων: as Diodorus, [lib. 18. p. 62.] and Josephus, [lib. 1. cont. Apionem , pag. 1050.] terme it, or ἐπιγόνων (as Dionysius Halicarnassæus in the proem of Roman Antiquities calls it) both importing as much, as Of the Successors of Alexander the Great, with the general History of his own time.

Antigonus, having now gotten both Eumenes and all his army into his hands, laid first hold of Antigenes, the Commander of the silver Targateers, and putting him alive into a coffin, there burnt him to ashes: and then put Eudamus, who brought Eumenes his Elephants out of India, and Celbanus, and some others whom he alwayes had found his opposites, to death, [Diodor.]

When Onomarchus the Captain of the watch asked Antigonus, how he would have Eumenes to be kept? his answer was, as you would keep (said he) a raging Lyon, or an unruly Elephant: yet afterward, relenting a little toward him, he commanded his heavy chains to be taken off from him, and a boy of his own to be suffered to attend him, and to help to anoint him, and gave leave to his friends, that would, to visit him, and to supply him with necessaries. And now, although his own son Demetrius, and Nearchus the Cretian, were desirous, and laboured to save his life, yet almost all the rest that were about him, pressed him by all means to rid him out of the way: yet for all this, Antigonus took seven dayes time to think upon it; and then, fearing least his Army might happen to grow into a mutiny about it, he gave order that no man should be suffered to come at him, and command his daily diet to be withdrawn from him: for he said, that sure his hand should never be upon him, who had formerly been his friend; and when he had neither eaten nor drank in 8 dayes space, and the camp was suddenly to remove, one was sent in to him, unknown to Antigonus, and cut his throat. Antigonus, in respect to his former familiarity with him, commanded his corps to be delivered to his nearest friends, to be buried as they thought fit: and they buried it in an honourable, but a military way, all the army following the bier, and burnt it, and gathered his bones into a silver Urne, and took care to convey them to his wife and children in Cappadocia, [Diodorus, year 1. Olymp. 116. Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Antigonus, returning into Media with his whole army, spent the rest of the winter in a towne not far from Ecbatane, and distributed his army here and there over all that Province, and especially in the country of Rages, so called from רעש because there had been above 2 thousand cities and townes destroyed by earth-quakes in those parts, as Strabo saies [lib. 11. pag. 514.] out of Possidonius; where, when he discovered that Pitho, the Governor of Media, sought to oblige many of the souldiers by large gifts, and larger promises, to his own devotion, and to perswade them to a revolt from him, he dissembled the matter very handsomely, and gave it out, that he purposed to make Pitho Governor of the upper Provinces, and to leave a sufficient army with him, to maintain them: He wrate also his letters to Pitho, and therein earnestly entreated him to come away in all haste unto him, to the end (said he) that having consulted together gether upon some necessary matters, he might forthwith march away into the lesse Asia. Whereby, and by other letters sent him from friends, as he took them to be, Pitho, who was then in the furthest parts of all Media, in his winter quarters, being gouzeled, came to Antigonus, who, so soon as he had him, called him before a Council of war; and they quickly found him guilty, and chopt off his head, [Diodorus; ut supra.]

Antigonus, gathering all his army together, committed the Government of Media to Orontobazes, a Median born, but General of his army he made Hippostratus, who had 3500 forraign Foot souldiers under him. Himself taking with him the body of his army went to Ecbatane, where taking into his hands five thousand talents of massie silver, he marched into Persia, and it cost him 20 dayes journey before he arrived at Persepolis, the Capital City thereof, [Ib.]

While Antigonus was upon his way thither-ward, the friends of Pithon, and such as were his consorts in the plot which he was about, the chief whereof were Meleager, and Menoetas, with other well willers both of him and Eumenes, but were scattered abroad in to corners, met together, to the number of 800 Horse, and fell first upon the lands and possessions of such of the Medes, as refused to joyn with them in this combination, and then set upon Herostrotus, and Orontobazus his Camp by night, and missed very narrowly of the prise they came for: but being over-laid with the multitude of their men, and having onely enticed some of the Medes to run the same course with them, were fain to retire; yet some of the nimblest of them, (and they were all horse-men) made many incursions upon the Country people, and raised many hububs among them; but were at last enclosed in a place compassed about with Rocks, like a pinfold, and were there partly slain, partly taken. But Meleager and Cranes, and the better sort of them, that would not yield, died like men, with their swords in their hands, [Ib.]

So soon a Antigonus came into Persia, the people there did him all kingly reverence and honour, as to the man that was now, without controversie, sole Lord of all Asia; there, calling a Council of his Nobles together; he propounded to them the matter of the government of the severall provinces to be considered of: in which consultation, they left Carmania to Tlepolemus, Bactria to Stasanor, and Parapamisus to Oxyartes the father of Roxane, because they could not well be taken from them, to hold as they did before. Into Aria was sent Euitus, and he coming shortly after to die, Euagoras was put in his room, a man of wonderfull valour, and grave wisdom withall, [Ibid.]

Antigonus sent for Sibyrtius, a well willer of his, out of Arachosia, and confirmed him in his government of that province, and gave him a whole thousand of the most turbulent and seditious silver Targateers, which had betrayed Eumnes; these he appointed to him, under a colour of serving him in the war, but indeed of purpose to destroy them; for he gave Sibyrtius instructions withall to employ them in all break-neck services, till he had consumed them, that there might not a man of them ever return into Macedon, or see the Greek coast again, [Diodor. Ibid. with Plut. in Eumene and Polyenus, Stratag, Lib. 4.]

Antigonus, finding that Pencestes was very much beloved in Persia, made it one of his first works to strip him of that government. And when all the natives there, repined at it, a certain chief man among them, called Thespias, spake openly against it; and said, That the Persians would be governed by no other man but Pencestes: whereupon he slew Thespias, and made Asclepiodorus Governour of Persia, and held on Pencestes with vain hopes, of preferring him to higher preferments elsewhere, until he had drawn him quite out of the Country, [Diodor. Ibid.]

Whiles Antigonus was upon his way to Susa, Xenophilus, who had the keeping of the Kings treasure there, being sent by Seleucus, went and met him at Pasitigris, and offered him his service, in whatsoever he should be pleased to command him. Antigonus received him very graciously, and made as if he honoured him above all the friends he had; fearing least he might happily alter his mind, and keep him out when he came thither. But when he came into the Castle of Susa, he possessed himself of it, and there got the golden vine, and store of other suchlike rarities, to the value of 15 thousand talents, all which he turned into ready coin, besides Crowns of gold, and other presents, and spoiles taken from the enemy, which amounted to five thousand talents more, besides a like quantity which he collected out of Media, so that in all he made 25 thousand talents, [Id. Ibid.]

Antigonus left for Governour of the province of Susa, one Aspisus, a native of the Country: but purposing to carry away all this mony to the sea side in Asia, he caused carriage to be provided for that purpose, and so taking all along with him, he took his journey toward Babylon, [Diod. Olymp. 116. year 2.]

When at 22 dayes end he arrived at Babylon, there Seleucus, the governour of that Province, recieved him with all royal presents, and feasted his whole army; but when he struck one of the Captains without acquainting Antigonus therewith. Antigonus willed him to give an account of all the monies of the publique stock, which he had there received since his coming to the place: But Seleucus answered him that he was not bound to make an account for that which was given him by the Macedons, for the service which he had done to Alexander in his life time: and when grutches grew daily between them, Seleucus, finding himself too weak for Antigonus, and fearing least he might happily be sent packing out of the World, as Pitho, the Governor of Media, was, he fairely stole away with 50 horse only in his company, and betook himself to Ptolomei in Egypt; for now all the world talked of his debonanairity, and how propitious he was to all, who in their necessities fled unto him, [*Id. Ibid. and Appia. in his Syriaca, p.*121.]

When Antigonus grew now very jolly, for that without being forced to draw blood of his old friend, and without stroke striken, he had quietly gotten into the possession of Babylon, the Chaldeans told him, that if he let Selucus go, all Asia would be his; and himself should one day lose his life in a battle against him, he repented him that he had let him go, and sent men after him, to take and bring him back again; but they, having pursued him awhile, gave him off, and returned without him to Antigonus, [Diodorus, ibid.] And he thereupon, turned Blirores the Governor of Mesopotamia out of his place, for suffering Seleucus to passe that way, [Appia. ib.]

Seleucus, having got safe into Egypt, was entertained by Ptolomei, with all expressions of love that might be: and having laid open the proceedings of Antigonus against himself, stirred up Ptolomei to engage in a war against him, [*Diod. ib. with Pausanias in his Attica, p.*5.]

3690. Seleucus, from thence sent some of his trustie friends into Europe, to perswade Cassander, who then commanded all in Macedonia, and Lysimachus, who did the like in 4400 314
Thracia, to make war upon Antigonus: and Antigonus, guessing what his intentions were, sent his Agents to Ptolomei, and Cassander and Lysimachus, to entreat them all three, to continue their love and friendship to him, as in former times, [Diod. ut su.] but Seleucus had so wrought with them, that they all joyned together with him in a firme league, against him, [Appia. ut sup.]

Antigonus, having made Pitho, who came out of India, Governor of Babylon, marched forward toward Cilicia; and coming to Mallos, which is a city in Cilicia; there he distributed his army into their winter quarters, it being then the time when Orion sets, (i.e.) in our month of November: and he received in the city of Quindi of the same Province, 10000 talents: and 11000 talents more out of the yearly revenue there [Diodor. ibid.]

And now Antigonus, was removed into the uper Syria, when Embassadors came to him from Ptolomei, Cassander and Lysimachus, who being brought into him as he sate in Council, made their demands according to their instructions, which were, that he would deliver up all Cappadocia and Lycia to Cassander, Phrygia bordering upon Hellespont to Lysimachus, all Syria to Ptolomei, and the Province of Babylon to Seleucus; and all the common stock of moneys which he had encroached upon since the death of Eumenes, to be shared equally among them: whereunto he answered roughly, that he was now upon making a war against Ptolomei; and that his purpose was not to have any sharers therein with himself, either of peril or profit, [Diod. and Appia. ut sup. Justin, l. 15. c. 1.]

The Embassadors returning with this answer, Ptolomei, Cassander, and Lysimachus, buckled themselves instantly to a war against him, by sea and land, [Id.] And Antigonus, perceiving what a storm was ready to fall upon him, sought the alliance and confederacie of other Cities and Nations, and Princes, for his assistance in this war: and to this purpose, he dispatcht away Agesilaus to the King of Cyprus, Idomeneus and Moschion to Rhodes, and one Ptolomei, his own brothers son, into Cappadocia, with an army, Aristodemus into Laconia, with a thousand talents, to hire souldiers from thence, and disposed Becons and Curriers throughout all Asia, which was wholy at his command, thereby to give and get knowledge of all things that passed, in a moment.

Having taken this order, and being upon his march into Phenicia, there to provide him of a fleet, and encamping near to Tyrus, in Phænicia, he sent for the petty Kings and Governors of those parts, to come unto him; and when they came, dealt with them to joyne with him, in furnishing out a fleet, and in building of more ships, because all the ships that belonged to Phænicia, were at that time with Ptolomei in Egypt. He gave them order likewise, to bring him in, 4500000 bushels of wheat (for to so much, came the yearly expence of his army) and then set men on work, to fell timber, and to build ships, and to draw the materials for them, from mount Lebanon to the sea side, imploying therein 8000 men to work, and 1000 beasts for carriage, [Id.]

Whiles

Whiles Antigonus was thus imployed, and had his Camp by the sea side, came Seleucus with an hundred ships royally furnished, and in a scornful manner, skirred along under the noses of them; which when it seemed not a little to trouble the minds of his new associates, Antigonus bad them be of good cheer, saying, that ere the end of that Summer, they should see him put to sea with a fleet of 500 saile, as good as those. Mean while returned Agesilaus with his Embassie out of Cyprus, and brought word that Nicocreon, and the most potent Kings of that Island had allready confederated with Ptolomei, neverthelesse, that Citticus and Lapithus, and Marrius and Cirenytes, would joyn with him: whereupon he left three thousand men under the command of Andronicus, to maintain the siege against Tyrus, and with the rest of the army marched against Gaza and Joppe, which stood out against him, and took them by force, and such of Ptolomeis men as he found there, he took and distributed them among his own companies, to serve him in his wars, and placed Garrisons in both places to keep them in obedience: which done, he returned to his standing Camp before Tyre, and prepared all necessaries for a siege against it. [Id.]

At the same time Aristo, who was entrusted to carry Craterus his bones, delivered them to Phila, the daughter of Antipater, who was married first to Craterus, and afterward to Demetrius; whose father Antigonus had perswaded him to marry her, and when he shewed himself averse from the match, by reason of the inequality of years between them, she being by so much the elder of the two, he would alwayes round him in the ear with that saying out of Eurypedes,

Ὅπου τὸ κέρδος παρὰ φύσιν γαμητέον, (i. e.)
In marriage look unto thy gain,
Though nature sometimes doth restrain.

Where he prettily put in γαμητέον, (i.) to marry, instead of δουλευτέον, (i.) to serve, meaning that a man must do any thing to serve his own turn: but this Phila was a woman which was reputed to excell both in wit and wisdom, whereby she often repressed the tumultuous spirits of the most turbulent souldiers in the army, and preferred in marriage at her own cost, the sisters and daughters of the poorer sort among them, [Id. with Plut. in the Life of Demetrius.]

Aristodemus, being sent with other Captains into Laconia, and having there gotten leave of the Spartanes, to raise souldiers there, got together eight thousand men out of Peloponesus, and upon conference with Polysperchon, and his son Alexander, joyned them both in a firm league of amity with Antigonus, and made Polyspercon their General, and Polyspercon he there presently made Commander over the forces which he had raised in Peloponesus, but prevailed with Alexander to passe over into Asia, to Antigonus, [Diod.]

Ptolomei, another of his Captains, going with an army into Cappadocia, and there finding the City Amisus besieged by Asclepiodotus, a Captain of Cassanders, raised the siege, and secured the place: and so having sent Asclepiodorus packing, upon certain conditions, recovered that whole province to Antigonas, and marching from thence thorough Bithynia, came upon the back of Zibytes, King of Bithynia, whiles he was busie in the siege of two cities at once, that of the Assacenians, and the other of the Chalcedonians, and forced him to raise his siege from both, and then falling to capitulations both with him and with the cities that were besieged, and having received hostages of them, removed thence toward Ionia and Lydia, for that Antigonus had written to him, to secure that coast, with all possible speed, having intelligence that Seleucus was going into those parts with his fleet, and thither indeed Seleucus was come, and besieged the City Erythræ: but hearing of the approach of Ptolomei, the nephew of Antigonus, left it, and went his way as he came, [Id.]

Mean while Alexander the son of Polyspercon came unto Antigonus; where, calling together the whole army, with the strangers that were in it, he opened to them what Cassander had done, protesting before them, that he would revenge the murder by him committed upon Olympias, and deliver Alexander his Kings son, with his mother Roxane, out of prison, in Amphipolis, and break off that yoke, which Cassander had laid upon all the Cities of Greece, by his putting his garrisons into them, and then sent back Alexander, Polyspercons son, with five hundred talents more, into Peloponesius, [Id. with Justin lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Then, having gotten a fleet from Rhodes, with other new built ships of his own, he set saile for Tyre; and having all the sea at his command, kept it so, as no supply of victual, or other necessaries, could come thither, whereby that city fell presently into great distresse, [Diod.]

Ptolomei of Egypt, hearing what a declaration Antigonus with the Macedons had made concerning the deliverie of all Greeks from the thraldom of Cassander, made the like declaration for himself, as desirous that all the world should take notice, that he was no lesse zealous for the liberty of all Grecians, than Antigonus was, and then joyned to his party, Cassander the Governour of Caria, who was a man of a great power, and had many great Cities under his command. And although he had formerly sent three thousand souldiers to the Kings of Cyprus, yet he now sent them 10 thousand more under the command of Myrmidon an Athenian born, and an hundred saile of ships, commanded by Polyclitus: but Generall over all, he made his brother Menelaus, [Id.]

These coming into Cyprus, joyned there with Seleucus and his Fleet, and in a Council of War, advised together what course was fit to take. The result of all which deliberation was, That Polyclitus with fifty sail should passe into Peloponesus, and there make war upon Aristodemus, and Polyspercon, and Alexander his son: That Myrmidon with an army of forreign nations, should go into Caria, there to help Cassander the Governour of that Province, against Ptolemei, a Captain of Antigonus, which lay heavy upon Cassander; and that Seleucus, and Menelaus, staying in Cyprus, should bear up Nicocreon the King, and the rest of their confederates against their enemies, which warred upon them. Having therefore thus divided their forces, Seleucus went and took Cerynia and Lapithus; and having drawn over Stasiæcus King of the Malenses to his party, he forced the Prince of the Amathusians to give him hostages for his fealty in time to come: as for the City Citium, seeing it would come to no agreement with him, he fell to besiege it with his whole army, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time, came 40 sail of ships, out of Hellespont and Rhodes, under the command of one Themison their Ammiral, to Antigonus: and after them, came Dioscorides, with 80 sail more; though Antigonus had already a Navy of his own, new built in Phœnicia, to the number of 120 ships, reckoning in those which he left at Tyre: so that he had in the whole, 240 ships of war, of which there were 90 of four tire of oares: 10 of five, 3 of nine, 10 of ten, and 130 open gallies. Then dividing this Navy, into parts, he sent 50 of them into Peloponesus, and the rest he committed to Dioscorides, his own brothers son; with this charge, that he should keep the Seas, and help his friends as their occasions required; and that he should gain unto his party such of the Islands, as hitherto stood out against him, [Ibid.]

Polyclitus, Seleucus his Lieutenant, sailing from Cyprus, came to Cenchrea, which was a Port of Corinth; where when he found that Alexander, Polyspercons son, had fallen off from Antigonus, to Cassander, so that he now found no enemy there to encounter, as he expected, he changed his course, and set sail for Pamphylia; and from thence, sailed to Aphrodisiades in Cilicia, and there understood, that Theodotus, a Captain of Antigonus his Navy, passed by from Patara, a Port of Lycia, with the Rhodian Fleet, furnished with Mariners out of Caria, and that Perilaus with a land army, coasted along by the shoar, for the defence of the Fleet, if need should be. In this case he used his wits, to save himself out of this brake; for he landed his men, and laid them close in a fitting place where the land army must needs passe: and himself with the Fleet went and lay behind a Foreland, near to the place, waiting for the coming of the enemy: and so it fell out, that Perilaus coming along, fell into the ambushment that was laid for him: where himself was taken prisoner, and of his men, some were slain, and the rest fell alive into their enemies hands. The Fleet at sea, seeing the land army engaged, hasted to their relief: but then Polyclitus, coming upon them in this confusion, with his Ships in good array, put them easily to flight: so it came to passe that Polyclitus took all their ships, and the most part of the men in them: and among the rest, Theodotus himself their Ammiral, sorely martyred with wounds, of which he shortly after died, [Ibid.]

Polyclitus, having sped so well on all hands, sailed back first to Cyprus, and after that to Pelusium in Egypt: where Ptolemei richly rewarded him for so great a service: and withal, promoted him to a far higher dignity and place of honour than he was in before; as the author of so great a victory: but released Perilaus, and some other of the prisoners, which Antigonus desired by a messenger sent to him for that purpose. And then himself going to a place called Ecregma, came to a parlie with Antigonus; but Antigonus refusing to grant him what he demmanded, he left him, and returned, [Ibid.]

3691. Cassander put over an army out of Macedonia into Caria, both to help the Cities there which had confederated with Ptolemei, and Seleucus, and also to find Antigonus work there, that he might have no leisure to come into Europe: and the Commanders of this army, Cassander the Governour of Caria, and Prepelaus, hearing that Ptolemei, Antigonus his General in those parts, had laid up his army in their winter quarters, and that himself was now busie in the burying of his father, lately deceased, sent away Eupolemus, with 8000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, to a place called Caprima in Caria, to lie in ambushment for him there: but Ptolemei, getting notice thereof by some that fled over to him, got together out of the next quarters 8300 Foot, and some 4401 313

600 Horse, and with them falling unlookt for into the enemies trenches, and finding them there all fast asleep, took Eupolemus prisoner, and forced all the rest to submit to his discretion, [Diodor. year 3 Olymp. 116.]

Antigonus, seeing that Cassander put in for the Sovereignity of Asia; left his son Demetrius in Syria, with instructions, to intercept Ptolemeis men, which he suspected were then coming with an army further up into Syria; and to that purpose, left with him 10 thousand Foot of other nations, and two thousand Macedons, 500 out of Lycia and Pamphylia; Persian archers and slingers 400, and moreover five thousand Horse, and upward of 40 Elephants, and four men for his counsellors, Nearchon, Pitho, who came lately from Babylon, Andromicus, and Philippus; all men of mature age, and judgement, and such as had attended upon Alexander in all his wars : for Demetrius himself was but a young man, not passing the age of 22 years, [Id. ibid.]

Upon Antigonus himself, whiles with the rest of the army, he went to passe the Taurus, there fell a mighty snow, wherein he lost a multitude of his men : whereupon he returned back into Cilicia, where he advised himself of a better way to passe that mountain, and with lesse damage to his army; and so coming to Celænæ in Phrygia, he there bestowed his army into their winter quarters, [Id. ibid.]

Tyre, when it had stood out the siege one whole year and three moneths, at last surrendred to Antigonus upon articles, by which Ptolomei the King of Egypts men, went away with their bag and baggage : and Andronicus was left to hold the place with a Garrison, [Id. year 2. Olymp. 116. and Olymp. 117. year 1.]

Medius, being sent for by Antigonus to come to him with his fleet, which he had in Phænicia, upon his way met with the fleet of the City Pydna; and brought both it, and all the men in it, under his subjection, [Id. year. 3. Olympiade. 116.]

Cassander, the Governour of Caria, being over-laid by the enemy, came to this agreement with Antigonus, that he should give up all his army to Antigonus, and suffer all the Greek Cities there, to live after their own laws, and should hold the government which he there had, as by grant from Antigonus, and should carry himself as a firm friend to Antigonus in time to come, and for performance hereof, gave his own brother Agathon in pledge; yet shortly after, repenting him of his bargain, got his brother again out of their clutches, that had him in keeping, and sent his agents to Ptolomei and Seleucus, to come speedily and help him; which Antigonus took in such ill part, that he forthwith sent both by sea and land his forces, to set the Greek Cities at liberty; and to that purpose made Medius his General by land, and Docimus his high Ammiral by sea. These coming to Miletum, dealt with the inhabitants to stand for their liberty, set upon the Castle and took it, with the Garrison that was therein, and restored the City to her pristin liberty, [Id. year 4. Olympiade 116.]

Mean while Antigonus took Tralles, and going before the walls of the City Caunus, and sending for his fleet, took that likewise, all save the Castle: and having cast a trench round about that also, he made continual assaults upon it, where there was any hope of entry. He had sent Ptolomei to the City Iassus, but he was fain to come back and joyn again with Antigonus, and so all these Cites came at that time into his subjection. [Id. Ibid.]

3692. The Cyrenians, falling off from Ptolomei, besieged the Castle there, so fiercely, as if they would presently have taken it: and when messengers came from Alexandria, perswading them to desist, they struck of their heads, and fell to work against the Castle harder than ever. Ptolomei, exceedingly moved herewith; sent thither one Agis, a Captain of his, with an army; and withall, a navie to assist him by sea, under the command of Epænetus. Agis pursuing the war against these rebels vigorously, took the City of Cyrene by strong hand, and committed the authours of this sedition to prison, and then sent them bound to Alexandria, and disarmed the rest: and so having set things in order there, as he saw cause, returned into Egypt, [Id. year. 1. Olympiade 117.] 4402, 312.

Ptolomei, having had this good successe at Cyrene, took shipping, and with his fleet passed over into the Isle of Cyprus, against those who rebelled there against their King; and having gotten Pygmalion, who traded with Antigonus, into his hands, put him to death : then took he Praxippus King of the Lapithi, and Prince of Cerynnia, who was suspected of a revolt, and laid them fast: he took likewise Stasiæcus, a petty King of the Malians, and destroying their City, removed the inhabitants from thence to Paphos: which done, he made Nicocreon Commander over all Cyprus; and gave him the Cities, together with the revenues of all the Kings which he had cast out of their dominions, and then went with his army into the upper Syria, and sackt the Cities of Possideum and Potamos in Caria; and that done, he went with a flying army, and took Mallus in Cilicia, and sould away all the inhabitants thereof for slaves, and wasted all the region thereabouts : and having stored all his army with wealth, sailed back again to Cyprus, [Id. Ib.]

Mean while, Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, kept in Coelosyria, expecting the coming of the Egyptians: but hearing what work Ptolomei had made of so many Cities in Syria, he left Pithon to command in those parts; leaving his Corseleteers and Elephants with him, and he with his Horse, and companies of light armed souldiers, highed him away in all speed toward Cilicia, to aide them which for want of help were distressed there: but coming too late, and finding the enemies all gone, he returned speedily to his Camp again, spoiling many of his Horse by the way; for in six dayes space, he marched from Mallus, 24 dayes journies by their ordinary stages, so that thorough immoderate travel, none of the servants or Horse-boyes were able to keep them company, [Id. Ib.]

Ptolomeus, seeing all go every where as he would have it, for that present, returned into Egypt; but not long after, being put on by Seleucus, for the hatred he bare to Antigonus, he resolved to march into Coelosyria, and there to try it out with Demetrius; wherefore gathering all his army together, he marched from Alexandria to Pelusium, having with him 18000 foot, and 4000 horse, whereof some were Macedons, and some hired souldiers: the Egyptians, some served to carry their darts and weapons, and other luggage of the army, and some for souldiers, and having passed the desert from Pelusium, he encamped near the old city of Gaza in Syria, not farr off from the enemy. And Demetrius on the other side, called all his army out of their winter quarters and appointed them their rendevouz at Gaza; there to attend the coming of the enemy, [Ibid.]

In the 117 Olympiade, Ptolomei overthrew in a main battle near Gaza, Demetrius the son of Antigonus, surnamed afterward, Poliorcetes, (i. e.) the City-taker; as Castor, the Historiographer reporteth, cited by Josephus, [lib. 1. cont. Apion. p. 1048.] the particulars of which fight are related by Diodorus Siculus, in his history of that Olympiade, where he saith that there were taken prisoners of Demetrius his men, to the number of 8000 and upward of 500 slain; but that is to be amended, and made 5000 out of Plutarch. But among the Nobles that were there slain, one was Pithon, who was at that time joyned in commission with Demetrius, and Boeotus, a man who had long lived with Antigonus the father, and was ever privie to all his designes, and partaker of all his counsels.

Ptolomei and Seleucus took Gaza, but Demetrius, by the help of a good pair of spurs came to Azotus: about midnight following, having road 270 furlongs, and from thence sent to beg the bodies of his dead for burial: which Ptolomei and Seleucus not onely at first word granted, but also sent him back his own pavillion, with all the furniture thereunto belonging, free, and without ransom, adding thereunto a generous message, that they fought not for proy, but for honour, and to see who should wear the Garland, [Diodorus, Ut. Sup. Plutarch. in Demetrio, and Justin. lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Demetrius, being no longer able to hold out, in the case he was in, dispacht away a messenger with his letters to his father, who lay then in Phrygia, to pray in aide of him, and to come away speedily to his help; and he himself coming to Tripoli in Phoenicia, sent for the souldiers that were in Cilicia, and elsewhere in Garrisons remote, and far distant from the enemies quarters, to come unto him, [Diodorus.]

But Antigonus, when he heard the news, said that Ptolomei had now gotten the victory, of a company of beardlesse boyes; but that he should fight next time with men: yet that he might not quell the courage of his son, and because he so desired, he gave him leave to fight again with him himself, if he saw cause, [Plutarch. in Demetrio.]

Ptolomei sent the prisoners which he had taken into Egypt, there to be distributed, among the several regiments of his fleet: and when he had honourably enterred his own that were slain, he went forward, and set upon the Cities and strong places of Phaenicia, besieging some, and perswading others of them to yield unto him, and having taken Sidon, he went and encamped before Tyre, and sent to Andronicus, Captain of the Garrison, there to render up the City to him, tendring him large promises both of wealth and honour: but he not onely answered, that he would never betray the trust which Antigonus and his son Demetrius had put him in, but also used many reviling speeches against Ptolomei, but yet a little after, when surprised by a mutiny of his own souldiers, he fell into his hands, Ptolomei forgetting that by-past railing of his, highly rewarded him, and took him into the number of his friends, and honourably prefered him, [Diod.]

Seleucus, taking with him 1000 Foot of Ptolomeis men, (as Appianus hath it: for Diodorus sayes but 800.) and 200 Horse, went with so small a train to recover his Government of the Province of Babylon; and coming with them into Mesopotamia, he there dealt with such Macedons as he found dwelling in Carran, and some of them by perswasions, some by plain force, he drew to go along with in this journy of his. Now no sooner had he set foot within the territory of Babylon, but the inhabitants came flocking to him, and offered him their service in the recovering of his right. Polyarchus also, who bare some kind of office among them, came unto him to receive his commands, with a full thousand of men compleatly armed. But they who stood for Antigonus, when they perceived the generall, and irresistible inclination of the multitude toward him, fled all to the Castle, which was commanded by Diphilus, and Seleucus fell presently to besiege it; and having taken it by force, he there delivered such children and friends of his, as Antigonus, when Seleucus for fear fled away into Egypt, had there committed to prison. This done, he then fell to raising of souldiers in the Country, and having bought Horses, distributed them among those who were fit to ride them. And withal, carrying himself fairly and amiable unto all sorts, made them all ready to run any hazard with him, and so in a trice recovered all his government of Babylon again, [Diod. with Appian. in his Syriaca, pag. 121.]

But then Nicanor, whom Antigonus had made Governour of the province of Media, marcht against him with 10 thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, and Seleucus made no tarrying, but went out to meet him, having with him in all little above three thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, and passing the River Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he hid his men in the fennes thereby, purposing to set upon Nicanor at unawares, and Nicanor, when he came to the bank of the Tigris, and found no enemy there; went and encamped near to a post-house of the Kings; little thinking the enemy had been so near. But the night following, when contemning his enemy, he cared not to keep a due watch, after a military manner, Seleucus fell upon him, and raised a great tumult in his army, for when the Persians put themselves forward to fight, Euager their General, with sundry others of their Commanders, happened to be slain: after which broile, the greater part of Nicanors army, what for the present danger they were in, what for the mislike they had of Antigonus his government, left him, and came to the service of Seleucus. Whereupon Nicanor, fearing lest at the next bout, his souldiers would deliver him up to Seleucus, fairly stale away with some few of his friends, and fled thorough the desert home into Media again, [Diodor.]

Selucus, having by this means gotten a potent army about him, and continued his fair carriage to all men as before, easily procured the provinces of Media and Susa, and other countries bordering thereupon, to come under his subjection, and then sent Ptolomei word, how he had sped, having now gotten a full royal power and majesty into his hand, as [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 117.] declareth. From whence it is, that from this year, 3692 Eusebius deduceth Selucus his principality or reign: and with all notes, that the Edesseni begin their Epoch, and the story of the Maccabees their account of the Grecian reign. 4402 And out of doubt from the Autumne of this very year, that is, from Septemb. or Octob. of the year 4402, according to the Julian Calendar, it is, that the composer of the second book of Maccabees reckons his Grecian years, & the Jews there, aram Contractium, (i. e.) their account of Contracts, and those of Edessa, and other Syrians, their Epoch of the Seleucian race, and the Arabians, the years of Alexander Debilkarnain, as they term them, and yet the writer of the first book of Maccabees begins his account of the Grecian year, from the spring precedent to this autumne, and Ptolomei of Alexandria, in his great Syntaxis begins his Chaldean account, from the Spring following.

3693. Ptolomei of Egypt, staying still in Coelosyria, sent one of his Nobles about him, called Cilles, a Macedon born, with a great army against Demetrius, who lay encamped 4403 in the upper Syria, willing him to fight with him, and to turn him quite out of all, that is called Syria, or to coup him up, and tread him to dirt, where he lay. Demetrius understanding by his spialls, that Cilles with his army lay at Myus carelessely, without keeping watch or ward, leaving his carriages behind him, marcht away with a company of light-footed lads, which travelled all night; and a little before day fell in upon Cilles his Camp, put all in a confusion, took it, and Cilles himself prisoner, and with him seven thousand souldiers, and a great booty besides: yet because he thought Ptolomei himself was coming after with all his army, he therefore pitcht his Camp in a place where he had a bog on the one hand, and a great Lough on the other to secure him. [Diodor. year. 1. Olymp. 117. and Plut. in Demetrio.]

Demetrius sent news of this his good successe to his father Antigonus, where he lay at Celenæ in Phrygia, solliciting him by his letters, either to send an army speedily, or to come himself in person into Syria. Antigonus, having read the letter, was wonderfull joyfull at the news, both because the victory was gotten by his sons own conduct and ordering of matters in the fight, and also for that he had shewed himself a man worthy hereafter, to wear a Crown upon his head. [Diodor.] But Demetrius, with his fathers leave, sent back Cilles and all his friends to Ptolomei again, thereby, not to lie any longer longer in his debt, and to cry quittance with him for his former kindnesse in that kind. [Plut.]

Antigonus with his army removed out of Phrygia, and having in few dayes passed the Taurus, came to his son Demetrius. And Ptolemei, by the advice of his Council, thought fit to leave Syria; but before he went, he laid waste and destroyed the principal Cities which he had there at that time in his possession; as Acon in Syrophœnicia, and Joppa, and Samaria, and Gaza of Syria: and then taking along with him out of the country, whatever he could drive or carry, loaden with wealth he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 117.]

A multitude of men there was, who seeing his good disposition, and clemency of nature, would needs along with him into Egypt; among whom there was one Ezechias Ἀρχιερεὺς: (i. e.) a high Priest (perhaps a secondary one; for the chief High Priest at that time was Onias the first) of the Jews: a man of about 66 years of age, and much respected among his people, very eloquent, and of much experience in the affairs of the world. This and much more of this Ezechias is related by Hecatæus the Historian (who conversed with him in Ptolemeis army) in a peculiar Treatise which he wrote, of the Jews: where he also maketh a large narration of another Jew, which he grew acquainted with, called Mosollamo, al. Mesollamo: as followeth.

When I went, saith he, toward the red Sea, there was one among the rest of a Troop of Horse of the Jews, which went to convoy us, called Mosollamus, a high-spirited man, and the best archer of all the company, who espied a certain wizard in the company which stood still; and desired all the company to do the like, whiles he observed a certain bird that flew, to divine thereby: and asked him the reason why he stayed: and when the wizard shewed him the bird which he had in his eye, and said withal, that if it were expedient for the company to stay there, that bird would stay where she was: but if she rose, and flew before them, then they should do well to go forward too: but if she flew back, then all the company ought also to return. Then this Mosollamus said nothing, but drew his bow, and shot, and killed the bird, and when the wizard and others there present grew angry at it, and cried shame of him for so doing: Why are you so angry, quoth he? and why do you take this unlucky bird into your hands? Could she that knew nothing of what was to betide her self, tell any thing of what would befal us in this our journey? for if she had had any knowledge of things to come, she would never have come hither, here to be shot to death by Mosollamus a Jew.

Many things besides there are, which [Josephus in his book, contra. Apion.] recites, out of the same book concerning the Jews. As namely, that at that time, there were to the number of 1500 Priests, which received tithes, and governed all things belonging to the common wealth: and Demetrius Phalareus, in his Epistle to Ptolomæus Philadelphus, (found in Aristeas his book of the 70 Interpreters, and in the same Josephus, lib. 12. Antiquit. cap. 2.) out of the same Author, yeilds the reason why no heathen Poet, or Historian, makes mention, either of those sacred books, or of those men who lived according to the rule delivered in them: to wit, for that they contain a sacred and a venerable rule, which was not to be taken into, or uttered by unhallowed mouths.

3603 Antigonus, when he had without stroke striking recovered all Syria, and Phœnicia, into his hands; took a journey into the country of the Arabians, called the Nabathæans: for, conceiving that they never much favoured his proceedings, he appointed one of his Nobles called Athenæus, with 4 thousand Foot, and 600 light-Horse, to fall in upon them, and to bring away what spoile he could get out of their Country. And now the time grew near when all bordering Nations used to come thither as to a common Mart, to sell off to them their commodities, and to buy from them the merchandise of their Country. To this Mart therefore the Nabathæans now went according as they were wont, leaving their wealth, and old men with their wives and children, upon the top of a rock; Athenæus, watching this opportunity, marched speedily to this rock, and having marched out of the Province of Edom, the length of 2200 furlongs, in three dayes and three nights space, late in the night, the Arabians knowing nothing of his coming, possessed himself of it. The souldiers which he there found, he partly put to the sword, and partly made prisoners of them, and such as were wounded, he there left behind him; and carried from thence the greatest part of their mirrh and frankincense, with 500 talents of silver, and staying there not past three hours, for fear of the countries coming in upon him, returned presently again: and now, he with his souldiers having gone 200 furlongs, could go no further for very wearinesse, and therefore rested them there, keeping neither watch nor ward; as presuming that the country people could not reach thither in two or three dayes after, [Diodorus, year 1. Olympiade 117.] 4403. 311.

The Arabians, being acertained of what had fallen out, by those which had seen the army of the enemy: left the Mart, where they were met, and returned to the rock, and being there more fully informed by the wounded persons which were left, what way they

they were gone, incontinently followed after them: and because Athenæus his men kept no watch, and after their long journey lay weary and fast asleep, some of their prisoners stole away from them: from whom when their country men, whom they met, had learnt how the enemies Camp lay, they hasted to the place, and coming upon them at three of the clock in the morning, fell into their trenches, to the number of 8 thousand of them, and cut the throats of some snorting in their cabins; others that made resistance, they slew: to make short, they utterly destroyed all their Foot, onely 50 of their Horse got away, and they wounded too, for the most part; and so the Nabathæans, having recovered their goods again, returned to the Rock: and by a letter of theirs written to Antigonus in Syriac characters, complained of Athenæus, and his wrong doing, and excused themselves; to whom Antigonus wrote back again cunningly, telling them, that Athenæus was well enough served by them: blaming him for doing what he had done, and assuring them, that he had given him no such order, [Id. ibid.]

But Antigonus, having for a time made fair weather with these poor Nabathæans, shortly after, chose out of all his army, 4 thousand Foot, light-armed, and the swiftest of foot that he could find, and to them added 4 thousand Horse, willing them to take in their knapsacks, as many dayes victuals as they could well carry, and such as needed no cooking; and assigning Demetrius, his son, to command them: he sent them away in the first of the night, with this charge, that he should by all means be revenged of them. He therefore travelled 3 dayes journey thorough the Desert, hasting to fall upon them at unawares: but their scouts perceiving the first approach of the enemy toward their borders, made fires, and by them gave notice of their coming to the Country: whereupon they presently gat them to their Rock, to the top whereof there was but one way up, and that made by hand too; and there leaving their baggage, left withal, a sufficient guard to keep it; and the rest went and drave away their cattle, some to one place, some to another in the Desert. Demetrius, when he came to the Rock, and saw all the cattle driven away, presently went to besiege the Rock; but when they that were in it manfully defended it, and by the advantage of the place, had all the day long the better of it, Demetrius at last was fain to draw off: and seeing he could do no good upon them, made a peace with them, upon hostages given him, and such gifts as were agreed upon between them, and so removing with his army 300 furlongs off, encamped near to the Lake Asphaltis, or Dead Sea, [Id. ibid.] but Plutarch sayes, that he went thence, with a huge booty, and 7 hundred Camels.

Antigonus at his return to him, having heard the relation of his voyage, blamed him for his making a peace with the Nabathæans; saying, that those barbarous people, having so escaped, would thereupon grow more insolent than before: yet commended him for discovering the Lake Asphaltis, seeing that from thence he might raise some yearly revenue to himself: and made Hieronymus Cardianus the Historian, his Treasurer for that revenue; whom [Josephus, lib. 1. cont. Apion.] noteth to have been made President of Syria by Antigonus: and very deservedly blameth him, for that in his History he maketh no mention of the Jews, considering that he lived near unto, and almost among them; this Hieronymus was commanded to build ships, and to gather together in one place all the bitumen, or liquid brimstone that could be gotten out of that Lake: But the Arabians coming together to the number of 6 thousand men, set upon them as they were in their ships gathering this brimstone, and shot them almost all to death with their arrows; whereby Antigonus lost all hope of making any standing revenue that way, [Diod.]

Antigonus, understanding by letters from Nicanor the Governour of Media, and others, how Seleucus prospered in those parts, sent his son Demetrius with 5 thousand Macedon Foot, and 10 thousand mercenaries, and 4 thousand Horse; with charge, that he should march to the very walls of Babylon; and having recovered that Province, should from thence march down to the Sea: and he, parting from Damascus in Syria, went vigorously on to fulfil his fathers commands. But Patrocles, whom Seleucus had left President of Babylon, so soon as he heard that Demetrius was falling into Mesopotamia, not daring to stay his coming, because he had but a small power about him; commanded the rest to leave the City, and that passing the Euphrates, they should flee, some into the Desert, others over the Tigris, into the Province of Susa, and to the Persian sea: and himself with a company which he had about him, trusting in the bars of the Rivers, and dikes of the Country thereabouts, instead of so many Fortresses and Bulwarkes for his defence, kept himself still within the bounds of his own government, and cast about, how to entrap his enemy; sending ever and anon tidings to Seleucus in Media how things went with him, and desiring aid to be speedily sent unto him, [Id.]

Demetrius, when he came to Babylon, and found the City it self void of inhabitants, fell presently to besiege the Forts and Castles that were therein: and having taken one of them, gave the spoile thereof to the souldier; and turning out Seleucus his men, put therein a Garrison of his own, consisting of seven thousand souldiers; but not being able to take the other, in hast, after some few dayes siege, departed, leaving Archelaus, one of his trusty friends, to maintain the siege about it, with five thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse: and himself seeing the time run out, which his father had appointed him, to finish his work in, bad his souldiers rap and rend what ever they could light on in all that province, and take it to themselves: and then took his journy back into Asia; whereby, he left Seleucus more grounded, and better setled in his government than before. For why, said men, should Demetreus wast and spoil the Country, if he took it for his own? [Id. with Plut. in Demetrio.] Whereupon the Chaldeans reckon the Epocha, or beginning of the Seleucian reign in Babylon, from this time, rather than from the former.

Demetreus returning into Asia, quickly raised the siege, which Ptolomei had laid to Halicarnassus, [Plut. in Demetrio.]

And now Cassander, Ptolomeus and Lysimachus, made peace with Antigonus, upon such articles, as follow, to wit, That Cassander should command all in Europe, untill Alexander the son of Roxane, came to age. That Lysimachus should hold Thrace; and Ptolomei Egypt, with the bordering Countries of Lybia and Arabia: And Antigonus should have the command of all Asia to himself: but this campact between them held not long, for every one took one occasion or other, to encroach upon more than his part came to, [Diod. year. 2. Olymp. 117.]

Cassander, seeing Alexander the son of Roxane to grow up, and hearing a bruit cast abroad among the Macedons, that it was high time, that the young King should now be freed from his prison, and take the rule of the kingdom into his own hands, took a fright hereat, and gave order to Glaucia the keeper, to murder Roxane, and the King her son; and burying their carcases, in some secret place, should by all means possible conceal their deaths. [Id. Ib.]

Parysades the King of Bosphorus Cimerius dying, after that he had reigned 38 years, left his kingdom to his eldest son Satyrus, which he held nine years onely, [Id. year. 3. Olymp. 117.]

3694. In Peloponesus, Ptolomei, a Captain of Antigonus, falling off from him to Cassanders 4404 310 side, sent souldiers to a most trusty friend of his, called Phœnix, and one to whom he had committed the managing of the government of Hellespont; advising him withall to man his Forts and Cities, and to stand upon his guard; and no longer to be at Antigonus his command, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 117.]

On the other side, Ptolomei of Egypt cried out upon Antigonus, for that he, contrary to agreement, had put Garrisons of his own, into sundry Cities of the Greeks in Asia side: and thereupon sent Leonides, a Captain of his own, into Cilicia Aspera, and there possessed himself of certain Cities and places belonging to Antigonus; and moreover sent his agent to some Cities appertaining to Cassander and Lysimachus, that they would follow his advise, and not suffer Antigonus, to grow too fast in power. [Id. Ibid.]

Antigonus sent his younger son Philippus, to make war upon Phœnix, and others who had revolted from him in Hellespont, but his son Demetrius, he sent into Cilicia against Ptolomei of Egypt, who going in hand with the errand he was sent in, routed the Captains of Ptolomei, that there were, and recovered the Cities which he had taken. [Ibid.]

Polyspercon in Peloponesus cryed out in like manner upon Cassander, and affecting the government of Macedon, sent for Hercules, a son of Alexander the Great, begotten upon Barsine, and now of the age of 17 years; and sent about to those, who were enemies to Cassander, to help to set this young man in his fathers kingdom, [Ib.]

Ptolemei of Egypt, having all Cyprus under his command, and finding that Nicocles the King of Paphos, negotiated under hand with Antigonus, sent two confidents of his own, Argaus and Callicrates, with instructions, to make away Nicocles; wherefore passing into Cyprus, and taking with them a certain number of souldiers from Menalaus, who commanded the army there: they beset the house of Nicocles, and then telling him, what Ptolemeis pleasure was, advised him, to dispose of himself for another world. And he at first went to clear himself of what was laid to his charge, but when he saw that no man hearkened to what he said, drew his sword and slew himself. Axiothea his wife, hearing of her husbands death, took her daughters, who were all young, and virgins, and slew them, and was earnest with the wives of Nicocles his brothers, to accompany her in her own death. Whereas yet Ptolomei had given no order concerning any of them, save onely to preserve them. The brothers also of Nicocles, shut every man his own doors upon him, and set fire thereon, and slew themselves, and so the whole race of the Kings of Phaphos, came to a tragick and lamentable end. [Diod. ib. and Polya. Stratag. lib. 8.]

Agathocles

Digitized by Google

Agathocles King of Sicilia, sailing about this time into Afric, there to make war upon the Carthaginians, there fell so great an Eclips of the Sun, that the stars appeared every where in the firmament, and the day was turned into night, [Diod. year 3. Olympiade, 117. Justin. lib. 22. cap. 6.] which dreadfull Eclips of the Sun, the Astronomicall tables shew to have fallen upon the 15 day of our August, in this year.

Epicurus, being now 32 years of age, read publickly both in Mitylene and Lampsacus five years together, [Diog. Laertius, in the Life of Epicurus.]

In Bosphorus Cimmerius, Eumelus, younger brother to Satyrus, compacting with some of the natives adjoyning, laid claim to the kingdom against his elder brother, whereof Satyrus being informed, went against him with a great army, and passing the river Thapsus, when he came near his quarters, fortified his Camp, with his Carts and Waggons, wherein he had brought an infinite quantity of provisions: and ranging afterward his army in the field. Himself, as the manner of the Scythian Kings was, led the main battle, in his Army, he had not above two thousand Greeks, al. one thousand, and as many Thracians, all the rest were Scythians, which came to assist him, to the number of 20 thousand, and no lesse than ten thousand Horse. Eumelus was borne up, by Ariopharnes King of Thracia, with 20000 Horse, and 22000 Foot, Satyrus encountred first with Ariopharnes, in a skirmish of Horse, and routed him; and then overthrew his brother Eumelus with his Foot, and forced all to retreat into the Kings palace, which was enviromed with a river, and steep rocks, and thick woods about, [Diod.]

Satyrus at first went and wasted the enemies Country, and set fire on their vilages, and drew from thence a huge spoil, and then making away thorogh their fen country, came to their wooden Castles, and took them, and crossing a river, felled a vast wood, thorough which he must needs passe, that would come to the Kings palace, in which work the whole army, spent three dayes, and so came to the walls of the Castle. There Meniscus, wo led the mercenary companies, having gotten in at a passage, though he fought very manfully, was neverthelesse, being overlaid with the multitude within, forced to retreat: and Satyrus coming to his relief, was wounded in the arme with a spear; which was so sore, that it forced him to retire to his Camp, and the next night, died thereof. And Meniscus breaking up the siege, drew off the army, to a City called Gargaza, and from thence carried the Kings body down the river, to a City called Panticapæum to his brother Prytanis: who having magnificently buried it, and laid up the reliques, in the Kings sepulchre, went presently to Gargaza, and there took into his hands the army, and the kingdom withall. [Ibid.]

Then came the Agents of Eumelus to him, to treat concerning a partage of the kingdom between them two; which he would not hearken to: wherefore leaving a strong Garrison at Gargaza, he returned to Pantacapæum, there to settle the affairs of his kingdom. But a while after, Eumelus, by the help of some Barbarians, possessed himself of Gargaza, and of sundry other Towns and Castles: and after that, overthrew Prytanis in a battle, and having shut him up in a neck of land, near the lough of Mæotis, forced him to render himself upon conditions, which were, to give up all his army, and to depart the kingdom. Neverthelesse, when Prytanis returned to Pantacapæum, which is the place where the Kings of Bosphorus keep their standing Court, he there endeavoured again to have recovered his kingdom: but being foild there again, he fled to a place there called the Gardens, and was there slain, and his brother Eumelus reigned in his stead, five years and five moneths,

Eumelus, to establish his kingdom, put to death all the friends, and wives and children, of both his brothers, Satyrus and Pritanis, onely Parysades, Satyrus his son, being but a very youth, escaped his hands: for, by the benefit of a swift Horse, he got away to Agarus King of the Scythians. But when Eumelus saw that the people repined at the losse of their friends which he had murdered, he called them all together, and there excused himsfelf, and restored to them their ancient form of government; and restored moreover to the Citizens of Pantacupæum, their former immunities, and promised to discharge them of all kind of tributes, sparing for no fair words, which might reconcile the hearts of the people to him: whereby having gotten all their good wills again, he held a just and moderate hand over them, and grew afterward into no small admiration for all kind of vertue among them, [Ibid.]. 4405

Ptolemei of Egypt, hearing that he had lost all again in Cilicia, put over with his fleet to Phaselis, and took that City by force; and from thence passing into Lycia, took Xanthus by assault, and the Garrison of Antigonus that was therein; then sailing to Caunus, took the City upon surrender, and then set upon the citadels and forts that were in it, and took them by assault, as for Heracleum, he utterly destroyed it, and the City Persicum came into his hands by the surrender of the souldiers that were there put to keep it, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 117.]

Then sailing to Coos, he sent for Captain Ptolemei to come unto him: that same was Antigonus his brothers son, as was said before; and had an army committed to him by Antigonus: but now forsaking his Uncle, he clave to Ptolemei, in all his ways. Parting therefore from Chalcis, and arriving at Coos, Ptolemei at first received him in all courteous manner; yet after a while, when he saw the insolency of his carriage, and how he went to allure the officers by gifts, and secret meetings with them, fearing the worst, he clapt him up in prison, and there poisoned him with a draught of hemlock: as for the souldiers that came with him, he made them his own by large promises which he used towards them, and distributed them, by small parcels among the rest of his army, [Id. ibid.]

Cassander, fearing least the Macedons would fall over to Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, who was then fourteen (as Justin, or rather seventeen, as Diodorus hath it) years of age, struck in with Polysperchon, and by his means procured both him and his mother Barsine to be privily murdered, and their bodies to be hid deep enough in the ground, least by their solemne Funerals the truth might happily come to light. And now that Alexanders two sons were both rid out of the way, and dead, and no heir of his body left to succeed him, every Governour made himself a King of the Province which he held, nor more, nor lesse, than if he had won it by the sword, and right of war, [Id. ibid. and Justin, lib 15. cap. 2.]

3696. Ptolemei, sailing from Myndus along the Islands which lay in his way, came to Andros, and putting out the Garrison that there was; restored it to her former liberty, [Diodorus, Olymp. 118. year 1.] 4406. 308.

Cleopatra, the Daughter of Philip, and Sister to Alexander the Great, being incensed against Antigonus, of her own accord, inclined to Ptolemei and left Sardes, to go unto him: but the Governour there, to whom Antigonus had given in charge not to hurt her, stopt neverthelesse her going, and afterward by his command, and the help of some of her women about her, privily got her to be murdered: But Antigonus, who would no wayes be thought guilty of her death, put some of those women to death for having a hand in her murder: and buried her with all the magnificence that might be, [Id. ibid.]

Ophellas, who had thrust out Thimbro, and reduced the Cyrenians under the obeissance of Ptolemei, challenged now, Cyrene it self, with the Cities and Regions thereunto adjoyning, as his own: and not therewith content, began to look after greater matters, and to have higher projects in his braines: and whiles he was casting these imaginations in his mind, one Ortho of Syracusa, came to him in a message from Agathocles, solliciting him to joyn in armes with him against the Carthaginians; telling him withal, that if he subdued them, he would make him Sovereign of all Afric. This therefore coming in the way, so heightened him in his former hopes, that he readily hearkened to him, and sent his Agent to Athens, from whence he had married his wife Euridice, the Daughter of Miltiades, to pray their aid and association in this war, [Id. ibid.]

3697. Many there were of the Athenians, and other Grecians, which willingly hearkened to this motion, hoping thereby to have the sharing of the richest pieces of all Afric, with all the wealth of Carthage amongst themselves. And now Ophellas, being fully provided of all necessaries for such a voyage, drew out his army, consisting of 10 thousand Foot, and six or seven hundred Horse, and one hundred Chariots, with above 300 men-drivers, and souldiers to manage them: besides extraordinaries and followers of the Camp, to the number of 10 thousand more; many of which, drew their wives and children with their stuff and baggage along with them: so that they looked more like a Colony going to be planted, than an army marching against an enemy. Having therefore marched 18 dayes journey, and in them gone 3 thousand furlongs, they came to a City called Automulus, in the westerne border of Cyrenaica, and there they encamped, and rested themselves: then removing again, they travelled thorough a dry and thirsty Country, and full of noisome Serpents, and came at last, after two moneths miserable travel, with much adoe, to Agathocles his Camp, where they pitcht their Camps at a small distance each from the other, [Id. ibid.] 4407. 307.

Agathocles, hearing of his approach, went to meet him, and advised him by all means to have a care of his army after so tedious and hard a journey, and to see them well refreshed, and having often supped together, at last Ophellas adopted Agathocles for his son: but he, when upon a time the greater part of Ophellas his army was gone a forraging into the Country, suddenly called an assembly of his own army, and before them accused Ophellas, for that being called for an assistant in this war, he went about to betray him; and having incensed the multitude, drew out his whole army in battalion against him and his Cyrenians: Ophellas growing amazed at this unexpected alteration, put neverthelesse himself, and the men he had with him into a posture of defence; but the enemy being too quick for him, and he too weak for them, he was there there slain upon the place, and Agathocles, when he was dead, perswaded the rest that were left, to lay down their arms, and then telling them what great things he would do for them; perswaded them to take his pay, and so rid himself of Ophellas, and got all his army to himself: but such of them as he found not fit and serviceable for the war, those he sent away to Syracuse, of which few yet arrived there, being for the most part cast away in a fierce tempest, that fell upon them at sea, [Id. Ib. with Justin, lib. 22. cap. 2.]

After Ophellas his death, Cyrene, and all Lybia returned to Ptolomei's obeissance again. [Suid. in Δημήτρ.]

3698. Demetrius Poliorcetes, or, as Pliny renders it, Expugnator Urbium, (i. e.) the City taker, being furnished with two strong armies, one by land, and another by sea, and provided of weapons, and all other necessaries for the war, set forth from Ephesus, to set the Grecian Cities at liberty, [Diod. year. 2. Olympiade 118.] and carrying with him five thousand talents of silver, came to Pyræum, the port of Athens, with 250 saile of ships, upon the 26 day of Thargelion, (i. e.) about the 31 day of our May, as Plutarch in the Life of Demetrius, saith. And having been received into Athens, took the City of Megara, and because Cassander had put a Garrison into Munichium, which was the Fort or Castle of Athens, under the command of one Dionysius, therefore he rased it to the ground. 4408, 306.

In the year when Anaxicrates was L. Chancelor in Athens, as among others, Philochorus hath it, who lived at this very time, in his Attic. History, [lib. 8. cited by Dionysius Halicarnassus, in his Dinarchus] reporteth, to wit, toward the end of his Chancellor-ship, and withal, [year. 2. Olymp. 118.]

When Euridice, the relict of Opheltas, al. Ophellas, Prince of Cyrene, who was slain the year before, returned to Athens. Demetrius the son of Antigonus married her; which marriage, the Athenians took as a great honour done to them: and thereupon they began, and were the first that honoured Demetrius and Antigonus, with the title of Kings; who otherwise refused that title, as the onely mark of regality, which hitherto remained entire and untoucht, to the stock and linage of Philip and Alexander his son, [Plut. in Demetrius.]

Demetrius, being re-called out of Greece by his father Antigonus, to make war upon the Captains of Ptolemei, in the Isle of Cyprus, put over first into Caria, and from thence went into Cilicia, and furnishing himself there with shipping and men, sailed thence into Cyprus, with 15 thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, and a fleet consisting of 110 ships, of three tire of Oares a piece, of singular swiftnesse, and 53 not so swift, as the other, yet men of war, as the other were, besides ships of burden of all sorts, answerable to so great a multitude of Men and Horses, as were in them to be wafted over.

Being landed, he first encamped near the shoar, not far from Carpasia, and drawing up his ships to land, fenced them there with a deep trench, and ramparts, and then went, and by force took Urania and Carpasia, and leaving a sufficient guard to defend his trenches about the fleet, marched forthwith to Salamis. [Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 118.]

Menelaus, the brother of Ptolemei, and chief Commander of the Isle, being then in Salamis, and seeing the enemy, within 40 furlongs of the City, drew out of the Garrisons adjoyng, to the number of 12000 Foot, and 800 Horse, and went to meet him: but not able to endure the impression of the enemy, fled, and Demetrius, following him hard at heels, to the very gates of the city, took to the number of three thousand of his men, and slew one thousand more upon the place: the prisoners he distributed among his own companies to serve him: but finding that they were ever ready to fly over again to Menelaus, because their wealth was in Ptolomeis hands in Egypt, he shipt them all away to Antigonus his father. [Id. Ibid.]

Antigonus at that time was building a City in the upper Syria upon the river Orontes, called after his own name, Antigonia, laying out great sums of money upon it, and taking in within the walls 70 furlongs of ground: for the place it self was very oppertune, to lie as a yoak, both upon Babylon, and the upper provinces, and also upon the nether, as far down as Egypt. [Ibid.]

Menelaus, flying back to Salamis, resolved there to endure a siege, and dispatcht away a messenger to Ptolemei, for more help, telling him what danger he was in. And Demetrius fell presently to work, dressing his Engins of battery, to take it by force: among others he had one special Engine, which he called Helepolis, (i. e.) one that would not faile him in taking any City, which it was bent against, besides sundry other great rams and galleries for them. But they within, in the night time threw fire-works upon them, and consumed the principall of them, with the greatest part of the men that kept them: yet Demetrius would not off, but pressing the siege both by sea and land, thought in time he should not fail but have it, [Ibid.]

Ptolomei

Ptolemei, hearing of the losse of his men, took presently shipping with an army well furnished for sea and land, and arriving at Paphos in Cyprus, took boats from the Cities adjoyning, and went to Citium, distant from Salamis 200 furlongs: his whole Fleet consisted of 140, or, as Plutarch hath it, 150 sail; the biggest whereof was of five tire of oares, the least of four: and these were attended with 200 ships of burden, containing no lesse than 10 thousand souldiers; and sent word to Menelaus, that when he saw them in heat of fight, he should then set out of the Port of Salamis, with 60 sail of ships, and fall in upon the rere of the enemy, and disorder them, all that possible he could. But Demetrius foreseeing what might be; as he left a part of his army to maintain the siege by land, so he gave order to Antisthenes his Ammiral, with ten ships of 5 tire of oares a piece, to lie at the mouth of the Haven of Salamis, and to keep in the Fleet that there was, so that they should not be able to come out: and having first ranged his land army upon the shoar and forelands looking into the sea; took ship himself, and with a Fleet of 108, or as Plutarch hath it, of 180 ships, the greater sort whereof were of 7 tire of oares, the least of four, put out to sea, [Diod. and Plutarch.]

Ptolemei, in the wing where himself was, utterly routed the enemy, sinking some of their ships, and taking others with the men in them; and then returning thought to have done the like with the rest: but when he came, he found his left wing wholy routed by Demetrius, and him in hot pursuite of them; wherefore he made back to Citium. But Demetrius committing his men of War to Neon and Burichus, to pursue the enemy withal, and to take up such as they found swimming for their lives, returned to his own Port whence he set out, [Diodor.]

Mean while, Menelaus sent out his 60 ships as he was commanded, under the command of Menætius, and he entring a fight with those ten ships that were set to keep 4408 306
3698. him in, brake thorough them, and they fled for safety, to the army that was at land; and Mænetius his men seeing they came too late, to act according to their instructions, returned again to Salamis, [Id.]

Ptolemei, seeing no good to be done in Cyprus, returned with eight ships onely into Egypt, [Id. with Justin, lib. 15. cap. 2. and Plut.] and Menelaus hereupon gave up both the city, and also all his Forces both by land and sea to Demetrius: his Forces were 1200 Horse, and 12 thousand Foot, all Corseleteers. [Plut.] And Demetrius having in a short time taken in all the rest of the Cities and Forts of the Island, distributed the Garrison souldiers, among his own companies, to the number of 16 thousand Foot, and 6 hundred Horse, [Diodor.]

He took 100 ships of lading, wherein there were almost 8 thousand souldiers. Of ships of War he took 40 with the men in them; and of those which were bilged in the fight, about 80. all which, leaky as they were, and full of water in the hold, they drew to land, under their Camp, near the City. Demetrius had twenty of his own ships sorely hurt in this fight, which yet being recured, and rigged up again, proved serviceable as before, [so saith Diodor.] But Plutarch thus; Of Ptolemeis ships there were 70 taken, with the men in them, Souldiers and Mariners; but of the rabble, and hang-bies which were in the ships of burden, and slaves, and friends, and women-kind; with arms, and monies to pay the souldier, and engins, nothing escaped, Demetrius took all, and carried it to his Camp: Among the rest, there was one Lamia, renowned at first for her excellent skill in playing upon the Recorder, and afterward a famous harlot, and though she were then past her prime, yet Demetrius, younger a great deal than she, fell in love with her; and she so far caught and enamoured him, with the prettines of her discourse and behaviour, that he grew as fare in love with her, as other women were with him, [Plut.]

Demetrius buried the bodies of the enemy, that were slain, very honourably; and dismissed such as he had taken prisoners, and gave the Athenians armes enough to furnish 1200 men, [Plut. in Demetr.] He sent home Leontiscus, Ptolemeis son, and Menelaus his brother, and his other friends, with fitting provision for their journey by the way; not forgetting what Ptolemei had formerly done to him in the same kind: using these enterchangeable and reciprocal offices of love and kindnesse, in the very heat of war, that it might evidently appear, their contention was for honour, and not for hatreds sake, it being the fashion, it should seem, in those dayes, to wage war more religiously, than now men use to observe the laws of friendship in time of peace, [Justin, lib. 15. cap. 2.]

Demetrius dispatcht away Aristodemus the Milesian, with the news of this victory to his father; which Aristodemus was reckoned the prime flatterer in all the Court: and coming to Antigonus, stood still a while, and held him in suspence, what the news might be; till at length he burst out with these termes, God save the King Antigonus, we have overthrown King Ptolemei at sea; Cyprus is ours, we have in our hand 16 thousand 8 hundred of his men prisoners: to whom Antigonus answered; and God save thee too: neverthelesse, because thou heldest me so long in suspence before thou thou toldest me thy good news, thou shalt in some sort be punisht too; for thou shalt stay a while, before thou receive thy reward for thy good news, [Plut.]

Antigonus, puffed up with pride upon this victory, assumed to himself a Crown, or Diadem, and the Title of King ever after; and thereupon Ptolemei also, least he should any ways seem to hang the head upon this late ill success, or be the less regarded among his subjects, took the Crown and Title of a King to himself likewise: and in all his letters from that time forward, wrote himself King: And by their example, other Governours of Provinces did the like; as Seleucus, who had lately subdued the upper Provinces to himself, and Lysimachus, and Cassander, seeing there was neither mother, nor brother, nor son, of Alexander the Great now left alive, [Diodor. and Justin. lib. 15. cap. 2. Plut. in Demet. and Appianus, in his Syriaca. pag. 122.]

3699. Seleucus wrote himself King, not onely of Babylon, but also of Media, having with 4409. 305.
his own hand slain Nicator, al. Nicanor, whom Antigonus had placed Governour there, [Appia. ib.] taking to himself also the surname of Nicator, al. Nicanor (for so we find him also stamped in his coins,) not from Nicator, or Nicanor, whom he so slew; but from the many and great victories which he gat, [Appia. ibid. pag. 124. and Ammia. Marcellinus, lib. 23. Histor.] for having subdued the Bactrians, he proceeded and took in all the rest of the countries which Alexander had formerly subdued, as far as the River Indus, and added them to his own Dominion, [Justin, lib. 15. cap. 4. Appia. in his Syriaca. pag. 123.]

King Antigonus, (for so hereafter we must terme him) his youngest son coming to decease, buried him, in a kingly manner; and calling home Demetrius out of Cyprus, commanded his whole army to meet at his new City of Antigonia; for he was purposed to march from thence into Egypt: wherefore leading the Foot himself, he went thorough Coelosyria, having in his land army 80 thousand Foot, and about 10 thousand Horse: and he made Demetrius Ammiral of his Fleet, giving him order to keep close to the shoar, in sight of the land army, having in all 150 fighting ships, and 100 more of burden, wherein was an infinite store of armes of all sorts: and when the Pilots told him, that now was the time that the seven Stars were ready to set, and would set the 8 day from thence, (to wit, in the beginning of April, he told them they were too timorous to make good sea-men of, [Diod, year 3, Olymp. 118.]

Antigonus, coming with his army to Gaza, and purposing to fall upon Ptolemei before he was provided for him, commanded his souldiers to take with them 10 dayes victual, and getting together Camels out of Arabia, he loaded on them 130 thousand bushels of wheat, and infinite store of hay upon other beasts of carriage, and carrying his munition in carts, went thorough the Desert, not without some trouble to the army; for that they met with sundry fenny and dirty places by the way, especially about the place called Barathra, [Id. ibid.]

Demetrius, with his ships loosing from Gaza, in the dead of the night, was for many dayes together becalmed, so that the lighter ships were fain to towe the ships of burden after with ropes: but after this, and so soon as the seven Stars were set, a northerly wind rose, and fell upon them, with which, many of the ships of 4 tire of oares a piece, were driven on shoar, near to the City Raphia, where was no commodious landing for them: but of those which carried the artillery, some of them were sunk, and the rest recovered Gaza again: yet some of the best of them bare up, and came under the promontory of Casius. That Foreland is not far distant from the River Nile; but is no place fit for shipping, especially if any tempest be, there is no coming near it: wherefore every ship dropping two anchors a piece, two furlongs off from land, were fain to ride it out, in a huge sea, and in the middest of a thousand dangers, and were driven to that extremity, that had the tempest lasted but one day longer, having spent their fresh water, they must all necessarily have perished for very thirst. But in this great extremity of theirs, the storme ceased; and Antigonus with his army coming to the place, there encamped, and the weather-beaten men came ashoar and refreshed themselves in the Camp: neverthelesse in this tempest, there were lost, three ships of 5 tire of oares a piece, out of which, yet some men escaped alive to land, [Ibid.]

From hence Antigonus removed and sate down with his army 2 furlongs off from the River Nile: But Ptolemei having manned all the bank of the River with strong Garrisons, sent some in River-boats, that going as near the further bank as safely they might; they should there proclaim, that if any of Antigonus his army would come to him, he would give him, if a common souldier two pounds, if a Captain, a whole talent for his pains. No sooner was this proclaimation made, but a multitude of Antigonus his men which served him for pay, grew very desirous to be gone: yea, and some of his Captains also, for that, and some other reasons, had a mind to be going too. But when Antigonus perceived that a multitude of his men were flying away from him, he disposed archers, and slingers, and other engins of War, to keep them from flying over the water in boats, and if any were lighted on that went, he put them to death with horrible torments, [Ibid.]

Antigonus, gathering together his ships which came, though late, to him; went to a place called Pseudostomon, thinking there to have landed some of his men: but found a strong Garrison of the enemy there, and was beaten off from thence with bows and slings, and other Engins of war; and therefore the night drawing on, he went his way, giving order to the masters of every ship to follow the lanthorn of the Ammiral, and so come to the mouth of the river Nile, which is called Phagneticum, but the next morning, finding that a many of his ships had lost their way, and were gone he knew not whither, he was fain to come to anchor there right, and to send away the swiftest ships he had, all the sea over, to look out, and bring in the rest unto him. Mean while, time ran on, and Ptolemei, being advertised of the approach of the enemy, went forthwith to the relief of his men, and ranged his army all along the shoar, in the enemies sight. Then Demetrius, finding no possibility of landing here neither; and being informed, that if he should land, yet the Country adjoyning was naturally fenced and fortified with fens, and moorish grounds, set sail, and returned, [Ibid.]

But, as he was going, the wind struck up to the North, and with a mighty tempest, drave three of his ships, of four tire of oares, and some others of his men of war, upon the shoar, all which came into Ptolemeis hand; the rest, with much adoe, recovered Antigonus his Camp. Now Ptolomei had placed strong Garrisons, at every one of the mouthes of the river Nile, and had an infinite number of river boats every where ready, and stored with darts and slings, and men which knew right well how to use them; which troubled Antigonus very sorely, for the mouth of the river at Pelusium, being strongly guarded by Ptolemei, he could make no use of his ships at all: and for his land forces, the river Nile, which beginneth alwayes at the coming of the sun into Cancer to swell, but at his entring into Leo, overfloweth all his banks, was now grown to that height, that they could do little, and, which was worse, with his long lying both food for men, and fodder for cattle, began to fail, [Ib.]

Wherefore Antigonus, seeing his army to hang the head, called them all together, and before them all, propounded it to the Captains, whether of the two were best, to stay and fight it out now, or to return into Syria for the present; and to return again better provided the next year, and when the waters should be lower. And when every mans voice was to be gone; he bad his souldiers truss up their trinkets, and his Navy keeping still along the shoar by them, he returned into Syria, [Ibid.] Which fruitlesse issue of this journy, Medius one of his Nobles, is said to have fore-seen in a dream: for it seemed to him, that he saw Antigonus with all his army to contend in a race at Olympus, called Diaulus, (i. e.) a double course, wherein at the first setting out, they seemed to run exceeding well, but after a while, to grow somewhat wearish: and when they came to the race-post, and were to turn about it, and return to the barriers whence they set out, (for that was the manner of this double course) they grew so out of breath, that they could go no further, [Put. in Demet.]

Ptolemei, growing glad at heart, that the enemy was thus gone, offered sacrifice to his gods, for this great benefit bestowed upon him; and made withall, a magnificent feast for his Nobles: and wrote away letters to Seleucus, Lysimachus and Cassander, of his prosperous successe; not forgitting to tell them what a company of Antigonus his men, had fled over to him. And now having rescued, as it were, Egypt, a second time, and gotten it by his sword; he thought he might lawfully reckon it his own, and returned in triumph to Alexandria. [Diodor.] Whence it is that Cl. Ptolemæus, in his Reg. Cano. counts the beginning of his reign over Egypt, from this time, reckoning from the death of Alexander the Great to this time, full 19 years: for the 19 year from the death of Alexander the Great ends just, according to his account, with the sixth day of this present November, which we are now upon, of the year 4409, according to the Julian account.

Whiles these things thus passed in Egypt, Dionysius the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, (as Diodorus writes) dyed; having then reigned 33 years, as Athenæus [lib. 12. cap. 26.] recordeth: though Memnon saith, that he reigned but 30, and Diodorus but 32. years: of whose incredible fatnesse, besides Memnon, Nymphis, Heracleotes, in his book of the City Heraclea, cited by Athenæus in the place aforesaid, maketh mention: and so doth Elia. [Var. Histor. lib. 9. cap. 13.] To him were born two sons by Amastris, al. Amestris, the daughter of Oxethras, brother to Darius the last of Persia, which was at first given in marriage to Craterus, by Alexander: the eldest of these sons was called Clearchus, the younger Oxathras; and by Diodor. Zathras: Dionysius, therefore by his last will, left the government of his kingdom, and charge of his two children, who were yet very young, to his wife, joyning some other in commission with her, [Memnon in Excerpt. Photii. cap. 5. with Diodorus, year. 3. Olympiade 118. and 119. year 3.]

3700. Menedemus going from Patara in Lycia, Commander of three ships, each of them 4410. 304.
between two and three tire of oares apiece, took a ship of four tire of oares, coming out of of Cilicia, wherein were found letters from Phila, together with rich and royal apparel, and other furniture most curiously and costly wrought, sent to Demetrius Poliorcetes: all which Menedemus sent to Ptolemei in Egypt. This affront envenomed Demetrius against the Rhodians, as he then lay in siege before their City to take it: yet after a years time spent about it, by the mediation of the Athenians, they came to this agreement, That the Rhodians should assist Antigonus and Demetrius, in their wars against any, save onely Ptolemei: and so the siege brake up, [Diod. Olymp. 119. year 1. and Plut. in Demetr.]

The Rhodians, so soon as the war was ended, sent some of their Priests to consult the Oracle of Ammon, whether they should worship Ptolemei as a god or no; and being answered, yeas, they presently consecrated to him a foursquare Grove in their City; building on every side thereof, a gallery of a furlong in length, and called it Ptolomeum, or Ptolemeis gallery: and then was also the surname or title of Σωτήρ: (i. e.) Saviour, first given him by them: to wit, for that he had saved them from the force and violence of Antigonus and Demetrius, and not by the souldiers, for, his saving of Alexander in the City of the Oxydracans, (of which before) as some have imagined, [Arria. lib. 6. pag. 131. and Steph. in the word Oxydrac. Diodorus, ut supra.]

Eumelus, the King of Bosphorus Cimmerius, having now reigned there 6 years, came to his end by a mischance: for, making haste homeward out of Scythia to a certain solemne sacrifice that was then to be offered, and was in a Coach running upon four wheeles, and drawn with four horses, and covered over with a Canopie, coming to his Palace, the horses took a fright, and ran away with him: and when the coach-man could not hold them, Eumelus for fear least they would run down some precipice or other, leapt out of the Coach; but his sword hanging in the wheele, he was whirled away with it, and so killed; after whom, succeeded Spartacus his son, who reigned 20 years, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 117. and year 1. Olymp. 119.]

3701. Seleucus, crossing the River Indus, made war upon Sandrocottus, al. Androcottus; 4411. 303.
for that he, at the same time when Seleucus laid the foundation of his greatnesse in the East, had murdred all the Governours, which Alexander had set there, and took all India into his own possession, [Justin, lib. 15. cap. 4. Appia. in his Syriaca, page 122, 123.]

Now as he was going to make this war, a wild Elephant of a vast bignesse came to him upon the way, and as if he had been tame, and brought up to it, suffered him to get up, and proved a prime and singular Elephant for the war. [Justin, ibid.] Whereupon, traversing all India over, with 600 thousand men, brought it entirely into his own subjection, [Plu. in Alexan.] and then making himself King over them, freed them from a yoak of strangers, to bring them under another of his own, [Justin, ut sup.]

Megasthenes, in his Indica, writes, that he oftentimes repaired to him, whiles he remained with Sibyrtius Governour of the Arachosians; as [Arria. lib. 5. cites him] and withal sayes, that he had seen in his army 400 thousand souldiers, [Strabo, lib. 16. page 709.]

make a peace with him. But when he would not, unlesse Cassander would absolutely stand to his mercy: then, upon conference with Lysimachus King of Thrace, they both agreed to send their Ambassadors to Ptolemei, King of Egypt, and to Seleucus, King of the upper Provinces of Asia, crying out upon the pride and surquedry of Antigonus, expressed in his answers, and remonstrating to them, how far this war concerned them both, [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 119.] Wherefore perceiving that Antigonus his purpose was to take them to task one after another, whiles they never cared to make it a common cause; they heartened each other by their missives first, and then appointed a place where all were to meet; and resolved to contribute their several stocks to the maintenance of this war: but because Cassander himself could not be there, by reason he had an enemy so nigh at hand, therefore he sent Lysimachus, with all the power which he was able to make, and infinite provisions for them, [Iustin, lib. 15. cap. 2.]

Seleucus, having made affinity with Sandrocottus, King of India, gave him all those Regions lying upon the bank of Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and made them Colonies of his own, setting Governours over them, and received of him for a present 500 Elephants, [Stra. lib. 15. pag. 724. Plut. in Alex. and Appia. in Syria. pag. 123.] And so having made all peace in the East, prepared himself for the war against Antigonus, with his consorts, according to agreement in the West, [Justin, lib. 15. cap. 4.]

Lysimachus, putting over into Asia side with his own army, came before Lampsacus and Paros, and, because they submitted readily to him, he restored them to their ancient liberty; but having taken Sigæum by force, he put into it a strong Garrison of his own, and then committing six thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse, to the charge of Prepelaus, sent him to take in the Cities of Ionia and Eolia, and himself went before Abydus, carrying all manner of Engins of battery, and other necessaries with him. Neverthelesse, when an army sent from Demetrius for the defence of that place arrived, he gave off that siege; and having taken in Hellespont and Phrygia, he went on and besieged the City Synada, where the king Antigonus his Magazin lay, and the same time drave over Docimus, a Commander of Antigonus his party, to stand for the common cause, and by his help, took both Synada and other Forts and places belonging to Antigonus; and where his treasures were laid up. [Diodorus, year 3. Olympiade 119.]

Mean while, Prepelaus, who was sent to make war upon Ionia and Eolia, by the way, took Adramittium, and besieged Ephesus, and so terrified the inhabitants, that they submitted to him, and finding there the hostages which the Rhodians had given, he sent them all home again to their friends: nor did he any hurt at all to the Ephesians themselves in their persons; onely set on fire all the ships which he found in their harbour; because the enemy commanded, as yet, all at sea: and for that, the issue of the war was hitherto uncertain: after this he joyned to him, and the common cause, the Teians, and Colophonians; but as for Erythræ, and Clazomenæ, they had succor sent into them by sea; and therefore he could not take them: but having wasted their territories, he departed, and went for Sardes, and there he drew over by fair words, two of Antigonus his Captains, Phœnix and Docimus; and took the City it self, all save the Castle, into his protection; as for the Castle, Philippus, a friend of Antigonus, kept it, and would not betray the trust which he had reposed in him. [Id. Ibid.]

Antigonus was at that time, wholy taken up in making sports and feasts, at his new 4413 301
3703 City of Antigonia; and had proclaimed great prizes for such as would put in for them, and huge wages to all cunning artificers, that could be gotten. But when he heard how Lysimachus was come into Asia, and by what multitudes his souldiers revolted to him, he brake off his sports, and yet disbursed among the wrestlers, and artificers that were allready thither come, to the sum of 200 talents; and then taking his army with him, he marched away, and by long journies, hastened to meet the enemy; and so soon as he came to Tarsus in Cilicia, he there out of the monies, which he took with him out of the City Quindi, he gave his army three moneths pay before hand: and besides this, brought three thousand talents along with him from Antigonia, to the end he might not be to seek for money, if need should be; then passing the Taurus, he hasted into Cappadocia, and reduced such as in the upper Phrygia and Lycaonia, had revolted from him, to serve him in the wars, as they did before. [Ibid.]

Then Lysimachus, hearing of the enemies approach, fell to consult with his council, in this imminent danger, what were fittest to be done: and their advise was, by no means to hazard a battle, till Seleucus came down out of the upper provinces; but to possesse himself of the surest places, and to intrench himself, in the strongest manner that possibly he could, with ramparts, and palissadoes and stakes: and there expect the coming of the enemie. Lysimachus having heard this advice, put it seriously in execution, and Antigonus on the other side, so soon as he came in sight of his Camp, drew out in batalion, and provoked Lysimachus to a fight, but seeing he would not, he went and kept all the passages, by which any victual might come unto the Camp, whereupon Lysimachus, fearing least, food failing, he might happily fall alive into Antigonus his hand, removed by night, and having marched 400 furlongs, came to Dorylæum, and there encamped: for that in those parts, there was store of corn, and other provisions in abundance, having a river at the back of him: wherefore, having there raised a work, and enclosed it with an exceeding deep trench, and three rows of stakes upon the top of it, he made all as sure as art could make it. But Antigonus, finding the enemy gone, pursued after him with all speed, and coming near the place where he lay entrenched, and seeing no disposition in him to fight, he presently fell to work, and drew another trench round about his Camp to besiege him there, and to that purpose caused all kind of instruments of a siege, as darts, arrows and Catapults thither to be brought, and though many skirmishes were made about the trenches, because Lysimachus his men fought from their works, to hinder the enemy in making theirs, yet it so fell out, that Antigonus his party had still the better of it. [Ibid.]

But in processe of time, Antigonus his works came to be almost finished round about, and Lysimachus his provision began to fail; wherefore Lysimachus, taking the advantage of a tempestuous night, gat him away with his army; and thorough mountainous countries, came to his winter quarters. But when Antigonus the next morning saw that the enemy was gone, he also marched after him thorough the champion country. But by reason there fell great store of rain, and the wayes were foul, and full of sloughs, he lost many of his carriages, and some of his men also in that journey: and the whole army army was distressed therewith: wherefore, both to spare his army, and because the Winter quarter came on, he gave off the pursuite of him, for that time; and casting about for the fittest places to winter in, distributed his army into them, [Ib.]

And Lysimachus, in like manner, sent his army to be quartered in the country of Salmonia, having made large provision for them out of Heraclea: for that he had made an alliance with them of that City; by marrying Amestris, the widow, as was said before of Dionysius, and tutrix of his two young children; and Governesse for the present of that City, [Id. ibid. with Memnon, in Photius, cap. 5.]

At this time Demetrius, being sent for by his father out of Greece, made peace with Cassander; and, steering a streight course thorough the Islands of the Egæan Sea, came to Ephesus: and there landing his army, encamped before it, and reduced it to their former obedience; and suffered the Garrison which Prepelaus had put therein, to depart with safety. And putting a strong Garrison of his own into the Castle there, marched away with the rest of his army as far as Hellespont, and reduced the Lampsacenians and Parians to his subjection. And from thence going to the mouth of Pontus, encamped near to a place called the Temple of the Chalcedonians, and there fortified: which done, he left there 3 thousand Foot, and 30 sail of good ships to keep it; and sent the rest of his army to quarter for that Winter, in sundry places thereabouts, [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 119.]

About this time, Mithridates who was subject to Antigonus, being suspected of favouring Cassanders party, was slain at Cius, in the country of Mysia, where, as also at Arthinas, he had continued Prince 35 years, [Id. ibid.] Of whom divers Authors speak diversly. For this Mithridates, is that son of Ariobarzanes, a man of the Royal blood of Persia, and descended from one of those seven which destroyed the Magi there: as we may gather out of [Polybius, lib. 5. pag. 388. and Florus, lib. 3. cap. 5. and Sext. Aurelius, Victor. de Vir. Illustr. cap. 76.] surnamed Κτίστης: (i.e.) the Builder; and lost the succession of the kingdom of Pontus after him down to Eupator, al. that Mithradates, who maintained so long a war against the Romans: as Strabo tells us, [lib. 12. pag. 562.] whence it is also that Tertullian, [lib. de Anima.] I learn (saith he) out of Strabo, that Mithridates got the kingdom of Pontus by a dream: the Story is this; Antigonus in a dream, thought that he had a field full of a golden harvest; and that Mithridates came and cut it, and carried it away into Pontus: whereupon he purposed to apprehend and kill him; whereof Mithridates being advertised by Demetrius, fled away with six horse onely in his company, and fortified a certain Town in Cappadocia, where many men joyned with him: and so he obtained to himself, both Cappadocia, and also many other Countries of Pontus, and left them to the eighth generation after him; and then it was extinguisht by the Romans, [Plut. in Demetr. and Appian. in his Mithridatica, pag. 176.] Lucian, [in his book of Long-Lived men, pag. 176.] out of Hieronymus Cardianus, and other Writers reporteth, that he lived, to the age of 84 years; and that his son, called also Mithridates, succeeding him in his Principality, added to his Dominions Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia, and held them 36 years, [Diodor. ut sup.]

Cassander sent one Pleistarchus into Asia, with an army of 12000 Foot, and 500 Horse, to assist Lysimachus; and he, coming to the mouth of Pontus, found that streite kept by the enemy: and thereupon despairing of any passage that way, went to Odessus, which lies between Apollonia and Galatia, over against Heraclea, where a part of Lysimachus his men lay: but finding no ships there, for his transportation, he divided his army into three parts; and the first part that set out, landed safely at Heraclea; the second miscarried by the enemy, which were set to keep that streite of Pontus. The third, wherein Pleistarchus himself was, was so overset with a violent tempest, that the greatest part of the ships, and men in them, perished; and the ship wherein himself was, being a goodly ship of six tire of oares, was cast away likewise: and of all the men in her, which could not be lesse than 500. onely 33 escaped, of which Pleistarchus himself was one, who getting upon a plank of the ship when it split, was cast on shoar half dead: yet being a little recovered, was carried to Heraclea, and there growing strong again, went to Lysimachus in his winter quarter, having lost the greater part of his army by the way, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time Ptolemei, coming with an excellently well appointed army out of Egypt, reduced all the Cities of Cœlosyria, to his obedience, but when he lay in siege before Sidon, there came a false rumour to his ear, that a battle had been fought, wherein Seleucus and Lysimachus were beaten, and fled to Heraclea, and that Antigonus thereupon was hasting into Syria with his victorious army. Ptolemei, giving over-light credit to this report, made a Truce with the Sidonians for five moneths; and putting Garrisons into the other Cities which he had taken in those parts, returned into Egypt, [Ibid.]

Whiles these things thus passed, 2800 of Lysimachus his chief souldiers fled over to

Antigonus, and Antigonus entertained them very curtously, and furnishing them with such pay as they said Lysimachus ought them, gave them also for a reward of their so doing, large monies over and above, [Ibid.]

At the same time also, Seleucus with a great army came down out of the upper provinces into Cappadocia, and wintered his army in tents, which he brought ready made for them. His army consisted of 20 thousand Foot, and 12 thousand horse, (reckoning in with them his archers on horseback) and 480 Elephants, and iron Chariots one hundred, thus these Kings forces came together, purposing the next sommer to try for the mastery between them.

Pythagoras the soothsayer, as formerly for Alexander the Great, and for Perdiccas, so now for Antigonus, fell to his divinatious by the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice; and finding the strings or fillets wanting in the liver of them, told Antigonus that his death was thereby portended. [Arrian. lib. 7. pag. 160.]

Alexander the Great also appeared to Demetrius in his sleep, all gloriously armed, and asked him, what was the word which he and his father purposed to give; and he answered, Jove and victory, then replied Alexander, Therefore will I go over to thy enemies, for they will take me for theirs. [Plut. in Demetrio.]

Antigonus, hearing that there were so many Kings gotten together against him, vantingly said, that he would scatter them all like so many birds out of a bush, yet the enemies approaching, he was observed to be more lumpish and silent then he used to be, and shewing his son to his army, told them, that this was the man, that must be his successor. And, which they marvelled at, more than all at the rest, had speech with him in his tent often times all alone, whereas formerly, he would never impart any secret at all unto him. And when his army was all ready ranged in batalio, and he going out of his pavilion to them, he stumbled, and fell all along upon his face, and being sorely troubled thereat, and got up again, he begged of the gods to send him either a victory that day, or a death void of pain, [Plut. Ib.]

This fight, between these so many Kings, was fought at Ipsus, a Town in Phrygia, [Arria. lib. 7. Plutarch in Pyrrho, Appian. in Syriacis, pag. 122. Diod. and Porphy year 4. Olymp. 119.] to wit in the beginning of that year. In which battle Antigonus and Demetrius between them had above 70 thousand Foot, 10 thousand Horse, 75 Elephants, and 120 Chariots, and Demetrius with the best part of his Horse, charged upon Antiochus the son of Seleucus, and his successor afterward in his kingdom, and having most valliantly routed him, but over rashly pursuing him, and too far, was the cause of the losse of that victory to his father; yet in that pursuit, Pyrrhus made his brave valour and worth, conspicuously to appear, who being then but 17 years of age, and thrust out of his kingdom by the Epirotes his subjects, joyned himself with Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidamia, who was intended for Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great, by Roxane, [Id. in Pyrrho.]

Seleucus, seeing Antigonus his batalion destitute of all help from their Horse, made as if he would have fallen upon them, but withall, very advisedly invited them rather to fall over unto him: whereupon a great part of them did so, and the rest fled; and turning upon Antigonus, one of them cryed out, saying, These come upon thee, O King: and he aswered, But Demetrius will come and help us: and whiles he stood looking still for Demetrius his return to rescue him, the enemy came on, and powred on their darts, as thick as hail upon him, and in that storm, he fell: whereupon all forsook him, and shifted for themselves, onely one Thorax of Larissa staid by the body of him, [Id. in. Demetr.] His body was afterward taken up, and buried in a royal manner, [Diod. lib. 21.] Plutarch tells us, that when Antigonus was upon his late voyage into Egypt, he was then little lesse than 80 years of age; Appianus, that when he came upon this journey, he was upward of fourscore years old. But the whole term of his life, was 86 years, as Porphyrie affirms, cited by Scaliger in his Greek fragments of Eusebius, [lib. Ult.] But Hieronymus Cardianus the Historiographer, and one who lived with him (as Lacianus, in his book of Long-Lived men, voucheth him) affirmeth, that he lived 81 years, and no more.

Demetrius, seeing all lost, with five thousand Foot, and four thousand horse, fled away with all possible speed to Ephesus; where, when all men began to fear, lest for want of monies, he would fall a plundring of the Temple of Diana, and he himself thought he should not be able to hold his souldiers hands from it, he hasted thence with all speed, [Plut. in Demetr.] and taking his mother Stratonice, and all his treasure with him, sailed to Salamis, in the Isle of Cyprus, which was at that time under his command, [Diod. lib. 2.]

The Kings that had gotten this great victory, fell presently a sharing this great kingdom of Antigonus and Demetrius, among themselves, and laid every man his share, to the dominions which he formerly possessed. [Plut. in Demetr. Appia. in Syriac. pag. 122. with Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 410.]

But

But when they could not agree about the partage of the spoile, they fell again into two sides between themselves; for Seleucus joyned presently with Demetrius, and Ptolemei with Lysimachus, [Iustin, lib. 15. cap. 4.] for Seleucus and Ptoleme , were, without compare, the two mightiest of them all; and therefore the contention between them was propagated, and continued to their posterities, under the names of the Seleucians, Kings of the North, and the Ptolemeis Kings of the South; as we find foretold [in the 11 chapter of the prophesie of Daniel.]

After Onias, his son, Simon, succeeded him in the Priesthood at Hierusalem: surnamed the Just; because of his great zeal and fervency in the worship of God, and the exceeding love, which he ever expressed to his country-men the Jews, [Josephus, lib. 2. cap. 2.] of whom in the book of Ecclesiasticus, [cap. 50. v. 1.] we find this testimony given; Simon, saith he, the High-Priest, the son of Onias, who in his life time repaired the House again, and in his dayes fortified the Temple; and by him was built from the foundation the double heigth (or curtaine) the high fortresse of the wall about the Temple. In his dayes the cisterne to receive water, being in compasse as the sea, was covered with plates of brasse. He took care of the Temple that it should not fall, and fortified the City against besieging: How was he honoured in the midst of the people at his coming out of the Sanctuary? [See Salian. his Annals, To. 5. year of the World, 3675. and Scaliger, in his Animadversions, upon Euseb. an. 1785.] This man is said to have sate High Priest there 9 years by [Scalig. in Græc. Euseb. pag. 50.]

3704. Seleucus, upon the 23 day of our April, offering sacrifice to Jupiter in the mount Casius, consulted him also concerning a place, where to build a City in; when presently an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the alter, which she is said to have let fall, in a place near the sea, below Palæopolis, (a little city built in former times by Syrus, the son of Agenor, on a hill thereby) in a sea town of Pieria: Whereupon, Seleucus fell presently to lay the foundation of a great City, which he built there, and called it after his own name, Seleucia, [Johan. Malela, in his Chron. not printed.] wherein yet, others say, that he followed not that act of the Eagle, but the flash of some lightening that appeared to him, and that thereupon the lightening was ever after in that place celebrated with set hymns and praises, as if it were a god it self, [Appia. in Syriac. pag. 125.] 4414. 300.

Seleucus himself proceeding, came to Iopolis, a City built in the hill Country of Silphium; and there the third day after his coming, falling upon the first of Artemisium; (i.e.) of our May, offered sacrifice to Jove the Thunderer, in a certain Chappel, said to have been anciently there built by Perseus the son of Danae: And afterward coming to Antigonia, and there offering sacrifice to Jove, upon the alters newly then built by Antigonus, he together with Amphion the Priest, prayed that Jupiter would shew him by some sign, whether he should inhabite Antigonia it self, calling it by some other name, or whether he should go and build a new City in another place: and then again it is said, that an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the alter, and let it fall near the hill of Siliphum. Whereupon it was, that over against that Hill and Iopolis therein built, near the River Orontes, where was a Town called Botzia, he laid the foundation of his wall, upon the 22 day of the moneth Artemisium at the rsing of the sun: which City he called after the name of his son Antiochus; and therein estsoones erected a Temple to Jupiter Botzæus. These and many more like things, doth Johannes Malela an Antiochian borne, deliver concerning the origine of this City, which Eusebius also in his Chron. affirmeth to have been built by Seleucus in the 12 year of his reign. Now this Metropolis of Syria, was afterward made a Tetrapolis; (i.e.) a fourfold City, being divided into four Regions, making, as it were, so many Cities: for that every one of them, had a proper wall built about it self, and one common one, which enclosed them all: of which, the first onely was built by this Seleucus Nicator. The second was the work of the Inhabitants themselves. The third was finished by Seleucus Callinicus: And the fourth, by Antiochus Epiphanes, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 750.]

Now that Seleucus called this City after the name of his son Antiochus, besides Malela and Cedremus, Julian also the Apostata, in his Misopogon teacheth us: whereas yet Strabo, and Appianus and Trogus Pompeius, tells us, that he called it Antiochia, after the name of his father Antiochus, [and Iustin, out of Trogus Pompeius, lib. 15. cap. 4.] saith, that herein he consecrated the memorial of a twofold beginning; for, saith he, he called the City after the name of his father Antiochus, and consecrated the fields about it, to Apollo; because forsooth, his mother Laodice, would needs make him believe, that he was begotten on her by Apollo: and therefore Daphne, a suburb of Antioch, a place much renowned for the Grove of Lawreltrees that there was, and no lesse than 80 furlongs in compasse, was consecrated to Apollo: whence as this day it is called Δάφνη ἡ πρὸς Ἀντιόχειαν κειμένη (i.e.) Daphne near unto Antioch, [2 Maccabees chapter 4. verse 33.] So the City it selfe of Antioch, is called called Ἀντιόχεια ἡ ἐπὶ Δάφνῃ: (i. e.) Antioch near unto Daphne, by other Writers.

Seleucus, utterly demolishing Antigonia, conveighed the materials down the river Orontes, unto Antioch; and transplanted from thence, to the number of 5300 Macedons and Athenians, which Antigonus had there planted, unto his new city, [Jo. Malela,] though Diodore saies indeed, that Seleucus did destroy Antigonia, but adds, that he transported the inhabitants thereof, to his new city Seleucia, [l. 20. year. 2. Olym. 118.] But Strabo also maketh mention of the inhabitants of Antigonia, removed to Antiochia, [l. 16. p. 750.] where he also adds, that some of the race and off-spring of Triptolemus, and Argivians, which were long ago sent with him to seek out Io, were there planted by Seleucus; which yet were none other than those Grecians out of Peloponese, which Stephanus Byzantius saith, were placed to dwel in Antioch, τῇ ἐπὶ Δάφνης (i. e.) in Antioch by Daphne. To which purpose also is that saying of Jo. Malela, Προσηγάγετο δὲ ὁ αὐτὸς Σέλευκος καὶ τοὺς Ἀργείους, τοὺς Ἰωνίτας, &c. (i. e.) Seleucus himself besought some of the Grecians of Ionia, and translated those Grecians which dwelt in Iopolis, to make them inhabitants of Antioch, and whom he made Citizens there, as men of a more sacred and generous kind, than the rest : compare this here with Scaligers notes, upon the 1713. number of the Euseb. Chron.]

Lysimachus the King of Thrace took to wife Arsinoe, the daughter of Ptolomei, not Ptolemei Philadelphus, as in Memnon, [cap. 5.] but of Ptolomei the first, the son of Lagus, surnamed the deliverer, as we learn out of Plutarch in Demetr. and Justin, [lib. 17. cap. 2. and lib. 24. cap. 2.] and even out of Memnon himself, in Excerpt. [cap. 9.] of Ptolemei the first, I say, and Euridice, as we find in Pausan his Attic. [pag. 8.] whereat his former wife Amestris, the relict of Dionysius, the King perforce, or tyrant, or a usurper of Heraclea, grew so offended, that he left him, and returned to Heraclea, and there built a City near the Euxian sea, which he called after his own name Amastris, and sent for men out of Sesamus, Cytorus, Cromnus and Teios, and other places to inhabit it. [Memnon. Excerpt. cap. 5. with Strabo lib. 12. pag. 544.]

3705. Seleucus, following the example of Lysimachus, sent his Ambassadors, and by them desired to have Stratonice, the daughter of Demetrius, surnamed Poliorcetes, and Phila, for his wife. Whereupon, Demetrius, taking his daughter along with him, took shipping, and with his whole fleet which attended him at Athens, set saile for Syria. But by the way touched in Cilicia, which Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander, then held, as allotted to him by a general consent of the Kings, after the battle wherein Antigonus, his Grandfather was slain. This Plistarchus conceiving himself wronged by Demetrius his setting foot upon his land, went and complained thereof to Seleucus, and expostulated the matter with him; for that without the consent of the other Kings, Ptolemei and Lysimachus, he had entered into a league and affinitie with Demetrius, a common enemy to them all. Hereupon Demetrius in a rage went from thence to Quinda, where when he found yet remaing of the old treasure of Alexanders, 1200 talents, he took them all away with him, and weighed anchor, and to sea, as fast as he could high him, [Plut. in Demet.] 4415. 299.

Seleucus came to meet Demetrius, and his wife Phila, at a place called Orossus, and first invited them to dine with him at his pavilion in his Camp: after which Demetrius invited him aboard his ship of 13 tire of oares high, after which they spent whole dayes in familiar discourse together, without arms or guard about them, till at length Seleucus married Stratonice, and with her returned in great pomp and magnificence to Antioch.

Demetrius, having possessed himself of Cilicia, dispatcht away his wife Phila to her brother Cassander, to excuse such matters as Plistarchus, might happily have laid unto his charge, and whiles she was away, his other wife Deidamia came to him to Athens, where after a short while, she died. [Ibid.]

3706. Seleucus desired Demetrius to let him have Cilicia for a certain sum of money, which when he would not grant, Seleucus in a cholerick way, demanded to have Sidon and Tyre out of his hands, and this seemed an injurious act of his, that having made himself Lord, and possessing all from India, to the Syrian sea, yet he was of so poor a spirit, as to trouble his father in law, being otherwise under a cloud of adverse fortune, for two such poor Cities, as Tyre and Sidon were. Wherefore Demetrius stoutly answered, that if he were a thousand times overcome, yet he would never buy a son in law at so dear a rate; and thereupon fell presently a fortifying of those two Cities, which were such sores in Seleucus his eyes, [Ibid.] 4416. 298.

3707. Cassander, having had the rule and government of things in Macedonia 19 years, dyed, leaving three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander, begotten on the body of Thessalonice, the sister of Alexander the Great, all which reigned after their father three years and six moneths onely, [Dexippus and Porphyrius in Scaligers Greek Eusebians, pag. 48. 228.] 4417. 297.

Philip

Philip the elder of the three, coming shortly after his fathers death to fall away and die of a consumption, his two younger brothers, Antipater and Alexander, fell together by the ears about the kingdom, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. Pausa, in his Bæot. pag. 287. and Plut. in Pyrrho & Alexan.]

This Antipater, Dexippus, and Euseb. in Chron. call by the name of Antigonus: nor could Hermippus understand any other, where he saith, that Demetrius Phalereus, after the death of Cassander, for the dread he had of Antigonus, fled to Ptolemei, surnamed the Deliverer, [Diog. Laertius, in Demet. Phal.]

Pyrrhus also, at the same time, remained with Ptolemei, as a hostage in Egypt: where he married Antigone the Daughter of Berenice the Queen, by Philip her former husband, [Plut. in Pyrrho. Pausan. in Attic. pag. 10.]

Pyrrhus, by the help of Antigone his wife, having obtained both a Fleet of ships, and 4417. 297.
store of money withal, from Ptolemei; set sail for his old kingdom Epirus; and there came to a composition with Neoptolemus, who had usurped his kingdom, upon termes, to hold it joyntly with him, [Id. ibid.]

Eupolemus, the Historian, deduceth his Chronologue from Adam, and the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, down to the fifth year of this Demetrius, reckoned from the death of his father Antigonus, and to the 12 year of Ptolemei, reckoned from the utter extinction of Alexander the Great, his Race, of which I spake toward the end of the year of the World, 3695. in his book of the Kings of Juda; as we find in the [1 book of Strom. of Clemen. Alexan.] 3708. Demetrius, Poliorcetes, (i. e.) the City sieger, wasted the City of Samaria, which 4418. 296.

Perdiccas had formerly new rebuilt, [Euseb. Chron.]

3709. Velleius Paterculus, in the first book of his History, tells us, that Pyrrhus began his 4419. 295.
reign, when Fabius Max. and Q. Decius Mus, were each of them, the fifth time Consul of Rome; to wit, when Neoptolemus being slain, Pyrrhus took the sole possession of Epirus into his hands: and then, remembring how much he had been beholding to Berenice and Ptolemei, by whose favour it was, that he had thus recovered his kingdom; he called his son, which Antigone now bare unto him, by the name of Ptolemei; and having built a new City in a neck of land in Epirus, he called it after the name of his wives mother, Berenice, [Plut in Pyrrho.]

3710. In the 36 year of the Periode or account of Calippus, the 25 day of the moneth Pos- 4420 294
sideon, in the year 454. of Nabonassar, the 16 day of Paophus, 3 hours after midnight, the 21 day of our Decemb. Timochares observed at Alexandria in Egypt, that the Moon rising to her utmost heigth northward, touched upon the most northerly Star of those which are in the head of Scorpio, [Ptol. in his great Syntax. lib. 7. cap. 3.]

In the same year also, upon the 15 day of Elaphebolion, the 5 of Tybus, four hours 4420. 294.
before midnight upon the 9 of our May, the same Timochares observed the conjunction of the Moon with Spica Virginis, [Id. ibid.]

Thessalonice the Queen, and relict of Cassander, the Daughter of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, begotten upon the Daughter of Nicasipolus, was murdered by Antipater her own son; yea, though she begged life of him by those paps which gave him suck: the reason was, for that in the partage of the kingdom, made between him and his brother, she seemed a little inclined to her youngest son Alexander. And Alexander, to revenge this murder of his mother, prayed in aid of all the friends he could make; of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, of Demetrius Poliorcetes, in Peloponesus, [Justin, lib. 16. cap. 1. Plut. in Pyrrho. & Demetr. Pausan. in Bœot. pag. 287.]

Lysimachus the King of Thrace, for the dread he had of Demetrius his coming, perswaded with his son in law Antipater, rather to agree with his brother, than by falling out with him, to draw upon himself an old hereditary enemy of his fathers, [Justin, ibid.] And knowing well, that Pyrrhus would do any thing for Ptolemeis sake; he sent certain forged letters to him, as sent from Ptolemei, wherein he advised him, to receive a gratuity of 300 talents from Antipater, and to give off his journey into Macedon for the support of Alexander against against his Brother. But Pyrrhus perceived this trick of his; for opening the letter, he found not there the usual salutation from Ptolemei to him: which was, Pater filio, (i. e.) The father to his son: instead whereof, it was here written, King Ptolemei to King Pyrrhus, sendeth greeting: and withal Demetrius his sudden falling in upon Macedonia, brake off all these devises of Lysimachus, [Plut. in Pyrrho.]

Ptolemei of Egypt, took the whole Isle of Cyprus out of Demetrius his hands; the City Salamis onely excepted, where he besieged Demetrius his mother and children that were therein: and them, having at length taken the City, he sent home unto him honourably attended, and with rich presents bestowed on them, for their journey, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Demetrius, having gotten Alexander into his hands, and slain him, possessed himself self of the kingdom of Macedon, [Iustin, l.16. cap.1. Pausan. Baeot. pag. 287. Plut. in Pyrr. & Demetr. and in his Treatise, περὶ δυσωπίας: (i.e.) of shamefacestnesse;] and held it seven years, as the same Plutarch affirmeth.

3711. Lysimachus, being at that time engaged in a war which one Dromichetes a King of the Getes made upon him, least he should be forced to maintain a war against the King of Getes, and Demetrius both at once, gave up that part of Macedon, which belonged to his son in law Antipater, and so made peace with him, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. with Strab. lib. 7. pag. 302. & 305.] 4421. 293.

Dromichætes his hap was to take Lysimachus prisoner, but used him very kindly [Strabo. Ut supra. Diodorus, in Excerpt. H. Valesf. pag. 257, 258.] and Lysimachus gave him his daughter to wife, and gave up into his hands that part of Thrace, which lay beyond the Ister, for a dowrie with her. [Pausani. in Attica. pag. 8.]

Clearchus, the King perforce, or Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, going to help Lysimachus in his war against the Getes, was taken prisoner together with him, and when Lysimachus was gotten at liberty himself; he, by his wisdome, used the means to procure his liberty also, [Memnon. in Excerpt. cap. 6.]

3712. When Simon, surnamed the Just, the High Priest at Jerusalem, was dead, leaving behind him one onely son Onias, then an infant, his brother Eleasar, the son of Onias the first, took upon him the high priesthood of the Jews, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 2.] and is said to have sate there 32 years, in Scaligers Greek Eusebian fragments. [pag. 50. and 162.] 4422. 292.

After the return of Lysimachus from the Getick war, Agathocles, his eldest son, and who was taken prisoner in the first battle that ever he was in, as some report, took to wife Lysandra, the daughter of Ptolemei of Egypt, surnamed the deliverer, and of Euridice his wife, [Pausan. in his Attic. p. 8.]

After this, Lysimachus, passing with his Navy over into Asia, seized on such as there were in subjection to Antigonus and Demetri us, [Id. Ib. with Plut. in Demet.] where whiles he lay before Ephesus, and they had to help them one Mandro, an arch Pirate, who often brought in thither rich prises which he had taken: Lysimachus fell a bribing of him, and wan him over to betray the City to him, and for the effecting thereof, put into his hands certain valiant Macedons, whom he with their hands bound behind them, brought like prisoners into Ephesus; and they spying their time, got arms in the Castle where they were, and took the City for Lysimachus, [Jul. Fronti. Stratag. lib. 3. cap. 3.] and whereas the City of Ephesus being seated in a low ground, was a while after infinitely annoyed by an inundation of the sea coming in upon it, and quite drowned by it, of which deluge we may read an epigram in Stephanus Byzantinus, made by one Duris, Lysimachus now removed it into another place; and being new built, called it after the name of his new wife Arsinoe, though after his death, it quickly returned to her former name and appellation of Ephesus, [Strabo lib. 14, p. 640. and Stephanus in Ephesus.] and to replenish his new City with inhabitants, he demolished the two Cities of Lebedus, and Colophos, and removed the dwellers in them to it; which destruction of those two famous Cities, Phœnix in his Iambicks, grievously deploreth, [Pausan. ut sup.]

3713. Seleucus, to st[illegible] such Cities as he had built in Asia, and the lower Syria, and especially Antioch, the Metropolis of all the rest, removed the Jews from their own dwellings into them; giving them every where equal priviledges, prerogatives and immunities with the Macedons, both in Towns and Cities, [Euseb. Chron. Joseph. Atiquit. lib. 12. cap. 3. & lib. 2. Cont. Apio. pag. 1063.] But of the Cities which he built, he named 16 after the name of his father Antioch, Antiochia; and six others after the name of his mother Laodice, Laodicea; nine of them from himself, Seleucia; three from his wife, Apamea; and one from his last wife, Stratonice: and to the rest, he gave certain Greek and Macedonic names, as came in his head: as Berræa, Edessa, Pella, and the like, [Appian. in Syria.] 4423. 291.

3715. Agathocles, the Tyrant of Sicilie, coming to die, shipt away his wife Thoxena, with his two children, which he had by her, being very little ones, with all his treasure and family, and rich furniture, wherein he exceeded all other Kings, and sent them into Egypt, from whence he took her, fearing least so soon as he was dead, they should be made a spoile to some or other, together with his kingdom. Though his wife, entreated hardly, that at least she her self, might not be forced to leave him, whiles the breath was in his body; pleading for her self, that when she married him, she contracted a society with him of all fortunes, as well bad as good, and that she would willingly hazard her own life, to be with him at the hour and instant of his death, and his children, little though they were, yet hardly could they be drawn off from holding by him; and in the end, parted from him with a dolefull cry, and pittifull lamentation, when the wind served, and they must be gone, and so soon as they were gone, he breathed out 4425. 289.

out his last, and gave up the ghost, [Justin, lib. 23. cap. 2.]

3710. Clearchus and Oxathres, the two Kings of Heraclea in Pontus, when their mother Amestris had gotten a ship-board to be gone from them, in a most barbarous manner, caused her to be thrown over-board, and drowned in the sea, [Memnon Excerp. cap. 6.] 4426. 288.

3716. Lysimachus, desirous to revenge the death of Amistris, sometime his wife, came into Heraclea, and shewing there all fatherly affection to Clearchus and those who were nearest about him; first slew him, and then his brother Oxathres, [Id. cap. 7.] seventeen years after the death of Clearchus their father: as may be gathered out of [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 118.] and so, having reduced that City and territory thereunto belonging into his own power, and obliged it to himself, he took all the treasure belonging to those Tyrants, and whatever they had scraped together, into his own hands, and leaving the City in full liberty, and to live after their own laws, he returned into his own kingdom, [Memnon, ut sup.]

Strato of Lampsacus, the son of Arcesilaus, and surnamed Physicus, succeeded Theophrastus in his schoole; which Strato was the teacher and bringer up of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, who gave him for his pains, taken in his education, as it is said, fourscore talents, [Diog. Laert. in Strabone.]

Demetrius Poliorcetes, seeking to recover all his father Antigonus his Dominions, was now ready to land in Asia, with so huge an army, as no man after the dayes of Alexander the Great, to that time, had the like; for in his army he had no lesse than 100 thousand Foot, wanting two; and little lesse than 12 thousand Horse: in his Fleet he had full 500 ships; whereof some were of an excessive bignesse, as of 15 or 16 tire of oares. Before his going, he made a firm league with Pyrrhus; for fear least he, moving some troubles in his absence, might interrupt, and hinder him in his main design, [Plut. in Demetr. & Pyrrho.]

3717. Seleucus, Ptolemei, and Lysimachus, fearing, as well they might, whither this excessive preparation tended: combined together, and making one body of all their Forces, began to find him work, and to make war upon him in Europe; and in all their three names sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus in Epirus, advising him to invade Macedon: nor should reckon that a league, which he had made with Demetrius, since he therein had no intention of peace; but onely a purpose to be at liberty himself, to make war upon whom he pleased: Pyrrhus easily assented hereunto: debauched Demetrius his army, put him to flight, and took the kingdom of Macedon into his own possession, [Id. ibid. Justin, lib. 16. cap. 2.] And this was the first time, as [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 11.] noteth, that ever Pyrrhus was Master of some few Elephants. 4427. 287.

But when Lysimachus came, and pretending that he had a hand in the quashing of Demetrius as well as Pyrrhus, and therefore craved halfes with him in the kingdom of Macedonia; Pyrrhus, doubting of the firmity of the Macedons unto him, yeilded thereto, and so came to a division of the kingdom of Macedon with him by Cities and Regions, [Plut. ut sup.]

But in this mangling of things, Lysimachus, finding that his son in law Antipater, complained openly that his father in law had cheated him of the kingdom of Macedon, made short work, and slew him: and because his daughter Euridice Antipater's now Relict, repined at the death of her husband, therefore he committed her to prison. And so the whole house of Cassander paid Alexander the Great the price, whether of his own death, or whether of the destruction of his Race, partly by murders, partly by torments, partly by parricidial acts committed in his own family to the utter extirpation of it, [Justin, ut sup.]

Thus Demetrius, being in an instant stript of his kingdom, fled to Cassandria. But his wife Phila swallowed up with grief, and not enduring to see her husband fall again into the condition of a private man in a forreign country, and despairing of all better successe in time to come, poisoned her self, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.]

When Demetrius lay at the siege of Athens, which had revolted from him to Pyrrhus, Crates the Philosopher, being sent in Embassie to him, perswaded him to raise his siege: whereupon, getting all his ships together, and putting aboard them eleven thousand Foot, besides his Horse, he sailed away into Asia, there to get all Caria and Lydia from Lysimachus. There Euridice the sister of his wife Phila, met him not far from Miletus, bringing with her Ptolemais, her daughter by Ptolemei of Egypt, whom his son in law Seleucus, had formerly spoken to Ptolemei to bestow on him. Demetrius therefore now married her, by the good will of Euridice; and of her Demetrius begat Demetrius, who afterward reigned in Cyrenia, [Ibid.]

In this voyage, Demetrius took in many Towns and Cities, some by fair means, some by force, and some fell over from Lysimachus to him, who also brought great store of men and means with them. But when Agathocles the son of Lysimachus came towards him with an army, he marched up into Phrygia, purposing to invade Armenia, and

and thereby to make a combustion in Media it self, and consequently to feel the pulse, of the upper provinces of Asia, and how they stood affected to him; for that there he might happily find many a lurking hole, if need should be: as for Agathocles, who followed him, he often worsted him in small encounters, but never came to a main battle with him, [Ibid.]

Neverthelesse, failing many times of food for himself, and fodder for his Horse, he found himself sorely distressed, especially by an error committed in passing the Lycus, he lost many of his souldiers, which that fierce river swept away. And at last by a pestilence following the famin in his army, he lost eight thousand of his company, and was fain with the rest to come back to Tarsus in Cilicia, where his purpose was to refrain all kind of injury and oppression of the people, as apperteining to Seleucus, whom he would not offend in any kind. But that could not be; considering the extreme necessity his army was in, and Agathocles kept all the passages of the Taurus, wherefore he wrote his letters to Seleucus; wherein complaing of his own hard fortune, he humbly besought him to compassionate his case, as a poor kinsman of his, and one that desired to be pitied, even of an enemy, [Ibid.]

3718. Seleucus, taking into consideration the distressed estate of his father in law, wrote to his Commanders and officers in those parts, to supply him with all necessaries in a kingly manner, and not to suffer his army to want in any kind. But there was one Procles, an intimate friend and familiar of Seleucus, who wrought so far with him, by suspitions which he put into his head against Demetrius, that he presently led an army against him into Cilicia. Demetrius, wondring at this sudden alteration in Seleucus, drew off presently into the craggy mountains of Taurus, and from thence sent his agents to him, to desire, that by his good leave, he might fall upon some free state or other, among the Barbarians; and there spend the remainder of his life, without ranging the world over any longer: but if not, yet that he would suffer him to winter quietly where he was, and not to expose him, in the extremity he now was in, to the force and fury of his enraged enemy. Seleucus made an ill construction of all these motions, and therefore granted him onely, that, giving up into his hands the principal of his friends which he had about him for hostages and pledges of his good abearance, he should spend two moneths of his winter quarters in Cataonia, which was a country bordering upon Cappadocia, and withall, stopt up all passages which led from thence into Syria. [Ibid.] 4428 286

And now Demetrius, being thus closed up like a wild beast in a den, having Agathocles the son of Lysimachus on the one hand, and Seleucus on the other, to watch him; turned himself to try what he could do by force, and wasted some of the provinces belonging to Seleucus, and in every encounter, had the better of him; and when Seleucus let his iron Chariots flie upon him, Demetrius sundry times routed them also, and put his enemies to flight; and took the passages of the mountains, casting out the Garrisons which Seleucus had there placed for the keeping of them. And growing now confident of his own strength, resolved to throw at all, in a pitch battle with Seleucus, when upon the sudden, a grievous sicknesse fell upon him, which utterly overthrew the state, both of his body, and also of his affairs, and hopes in the world; for that during his sicknesse his souldiers all abandoned him, some falling away to his enemies, and others disbanded, and went where they pleased. [Ibid.]

Whiles Demetrius thus lay under the lash of Seleucus in Syria, Lysimachus set upon Pyrrhus, in Macedonia; and in five years and six moneths space, wan it all from him, [Dexip. and Porphy.]

Demetrius, at the end of 40 dayes, being recovered of his sicknesse, taking such souldiers with him as were left, removed his Camp, making as if he would march into Cilicia; and the night following, without sound of trumpet, turned short another way: and having passed the hill Amanus, ravaged and plundred all that Country as far as Cyrrhestica, a region in Syria. And when Seleucus came thither with his army, and encamped not far from him, Demetrius with his men came upon him by night, whiles he slept, yet he, getting notice of his coming by some that fled over to him, start out of his bed, and commanded an alarm to be sounded; and whiles he was putting on his shooes, cryed out to his friends, that he had to do with a fierce wild beast: and Demetrius, finding, by the noise which he heard in the enemies Camp, that his coming was discovered, retired presently, and went his way. [Plut. in, Demet.]

So soon as it was day, Seleucus followed and overtook him; and Demetrius giving one wing to be led by a captain of his, led the other himself, and routed the wing of the enemy, on his side; then Seleucus leapt off his Horse, and took off his helmet, and with a target in his hand, shewed himself bare faced to the mercenaries of Demetrius his army, and exhorted them to leave Demetrius, and fall over to him, and to be once so wise, as to understand, that it was more in favour of them, than of Demetrius, that he had refrained thus long from falling on them: whereupon they all cryed out, God save save Seleucus, and calling him their King, abandoned Demetrius, and served him, [Ibid.]

Demetrius, supposing this to be the last reverse of fortune, and worst that could befal him, retired to the streits of the mount Amanus, and there spent that night in a thick wood, with those few friends which he had about him: purposing from thence to go to the City Caunus, and hoping there to get shipping for some other country to flee unto. But when he saw that he had not so much as one dayes provision for them neither, it fell out so luckily with him, that an old friend of his, Sosigines, came and brought him 400 Crowns. This supply he hoped would carry him and his to the sea side; and therefore went by night, to passe the top of the mountain: yet because he saw by the fires every where made, that the enemy lay in his way, in great despair he was fain to return to the place whence he set out. And there, when one of the company told him, he should do well to put himself into Seleucus his hands, he drew his sword, and would have there present fallen upon it; but being perswaded by his friends about him to forbear, he sent to Seleucus, and submitted both himself and all that he had to his will and pleasure, [Ibid.]

Seleucus, having heard the message, gave order presently to his servants, to fit up a Royal Pavilion in most princely manner to receive Demetrius in; and dispatcht away one Apollonides, who had formerly been an intimate friend of Demetrius, to comfort him, and to tell him, that there was no cause of fear, seeing he was to come to an old friend and son in law of his: when this came to the eares of Seleucus his servants, first by one and one, and anon after, they all flocked in great multitudes to Demetrius: which act of theirs, instead of compassion, caused envy towards him, and made his foes to alienate Seleucus his good intentions, from him; telling him, that no sooner should Demetrius be seen in the Camp, but he should find strange alterations, and innovations in it, [Ibid.]

Hereupon, Pausanias was sent with a traine of about a thousand men, Horse and Foot together; who put all others from him, and instead of bringing him to Seleucus his presence, carried him away to a certain Foreland lying out into the Sea, in Syria. In that place was he kept ever after, with a strong guard upon him; but sufficient allowance made him, wanting for no monies, no walkes, no gardens, nor places of hunting, or other recreations, that his heart could wish: and his friends that had followed him, had free leave to have accesse unto, and converse with him: nor passed there a day, wherein some or other came not unto him, to see him from Seleucus, with friendly messages from him, and to bid him be of good comfort, and to put him in hope of his further liberty upon reasonable conditions: so soon as Antiochus (which was Seleucus his son) and his wife Stratonice were come to Court, [Ibid.] yet [Diodorus, lib. 21.] tells us, that he was all this while kept prisoner at Pella, [Hen. Vales. in Excerpt. pag. 262.]

Demetrius, being fallen into this condition, wrote to his son, and other Captains, and friends of his at Athens, and Corinth, and other places, that they should give no credence to any letters that might happen to come to them as sent from him, or sealed with his seale: but should look to, and order all, for the behoof of his son Antigonus, as if himself were actually dead, [Plut. in Demetr.] from whence it is that Porphyrie deduceth Antigonus his reign over Greece from this time; to wit, from the tenth year before he added the kingdom of Macedon to his other Dominions: which Porphyrie telleth us further, that this Antigonus, from a place called Goni in Thessalia, where he was bred and brought up, was surnamed Gonates, [Scalig. in Grac. Eusebia. pag. 226.] Now Antigonus, hearing the news of his fathers captivity, took it very heavily, and put himself into mourning weeds, and wrote away his letters, as to sundry other Kings, so to Seleucus himself, in all humble manner and suppliant-wise, offering himself, and whatever he could call his, in pledge unto him for his father; the like letters and messages came to Seleucus from sundry Cities and Potentates, on his behalf, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Onely Lysimachus by his letters advised Seleucus to take heed how he let a man go, of so ambitious and turbulent a spirit, so ambitious of Sovereignty, and so encroaching upon the rights of all other Kings, and offering him 2 thousand talents gratuity, if he would send him packing out of the World: but Seleucus, who had never any good opinion of the man, upon this letter of his, grew into utter detestation of him, as of a barbarous and execrable person, and spared not to let fall foul words to his Ambassadours, for that they went about to perswade him, not onely to break the word and promise which he had given, but also to commit so prodigious a murder upon a person, so many wayes and so nearly allied unto him: neverthelesse he wrote away his letters forthwith to his son Antiochus, who was then in Media, for his advise, what he should do with Demetrius now he had him: for that, of himself, he was purposed to let him go at liberty, and to restore him in all points to his former state and glory of a King; which he therefore thought fit to communicate to him; because he had married his daughter

Stratonice, and had children by her, [Id. Ib. and Diod. in Excerpt. published by Hen. Vales. lib. 21.]

3719. Demetrius, being hitherto confined to that Chersonese or neck of land, at first, forbare not to exercise himself in hunting, and other sports: but by little and little grew idle and rechlesse, and fell to potting and dicing, and spent his time for the most part that way. Plut. in Demet.] 4429. 285.

Ptolemei of Egypt, surnamed Soter, having children first by Euridice, the daughter of Antipater, and then by Berenice, whom Antipater sent as a companion onely with his daughter, into Egypt, drawing now near to his end, left Ptolemeus, surnamed Philadelphus, one of his sons, which he had by Bernice, to succeed him in the kingdom, as Pausan. in Attic. affirmeth. [Justin lib. 16. cap. 2.] telleth us, that before ever he grew into any infirmity of body, he put over his kingdom to his said son, and that he gave his reasons for his so doing to the people. But Lucianus in Macrobiis, and Porphyrie in the Greek Eusebian fragments, [pag. 225.] tell us, that when he had reigned 38 years alone, he then joyned his son with him in the kingdom, and so held it joyntly with him two years. But I conceive, that it was in the 39 year, beginning after the death of Alexander, that he took his son Philadelphus into the consortship of the kingdom with him, and that in remembrance thereof it was, that Dionysius the Astronomer, framed a new Era or Calendar, to be reckoned from the summmer of this year, 3719. as Clau. Ptolomeus sheweth in his Great Syntaxis, out of the said Dionysius his cælestial observations, which Dionysius is the same man, and none other which this Ptolemeus Philadelphus sent into India, as Plinie [lib. 6. cap. 17. reporteth.]

Hermippus saies, that Demetrius Phalereus advised Ptolemei, the father, by all means to joyn with him in his kingdom, one of his sons begotten of Euridice, and not of Bernice: and Heraclides, (reported by Diog. Laertius in Demetr. Phaler. in his Epitome of the successions of Sotion,) saith, that when the said Ptolemei would needs give the Diademe to his son Philadelphus, Demetrius said to him, Sir, take heed what ye doe; if you give it once away, you will never have it again; yet did the father for all this, not onely give him the Crown in the open sight of all the people, but also attended on him as one of his ordinary guard or Pensioners, saying, That it far surpassed the having of a kingdom, to be the father of a king, [Just in lib. 16. cap. 2.]

Ptolemeus surnamed Ceraunus, (i. e.) Lightning, either for his quicknesse and celerity in dispatch of busines, or for his fiercenesse of nature, as Memnon saith, the son of Euridice, seeing his younger brother made King before him, for fear of what might follow, got him privily away, and fled to Seleucus; and he pitied his case, as of the son of a friend, and entertained him with large and honourable allowance, not without some signification, that when ever his father came to die, he would set him in his throne in Egypt, [Memnon in Excerpt, cap. 9. & 13. Appian in Syriac. pag. 128.]

In the 124 Olympiade, as we find in Cyril of Alexandria, [lib. 1. cont. Julia.] the image of Serapis was brought from Sinope, upon the Euxine sea to Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemeus Philadelphus, as some think, or rather under Ptolemei the first, his father, (for in the beginning of this Olympiade it was, that they reigned joyntly, as was said before) for, that Ambassadors were sent from him concerning this very thing to Scydrothenis, who was at that time King of Sinope in Pontus, Cornelius Tacitus sheweth at large in the fourth book of his History, toward the end thereof.

3720. In the same Olympiade, as we find in Euseb. Chron. Sostratus of Cnidus built the Pharus, or watch-tower, in Alexandria, of which Plinie, [lib. 36. cap. 12.] speaketh in this wise, Magnificatur turris a rege facta, &c. (i. e.) Much renowned, saith he, is the Tower built by a King in the Isle of Pharus, which makes the port of Alexandria, which Pharus cost 800 talents the building: wherein (to omit nothing) great was the mind of Ptolemei the King, in that he suffered Sostratus, the Architect of that great work, to set his name upon it. The use of which Tower was, to bear a light in it, for the help of those who travelled by sea in the night season: and by day, to shew them the way into the port, and how to avoid the shelves that lay before it. [Strabo lib. 17. pag. 791.] calls this Sostratus, φίλον τῶν βασιλέων, &c. (i. e.) the friend of Kings; meaning, of the two Ptolemeis, father and son, who, as I shewed before, at this time held that kingdom in consortship together: and withall, relates the inscription which Sostratus there made of himself; as thus, Σώστρατος Κνίδιος Δεξιφάνους, θεοῖς Σωτῆρσιν ὑπὲρ τῶν πλωϊζομένων. Sostratus a Cnidian born, the son of Dexiphanes, to the gods the delivererers, for the benefit of the sea-men, and Lucian in the end of his book, of the right writing of a History, hath the same, saving, that he saith; Sostrates inserted it somewhere cunningly, and of himself, and not, as Plinie, by the sufferance and good likeing of the two Kings. For when he built the Tower, he graved this inscription somewhere in the inside of it, and then plaistered it over, and upon that plaister, set the name of the Ptolemei, whoever it were, that then reigned, conceiving that it would come to passe in some short time, (as indeed it did) that the upper inscription, together with the plaister, would fall off, and then his own name, that was graven under in good stone, would appear. 4430. 284.

But to the end that there might be a safe arrival made for shipping to this Pharus, which lay 7 furlongs distant from the main land, there was made a huge causei, which joyned the Island to the Continent, and made it now to be no longer a distinct Island; but a Chersonese or Peninsula, and a part of the Continent, joyning to Rhacotis a suburbe of the City of Alexandria: of which [Ju. Cæsar, in lib. 3. Commenta. De Bello civi.] toward the end thereof, speaketh in this wise: Pharus, saith he, is a tower in that Island, of a woundrous heighth, and sumptuously built, which is so called from the Island it self whereon it stands: This Island lying over against Alexandria, makes an arme of the sea between a sure haven for the Cities use; but, a superioribus Regibus; (for so it should be, as Brodæus, Scaliger, and Salianus have well observed, not, a superioribus Regionibus, as the vulgar printed Copies have it) (i. e.) by their Kings in elder ages, had a narrow causway of 900 paces long been made therough the sea, which by the help of a bridge joyneth it to the town, for we may in no sort give credit to that fable of [Ammia. Marcell. lib. 22. of Johan. Malela, lib. 9. cap. 2. of the Author of the Fasti siculi of George Cedremus, and Joh. Tzetza,] who dreame, that both the tower it self, and causway, were the work of Cleopatra, the last Queen of Egypt.

Spartacus, the King of Bosphorus Cimmerius died, when he had reigned 22 years, as Diodorus telleth us in the year 1. of the 119. Olympiade: after whom, as it seemeth, succeeded his son Parysates, of whom I spake in the year of the World, 3695.

Demetrius Poliorcetes, who had now laien three whole years confined in a Promontory or Foreland of Syria, partly with lazinesse, partly with potting and gormandising, fell into a sicknesse, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.] 17 years after the deceale of his father Antigonus: as [Dexippus, Porphrie and Eusebius say:] Seleucus was ill spoken of abroad in the world about his death: and indeed, he repented him often, and blamed himself for being so jealous and suspitious of him. But Antigonus, Demetrius his son, when he heard that the Reliques of his father were coming towards him, put to sea, with all the shipping that he could make, and met them about the Isles, and there receiving the ashes of his fathers body, laid them up in a golden Urne, and covering them over with a vaile of Scarlet, and a Diadem or golden Crown set thereon, and using all Rites Pomps, and Ceremonies usual and belonging to so great a Funeral, carried them along with him first to Corinth, and afterward to Demetrias, a City so called after his fathers name, and by him peopled with men, drawn out from the lesser towns and villages of Iolcos in Thessalie.

Seleucus, having now gotten all that which Demetrius possessed in Syria, and Asia, properly so called, made of both those kingdoms one entire Empire, [Euseb. Chron.] at which time the Jews paid him 300 talents yearly for their tribute: yet they had no forreign Ruler set over them, but were governed by their High Priests, and according to the fashion of their country, [Sever. Sulpic. Sacr. Histor. lib. 2.]

3721. In this year, Ptolemei, the son of Lagus, surnamed Soter, died; after his joyning his son with him in the consortship of the kingdom, or the Epoch of the Dionysian account, 1 year, and almost 3 moneths after the death of Alexander the Great, 39 years and 4 moneths, or thereabouts (for which others reckon 40 full years; but [Clau. Ptol. in Reg. Can.] 39. years onely) when he had lived full 84 years, as [Lucian hath it in Macrobiis.] The countries and kingdoms which he held in his possession, are all contained, [Idyll. 17.] of Theocritus the Poet; as namely, Egypt, Phœnicia, Arabia, Syria, Lybia, Ethiopia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Lycia, Caria, and the Isles of the Cyclades. And the truth is, that he is said to have joyned in armes with Seleucus, against Demetrius, upon expresse conditions, that the dominion of all Asia should be to Seleucus, but Phœnice and Cœlosyria he would have to himself. But the Seleucians say, nay, but that Ptolemei entered into an association of armes against Antigonus, not to gain any thing thereby to himself; but onely to help Seleucus in the claim which he laid to Cœlosyria; and that, that, upon the death of Antigonus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, was it which cast Cœlosyria upon Seleucus, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 410.] Now although there be no doubt but that Phœnicia and Syria, as Theocritus also testifieth, did sometime belong to Ptolemei; and that he after the death of Antigonus, who had wrested them out of his hands, subdued Syria again to himself; as [Pausan. in Attic.] relateth: yet we have already shewed, that Tyre and Sidon, were in the possession of Demetrius Poliorcetes; and after his death, if not before, both those two places and all the rest of Syria, came into Seleucus his possession. 4431 283

Josephus, [lib. 12. cap. 2.] gives Ptolemeus Philadelphus 39 years of his reign, reckoning as it seemeth from the time, that he first reigned joyntly with his father: for after his fathers death, Clemens Alexandrinus gives him but 37 years, [Claud. Ptolemeus, in Reg. Can. 38.] and so do Porphrie, Eusebius, and others. Whereas, according to my accout, he reigned after his fathers deceale, 37 years and almost 8 moneths, but in all, 39 years, wanting one moneth. But how long soever he reigned, certain it is, that he put to death his younger brother Argæus, as guilty of conspiring his death, so did did he another brother of his, born of Euridice, as detected for solliciting the Isle of Cyprus to a revolt from him, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 6.] Whereby it seems, that he little deserved that specious name of Philadelphus, (i. e.) a lover of his brethren. Theocritus in his 17 Idyllion saith, that he had in his dominions 33339 Cities, and is said to have been of so great power, that he exceeded therein, his father Ptolemei the first: which Jerom confirmeth out of Histories, upon [Daniel, cap. 11.] and so doth Appianus Alexandrinus, out of the Records of the Kings of Egypt, in his preface to his History of the Romans, unto whom for this purpose we may adde, what Athenæus, [lib. 5. Deipnosoph. cap. 5.] relateth of his fleets, and the unmeasurable bignesse of his ships.

In the year 47 of the first Periode of Calippus, in the eighth day of the moneth Anthisterion, 465 years of Nabonassars account, the 29 day of the moneth Athyr, three howers before midnight, in the end of the 29 day of our January, after the Julian Calendar, Timochares observed at Alexandria. That the south part of the Moon covered the following part of the Virgilia's, to a third part or near half. [Ptolem. lib. 7. cap. 3.]

Lysimachus, now King both of Thrace and Macedon, being drawn thereto by the perswasion of his wife Arsinoe, (by whom he had also children born) murdered his son Agathocles; his eldest son, and whom he had ever designed to be his successor in his kingdom, and by whose conduct he had achieved so many glorious victories, but whether by poyson, or by the hand of Ptolemeus Ceraunus, brother to his said wife Arsinoe, I cannot say, [Strabo lib. 13. p. 623. Justin lib. 17. cap. 1. Pausan. in Attic. pag. 9. Memnons Excerpt. cap. 9.]

But having thus begun with his own son, he fell afterward to act the like upon his Nobles that were about him, for no other cause than for that they lamented the death of his son. Whereupon they which escaped his hands, and the Captains of his armies in all parts, fled away to Seleucus, [Justin Ibid.] and when upon these murders of his Nobles, all the people fell to have him in abomination, now not single persons onely, but whole Cities fell off from him, and revolted to Seleucus. [Memnon Ibid.]

Lysandra, the daughter of Ptolemeus Soter, and sister to Arsinoe, with her children begotten on her by Agathocles, and her brothers with her, fled away all to Seleucus; and with them Alexander also, another son of Lysimachus, but by the venter of Odryssias, another wife of his, fled also for company to him; all which coming to Babylon, joyned in petion to him, to make war upon Lysimachus, [Pausan. Ibid. with Appian in Syriac. pag. 130.]

At the same time also, one Philetærus a Paphlagonian born, and an Eunuch made, but one who had had good education in his youth, and whom Lysimachus had made keeper of all his treasure laid up in Pergamus, repining at the murder acted upon Agathocles, and therefore laid at by Arsinoe, who dayly accused him to Lysimachus, seized himself of the city Pergamus, which stands upon the river Caicus, and then sent to Seleucus, offering himself, and all the treasure which he there had under his charge, belonging to Lysimachus, to his disposing, and so holding in still with the strongest, and him that was next at hand, and bearing them in hand, with fair promises, and good offices, as occasion was offered, kept the Castle there, and principality of the place, 20 years long. [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 7. and 9. Strabo lib. 13. pag. 623. And Appianus in Syriac. pag. 129.] calls him, τὸν Περγάμου δυναστεύοντα, (i. e.) the Prince or Potentate of 4132 282
3722. Pergamus, but certain old [choines] in Huber. Goltsii Thesauro. have him, Regem, (i.e.) King: For indeed this was the man that was the founder of that new principality in Pergamus; being 60 years of age, as Lucian. in Macrobiis affirmeth of him.

In the year 48 of the first Periode of Calippus, on the 25 day of the moneth Pyanepsion, 466 year of Nabonassar, the seventh day of the moneth Thoth, three howres and one half before midnight, the ninth day of our November, Timochares at Alexandria observed the Conjunction of the moon with Spica Veneris, in the northern part thereof. [Cl. Ptolem. lib. 7. cap. 3.]

Antiochus, surnamed Soter, son of Seleucus Nicator, falling in love with Stratonice, his Stepdame, and one by whom his father had a son born, being conscious to himself, of the feditie of his own desire, neither attempted any thing upon her, nor disclosed ought of that which troubled him, but lay gnawing his sheets, and in that melancholy, would fain have died. But Leptines, a Mathematician, or as others say, one Erasistratus, a Physician, Aristotles grandchild by a daughter of his, and a disciple of Chrysippus, as Plinie hath it, [lib. 29. cap. 1.] to wit, of Chrysippus a Cnidian born, and by profession, a Physician likewise, as Laertius in the life of Chrysippus saith, though some others say he was a scolar under Theophrastus, as the same Laertius, in the Life of Theophrastus toward the end thereof noteth, against whose followers, going by the name name or sect of Erasistrataeans. Galen afterward wrote a book of Phlebotomie, or opening of a vein, yet extant; this Erasistratus therefore, sitting upon a time by Antiochus, observed, that at the coming in of Stratonice his colour ever rose, and his pulse beat high, and when she went away, he grew pale and wan again, and fetcht his breath short, and panted, found thereby what ailed him; and opened the matter to Seleucus: who thereupon was content to part with her, though most dearly beloved, to his son; and calling his army together, before them all, married her to his son. And whereas he had at that time 72 Provinces under him, he gave up the greater part of them, τὰ ἄνω ἔθνη, (i.e.) the upper provinces, which were all to the eastward of Euphrates, to his son, reserving to himself onely such countries as lay from the Euphrates westward, to the Mediterran sea, [Appian. in Syriac. with Valer. Max. Lib. 5. cap. 7. Plut. in Demet. Lucian. De Syria Dea. Galen. περὶ τοῦ προγινώσκειν, (i.e.) of foreknowing, and Julia in Misopogone.]

3723. Lysimachus, passing over into Asia, made war upon Seleucus. And this was the last battle fought between the Survivors of Alexander the Great: of which there were now already 34 extinct and dead, these two onely survived: This battle was fought in Phrygia, lying upon the Hellespont, περὶ Κόρου πεδίον: as we read, [in Porphyrie, in Grac. Euseb. Scaliger, pag. 228.] wherein Lysimachus, fighting very valiantly in his own person, and having lost many of his men, was struck thorough with a great Spear, by one of Heraclea, whose name was Malacon: and so having seen the death of fifteen of his children, before him, remained as it were the last stone of his house, to be pulled down, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 9. Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 9. Appian, in Syriac. pag. 128. 131. Justin, lib. 17. cap. 1. & 2. Oros. Lib. 3. cap. ult.] Appian saith, that he had then lived 70 years, Justin, and Orosius, 74. but Hieronymus Cardianus, the Historian, who then lived in great esteem, saith that he was at that time 80 years of age, as [Lucian, in Macrobiis,] reporteth out of him. 4433. 281.

When Lysimachus was fallen, a dog of his kept by the body, and beat off all birds and beasts from it: till at length one Thorax, of the country of Pharsalia, having long sought for it, found it out, when it was almost putrified, and knew it principally by his dog that lay by it; and Alexander his son by Odrysias, with much adoe, and after many entreaties, gat it of Lysandra, and carried it into the Chersonese of Thrace, and there buried it: his bones were afterward translated to the Temple in Lysimacia, by the Citizens of the place, and there laid up in an Urne: which Temple, went afterward by the name of Lysimachium, [Pausan. and Appia.]

When he was dead, his kingdom accrued to Seleucus, as an addition to his former Monarchie, [Memnon,] with which, so great a victory he much pleased himself: and the rather, for that he now saw himself the last alive of all that company, which went by the name of Alexanders fellows, or companions in armes; and a Conqueror of Conquerors, which he said, was a gift not of man, but of god himselfe, [Justin.]

The men of Heraclea in Pontus, hearing that Lysimachus was dead, and that he was slain by a country man of theirs, in the 84 year after that Clearchus had first usurped the Soveraignty over them, fell into a desire of recovering their native liberty, which after their town-born tyrants were extinct, Lysimachus had again taken from them; and in the recovery thereof, they shewed themselves right valiant men for Lysimachus, though upon the death of the two Brothers, Clearchus the second, and Oxathres, he restored their liberty to the Citizens for a while; yet afterward, thorough the importunity of his wife Arsinoe, he made war afresh upon them, which [Justin, lib. 17. cap. 3.] mentions; and having taken their City, he made one Heraclitus Cimaeus, a man wholy at Arsinoes devotion, Governour over them. After Lysimachus his death therefore, the men of Heraclea dealt with this Heraclitus, offering him not onely all security for his own person, but also a large summe of money to bear his charges on the way; provided onely, that he would be gone, and leave them in their pristin and native liberty. And he thereupon, grew into a rage, and commanded some of them away presently to be put to death: which the Citizens perceiving, and having formerly underhand agreed with the chief officers of the Garrison under him, to make them free of their City, and to pay them all their arreres which had been detained from them, fairely took Heraclitus himself, and put him in prison: where they kept him for a while; But seeing themselves anon after free from all danger, they demolished the Citadel, which Lysimachus had built upon them; and sending an Embassie to Seleucus, to satisfie him concerning what they had done, made one Phocritus, Superintendant or Curator of their State, [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 8. & 10.]

Zipaeus, a petty King of Bithynia, growing angry with the men of Heraclea, first for Lysimachus, and now for Seleucus his sake (for he was enemy to them both) made inrodes upon their land, and spared not for any mischief that he could do them; wherein neverthelesse his men scaped not scot-free: but received oft-times, as much damage them-themselves as they did hurt to them, [Ibid. cap. 11.]

Mean while, Seleucus sent one Aphrodisius to the Cities of Phrygia, and places adjoyning, to look to his profits and affairs there; who having dispatcht the businesse he was sent about, at his return, gave large commendations of other Cities, but laid made things to the Heraclians charge; especially, that they stood ill-affected to Seleucus himself: whereupon the King growing into choler, scorned the Embassie sent by them unto him; and used many rough and minatory speeches to them: but there was one of them, called Camælcon, who, nothing daunted therewith, spake to Seleucus in this wise, Sir, Hercules, Carron, (now Carron in the Dorian Dialect or language, signifies, him that is the strongest) which word, when Seleucus understood not, persisting in his former choler against them, turned away from them. Whereupon the Messengers that were sent, conceived that it was no boote for them, either to stay there, or to return home again; which tidings coming to Heraclea, they not onely fortified their City, the best they could of themselves, but also fell to procuring of forraign aides, and sent their Ambassadors to Mithridates King of Pontus, and to the States of Byzantium, and Chalcedon, to pray in aide of them, [Ibid. cap. 12.]

But those who were bannished and lived in exile from the state of Heraclea, met together, and came to an agreement among themselves, which was this. There was one Nymphidius, who perswaded them to labour for a restitution to their country; and told them it would be no hard matter to effect it, if they would desire restitution of what their ancestors had lost, in a fair, and not in a turbulent way: whereunto they were all easily perswaded; and when thereupon all things fell out happily, and succeeded according to their desires, it was hard to say, whether they that thus returned to their Country, or their Country which thus received them home again, were the gladder of it, for both they who returned, used the Citizens, who had expulsed them, very lovingly; and the Citisens suffered none of them to want for any necessarie and convenient means to live withall, and by this means they grew all into a body again, and returned into their pristine state of nobility and goverment, as they were before. [Ib.]

3724. Seleucus, purposing to end his dayes in his old and native Country of Macedonia, passed over the Hellespont, and going from thence to Lysimachia, espied by chance, a certain altar standing in a conspicuous place, and asked what the name of that altar 4434. 280.
was; it was told him, that it was called Argos. Now it is said, that he had been forewarned by an oracle, to beware of Argos. But he further asked, why it was called Argos, whether from the Argonautæ, which passed that way in elder time, when they went with Jason to Colchos, or from the Argivi, who went to the siege of Troy, or for that the great Argos, wherein Jason went, was there cast away in their return, or for that it was the Country of the Atridæ, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; and as he was thus questioning about the name of that altar, Ptolemeus Ceraunus, the son of Ptolemei the first, by his wife Euridice, and brother to Arsinoe the Relict of Lysimachus, standing behind him, ran him thorough with his sword, and slew him; having been his great benefactor, and who had ever borne him up, and maintained him, and who would never let him be from him. And so Seleucus within seven moneths after the death of Lysimachus, lost both the kingdome of Macedon, which he had taken from him, and his life withall.

Arrianus tells us, that Seleucus was the greatest man that was, after Alexander the Great, and the most nobly spirited of all the rest, and the extent of whose dominions, exceeded all others, [lib. de Reb. Alexand.] He died in the 43 year after the deceate of Alexander, the 32 year of the Grecian, or Seleucian Calendar, having spent in his life, as Appian sayes, 73 years, but as Justin intimates, 78. His body was buried by Philetærus the Potentate of Pergamus, which he redeemed out of Ceraunus his hand, with a great sum of mony; and having buried it in all solemn wise, sent his ashes to his son Antiochus, who receiving it, burned it in Seleucia, which stands upon the sea coast; adding a consecrated Chapel to his tomb, which, from his surname, was called Nicatorium, [Appian, in Syriac. pag. 129.] Justin tells us, that both he, and his sons, and grand-children after him, were all born with the signe of an anchor in one of their thighs, as a naturall badge and token of that race, [lib. 15. cap. 4.] And Ausonius in his book de Claris Urbins, (i. e.) of famous Cities, speaking of Antiochia, saith, [l. 2.]

——Illa Seleucum. &c.
She for her founder did Seleucus praise,
Who ware a native anchor in his thigh;
A true impresse of his nativity,
And cognisance on all his progenie.

But Polybius, [lib. 2 pag. 128.] notes, that Ptolemei the first, and Lysimachus, and Seleucus, and Ptolemæus Ceraunus, all died about the 124 Olymp. and that Ptolemei the

the first, died in the first year of it, and Lysimachus and Seleucus in the last: But Ceraunus died not till the later end of the first year of the Olympiade following: and whom therefore Polybius, mentioning again the concurrence of their deaths in the [same book, pag. 155.] seemeth of set purpose to have omitted.

Ceraunus, having thus murdered Seleucus, by the help of a swift horse, gat him to Lysimachia; where putting a Crown upon his head, and taking a fair guard about him, he went unto the army, where of pure necessity the army received him, and cryed, God save the King; who had but a little before, sworn fealty to Seleucus, [Memnon, Excerp. cap. 13.]

Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, the son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, hearing how Seleucus was murdered, made a journey into Macedonia, purposing to prevent Ceraunus in those parts, both by his land and sea Forces. But Ceraunus, having all Lysimachus his Fleet in a readinesse, drew out, and met him in right good array at sea: in which among other sorts, there were from Heraclea in Pontus sent him sundry vessels, some of six, some of five tire of oares, and such as were called Aphracta; and above all one of eight tire of oares, called the Leontifera, which for her great bulke, and exquisite building, was much admired by all that beheld her; for in her were an hundred oares, so that on each side there were 800 rowers, which made 1600 in all: and upon the upper deck or hatches, there were 1200 fighting men; under two special Commanders: insomuch, as when they came to graple, Ceraunus had by far the better of it; and Antigonus was fain to flee, with all his Navy, In this fight the ships from Heraclea, did best; and among them the Leontifera best of all. Antigonus therefore being thus routed, fled into Bœotia, and Ptolemæus Ceraunus went into Macedonia, where he remained quiet by the space of two years, [Ibid. cap. 14, 15.] to wit, one full year and five moneths, as Dexippus and Porphyrie, do more precisely relate this matter.

Ceraunus, growing now gracious in the eyes of the multitude, both in regard of his father Ptolemei the first of Egypt, and also for the revenge which he took of Lysimachus his death, endeavoured first, to take in, and make faire with Lysimachus his sons: and desired to marry Arsinoe their mother, and his own sister, bearing them in hand, that he would adopt them for his children; that so succeeding in their fathers room, they might, either in reverence of their own mother, or in regard that they were now to call him father, forebear attempting any thing against him. He also by his letters sought the love and friendship of his brother Ptolemæus Philadelphus King of Egypt, professing that he utterly forgat his losse of his fathers kingdom, and that he would never seek to get that from his brother, which he had already more fairely attained to, by getting it from an enemy. [Justin, lib. 17. cap. 2.] He made also a peace with Antiochus the son of Seleucus, whom he had murdered, [Id. lib. 24. cap. 1.]

Neither did he omit to sollicite Pyrrhus the King of Epirus to the same effect: supposing it would infinitely sway the scales, to which side soever he leaned. For as much as he also then lay at catch, to get any mans estate that lay in his way; and offered himself to any man that would make use of him. In which humor, being to aid the Tarentines in Italy against the Romans, he sent to borrow ships of Antigonus Gonatas, to transport his army into Italy, to Antiochus the son of Seleucus deceased, to borrow money, because he seemed to be better stored of money, than of men; and to Ptolemæus Ceraunus, to furnish him with some companies of souldiers out of Macedonia: and Ceraunus presently sent him 5 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse, and fifty Elephants; yet to serve him two years, and no longer. In requital of which favour, he took his daughter to wife, and left him Guardian and Protector of his kingdom of Epirus, during his absence; for fear, least while he was away, with the flower of his youth in Italy, some or other, might take advantage, and make a spoile thereof in his absence, [Id. lib. 17. cap. 2.]

Wherefore, leaving his son Ptolemei, whom he had by Antigone the daughter of Berenice, being but 15 years old, Governour of his kingdom, yet as it were under the tuition of the said Ptolemei Ceraunus King of Macedon, he took his journey, and with his army landed in the Port of Tarentum, now Otranto in Italy; taking with him his two younger sons, Alexander and Helenus, being very little ones, for his solace in so remote a war, [Id. lib. 18. cap. 1.] and never staying for the Spring, put over thither in the middest of Winter, as Zonaras reporteth, out of Dionysius Halicarnassæus in the 124 Olympiade, as [Polybius saith, lib. 2. pag. 129.] to wit, in the fourth and last year of that Olympiade.

Antiochus Soter, after his father Seleucus his death, held the kingdom of Syria 19 years. [Porphyrie, Eusebius, and Serv Sulpitius;] who when, with much adoe, and with many a battle fought, he had hardly recovered all his fathers Dominions: in the end, he sent an army under the command of Patrocles, to pass the mountain Taurus; and he chose him a Lieutenant, one Hermones, borne at Aspendus. Now Patrocles his purpose was, to set upon Heraclea, in the country of Pontus: but receiving satisfaction by an

Embassie which they sent unto him, he forbear proceeding any further against them, and making a firme league with them, turned his course, and passing thorough the country of Phrygia, came into Bithynia. But the Bithynians by an ambushment which they laid for him, cut off him, and his whole army, and utterly destroyed them; wherein yet Patrocles himself played all the parts of a most valiant man, and did with his own hand many exploits upon the enemy, [Memnon, Excerpt, cap.16.] and Zipætes the King of Bithynia, having thus destroyed Antiochus his army, built a City at the foot of the hill Lipatus, and called it after his own name, [Id. ibid. cap. 21.]

In the end of the fiftieth year of the first Periode of Calippus, being the 44 from the death of Alexander the Great, Aristarchus of Samos, took an observation of the Summer Solstice; and after that Meton did the like for 152 or 9 decades of years: as Cl. Ptolemæus in his book De anni Magnitudine, reporteth out of Hipparchus, [lib. 3. Syntax. cap. 2.]

Arsinoe, the Relict of Lysimachus, being married to her own brother, Ptolemæus Ceraunus, received him into her City of Cassandrea: and he presently, seizing upon the Castle there, took her two sons, which she had by Lysimachus, the one called Lysimachus of the age of 16 years, the other, Philippus, being but 3 years old, and slew them both in their mothers armes; and she her self rending her clothes and tearing her hair, was haled out of the gates of the City with two servants onely, and sent into banishment to the Isle of Samothracia, [Iustin, lib. 24. cap. 2. & 3. Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 15.]

725. In the beginning of the second year after Pyrrhus his arrival in Italy, the Galls invaded Greece, [Polyb. lib. 1. pag. 6.] for they, dividing their whole army into three parts, and allotting to every part, their work to do; one fell in upon the Thracians and Triballi, under the conduct of Cerethrius; the second upon Pannonias, under Brennus and Acichorius; the third upon Macedon and Illyrium, under Belgius, [for so Iustin, lib. 24. cap. 5. and lib. 25. cap. 2. calls him] not Bolgius, as Pausanias names him, [Pausanias, in Phocicis.] 4435. 279.

Ptolemæus Ceraunus, with a small company, and they not all of the best marshalled neither, (as if wars were as easily waged, as murders are committed) driven on with the furies of his wicked minde, went out against Belgius; and when the King of the Dardans offered to aid him against these new-come Galls, with 20 thousand men, he would none of them: and when the Galls sent Messengers to him, offering him peace for money, he sent them back word, that he would not give them peace, unlesse they delivered their armes, and the principal of their army, for hostages of their good abearing unto him. So to it they went, and the Macedons not able to endure the impression of the Galls, fled before them: Ptolemei himself being sorely wounded, and the Elephant on which he rode, being also wounded, and thereupon grown unruly, was cast off his back, and taken by the Galls, and by them torne in pieces; his head cut off, and being taken upon the point of a Spear, was carried about for a terrour to the enemy. Few of the Macedons escaped; the rest were either slain or taken prisoners, [Iustin, lib. 24. cap. 4, 5. lib. 23. cap. 2. with Memnons Excerpt. cap. 15. Diod. Sic. lib. 22. Sec. 3. Pausanias in Phoc. pag. 335.]

After Ptolemei, in the kingdom of Macedon, succeeded his brother Meleager; and him the Macedons, after two moneths space, ejected, as a man unworthy of the place; and put in Antipater, the son of Philip, who was brother to Cassander; of whom, [Iustin, lib. 12. cap. 14.] maketh mention: and whom they nicknamed the Etesian, because he continued in the place but 45 dayes, for thereabouts it is, that the Etesian winds used upon that coast to blow every year, and no more, [Porphyr. in Græc. Euseb. pag. 228.]

Brennus, (who, some say, was by birth a Prausian, as we read in [Strabo, lib. 4. pag. 187.] hearing of this great victory gotten by Belgius, fretting in himself, to see that he had letten slip out of his hands so faire an opportunity, of getting so great a Proie, as the whole riches of the East: gathered together 150 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse of his Galls, and marched in all haste into Macedonia, Iustin, lib. 24. cap. 6.] but coming into the country of the Dardans, a people in Illyrum, was forced to stay there, by reason of a mutiny which rose in his army: for to the number of 20 thousand of his men, (which number Suidas also, in the word Galatæ hath) with Leonorius and Lutarius their Captains, fell from him, and went away into Thracia; and what with fighting, what with selling peace to those that would buy it of them, came at length to Byzantium: and having for a while wasted the country of Propontis, and making it tributary to them, possessed themselves at last, of all the Cities in those parts, [Liv. lib. 38.]

726. Sosthenes, a chief man in Macedonia, gathering together the youth and lusty gallants of the country, made head against those Galls that there were, and quelled them in many encounters, and defended the country from their further plundrings. For 4436. 278.

which great service, when many of the Nobles there strove for the kingdom, he being a man of obscure place and parentage, and of no Royal blood, was yet perferred before them all; and when they would have made him King, he refused it, and made them take their oath to him, as to their Captain or Commander onely, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 5.] and in that capacity, he governed that country two years, [Porphyrie and Euseb.]

When Brennus came into Macedonia, and there fell to spoiling and ravaging of the Country, Softhenes met him with his army; but so few as they were against so many, and heartlesse against men grown haughty upon so many victories, the Macedons were quickly overthrown, and fled to their Cities; where whilest they kept themselves, not daring to peep out, Brennus with his army, overran and plundred all the Country, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6.]

Leonorius and Lutarius, getting by a trick, into Lysimachia, and possessing themselves entirely of the Chersonese there, came down from thence into Hellespont, and there finding how little a cut it was over into Asia, had a great mind to passe over into it; and sent their Agents to Antipater the Governour of Hellespont, to treate with him about their passage, [Liv. lib. 38.]

Zipætes having now reigned in Bithynia, full 48, and lived 76 years, died, leaving four sons: the eldest of which, was called Nicomedes, who succeeded his father in the kingdom, and proved to his brothers, not a brother, but a butcher, [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 21.] but the younger who was called Zipætes, and whom [Liv. lib. 38.] calleth Zibœas, held the sea coast of Bithynia, which went by the name of Thracia Thyniaca, al. Asiatica, [Ib. cap. 18.]

Now, when after Zipætes his death, Antiochus Soter prepared to make war upon Bithynia, Nicomedes sent and prayed in aid of the City of Heraclea; promising to do the like for them, if they ever happened to stand in need of him: whereupon they sent him aid at that present; and by this occasion they afterward, though with great expence of monies, recovered Cierus and Tius, and the land of Thinis: But when they went about to recover the City and Territory of Amestris, (which had also been taken from them) and spared neither for war nor money to recover it: Eumenes who held it, as Governour onely, chose for very spight to give it up to Ariobarzanes the son of Mithridates, then King of Pontus, gratis, rather than to render it to the State of Heraclea, upon any termes, [Ibid. cap. 17.]

Brennus, and Acichorius, with the Illyrians (as Appianus in Illyricis telleth us) whom they call Autarians, and Celts, whom they call Cimbrians, left Macedonia, and went into Greece, with an army of 152000 Foot, and 20400 Horse, every of which Horse had two footmen attending on him, they on horseback likewise, to help their Masters, if occasion were, and to supply his place, if he happened to be slain: but, when they went to plunder the Temple at Delphos, they were terribly beaten off with Thunder and Lightening, with Earthquakes, and with the sinking of the ground under them in the Mount Olympus, and with bitter Frost and Snow, being then the Winter Season, and miserably distressed in all kinds: and they which were slain by the sword of the Phocenses themselves, were little lesse than six thousand men. There fell upon them likewise, a panick fear; and by a Frost falling in a night, they lost upward of ten thousand more, and as many more perished of very hunger in the place. Brennus their Leader, vexed with the wounds which he had received in his body, and for very shame of such his overthrow, having first swill'd himself with drink, fell upon his own sword and died: and Acichorius, seeing how the heads of this war were punished, gat him hastily, with a company of 10 thousand poor maimed souldiers out of Greece; but the continual stormes of rain and snow, with bitter frosts and famine, and which was worst of all, perpetual waking, utterly consumed the reliques of this unlucky army; and all nations thorough which they passed in their return, fell upon them as they went, here and there scattered, and made a proy of them, [Pausan. in Phoc. & Attic. Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6, 7, 8. Eclog. Diodor. lib. 22. Sec. 13. Appian. Illyr. pag. 758.] which calamity Polybius, [lib. 2. pag. 108.] notes to have befallen them, year 2. of the 125 Olympiade, and when Anaxicrates was Lord Chancelor of Athens, [Pausan in. Phoc. pag. 340.]

As for those of Illyrium, called Autarians, which escaped this misfortune, when they came home into their own country, they found themselves there pestered with such a multitude of frogs, sent upon them, that they corrupted the very Rivers with their putrefaction; and then a vapour rising out of the earth after them, bred a pestilence thoroughout all the Country, till they were fain to flee from their native soile; but carrying the plague along with them, no Country would receive them, and so were they fain to go on 23 daies journey, till they came into the countrey of the Basturnians, and there they built them cities to dwell in, moreover it is said that the land of the Celts, was plagued with Earthquakes, and in them whole Cities swallowed

lowed up; and that these plagues still followed them, till at last they also were forced to leave their habitation, and went wandring till they came to the Country of the Illyrians, who were partakers with them in their action at Delphos: and them, as being already consumed with the plagues, they easily overcame, but taking the infection there by medling with their goods, they were fain again to be gone from thence, and wandred still, till they came to Pyrene, [Appian. ut. sup.] of all which horrid, strange, and miraculous plagues and punishments falling upon these Galls and others formerly mentioned, or hereafter to be mentioned, for their sacrilegious acts committed against their Idols, we may truly say, and must confesse, that to be most true, which the wise man saith of them, who sware falsely by them, That it was not the power of them by whom they sware, nor of them, whom these thus robbed, but the just vengeance of sinners, from the true God, which punisheth alwayes the offences of the ungodly, [Wisd. cap. 14. v. ult.]

As for the Cordistæ, who were a part of these Galls, which attempted the plundering of Delphos, tis said, that one Bathanasius their Captain, seated them near the bank of the river Ister, from whom it is, that the way by which they returned, was afterward called Bathanasius his way, as Athenæus tells us, [lib. 6. cap. 4.] which are the same Galls, which Strabo calls, the Scordisci, seated upon the Ister, and they put these Autarians, or Autoriates, from their possession, which they had there gotten, [lib. 7. pag. 293; 296, 313, 317, 318.]

And now for those Galls, who as I said before, went out of Thrace, down to the streit of Hellespont, upon a discord raised among them, Leonorias, with the greater part of his men, returned to Byzantium, from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedons, who were sent by Antipater, to him, as spies upon him, under the colour of Ambassadors, five ships, which he used to transport his men by some and some, day and night, till he had landed them all in Asia, [Livie. lib. 38.]

And now to return to where we left, the war growing between Zipætes, the Bithynian, and the state of Heraclea, Zipætes got the victory of them, but succours coming to them from other parts, Zipætes was fain to fly; whereupon the Heraclians, getting the bodies of their slain, burnt them, and carryed their bones into the City, and laid them up in their charnel howses, as the bones of men, who among others had excellently well deserved of their Country, [Memnons Excerpt. cap. 18.]

About the same time, Antiochus Soter, and Antigonus Gonatas, making each of them great provisions for war, one against the other, Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, sided with Antigonus; but others with Antiochus, Antiochous therefore, forbearing Antigonus for the present, marched first against Nicomedes, whereupon he was fain to gather what aides he could from other parts, and among the rest sent to his friends the Heracleans, and got from them 13 ships, of three tire of oares a piece, and then went to encounter Antiochus upon the sea, and their fleets met indeed, but having stood at gaze a while, and looking onely one upon another, each party drew off again, and so nothing was done between them that time. [Ib. cap. 19.]

They of Byzantium, wearied out with the continuall incursions and plundrings of the Galls, sent their Ambassadors about to their friends, and got of the Heracleans a thousand, some say, four thousand Crowns; and not long after, Nicomedes dealt with these Galls, and upon termes, procured them to come to his help in Asia; which terms were these: That they should for ever continue firm and fast friends to Nicomedes, and his heirs. That without his privity and consent, they should lend no helping hand to any that by Embassies should implore their aide in their wars, but should be friends to his friends, and foes to his foes. Item, That they should help them of Byzantium, if occasion were. Item, That they should maintain league and friendship with the Tianians, and Heracleans, and Chalcedonians, and Cierians, and some other States, which had other nations under their jurisdiction, [Ib. cap. 20, 21.] and so Leonorius, by the means of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, put over from Byzantium into Asia side. [Livie lib. 38. Strabo lib. 12. pag. 566.] Now this passage of the Galls into Asia, Pausan. in Phoc. [p. 340.] tells us, was in the third year of 125 Olymp.

Neither yet were they of Byzantium hereby quite rid of those plundring Galls, for some of those who were at Delphos with Brennus, and escaped that danger, came into Hellespont under their Captain Comontorius, and they had no mind to go any further, but liking well of the Country which lay about Byzantium, there sate them down, and having conquered the Thracians, and made Tyla the head City of their kingdom, put Byzantium into as great a fear of an utter ruine, as they were in before, [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 313.

3727. Ptolemeus Philadelphus, being a great favourer of learning, and all liberall arts and sciences, built a most famous library at Alexandria, in that quarter of the City which was called Brachium; and having committed the care of getting books of all sorts, and out of all Countries, to Demetrius Phalereus, upon his advise, he also sent to have the holy writings of the Jews to be translated out of Hebrew into Greek by 72 inter- 4437. 277.

preters,

preters, in the seventh year of his reign, as Epiphanius in his book, de mensuris & ponderibus, (i. e.) of weights and measures, reporteth, of which Tertullian, [cap. 18. Apologet.] thus writeth: The most learned King, saith he, of all the Ptolemeis, surnamed Philadelphus, and most exquisitely seen in all kind of litterature; studying, as I conceive, to outgo Philistratus in the matter of libraries, among all other monuments, which either antiquitie or curiosity could afford, for the eternizing of a mans fame to posteritie, by the advise and setting on of Demetrius Phalereus, a most excellent scholar, and humanition in those dayes, whom he had set over that work, desired of the Jews to have their books also.

And verily that this Ptolemei, if ever any King, was infinitely addicted to the studies of humane learning, is confirmed by Phylarchus, vouched by Athenæus, [lib. 12. cap. 17. Deipnos.] which is more fully delivered by Vitruvius, in his preface to his book of Architecture, where he sheweth, that having finished his great library at Alexandria, he instituted certain games in honour of Apollo and the Muses: whereunto he invited, all writers in the common arts and sciences, (as others were wont to do, wrestlers and the like) to put in for the prize; and appointed great rewards to them who were found to excell, and surpasse the rest in them, and shewed how he entertained Zoilus, surnamed Homeromastyx, (i. e.) the scourge of Hmer, when he came unto him.

For this collection of books, Aristotle shewed him the way, for he at his death, left his library to Theophrastus, and Theophrastus by his last will and testament, which we find in [Diog. Laertius,] left it to Nileus Scepsius, [Strabo. lib. 13. pag. 608. Plut in Sylla.] and from him Ptolemei bought them, besides others which he bought at Athens and Rhodes; and brought them all to Alexandria, as Athenæus, [lib. 1. cap. 1.] teacheth us, though Strabo and Plutarch in the places above mentioned; and Atheneus himself elsewhere, to wit, [lib. 5. cap. 11.] say, that Theophrastus his books, and with them all Aristotles library, came to the hands of Neleus his heirs, and were by his successours, and long after in the dayes of Sylla, sold for a great sum of mony, to one Apellicon the Teian.

Keeper of this great library after Demetrius Phalerus, (who was not onely a great Grammarian, for which only Tertullian commends him, but also a singular Philosopher, and one who had been formerly a great States-man, and an excellent Governour in Athens) was one Zenodotus of Ephesus, (the first Corrector of Homers books) as Suidas sayes, and after him Aristophanes, who with great deligence and industry, read over all the books of that great library, in order as they stood; as Vitruvius in his forementioned Preface to his book of Architecture affirmeth. But this was afterward: and therefore to return to the time we are now upon. Aristæas in his Treatise of the 70 interpreters, and after him Josephus, lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 2. and Euseb. lib. 8. de Præpar. Evangel. speak,] as followeth.

Demetrius Phalereus, being upon a time asked by King Ptolemei, how many Myriads or ten thousands of books he had gotten together, answered, about 20 Myriades, but hoped ere long, to make them 50 Myriades, which number of 200000 books, since we find, not onely in Aristæas, which we now have, but also in those Copies which Josephus and Eusebius heretofore used, that that lesser sum of 54800, found in Epiphanius, who wrote long after them, is in no wise to be admitted.

Demetrius Phalereus advised the king, as I said before, to ask those sacred writings of the Jews; but Aristæas, who was an attendant about him, at that time, advised him, for the purchasing of them, to set all the Jews, who were then slaves in Egypt at liberty, and send them home; and it is said that the number of them came to 10 Myriades, (i.) one hundred thousand soules: and in our copy of Aristæas, it is said: that every one of them cost the King 20 drachmaes, or 120, as it is in Josephus: now 120 drachmaes, make 30 sicles, or stateres, or tetradrachmaes in silver, which was the full price of a slave in [Exod. c. 21. 32.] at which rate our Saviour also, what time, for our sakes, he took the form of a slave upon him in the flesh, was sold by Judas the traitor, now those 20 drachmaes which we find in our Aristæas, being multiplied by 10 Myriades (i.) 100 thousand amount to 2000000 drachmaes, which again being divided by 6000 which make just an Attick talent, make 333⅓ Attick talents; now the price which Ptolemei payed to redeem the Jews from their masters, came to above 400 talents, both by Josephus his and also by our Aristæas his account: because it is said that there were above 10 Myriades paied. In which redemption of the Jewish slaves from their masters the like price was paied for every sucking child of them, together with the mothers which they suckt on over and above, whence it is that Josephus saies that Ptolemei paid in this kind, upward of 460 talents, in stead of which our vulgar editions of Aristæas have 660 talents.

Of these Jews Ptolemei took the younger sort and ablest of them into his army, and of the rest, such as he thought fit, he emploied in his private affaires, as in his letters to Eleasar the High Preist, himself affirmeth, for which one true letter of the Kings,

Epiphanius

Epiphanius giveth us two forged ones, far different both in stile, and meaning, from that which we find in Aristæas, and Josephus, the latter of which beginneth thus, θησαυ᾽ ϰ κατωρυγμένε. &c. (i. e.) of a treasure that is hidden, and of a fountaine sealed up, what profit is there? whereas in the greek one attributed to the king, who doth not perceive a manifest Hebraisme, and that taken out of Ecclesiast. [c. 20.30.] wisedome if it be hidden, and a treasure unseen, what profit is there of either of them?

But together with that Epistle, he sent also rich presents to the use of the Temple at Jerusalem, by Andræas, and Aristæas his two servants, to be delivered to Eleasar the High Preist, as namely, a golden table of two cubits long, (and an half, as Josephus addeth) and no lesse than half a cubit thick, all of solid gold, and not covered over onely with plates of gold; with 20 goblets of like gold, and 30 of silver, for the making of all which, he allowed over and above, 50 talents weight of gold, and 70 of silver, and precious stones to the number of 5 thousand, so that these stones amounted in the value of them, to five times as much as the gold which he sent, came unto, and the workmanship theseunto belonging, besides all which he sent 100 talents for sacrifices and other uses of the Temple.

Eleasar the Priest, receiving these presents, out of every tribe, (for that after the captivity there remained some of 10 tribes of the twelve, I shewed before in the year of the World 3468. c.) he chose six principall men, most eminent above all others, for ripenesse of age, for nobility, for learning and experience; which should translate Gods Law, out of Hebrew into Greek; the particular names of the which 72 elders are expressely delivered by Aristæas; the last of which called Ezekiel, I conceive to be none other but him, whom Eusebius in the ninth book, de Præpart. Evangel. reporteth to have written a Tragedie of the bringing forth, or deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt; for the very name of Ezekiel sheweth, that he was of the Jewish race, and not a Greek, as Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, thought he was.

Eleasar also wrote back a letter to the King, the beginning whereof, as we find in Aristæas, was this, Αὐτὸς τι ἔῤῥωσο, (i. e.) God save you, or as Eusebius, more rightly, Εἰ αὐτὸς τε ἔῤῥωσαι, &c. (i. e.) If your self are well, and the Queen Arsinoe your sister, all is well, and as we desire it should be: for Philadelphus, after the death of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus King of Thrace and Macedon, by whom he had Ptolemeus Euergetes, and Berenice (of whom more in their proper places) married a second Arsinoe, his own sister, which after the death of Lysimachus her first husband was married to Ptolemeus Ceraunus her own brother, but she dyed, before she bare any child to Philadelphus, on whom he so doted, that he called a province in Egypt, Arsinoitis, after her name, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 7.] and made her a statue of Topaz stone, four cubits high, and consecrated her in a Temple, which was called the golden Temple, [Plinie lib. 17.*c.*8.] and by his appointment, Dinocrates the Architect, set him to make an archroof over her, all of load-stone, to the end, that an image of her made of Iron, might cleave thereto, and seem there to hang in the air, [Id. lib. 14. cap. 14.] of which Dinocrates, Ausonius in his 9 Idyllion, speaking, saith;

> Jussus ob incesti qui quondam fœdus amoris, &c.
> (i. e.) Who for a monument of incestuous love,
> By Ptolomeis command did make to hang,
> Arsinoe in the air of an Egyptian kirk.

These 72 interpreters entering into Alexandria, presented the King with such things as Eleasar had sent unto him, together with sundry parchments, wherein the law was written, with golden letters, in the language of the Jews, all curiously written, and the parchments so joyned together, that the seaming of them could not be discerned by the eye of man: and it fell out, that they came thither at a time, when news came to him of a great victory gotten by him at sea against Antigonus, of which sea fight, for want of writers in that time, I find no mention made in any other place but this, for I can no wayes approve their judgement, who refer it to that time, when Antigonus Gonatas making war upon the Athenians, besieged their Cities by sea and land, which we find by Iustin, [Lib. 26. and by Pausan, in Laconic.] was not till after the death of Pyrrhus, and before the death of Aretas, or Areus the first King of Lacedemon, which was between the years 4447, and 4450, according to the Julian account: for allbeit that Areus with his land forces, and Patrocles with Ptolemeis fleet, came at that time to the succour of the Athenians, yet seeing that Areus returned home without any battle fought, Pausanias shewes, that Patrocles did nothing neither for their relief. [In Attic. pag. 7. and in Laonic. 87.]

But concerning our 72 interpreters, Ptolemei to entertain them, feasted them seven dayes, or as Josephus hath it, 12 dayes, in a most sumptuous and magnificent manner, and afterward appointed one Dorotheus to take care of them, and to supply them with with all necessaries, not letting them want for any thing, for their table or otherwise. And the King himself would now and then put them questions, some concerning affairs of State, some of morality; whereunto they extempory made him very prudent and well advised answers: as we find in Aristeas, who took all that he wrote out of the Kings Diaries, or Day-books; then caused he three talents to be given to each of them and the boy that carried them.

Three dayes after, one Demetrius walking along the causway, called the Heptastadium, that is a mile, wanting one furlong, with the Interpreters, led them over the bridge into the Isle of Pharos, and there placed them in a goodly house, upon the north shoar of the Island, and far off from any noise or tumult; and they there set themselves every man to his work of the Translation, most exactly fitting it to the meaning of the Original: which done, Demetrius caused it to be fairely exscribed: every day they sate at it till three of the clock in the afternoon; and then went and took their repast: having all things abundantly provided for them, and especialy their diet, of the same kind that was provided for the Kings own table, did Dorotheus see them furnished withal, by the Kings appointment. Moreover, every morning very early, they came to Court, and there having bid the King good-morrow, returned to their place: and there having washt their hands, as their manner was, and said their prayers, they set themselves to read, and to interpret from point to point; But Epiphanius, varying herein from Aristeas and Josephus, writes that they were put into 36 cells; to wit, two together in every one of them; and there continued from break of day, to the very evening; and that then they were put into 36 boats, (i. e.) two into a boat, and so brought back to the Kings Palace, and there eate of the Kings diet: in the former part of which Narration, he followeth I know not whom; but in the latter, it seems, is led by their Fables, which dream't that the causway of 7 furlongs was not made, at least not finished, till Cleopatraes time.

And it so fell out, that this work of the 72 Interpreters was finished in 72 dayes, as if it had been so cast by them of set purpose; which done, Demetrius calling all the Jews together in the place where it was done, read it all over in the presence of the Interpreters themselves: and they as the authors and finishers of so great a good, were highly commended and magnified by all the Jews there present; Demetrius also himself wanted not his share of praises among them: and they besought him, that he would deliver a copy of the law, so translated to their Rulers. And when it had been all read over to them, then the Priests and Elders of the Interpreters, and the Magistrates and Officers of the Jews, stood up and said, Forasmuch as this Interpretation is religiously, and in every point accurately performed, it is requisite and fit, that it should stand as it is, and that no alteration be made in it. And when all approved that saying of theirs, with a great acclamation, then Demetrius required to lay a great curse (as the manner was) upon any man that should offer to alter it, by adding any thing thereto, or taking any thing therefrom.

And when all had been in like manner read over to the King, he infinitely admired the wisdom of the Legislator; and commanded all possible care to be taken of those Books, and that they should be religiously laid up and kept. He also desired the Interpreters themselves, that after their return home, they would not faile to come often to him again; and gave to every of them, three faire Gownes, two Talents of Gold, a Cup of one whole Talent, and the full furniture of a Chamber.

And moreover, to Eleazar the High Priest, he sent by them, ten beds with Silver feet, and rich furniture thereunto belonging: a Cup of 30 Talents, ten Raiments, with Scarlet, and a Crown richly wrought, and about one hundred pieces of Linnen, as fine as Silke; and withal, Viols, and Mazers, and two golden Goblets, to sacrifice withal; and by his letters desired him, that if any of these men had at any time a desire to come and visit him, he would not hinder them; for that he infinitely desired to converse with such kind of men, and chose to spend his money upon them rather than any other way.

The Galls, which were left by Brennus, when he went into Greece, to keep Macedon, least they should seem to sit idle, whiles their fellows were at work, fitted out 15 thousand Foot, and 3 thousand Horse, and set upon the Getes, and the Triballi, and routed them, [Justin, lib. 25. cap. 1.]

3728. Antigonus Gonatas, having lost a battle at sea, as was said before, by Ptolemei Philadelphus his men, made a peace with Antiochus Soter, as Justin, shewes, [lib. 25. cap. 1.] and went into Macedonia, where his father Demetrius Poliorcetes had sometimes reigned, and which himself, coming to it in the tenth year after his first being King of Greece, held 34 years, [Porphyrie, in Græc. Eusebia. pag. 229.] whose Heirs continued Kings there down to Perseus; in whom, being overcome by the Romans, the kingdom of Macedon, was extinct, [Plut. in Demetrius.] | 4138 | 270

The Galls, having overcome the Getes and the Triballi, sent their Ambassadors to

Antigonus

Antigonus the King of Macedon, to offer him peace for his money; but withal to spie his army, and the manner of his Camp: These Antigonus entertained and feasted in sumptuous manner: but the Galls seeing the infinite store of Silver and Gold set forth for the feast, for greedinesse thereof, returned more his enemies than they came. And thereupon resolved with one accord to set upon him: but he having got an incling of their coming, gave order that every man should take with him what he could, and lie close in a wood adjoyning: the Galls came on, and taking what they there found, turned away to the sea side; where, whiles they were busie in rifling the ships, the Marriners, and a part of the army which was thither fled with their wives and children to save themselves, set upon them unawares, and slew them, and made such havock of them, that the reputation thereof secured Antigonus from thence forward, not only from the Galls, but also from all the nations round about him. [Justin lib. 25. cap. 1. & 2.]

Now as touching those Galls, who under their 17 Commanders, the chief whereof were Leonorius ond Lutarius afore named, passed over it several times into Asia, they all came again into one body, and offered their assistance to Nicomedes against Zibæas, al. Zibetus the younger, who held the coast of Bithynia lying upon the sea; by these, and others which came from Heraclea in Pontus, was poor Zibetus crusht to pieces; and so Bithynia came all into the hands of Nicomedes. But the Galls having wasted that Country all over, shared the spoile thereof among themselves; and then dividing the kingdom between them and Nicomedes, called their portion thereof, by the name of Gallogracia. [Livie lib. 38. Justin. lib. 25. cap. 2. Memnon Excerpt. cap. 20.]

Of 20 thousand men that they were, there were not above 10 thousand armed; yet they struck such a terror into all the Nations and Countries on this side the Taurus; that as well the places which they went not to, as those they did go to, far and near, all submitted to them. And whereas they consisted of three nations of their own, to wit, the Tolistobogians, al. the Tolistoboians, (coming, as was thought, from the Galls, which were called the Boii) the Trocmi, and the Tectosagi, they divided all Asia between them, according to the severall parts thereof, where they planted themselves: to the Trocmies lot, fell Hellespont, and all that coast: Eolia and Ionia, fell to the Tolistobogii, and the Tectosagi possessed the inland or middle part of Asia; but they made their chief seat upon the bank of the river Halys, [Liv. lib. 28, and Suidas in the word Galata.]

Of this passing of the Galls out of Europe into Asia, Demetrius Byzantius wrote 13 books, as [Laert. in the Life of Demetrius Phalerius] sayes, which one Phaennis, who lived a whole age before this fell out, is said by way of oracle to have foretold, in these words,

Δὴ τότ' ἀμειψάμενος, &c. (i.e.)
The Galls shall passe the streight of Hellespont,
And ravage all the land of Asia;
Yet worser things hath God in store for them,
Who on the sea coast of that land do dwell.

In the 126 Olympiade, Eratosthenes Cyrenæus, the son of Aglai, or, as others, of Ambrosius, was born. He was a scolar of Aristo Chius the Philosopher, and of Lysanias of Cyrene the Grammarian, and of Callimachus of Cyrene a Poet, [Suidas, in the word Eratosthenes.]

3730. Curius Dentatus, this year fought with Pyrrhus in Italy: and having slain 23 4440 274 thousand of his men, and taken his Camp, made him retreat to Tarentum. [Eutrop. lib. 2.]

When the Ambassadors, which Pyrrhus had sent to the Kings of Asia, and to Antigonus Gonatas, to help him with men and money, and they returned without either, to him; he called the Princes of the Epirotes and Tarentines together, and, suppressing the letters, told them, that supplies would come very speedily. But when the fame hereof came among the Romans in their Camp, and that there were great supplies coming to him out of Macedon and Asia both, that report held them quiet from attempting any thing more upon him, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 11.] But Pyrrhus, never telling why, made as if he would remove with his army from Tarentum. Mean while, willed his confederates to provide for war, and committed the keeping of the Castle at Tarentum to his son Helenus, and to one of his Nobles, whose name was Milo. [Justin lib. 25. cap. 3.] and when he had spent six whole years in the war in Italy and Sicilie, and lost many of his men, and had no hope left, of doing any good, he returned into Epirus, with those eight thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, which he had left. [Plut in Pyrr.]

Curius

Curius in his Consulship triumphed of Pyrrhus; and was the first that brought Elephants (four in number) to be seen in Rome, [Eutrop. lib. 2.] nor did the people behold any thing in that triumph more willingly, than those beasts with turrets on the backs of them, and which they were so much afraid of: which very beasts seemed to have a sense of their captive condition, by holding down their heads, as they followed the victorious horse in the triumph, [Florus, Rer. Rom. lib. 1. cap. 18.] which triumph, was made in the moneth of Jan. or Febr. as is gathered out of the Marble fragments of the Records of their Triumphs.

Pyrrhus, getting some of the Galls to joyn with him, made some inroads upon Macedonia, where Antigonus Gonatas then reigned. And having gotten many Cities, and two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolting to him, and his hopes still encreasing, he marched directly against Antigonus himself to bid him battle; and put him with all his Forces, Macedons and Galls, to flight. Of which Galls who brought up the reare, and fought that day very manfully, many were cut in pieces, and died in the place; and the Captains of the Elephants, being distressed by the enemy, yeilded themselves and Elephants unto him. The Macedon Foot standing amazed at this overthrow, and hearing Pyrrhus calling upon them all in general, and upon their Captains, and chief Officers by name, to yeild unto him, left Antigonus, and fell to him; and when Antigonus saved himself by flight, Pyrrhus pursued him to the sea side, [Plut. in Pyrrho. Pausan. in Attic. pag. 11, 12.]

After this victory so gotten, Pyrrhus took the richest and fairest spoiles of the Galls, and hung them up in the Temple of Pallas of Itonia, which is between Phera, & Larissa: and brought all the upper Macedonia and Thessalie into his subjection, [Id. ibid.] and as if this had made him amends for Italy and Sicily, which he reckoned he had lost, sent for his son Helenus from the Castle of Tarentum where he had left him, [Justin, lib. 25. cap. 3.]

When Pyrrhus had spoiled the City Egeas, which was the Royal Seat of the late Kings of Macedon, and where they lay buried, he left there the Galls who had followed him in this war, to keep it, who when they had heard by some, that in the Tombs of the Kings which there lay, there was great store of treasure hid, according to the fashion of old times, they brake down the Tombs themselves, and took away such wealth as was in them; threw their bones about the streets, and basely trampled them under their feet, But Pyrrhus, though finding that by that act of theirs, he himself was ill spoken of among the Macedons, yet blamed he not them therefore openly, knowing what need he had of them in his wars, [Plut. ib. Diodor. lib. 22. in the Excerpt. by Vales. pag. 266.]

Antigonus, with some few Horse that followed him, came to Thessalonica, there to attend the event of things, and what would become of Macedonia, now he had lost it: purposing to put for it again, by the help of such mercenary Galls as he had taken into his pay. But being a second time utterly defeated by young Ptolemei, Pyrrhus his son, with seven onely in his company, he skulkt up and down, seeking no longer now to recover his kingdom, but to save his own skull, [Justin, lib. 25. cap. 3.] And Pyrrhus reproached him, calling him an impudent fellow, for that, notwithstanding the condition he was in, yet he would not get him a cloak to wear, as other Grecians did, but contiued still in his Scarlet Robe, [Plut. ut sup.]

3731. In the year when Caius Fabius Licinius, and Caius Claudius Caninas, were Consuls of Rome, Ptolomæus Philadelphus, hearing of the great overthrow of Pyrrhus by the Romans, and how they began to grow in the world, sent his Ambassadors, with presents from Alexandria to Rome, and made a league and covenant with them, [Eutrop. lib. 2. Liv. lib. 14. Dio. in Excerpt. Legatio. published at Rome by Fulvio Ursino, and Jo. Zonar. Chron. lib. 2.] and the Romans being glad to see that so great a King as he was, thus sought their friendship; sent likewise their Ambassadors to him: to wit, Q. Fabius Gurges, Cn. Fabius Pictor, and Quin. Ogulnius. These, having received rich presents from the King, as soon as they came home, and before they went to yeild an account of their Embassie to the Senate, went and gave up all that ever they had received from him into the Treasury; rightly conceiving, that out of a publick service for the Common-wealth, they ought not to reape any benefit of their well-doing, save onely praise and honour; but all was restored to them again, not onely by a Decree of the Senate, but allso by the general vote of the people; and the Questors were commanded, to go and deliver to every of them his own again. So that in this one thing, the bounty and magnificence of Ptolemei, the sincerity of the Ambassadors, the equity of the Senate, and whole people of Rome, had every of them the praise due and belonging to them, [Diod. ut. sup. Valer. Max. lib. 4. cap. 3.] 4441. 273.

was observed to be in the morning, under the northerly part, of the forehead of the Scorpion. [Cl. Ptol. lib. 10. cap. 9.]

Pyrrhus, having obtained the kingdom of Macedon, began now to look after the soveraignty of all Greece and Asia. [Justin lib. 25. cap. 4.] But before he had quite subdued all Macedon, he was sent unto by Cleonymus of Sparta to come and help him in his wars at Laconia, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 12.] in the absence of Areus their King, who was then away in Creet, helping the men of Gortyna there, who were then oppressed with a war. Pyrrhus therefore went, with 25 thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, and 24 Elephants, which great army put Pyrrhus in mind not to recover Sparta to Cleonymus, but to get all Peloponese for himself. [Plutarch in Pyrrho.]

3733. In the 13 year of Ptol. Philadelphus (in some impressions it is falsely, and a half,) in 4443 271
the 476 year of Nabonassar, in the 17 day of the moneth Masor, answering the 11 of our October, 12 howers after the setting of the sun, Timochares observed the star of Venus in the morning wholly to have eclipsed and darkned, [Cl. Ptolem. lib. 10. cap. 4.]

While Pyrrhus lay before Sparta, a company of woemen, whose Captainesse was Archidamia, defended it against him till the return of Areus out of Creet, and Acrotatus the son of Areus, valiantly repulsed Ptolemie the son of Pyrrhus, when he made an assault, and would have broken into it, with two thousand Galls, and certain choice companies out of Chaonia: whereupon Pyrrhus, despairing of any good to be done there, drew off, and took the spoile of the Country, purposing there to winter.

Now whiles the war thus lasted in Laconia, Antigonus, having recovered the Cities of Macedonia, marched down with his army into Peloponese, there to encounter again with Pyrrhus, knowing that if he sped well there, he would presently return into Macedonia, to pursue the point of the war there, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 12.] and when Pyrrhus was upon his way to Argos, Areus the King fell upon the rear of him; and ever now and then cut off some of the Galls and Molossians, which brought it up, and one Orasus a Cretian born, slew Ptolemei the son of Pyrrhus, valiantly fighting on his fathers behalf, [Plutarch] whose body brought off, when his father beheld, he said, that this death betided him not so soon as he feared it would, or his overmuch rashnesse did deserve, [Justin. lib. 25. cap. 4.]

In the very night that Pyrrhus entered into Argos, it is said, that a scrich-owle came and sate upon the top of his Spear, [Elia. de Histo. Animal, lib. 10. cap. 37.] and the day following, he was kil'd, with a brick-bat, which a poor old woman threw down upon his head; and his head was presently cut off by one Zophyrus, a souldier of Antigonus, and carryed to Alcyoneus, Antigonus his son, who took it, and dasht it on the ground at Antigonus his foot, where he sate, with his Nobles about him; and Antigonus rebuked him very sharply for so lavishly insulting over the fall of so great a person; not considering the casualty of human condition: and taking the head, put his hood over it, which he then ware for an attire, after the manner of the Macedons, and buried his body very honourable. And when his son Helenus was brought prisoner to him, he willed him to take upon him both the habit, and also the spirit of a King, and delivered into his hands the bones of his father, enclosed in a golden Urne, willing him to carry it into Epirus, to his brother Alexander. And as for Pyrrhus his Nobles and friends, for they also, camp and all, fell into his hands, he entreated them with all the fair respect that might be. [Plut. in the end of his Pyrrhus, lib. 25. cap. 5. Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.]

Those of Tarentum, hearing of the death of Pyrrhus, sent to Carthage to crave aid thence, as well against the Romans, as against Milo, who held the City with a strong Garrison of Epirotes: and Milo being reduced to this exigence, and being enclosed on all sides, by the Romans at land, and Carthaginians by sea, delivered up the Castle to Papyrus Curso, the Roman consul, upon this condition, that he and his souldiers, with their monies, and other stuff, might be suffered safely to passe into their own Country. The City thereupon was also surrendred to Papyrius, by the Townsmen thereof: giving up their armes, their ship, themselves, and all into his hands: and this was the end of the war of Tarentum, against the Romans, [Zonaras out of Dionoros. lib. 4. cap. 3. *Frontin. Ptolem. we must here write A for Λ) that is, upon the 26 of our April, in the evening, and first hour of the night, and in the same year of Nabonassar; but the 24 of the Dionysian account, on the 24 of Leonion, or 30 of Paynus, answering to the 23 of our August, in the evening, Dionysius the Astronomer, took the observations of the Planet of Mercurie, which Cl. Ptolomæus, relateth out of Hipparchus, [lib. 9. cap. 7.] of his book called his Great Work.
Nicomedes King of Bithynia, enlarging the City Astacus, called it after his own name, Nicomedia, [*Euseb. Chron. with Pausan. in his Eliac. lib. 2. pag. 159. Trebel. Pollio. in Gallienis. and Ammia. But Porphyrie, Eusebius, Severus Sulpitius, Johannes Malela of Antioch, and all agree in this, that he reigned 15 years.
This man gave the Jews living in Ionia, equal rights and priviledges with the Gentiles, and yet suffered them to live according to their own religion and customs of their nation. [Josephus lib. 12. cap. 3.] he made sundry times war upon Ptol. Philadelphus, and fought with him, with all the forces he could raise from out of Babylon, and all the oriental parts. Wherefore Ptolemei, desirous to put an end to this bloudy war, gave him his daughter Bernice two wife, while his former wife Laodice was yet living; by whom yet he had borne him two sons, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus Hierax, (i. e.) the Hawk. And Ptolemei accompanied his daughter as far as Pelusium, and there gave him an infinite masse of gold and silver, in dowrie with her, whence he was called φερνοφόρος (i. e.) the dowrie giver, [Ierom upon Daniel, c. 11.] and took great care to his no smal cost besides, that water out of the river Nile, might be carried to her, where ever she was, to the end she might never drink of any other water but that, as Athenæus, [lib. 2. c. 2.] reporteth out of Polybius. And Appianus is mightily overseen, where he saith, that Bernice and Laodice were both daughters to this Ptolemei, [in Syria. pag. 130.]

3745. Josephus, [l. 12. c. 3.] writeth that after Eleazar the son of Onias, (i. e.) his Uncle Manasses, the son of Jaddus, succeeded him in the Priesthood at Jerusalem, and sate High Priest there 26 years, by the reckoning of [Scaliger, in Grac. Eusebia. page 50.] 4455. 259.

3747. In the year 28, according to Dionysius his account, the 7 day of the moneth Didymon, in the 491 of Nabonassar, day 5 of the moneth Parmuth, the 28 of our July, the Planet of Mercury was seen near to the sign of Gemini, in the evening toward the south head thereof, [Cl. Ptol. lib. 9. cap. 7.] 4457. 257.

3750. This year the second Periode of Calippus began. 4460. 254.

3753. Aratus of Sicyone, at the age of 20 years, delivering his native country from the tyranny ond oppression of Nicocles, joyned it to the body of the State or Commonwealth of Achaia, [Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 130.] and then sent to Ptolemei Philadelphus in Egypt, and gat of him 150 talents, which he bestowed among his poor country-men; especially in redeeming such as had been taken prisoners. And because those that had been turned out of their Country, and were now restored, would never let them be quiet, who upon what title soever, were now possessed of their lands and estates; therefore he made a journey himself to Ptolemei, and desired more money of him, to make all even among his country-men, and to take away all suites of law and differences between them. In which journey, thorough violence of tempest, and contrary winds, he was driven upon the coast of Caria, in Asia; and from thence, having made along voyage of it, came at last into Egypt: where he obtained a boone of 150 talents more for his countries good; of which he took 40 talents presently along with him, and returned into Peloponese, [Plut. in Arato.] 4463. 251.

3754. This year, when Manlius Vulso, and Attilius Regulus were Consuls in Rome, which, as Polybius noteth, was the 14 year of this first Carthaginian war, the Parthians, under their Captain Arsaces, shoke off the Macedonian yoke, and revolted from them, [Trog. Pomp. lib. 41.] This Arsaces, the later Persian Writers call Aski, al. Askam: and Mircondus Chapur, who, as he saith, began his reign there, in the 72 year, after the death of Alexander the Great; which is one year before the Consulship of Manlius and Attilius in Rome, and 3 years before Olymp. 133. in which Eusebius in his Chron. noteth; that this Arsaces and his Parthians fell off, and reeblled against Antiochus Theos; neverthelesse, because the Parthians keep the day, whereon Arsaces fought with Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of Antiochus, and overcame him, and took Callinicus himself prisoner, holiday, and make a great festival of it, as the very birthday of their liberty; as Justin relateth out of [Trogus, lib. 41. cap. 4.] therefore both [Justin, and Appian, in Syriac. pag. 130.] thought that the Parthians began their revolt, under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father. And the Parthians moreover, did this Arsaces that honour, as to call all their Race of Kings after him, by the names of Arsaces, [Iustin, lib. 41. cap. 5. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 702.] 4464. 250.

Now that the Parthians, together with the Persians, which the later Persian Writers confound, and make one people with the Parthians, (of which we may see more in [Schikardi, Tarich. pag. 101. and 102.] and our third note upon the Acts of Ignatius) fell off from the Persian Empire, Arrianus, in Persicis, sheweth, as we find him in [Photius, his Bibliotheca, cod. 58.] Where he also sheweth the cause of this their revolt from the Persian Empire, to have been this Arsaces and Tyridates, the sons of Phriapites, al. Priapasius, the son of Arsaces, first had slain on Pherecles (al. Agathocles, as we find him stiled by Geor. Syncellus) the Governour of that Country, appointed by Antiochus Theos; for that he offered to abuse the body of the said Tirdates in a sodomitical way, having five others in the plot with him. And then turning the Macedons out, took the Sovereignty to themselves: whose successors afterward stood it out also, against the Romans, and contended with them for the Empire of the World. See [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515.]

At the same time also, Theodotus, who had under him 1000 Cities of the Bactrians, fell off, and revolted from the Macedons; and the whole East, following their example, did the like, [Iustin. lib. 41. cap. 4. out of Trogus.] Others say, that the two Kings of Syria and Media, falling out, one Euthydemus perswaded the Grecians, which inhabited Bactria, to revolt from the Macedons, and to cast off their yoke; and that thereupon Arsaces, seeing Diotus, al. Theodotus, grow into such power among the Bactrians, drew the Parthians to a revolt likewise from the Macedons; Apollodorus also, in his books of the Parthian affairs, tells us; that those Greeks, which dwelt in the Bactria, growing strong, invaded India, and went so far therein, that, passing the River Hypanis, Eastward, went as far as the Isamus, and out-went Alexander in the conquest of India, [Strabo. lib. 11. pag. 515. 516. and lib. 15. pag. 686.]

Seleucus

3758. Seleucus King of Syria, overcome with love, sent for his former wife Laodice, and her children, to Court again; and she shortly after, fearing the fickleneße of his mind, and least his affections might happily return again to Bernice, his second wife, poisoned him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. Appia. in Syriac. pag. 130.] and to cover this sluttery of hers, she caused one Artemon, who was very like him, to lie in his bed, as if he himself had lain there sick: and so, what with his face, what with his counterfeit speech, cousened all that came to see and visit him in his sicknesse; and by this means, concealed the death of the true King, till she had taken order for one to succeed him in the kingdom, whom she thought fit, [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 14. Plinie, lib. 7. cap. 11. Solin. cap. 1.] and by this means, Seleucus, the eldest son of Seleucus by Laodice, came to succeed him in the kingdom, who from the many victories, which he got, (and they were none, that I know of) was surnamed Callinicus, and from his great beard, Pogon, (i.e.) which signifies a beard, as in Polyb. [lib. 2. pag. 155.] and he sate King 20 years. [Euseb. Chron.] 4468. 246.

Likewise in Egypt, Ptol. Philadelphus, who, living luxuriously, doubted not to say, that he should live ever, and that he onely had found out the way to immortality, as Athenaus, [lib. 12. cap. 17. reporteth out of Philarchus his History, lib. 22.] in the 40 year after the decease of Ptolemei the first his father, dyed; and after him succeeded Ptolemei, surnamed Euargetes, his son, begotten of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus, and reigned 25 years, as [Cl. Ptolom. in Canone, Clemens Alexand, in Strom. lib. 1. and Jerom upon cap. 9. of Daniel.] tells us; and in his time it is said, that there appeared a Phænix, which came to Heliopolis, drawing with her a huge flock of other birds, all wondring at her beauty, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 6.]

Laodice put Berenice with her young son, which she had by Ptolemie, into the hands of Icadion, and Genneus, (al. Coeneus) two chief men of Antioch, to be murdered. [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. and Appia. in Syriac. pag. 130.] Berenice, when she herad that they were coming to murder her, shut her self up in Daphne, a Castle or Suburb of Antioch, of which I spake before. Where, when the Cities of Asia heard that she with her young son were besieged, they in remembrance and reverence of her high calling, and progenitors, out of meer compassion, sent her in aides from all parts. Her brother also Ptolemei surnamed Euergetes, fearing the danger his sister was in, left his kingdom, and sped him thither, with all the forces which he could make, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] but before any aides could come, the young son, by such devises as Laodice used, was taken and carried away; whereof Berenice the mother hearing, armed her self, and got into a Chariot, and pursued after Cæneus, the butcherly minister of that cruel act; and overtaking him, when she could do nothing on him with her spear, took a stone, and with that, laid him all along; and forcing her Chariot over the very body of the knave, brake thorough the midst of the companies, and went directly to the house, where she heard say, they had laid the body of her son, whom they had already murdered, [Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 10.]

The murderers of the child, took another child very like him, and brought him forth, and shewed him to the people, with a roial guard about him, as if it had been the child indeed, But they set a strong guard of mercenarie Galls upon Bernice, and delivered up to her the strongest part of the place or Castle at Antioch, and gave her their oath to be true unto her, and entered into a covenant with her; for she gave ear to Aristarchus her Physician, who perswaded her to make a league and covenant of friendship with them, but they using their oath for nought else but a stratageme, to wit, to get within her, presently fell to cutting of her throat. The women about her, stood to defend her, as well as they could, and many of them there dyed in the quarrel: but three of them, to wit, Panariste, and Mania, and Gethosyne, took her body, and laid it in her bed, as if she had been wounded onely, and not quite dead; giving it forth, that she might recover, and held the people on in that amusement, till the coming of Ptolemei. [Polyanus Stratag. lib. 1.]

Now all the Cities of Asia, which were revolted from Seleucus, set ships to sea, and joyned with Ptolemei, either for the defence of Berenice, if she were alive, or to revenge her murder, if she were dead, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] and Ptolemei indeed, when he came, slew Laodice, and entering Syria, marched on as far as Babylon, [Appian. in Syriac. pag. 130.] possessing himself of Cœlosyria, with Seleucia, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 402, 403.] Syria also and Cilicia, and the upper provinces beyond the Euphrates, and almost all Asia fell unto him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.] even from Taurus into India, without one battle fought, or strok striken for it; if we may believe Polyenus, in the place above cited, with which we may also compare, what we find in the monument of Euergetes, called monumentum Adulitanum, published at Rome, in the year 1631. by Leo Allatius, to wit, Having received, saith he, the soveraignty of Egypt, Lybia, Syria Phœnicia, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cycladian Isles, from his father, he gathered an army of Horse and Foot, with a fleet of ships, and Elephants out of Trogloditica, and Ethiopia, part of which Elephants had been there taken by his father, and the rest by himself, and brought from thence into Egypt, and there trained up to the war, all excellently well furnished, & with them sailed into Asia; and conquering all the land on this side the Euphrates, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Ionia, Hellespont, and Thracia, together with all their Forces, and other Elephants out of India, and all the Kings of the Nations, in his companie; he put over the Euphrates, and there conquered Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Susia, Persia, Media, and all the country as far as Bactria.

This Euergetes, having conquered all Syria, came down to Jerusalem, and there offered many sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God, and dedicated to him gifts worthy of so great a Victory; as Josephus speaketh, [lib. 2. cont. Apion. pag. 1064.]

3759. Euergetes, being called back by a sedition of his own people in Egypt, held Syria in 4469. 245.
his own hands, but trusted Cilicia in the hands of one of his Nobles, named Antiochus; and the Provinces beyond the Euphrates, in the hands of Xanthippus for the Government of them: and spoiling and wasting all the kingdom of Seleucus, carried from thence 40 thousand talents of silver, and all the rich vessels that was therein; and 2500 Images of their gods, among which, he carried away also, those Images which Cambyses heretofore, had taken out of Egypt, at his being there, and carried into Persia: and from thence it was, that the Egyptians, when they saw their gods come home again by his means, gave him the surname of Euergetes, [Jerom. upon Daniel, cap. 11.] of whom, in that Monument aforementioned, called Monumentum Adulitanum, we find it thus written. Ptolemei, having there received those gods which the Persians had taken and carried out of Egypt in former times, with other treasure, there laid up; sent up his army, by ditches new cut, to let in the water for that purpose.

After the departure of Ptolemei out of Syria, Seleucus, having fitted up a vast Fleet to go against such Cities as had revolted from him: by a sudden tempest arising at sea, lost all his Fleet: whereupon the Cities and Countries which for very hatred of his person had turned to Ptolemeis side; now in very commiseration of this his so great a calamity at sea, returned all to his obedience again, [Justin, lib. 27. cap. 2.]

and in the year 504 of Nabonasar, 27 of the moneth Thoth, the 18 of our November, the Planet of Mercury was observed in the morning to have been to the northward of the uppermost Star in the head of Scorpio, [Cl. Ptol. lib. 9. cap. 7.]

Seleucus Callinicus, beginning to make war upon Ptolemei Euergetes, was utterly routed in the field, and thereupon fled to Antioch, and from thence wrote to his brother Antiochus, and craved his help, offering him for his pains, all Asia on this side the Taurus: but Antiochus, beeing at this time, not above 14 years of age, yet immoderately greedy of a kingdom, laid hold on the occasion, not with so brotherly a minde as he should have done: but like a very Laron, sought to strip his brother of all that he had, in his necessity; and though a child, yet put he on more than a man-like impious resolution; from whence it was, that even then, he gat the surname of Hierax; (i.e.) a greedy Hawke; or Harpye rather, because more like a Hawke than a man, he was ever ready to fall upon every mans estate, [Justin, lib. 17. cap. 2. with Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 754.]

3761. At this time, the people of Smyrna and Magnesia, in the moneth Lenæon, entered 4471. 243.
a league between themselves to maintaine the honour and greatnesse of this Seleucus: which league and decree of theirs, we find preserved to this very day, transcribed out of those Marmora Arundeliana; (i. e.) those Marble stones which the Earle of Arundel caused to be brought out of those parts, and published in print by Mr. J. Selden, as before.

Ptolemei, when he saw that this young Antiochus took part with Seleucus; least he should be forced to have them both his enemies, at once, struck up a truce with Seleucus, for ten years, [Justin, lib. 27. cap. 2.] In which long time of peace, he sent for Eratosthenes Cyrenæus, from Athens, and made him keeper of his Library at Alexandria, [Suidas, in Eratosthenes, and in the word, Apollonius.] For this Ptolemei Euergetes, followed his father Philadelphus his steps, in promoting the magnificence of this Library, and with it, of all kind of learning besides; for he himself was a schollar of Aristarchus the Philosopher, and wrote certain Historical Commentaries with his own hand, [Athena. lib. 2. cap. 33.] And of his care in getting into his Library the works of ancient Writers, Galen, upon the 3 book of Hippocrates, [of Epidemical diseases,] saith, He gave order for all the books of them which came into Egypt, to be brought to him, and took out copies of them: and then gave the transcripts of them to the owners which brought them, but put the originals in his own Library, with this inscription, Τῶν ἐκ πλοίων: (i. e.) from out of ships; that it might appear, they came out of such ships as there arrived. And having gotten from Athens the works of Sophocles, Eurypides and Escylus, onely to transcribe them, and left them 15 talents in pawne, till he restored the originals, which he had borrowed; he caused them to be written out most exquisitely in fair parchment, and then retaining retaining the originals, sent those so fair transcribed copies, back to them again; desiring them to keep his pawn of 15 talents, and to suffer the originals to remain with him.

and had lived in all, 80 years, as Medius and other Writers affirm, or as Porphyrie saith 3762. 83, died, [Lucian, in Macrobiis, Porphyr. in Græc. Eusebianis, Scalig. pag. 229.]

After him, succeeded his son Demetrius; who reigned 10 yeares, [Porphyrie, ibid, Polyb. lib. 2. page 131.] in which time he made himselfe Master of Cyrene, and all Lybia, [Porphyrie, ibid.] Now Olympias, the daughter of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, after the death of Alexander her husband and own brother, gave her daughter Pthias to this Demetrius, who had at that time to wife, the sister of Antiochus, King of Syria: whereupon she, as one turned off by her husband, went away to her brother Antiochus, and stirred up him, to begin a war upon her husband, for the injury by him done to her, [Iustin, lib. 28. cap. 1.] Now in all this time there was no other Antiochus that was a King, save onely this Antiochus Hierax, who would have wrested the whole kingdom out of Seleucus his elder brothers hand; for Justin out of Trogus, [lib. 41. cap. 4.] calleth both these brothers, by the name of Kings; and the same [Trogus, lib. 27. in the Prologue to it, and Polya. lib. Stratag. 4. in Antio. Hierax] shew, that Antiochus went into Mesopotamia; where, as the Fasti Seculi have it, Seleucus had built a City, called Callimicopolis: though at that time, neither Antiochus nor Seleucus, had Syria in their possession, but Ptolemei Euergetes King of Egypt.

3762. Now at this time, Antiochus, seeking to wrest all Asia, properly so called, out of his 4472. 242.
brother Seleucus his hand, raised an army of the Galls for his money against him: and coming to a fight near to the City Ancyra, Seleucus there, by the extraordinary prowesse of those Galls, lost the field; whereupon, these Galls supposing that Seleucus had been slain in the battle, turned their armes forthwith upon Antiochus, who had hired them for himself, which he perceiving, bought himself out of theirs, as out of so many theeves hands, with money, and was fain to enter a league, and to make an association of armes with his mercenaries: but Eumenes with a fresh army of his own, set upon Antiochus and his Galls, all bleeding and sore as they were of their late-gotten victory, and routed them; and thereby gat the greater part of Asia into his possession, [Iustin, lib. 27. cap. 2. & 3. with the Prologue of Trogus, ib.]

3763. Eumenes, the son of Eumenes the elder, who was the son of Philetærus, drank himself stark drunk, and died, as [Athenæus, lib. 10. cap. 16. out of Ctesicles, lib. 3. de Temporibus,] reporteth: and after him succeeded Attalus, that Attalus his son, which was 4473. 241.
younger brother to Philetærus, begotten of Antiochis, the daughter of Achæus. This Attalus, using his great wealth warily and magnificently withal, bred an opinion in himself, and then in other men also, that he deserved to bear the name and title of a King: and therefore having upon a time overcome the Galls in a fight, he presently took the name and port of a King upon him: and so used the matter by his care and providence, that it continued in his house to the third generation, [Polyb. lib. 18. in the Excerpt. of him, pulished by Vales. pag. 102.] concerning which points, Suidas reports an Oracle which was given him by the prophetesse at Delphos; in these words.

> Θάρσει Ταυροκέρως, &c. (i. e.)
> Go on Taurocerus, thou a Crown shalt wear,
> And thy sons sons: and there an end shall be.

Now it is supposed, that this Eumenes, was therefore surnamed Taurocerus, because there were a pair of Bulls hornes added some where, to the head of his picture, or other statue of him: as also in that Oracle uttered by Phaennes, concerning the slaughter, which he should one day make of the Galls, he is called, Tauri filius, (i. e.) the son of a Bull, mentioned by [Pausan. in Phocicis, pag. 334.] in these words,

> Τάχα γάρ σφιν ἀοσσητῆρα Κρονίων, &c. (i. e.)
> For Jove shall quickly them a Saviour send;
> Son of a Bull, and by Jove nurtured,
> Which on the Galls shall bring a dismal day.

Concerning which battle fought between Attalus and the Galls, Livie speaketh, [lib 38.] The first in Asia, saith he, that refused to pay contribution to the Galls, was Attalus; and fortune here, beyond all expectation of men, favoured this bold attempt of his: and upon a battle fought he had the better of them. But Polyænus, [lib. 4. Stratag. in Attalo] tells us, of a devise, which one Sudines, a Chaldæan Soothsayer, used to animate the souldiers to this fight, when they had otherwise quite lost their courage: which Sudines, was none other, but that Babylonian Mathematician, whom we find mentioned by [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 739.] whose Astronomical tables, one Vettius Valens of Antioch professeth protesseth that he made use of, in finding out the motions of the Moon.

In the year 45, according to Dionysius his Era upon the 10 day of the moneth Parthenion, al. Virginion, 83 years from the death of Alexander, the 17 day of the moneth Epiphus, (the third day of our Septemb.) the planet of Jupiter was observed to have quite eclipsed the Southern star of the constellation of the Asellus, (i. e.) the little Asse. [Cl. Ptolem. lib. 11. cap. 3.]

3764. Lacides Cyrenæus, Rector of the new Academie, succeding Arcesilaus of Pitane in 4474. 240.
Eolia, kept his Academy in a certain Garden which Attalus the King had there provided for that purpose, and there he began to read, year 4. of the 134 Olymp. [Laert. in Laces.]

3768. In the 75 year, accordig to the Chaldeans, in the 14 day of the moneth Dios, and 4477. 237.
the 512 year of Nabonassar, the ninth of the moneth Thoth, (the 29 of our July,) the planet of Mercurie, in the morning, was seen, near to the beam star in the signe of Libra. [Cl. Ptol. lib. 9. cap. 7.]

3771. Onias 2. son of Simon the Just, after that Eleasarus had first executed the office of 4481. 233.
the High Priest at Jerusalem, (because Onias himself was then but a little one) and after him Manasses, because the same Onias, when he came to age, proved βραχὺς τὴν διάνοιαν, as Josephus speaketh, (i. e.) but a bird-witted man, came at last, and in his old age, to be Prince and High Priest among the Jews, in which office, he carried himself very unworthily, and basely, setting his mind to nothing but mony. [Iosephus Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 3. in Græc. Eusebuseb. pag. 50.] It is said, that he sate Priest 14 years.

In his dayes, the Samaritans grievously vexed the Jews, spoiling the Country, and carrying away the people captives: and when Onias, for very covetousnesse refused to pay the 20 talents of silver, imposed by the Kings upon the land, which sum, his predecessors had ever used to pay out of their own store, for the ease of the people, Ptol. Euergetes in a rage, sent a messenger to Jerusalem, and threatned Onias, that if he did not speedily send him in his arreers of tribute, he would forthwith give away all the land among his souldiers, and plant new colonies of his own there. But there was at that time one Josephus, the son of Tobias, though a young man, yet of singular repute among all men, for his prudence, justice, and other virtues appearing in him. He living in the Country at a place called Phicola, where he was born; was advertised by his mother, who was the daughter of Simon the Just, and sister to this Onias the priest, of the coming of these messengers or Ambassadors to Jerusalem: whereupon he came to Jerusalem, and undertook to go along in an Embassie to Euergetes, about this matter; and being there, he so far insinuated himself, into the good liking and favour of the King, and Cleopatra the Queen; that he not onely blew over this storm, which so threatned to fall upon his Country, but also obtained a company of two thousand souldiers to levie the tributes and other due profits to the King out of Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, Samaria and Judæa, in which office he continued by the space of 22 years; and in that time doubled the Kings revenues; and brought them from 8000, which they were before, to 16 thousand talents by the year, and brought into the kings exchequer, all the goods of felons, and other confiscations which formerly the exchequer men swallowed up, and shared among themselves, [Iosephus 16. cap. 3. & 4.]

3772. In Macedonia the King Demetrius, died, leaving his son Philip, a very little one, and one Antigonus was made his Protector, or Guardian, but he, (who from his great and extraordinary promises which he made to all sort of men, was called Doson, (i. e.) one that was ever full of promises, and of no performance) marrying the mother of his ward, took the kingdom it self, into his own possession, [Iustin lib. 28. cap. 3.] and reigned 12 years. [Dexippus, Porphy. and Euseb.]

3774. Lycon of Troas dyed: when he had sate Rector of the schoole of the Peripateticks 4484. 230.
42 years, after the death of Strato Lapsacenus, who sate next before him, and lived in all 74 years.

3775. In the year 82, according to the Chaldean account, the fifth day of the moneth Xan- 4485. 229.
thicus, year 519 of Nabonassar, the 14 day of the moneth Tybi, (the first of our March) in the evening, Saturn was observed to be two fingers breadth under the southern shoulder of Virgo. [Cl. Ptol. lib. 11. cap. 7.]

3778. Antiochus Hierax being distressed, fled to Ptol. Euergetes in Egypt, and was by him 4487. 227.
clapt up in a fast prison, out of which he escaped, by the means of a certain harlot, which used to resort unto him, but being upon the way, he fell into the hands of certain theevs, who slew him, [Justin Lib. 17. cap. 3.]

And Seleucus Callinicus his elder brother, much about the same time, his horse falling with him, brake his neck, and died, [Id. Ib.] but he left two sons behind him; of which Seleucus the elder, surnamed Ceraunus, being weak in body and purse, could not keep his army in order; and the younger called Antiochus, and surnamed afterward, the Great, after the death of his father, went into the upper Asia, [Polyb, lib. 4. pag. 315.

and lib. 5. pag. 386. with Appian. in Syriac. pag. 86. and 131.] and Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely 3 years, [Porphy. Euseb. Severus Sulpitius.] 3780. Seleucus Ceraunus, marching against Attalus, who had now gotten all Asia on this side the Taurus into his possession, leaving his kingdom to the care of one Hermias a Carian born, passed the Mount Taurus with a great army, [Polyb. ut supra.] 4490. 224.

Seleucus was poisoned in Phrygia, by the meanes of two of his Nobles that were about him, Apatarias, and Nicanor, [Polyb. ib. Appianus, in Syriac. pag. 131. Jerom, upon Dan. cap. 11. Justin, lib. 29. cap. 1.] and there was at that time in his army, one Achæus, the son of Andronicus, brother to Laodice Seleucus his wife, but a prisoner with Ptolemei in Egypt. This Achæus, as a procheinami and kinsman to Seleucus, set himself presently to revenge his death, upon the two authors of it, and slew them both: and then ordered all matters in the army with a singular dexterity, wisdom, and magnanimity. And, having now a fair opportunity of setting the Crown upon his own head, seeing that all men sollicited and importuned him to do it, yet would he not be brought unto it; but kept it for Antiochus, the young son of Seleucus Callinicus, and, marching with the army from place to place, thoroughout Asia, recovered all that ever his father had lost, on this side the Taurus, [Polyb. lib. 4. page 315, and 317.]

But the army, that was in Syria, sent to Antiochus, that was in Babylon, to come and take the kingdom upon him, [Jerom, upon Dan. cap. 11.] which he did, being then under 14 years of age, as [Justin, lib. 29. cap. 1.] and κομιδῆ νέ@: (i.e.) very young, as [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 271.] saith: and reigned 36 years; as we find in [Porphyrie, and Eusebius.]

This Antiochus, committing the whole rule and government of all Asia, on this side Taurus, to Achæus, made Molon governour of Media, and Alexander, Molons brother, President of Persia; but in Court Hermias the Carian swayed all; who, being of a fierce and cruel nature, punished some very grievously for small offences, and making them seem greater by aggravating words than they were indeed; and casting false calumnies upon sundry persons, was ever a mercilesse and inexorable Judge against them, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 386.]

Cleomenes, the King of Lacedemon, being vanquished in the field by Antigonus Doson, King of Macedon, near to Sellasia, and thrust out of his kingdom, took ship at Gythium, which he had there laid ready for what chance soever might fall, and taking some of his Nobles along with him, he sailed into Egypt, to Ptolemei Euergetes (to whom he had formerly sent his children, and his mother Cratesiclea, for pledges, when he first promised him his aid;) and was, when he came, honourably entertained by him, [Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 154. Justin, lib. 28. cap. 4. Pausan. in Corinth. page 52. Plut. in Cleome.]

3782. The two brothers, Molon, the Governour of Media, and Alexander, the President of Persia, despising the youth of Antiochus their King (and the rather, for that they thought that Achæus would easily be drawn to joyn with them; but above all, fearing the power of Hermias in Court, and his malice and cruelty withal) conspired together with their Provinces to revolt from Antiochus, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 386.] 4492. 222.

In the parts of Caria, and the Isle of Rhodes, there happened at this time a fearful Earthquake, which overturned every where their houses; and among the rest, that huge Colossus, (or Image of Jupiter) at Rhodes, [Euseb. Chron. Oros. lib. 4. cap. 13.]

Ptolemei Euergetes gave Cleomenes (who by his sweet behaviour, grew every day more inward with him than other) some hopes that he would send him back into Greece with a Navy well furnished, and restore him again into his kingdom; mean while he allowed him 24 talents yearly for his entertainment; wherewith, living fruggally, he maintained himself and such as were about him, [Plut. in Cleom.]

3783. But Ptolemei died, before he could perform with Cleomenes, [Id. ibid.] whether of a natural sicknesse, as [Polybius, lib. 2. pag. 155.] or whether by the wicked practise of his own son, called Philopater; which signifies indeed a lover of his father; but had that name given him per Antiphrasin, (i.e.) by a contray meaning, as Justin saith; whose words [lib. 29. cap. 1.] speaking of this matter, are these. Egyptum patre ac matre, &c. (i.e.) Ptolemei, having murdered his father, and his mother, (whom Strabo calls Agathoclea) took Egypt into his hands; who, for his villainy acted upon his parents, had his surname Philopator given him by the Country. We read also in Pliny, [lib. 7. cap. 56.] that this Ptolemei was by another nickname, called Triphon, from his effeminate and luxurious fashion of living: and in the Fasti Siculi, we find thus, Ptolemei Philopator, who was also called Gallus, son of Ptolemei Euergetes, who was surnamed also Triphon, &c. wherein, as the false copy in the prologue of [Trog. Pompei. 27 and 30.] make for him in the surname of Triphon, falsely attributed to the father Euergetes; so in that other name of Gallus given to the son Philopator, the collector of the great 4493. 221.

Etymologie concurs with him; for there he notes, that Philopater was there called Gallus, because he was wont to go with an Ivie Bush about his head, and other parts of his body, after the manner of the Galli, (who were priests of Cybele) in the solemnities of Bacchus; for so effeminate and debauched was this man grown, with whoreing and drinking, that when he was in his best wits, and extraordinarily sober, yet even then he would run about the streets, with the maurice dancers, and bells gingling about him; [Plut. in Cleom.] and so as Polybius observeth of him, he spent the whole time of his reign, in revellings and pastimes, giving himself over to all sensuall and filthy lusts of the flesh, and to dayly quaffing and carousing, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 380, 381.] and Strabo adds, [lib. 17. pag. 796.] that both he, and all the Ptolemeis that followed, grew luxurious, and never ordered that state well afterward. Now this Philopator reigned after his father 17 years, [Cl. Ptol. in Reg. Canone. Clem. Alexan. Porphy. Euseb.]

Philopator, fearing Magas his brother, who by the means of his mother Berenice, was grown gracious in the army, took counsel with one Sosibius, (who was of chief credit with him) and others how to rid them both out of the way. But this imployment troubled these men not a little, for fear lest, the high courage of Berenice considered, all this enterprise would come to naught, and therefore they were fain to flatter all the Court, giving them assurance of great matters, in case the business went on, and succeed as they would have it. But Sosibius went farther; and finding Cleomenes the King of Sparta, who at that time stood in great need of the Kings help, to be a singular wise and politick man, and of great experience in matters of the world, brake the matter to him. But Cleomenes disswaded him from it; saying, that the King had more need to beget him, if it were possible, more brothers, for the security and preservation of his kingdom, than to destroy those which he had. But when Sosibius had told him further, that the King could never be sure of the mercenarie souldiers, so long as Magas was alive. Cleomenes then bad him, never fear that, for, saith he, among his mercenaries, he hath three thousand Greeks out of Peloponesus, and one thousand out of Creet, who at one beck of his, would be ready to do what ever he would have them. Whereupon Sosibius took courage, and went on, and murdered Berenice and her son Magas, and all that belonged to them. [Polyb. lib. 5. pa. 380, 382. and lib. 15, in Excerpt. p. 65. and Plut. in Cleom.]

Philopator, having first murdered his father, then his mother, and now with her his brother, as if all had been well with him, gave himself over to his luxury more than ever; and in that way all the court followed him, and not onely his Nobles in Court, and his chief Commanders in the army; but the whole body of the army, from the highest to the lowest, threw away all care of martial discipline, and lay lusting in Taverns and bawdy-houses at their pleasure, [Justin lib. 13. pag. 1.]

But to return to Antiochus, when he advised with his counsel, how to represse that rebellion of the two brothers, Molon and Alexander in Media and Persia, Epigenes (who was the man that reduced those forces to Antiochus, which were gathered together for Seleucus, and was of prime credit, and reputation in the army) advised, that Antiochus himself with his army, should presently march against them: but Hermias, on the contrary, advised the King to go himself into Coelosyria, and recover that; and send Xenon and Theodorus Hemiolius, to subdue the two brothers, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 387.]

Whiles this was in agitation, and the King lay at Zeugma in Seleucia, there came to him Diognetus his Ammiral, out of Cappadocia, conducting Laodice the daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus to the King; who, so soon as ever she came, married her: and coming out of the upper regions unto Antioch, there caused her to be proclaimed Queen; and that done, prepared himself wholly for the war, [Ibid. pag. 388.]

At the same time Molo, having a sure card of his brother Alexander to help him at all assaies, marched with a great army against Xenon and Theodotus, the Kings Commanders, sent into those parts, which put them into so great a fright, that they durst not keep the field, but put themselves into walled Cities for their defence; and in this case Molo, having the Country of Apollonia at his back, wanted for no store and plenty of provision, [Ibid.]

784. Mean while, Philip the son of Demetrius, in Macedonia, upon the death of Antigonus, his Guardian, and father in law, being then 14 years old, took the kingdom into his own hands, [Justin lib. 18. cap. ult. & lib. 29. cap. 1.] and reigned there 42 years. 4494 22[illegible]
[Dexip. Porphy. Euseb. and Polybius lib. 2. pag. 155.] observeth, that these three, Philip of Macedon, Ptol. Philopator of Egypt, and Antiochus Magnus of Syria, came to their Crowns all within the compasse of the same Olympiade, 139. for as Antiochus, came to the Crown in the first year of it, so Philapator succeeded his father in the third thereof, and Philip of Macedon in the fourth, and the same Polybius, [Lib. 4. pag. 271.] observeth obſerveth further, that about that time, almoſt all the kingdoms of the World, came to have a new ſucceſſion of Kings in them: the like doth, [Juſtin, lib. 29. cap. 1.] where they both ſhew further, that Ariarathes, about the ſame time, came likewiſe to be King of Cappadocia.

Now when, upon the death of Antigonus, the Etolians joyning with the Lacedemonians, made a common war upon the Achæans and Macedons; Cleomenes beſought Philopator of Egypt, that he would furniſh him with certain neceſſaries, and ſome ſouldiers, and diſmiſſe him to return into his own country; but when he perceived, that Philopator lent but a deaf eare to that motion of his, he then began to be an often and earneſt ſutor to him, to ſuffer him with his own ſmall traine, to be gone. And the King, little caring which end went forward in any buſineſſe of moment, and never forecaſting what was to come, according to his wonted folly, never regarded what Cleomenes ſaid unto him: but Soſibius, who, as I ſhewed before, was the chief man of all the reſt about him in matters of the kingdom, adviſing with the reſt of the Council, thought it no policy, to let Cleomenes go, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 381.]

Molo, of whom I ſpake before, aſſaied to paſſe the River Tigris, and to beſiege Seleucia; but being prevented by Zeuxis, who had gotten all the boates of the River into his hands, he turned his courſe, and went to Cteſiphon, and there made his proviſion, for his winter quarter, [ib. pag. 389.]

Antiochus, being advertiſed that Molo came on, and that his men ſtill gave ground, reſolved, to leave going againſt Ptolemei in Cœloſyria, and to march in perſon againſt Molo. But Hermias, who would not off from what he once propounded, ſent Xonætas an Achæan born, againſt Molo, with an army very well appointed, and with full and abſolute power to do with it as he ſaw cauſe, without controule; and brought the young King back again to Apamæa, and there gathered an army about him, [Ibid. pag. 390.]

Xenætas, coming with his army to Seleucia, ſent for Diogenes, the Kings Governour of the province of Suſa, and for Pythiades the Ammiral of the Red ſea; and with them drew into the field, and having the benefit of the River Tigris at his back, ſate him down with his army in the very face of the enemy: and the next day, ſeizing upon Molo his Camp, which he that night had left, there fell to drinking and rioting with his army, till Molo, eſpying his opportunity, came back the night following, and in the deep of the night, ſet upon them, when they little thought of him; recovered his own Camp, took theirs, and Xonætas himſelf fighting in the dark, was there alſo caſually ſlain, and Molo preſently with his army came before Seleucia, and took it at the firſt aſſault; becauſe Zeuxis was fled out of it, and with him Diomedon the Governour of the place it ſelf: Then ſubdueing the whole province of Babylonia, with that which lay upon the Red-ſea, he took the City of Suſa, and leaving there ſome to beſiege the Caſtle, whereinto Diogenes, their Commander was fled, he returned to Seleucia upon the Tigris, and there refreſhed his army. And indeed, in the Country lying upon that River, he took in all as far as Europus, a City in thoſe parts, and in Meſopotamia, all as far as Dura, [Ibid. pag. 391, 392, 393.]

Cleomenes, after that conſultation held by Soſibius, was committed to cuſtody: but watching his time, when Philopator with his traine was gone to Canopus, he gave it out among his keepers, that the King would preſently ſet him at liberty: and while they hereupon grew careleſſe of him, and lay faſt aſleep by their over drinking, he with his friends, brake out of priſon, at noon-day; and would faine have ſtirred up the people to a ſedition, but could not; and therefore having no hope of eſcaping left them, he and his followers, ſlew themſelves, [Ibid. pag. 385.] three years after his overthow in Laconia, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 304.] whereof when Philopator heard, he commanded Cleomenes his body to be flead, and to be hung upon a croſſe, and both his mother Crateſiclea, and his ſons, and all the women that attended on her, to be put to death, [Plut. in Cleome.]

Antiochus, ſetting out with his whole army from Laodicæa, and having paſſed the Deſert, came to the Dale of Marſyas, which lies between the Lebanus and Antilebanus. Spending therefore many dayes in marching thorough this Dale, and having taken in ſuch places as lay in or near his way, he came to Gerra and Brochos, which are two Caſtles, built upon the mouth or narrow paſſage which leadeth into this Dale; and thoſe he found kept by Theodotus, an Etolian born, but at this time, Governour of Cœloſyria for Philopator; which when he ſaw, he firſt reſolved to ſet upon them: but perceiving the natural ſituation of the place, to be very ſtrong, and Theodotus his courage in defending them, to be no leſſe, he drew off and went his way, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 390.] For which piece of ſervice yet, Theodotus was ſo far from receiving any reward or thanks from Philopators hand, that being ſent for afterward to Alexandria, he had much adoe there to eſcape with his life for it, [Ibid, pag. 385. and pag. 405.]

Antiochus, hearing of the utter destruction and slaughter made of his men with their General Xenœtas, and of Molo his victory, whereby all the upper Provinces were utterly lost, and fallen unto Molo, brake off his intended journey, and cast in his minde how to settle and secure the main of his estate, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 390.] About which as he was in councel, and Hermias could not stand alone against the general vote of all the rest which perswaded the King to go; yet to have his will in some thing, he forged certain letters, as written from Molo to Epigenes, and coming in a packet with other letters to him; and by that means, gat him to be put to death, as one that kept intelligence with Molo. And now the King marching against Molo, when he came to the River Euphrates, took into his army the remainder of his Forces that there were, and came to Antiochia, which is in Mygdonia, περὶ τροπὰς χειμερινὰς: (i. e.) about the beginning of Winter, and there stayed till the next Spring, [Ibid. page 393, 394, 395.]

Then removing from thence, upon the fourtieth day after he came to Lyba, and there following the advice of Zeuxis, and not of Hermias, he put over the Tigris with all his army; and then marching toward Dura, at the first approach raised the siege, which was laid unto it by a Captain of Moloes: and going again from thence, and never camping two dayes in one place, at 8 dayes end, they passed Oricum and came to Apollonia, [Ibid. pag. 395, 396.]

Molo, though he grew now much afraid, least his army would leave him, yet he drew out against the King; and having two wings, he committed the charge of the left to his brother Neolaus, and led the other himself. But when the battel joyned, the right wing, wherein himself was, stood firm to him, and fought very stoutly against the Kingsmen, but the left, fell over to the King: which when Molo perceived, and saw withal, that he was ready to be wholy surrounded by the enemy, he fell upon his own sword. The rest also of his friends, and which had been pertakers with him in this conspiracy against the King, gat themselves every man away to his own home, and there acted the like tragedy upon himself. His brother Neolaus also, when the wing which he led yeilded to the King, gat him away into Persia, to Alexander Moloes brother; and there having slain Moloes mother, and his children, slew himself also over them: having first advised Alexander to do the like. The King commanded Moloes body to be hanged on a crosse in a high place, and having reproached his Rebel-army with bitter words, for their foul and disloyal carriage towards him; yet at last gave them his hand, and received them to his favour and service again: and appointed some to convoy them back into Media from whence they came, and to settle that Province again. Mean while, himself went down from those upper parts to Seleucia, where the said Hermias using the inhabitants very hardly in other points, wrung out of them over and above a thousand talents, for a fine; which yet the King mitigated and reduced to 150, and then left Diogenes to govern Media, and Apollodorus to be President of the Province of Susiana; but sent Tychon, Master of the Scribes, and General of the army, into the Regions lying upon the Red Sea, to govern them, [Ibid. from the page 396. to the page 399.]

Now at what time Antiochus made this war upon Molo, Theodotus the Etolian, Governour under Philopator of Cœlosyria, returning from Alexandria, and casting in his mind, that Patropator was no better than a lost man, and despairing of any good from the Princes about him, with such company as he had with him, seized upon Ptolemais by himself, and upon Tyrus, by one Panætolus, and resolved to come to some agreement with Antiochus, and to put all Cœlosyria into his hands: which he performed in a very short time after, [Ib. pag. 385. and pag. 405.]

Unto Attalus King of Pergamus was born by Apollinis of Cyzicum a son called Attalus Philadelphus, who lived 82 years, as Lucian in his Macrobiis reporteth; and about the same time, Antiochus likewise had a son born to him, called Seleucus, and surnamed (as it seemeth) Philopator.

3785. Jubile 25.

Antiochus, having now gotten a son, resolved to set upon Ariobarzanes, who had obtained the Dominion of the Atropatians, and other Countries thereabouts: and Ariobarzanes fearing the coming of the King; especially because he was now grown old and decrepit, sought peace at his hands, and had it from him, upon such terms as he was pleased to give it, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 399. and 400.]

Whiles the war went on between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes, Achæus having shut up Attalus in his chief City of Pergamus, and taken all the places thereabouts, and entered into a league and confederacy with Ptolemei Philopator of Egypt, thought it no great matter to break into Syria, before Antiochus could return to rescue it; and by the help of the Cyrrhestians, who were already revolted from him, to make himself

Master of all that kingdom; and therefore with his whole army moving out of Lydia, marched thither-ward: but when he came to Laodicea in Phrygia, he there took a Crown upon his head, and began to assume the title and port of a King, both when he received Ambassadors from other Princes, and also when he had occasion of writing unto them, one Siveris, who being banished out of his own Country, was entertained by him, egging him principally on thereto: and so going on-ward in his journy toward Syria, when he came near to Lycaonia, his army there began to mutiny, complaining that they were led to a war against him, who was their liege Lord, and natural King. Whereupon Achæus, seeing it went against the hair with them, gave off his purpose, and proceeded no further in it; and moreover told the army that he never purposed to lead them into Syria against Antiochus, but onely to wast the Country of Pisidia, to which he presently led them, and did it to the purpose, and so having enriched them with the spoyle thereof, and made all fair with them, returned home again. [Idem. lib. 4. pag. 271, 314, 315. and lib. 5. pag. 401, 402.]

When the war between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes was ended, Apollophanes a Physician of Seleucia, standing in bodily fear of Hermias, wrought the means to bring him into suspition with the King. whereupon the King faining himself sick, caused Hermias to be haled out of his house, and by a crue of certain men appointed for that purpose, to be murdered; and it so fell out, that at the same time, the wives of Apamea drew likewise his wife and children out of her house there, and stoned them all to death. [Id. lib. 5. pag. 400, 401.]

Antiochus, being now returned home, and having sent away his souldiers to their winter quarters, sent messengers to Achæus, with many threating words. [Id. pag. 401. 402.]

Among the Jews, after the decease of Onias 2. his son Simon 2. succeeded in the priesthood, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4.] and he is said by Scal. [in Græc. Euseb.] to have sate 20 years.

Antiochus, calling all his army to Apameas, at the first of the spring, by the perswasion of Apollophanes his Physician, removed to Seleucia, which is called Pieria, sending Diognetus his Ammiral thither with his fleet, and Theodotus Hemiolius with a convenient company to possesse himself of the streits of Cœlosyria. But himself, having intelligence with some of the Seleucians in the town, whom he had won unto him by large monies and larger promises, took first one of the suburbs, and then the City set open their gates unto him, and having gotten it, he entreated the inhabitants very kindly, but put garrisons into the Castle and port both. [Polyb. lib. 5. from pag. 40, to pag. 405.]

The King was busie in setling things here, when letters came to him from Theodotus the Etolian, to request him to go into Cœlosyria, for that he was now ready to deliver it into his hands: whereupon the King put himself upon a march thither-ward; but Nicolaus a Captain of Philopators, having discovered this practise, besieged Theodotus in Ptolemais, where he was; so that he could not get out to act according to his intentions, and withall, sent Lagoras, a Cretian born, with Dorymon of Etolia, with a party to keep the passage entering into Cœlosyria, near unto Berytus, which Antiochus easily put to flight, and then Theodotus and Panætolus, seeing the siege raised from before Ptolemais, where they had hitherto been shut up with such friends as they had about them, went and met him upon his way, and delivered both Tyrus and Ptolemais, with all that in them was, into Antiochus his hand: there were found in both ports, 40 ships, which were consigned into Diognetus the Ammirals hand. [Ib. p. 505, 406, with lib. 4. pag. 305.]

Antiochus, being certified that Philopator was gone to Memphis, that his forces were all met at Pelusium, that the sluces of Nilus were all opened, and the sea let in to spoil all the fresh waters there, changed his purpose of marching to Pelusium, and went into Cœlosyria, and there going from one place to another, sought to take in all, partly by force, partly upon conditions, which he offered very reasonable unto them. Wherefore the places, that were lesse strong, yielded for the most part, upon the first summons; the rest clave close to Philopator, whose subjects they were, and those cost him much time in besieging them, [Id. lib. 5. pag. 406.]

Mean while, Philopator let all go at six and seven, and took no care of any thing: yet Agathocles and Sosibius, who managed all under him, made all the provision they could for the war, keeping all close from Antiochus, as much as possibly they might, and under hand sollicited the states of Cyzicum, Byzantium, Rhodes, Etolia and others, to mediate for a peace between the two Kings, whiles they, the mean time, made all provisions for the war, and trained and exercised their men in all kind of feats of chivalrie, and martial discipline, to the utmost of their endeavours, [Id. pag. 406, 407. cum lib. 4. pag. 305.]

But

But there happened at this time a new war to grow between the Byzantines, and the Rhodians; the ground whereof was, for that the Byzantines being fain to pay tribute and contribution to the Galls, which lay havie upon them, laid a tole upon every ship that passed by them into the Pontick sea, [Id. lib. 1. p. 158. & lib. 4. pag. 305, 306, 314.]

Whereupon the Rhodians sent presently to Prusias King of Bythinia, (that Prusias which in Excerpt. Memnon. [cap. 29.] is surnamed Χωλὸς, (i. e.) the Lame) and made an association of arms with him, who was otherwise mischievously enough bent against them, as for sundry other causes, so especially for that they laboured, all that ever they could, to make love and friendship between Attalus and Achæus, which he thought, in many respects would prove damageable to him, and his affairs. Wherefore he came to this agreement with the Rhodians, that they should take the charge of the war at sea upon themselves, and let him alone to plague the Byzantines at land. And to begin, he forthwith went and seized upon a port of theirs in Asia side called Hieron, which place belonged formerly in common to the Marchants which traded into Pontus: but the Byzantines had lately bought them out, and appropriated it to themselves, together with all that portion of Mysia in Asia, which they had many ages before enjoyed, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 314, 316, 316.]

The Byzantines, seeing what the Rhodians had done with Prusias, did the like with Attalus, and Achæus, and sent to crave aid of them, and *A*ttalus was very desirous of himself to have hearkned to their motion, but *A*chæus lying so heavy upon him as he did, he could afford them but little help. *A*chæus, whose Dominions stretched far and near in this side the Taurus, and who had lately taken on him, (as I said before) the title of a King, promised them all the good that he could do them, [Ibid. pag. 314.] They sent also to Tibites, to call him out of Macedonia, to be their General in this war aginst Prusias; for it was conceived, that the whole kingdom of Bythina, belonged as well to Tibites, as to Prusias, whose Uncle Tibites was. [Ibid. pag. 316.]

Prusias, fearing the coming of his Uncle, pulled down all Castles and places of any strength, that were in the kingdom, [Ib. pag. 318.]

The Rhodians to draw away Achæus from the Byzantines, sent to Ptolemei, and desired him to bestow on them Andromachus, (who was at that time a prisoner in Alexandria) to present him as a gift of their own, unto his son Achæus. Which done, and some other offices of honour, done unto him by the Rhodians, the Byzantines lost the chiefest staff they had to leane upon: and withall Tibites, whiles they were convoying him out of Macedon, dyed by the way, which infinitely crossed them in their designes. But Cavarus (a petty King of those Galls, who were in Thrace, (as Polybius, in Excerpt. Valesii pag. 26. and Athenæus lib. 6. cap. 6, tells us) who at that time came to Byzantium, mediated a peace between them, and Prusias and the Rhodians upon condition, that the Byzantines should forbear exacting any more tole, or impost upon their ships, and Prusias should restore, what he had taken from them of Byzantium. [Ib. pag. 317. & 318.]

At the same time also Mithridates King of Pontus made war upon them of Sinope, who borrowed 140 thousand drachmahs of the Rhodians, and therewith fortified their City against him: and all that Peninsula, or neck of land, wherein their City stood, [Ib. pag. 323.]

786. Antiochus besieged Dura in Phænicia, a City which Cl. Ptolemæus calls Dora, but 4490 to little purpose, for that the place was naturally strong: and Nicolaus, a Captain of Philopaters, sent them ever and anon relief. Yet because winter now came on, he was contented to make a truce with them for four moneths, at the motion of certain Ambassadors sent by Philopator; for further term, he would not grant, nor spend more time there, than needs he must, out of his own dominions: for manifest it was, that Achæus intended to invade his whole estate; nor was there any doubt but that Philopator aided him therein: wherefore having sent away the Ambassadors, he disposed garrisons in fit places, and leaving the care of all things there to Theodotus, he returned to Seleucia, and sent his army into their winter quarters: but taking no further care, of keeping them in military duties; supposing, that the rest would come on of it self, without any great fighting for it, because he had already gotten a part of Cœlosyria, and Phœnicia; and thought the rest would submit unto him of their own accord, and for words onely without blows. [Ib. pag. 409.]

But when things came not on, in such sort, as he imagined, at the first of the spring, 4496. 218.
he drew out his army again, purposing to set upon his enemies by sea and land, and by force to subdue the remainder of Cœlosyria that stood out against him, [Ib. pag. 411.]

Philopator committed the main of all his wars to Nicolaus the Etolian, made Gaza the Magazin, and there laid in all his provisions for the war, sent forth his armies by sea sea and land, made one Perigenes Ammiral of his forces by sea, who had with him 30 fighting ships onely, but of vessels of burden, to the number of 400. [Ibid. pag. 411.]

Antiochus was marched as far as Marathos, when Ambassadors came to him from the Isle of Aradus, to desire his friendship, and he not onely took them into his association, but also took up the difference that was between them and their neighbours, which dwelt upon the continent, and made them live good friends ever after: and then entring by the way of Theu-prosopon, into Phœnicia, came to Berytus, and in his way set upon Botrys, and took it, but burnt Treres and Calamus to the ground. [Ibid.]

But when he came at last to a main battle, he divided his army into three parts, the one he gave to Theodotus, the other to Menedemus, and the third he reserved for the sea, and commanded Diocles to take charge of them; which Diocles he had made Governour of Parapotamia, lying upon the Euphrates. But he with his Life-guard kept in the midst of all, as a reserve, to see how all things went every where in the battle, and to help where need should be: and withall Diognetus for him, and Perimenes for Philopator prepared for fight with thir naval forces, keeping each of them as close to the land as possible they could; and at last, upon a general signal given, they fell to it by land and sea, and at sea neither party had the better, and parted upon eaven terms, but at land Nicolaus, after a strong fight, was routed by Theodotus, and in the chase, lost 2000 men slain, and as many more taken prisoners, the rest fled into Sidon. Perigenes seeing all lost at land, retreated at sea likewise, and came to Sidon: and Antiochus without any delay came thither with his whole army, and sate down before it; but forbare assaulting of it, both because it was stuffed with men, and had provision enough within to keep them, [Ib. pag. 412, 413.]

When P. Cornel. Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus, were Consuls of Rome, Hannibal, having with much difficulty passed the Alpes, came down into Italy, in the Summer of this year, [Liv. lib. 21.] in the latter end of the 2 year of Olymp. 140. from whence we reckon the beginning of the second Carthaginian war, al. the war of Hannibal, described at large by Polybius, Livie, Silius Italicus, in verse, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in his Hannibalica: by which war, the name and fame both of the Carthagenians and Romans spread so far in the world, that in Greece first, and then in Asia, properly so called, and the Islands thereunto adjoyning, all men, upon their several occasions, cast their eyes upon, and lookt after them, and not upon Philip, Antiochus, or Ptolemei, any longer, [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 443.]

In the same Summer that Hannibal came into Italy, Antiochus also brake into Palæstina; and having given order to Diognetus his Ammiral to approach with his Feet to Tyrus, he with his army marched to Philoteria, a City seated upon the Lake of Tiberias, into which the River Jordan falleth: and from thence, runneth thorough the Country adjoyning upon the City of Scythopolis: which Josephus calleth Bethsan, in the Tribe of Manasses. And having taken them both, and put Garrisons in them, he passed the mountains, and came to Atabyrium; that is Thabor, a City seated upon a hill, the top whereof is reckoned to be 15 furlongs compasse; where Antiochus toling them out with small skirmishes, caused his Van to go close to the walls, and then [illegible] to make as if they fled; which they did: and when the Townsmen came out and pursued them, others that lay in ambushment arose, fell upon them, and slew many of them, and then himself falling on with the rest of his army, assaulted, and took that City also, [Polyb. ib. pag. 413.]

At the same time, Keræas, a Commander of Ptolemei Philopator, revolted from him unto Antiochus; whose entertainment there, was so good, that presently Hippolochus a Thessalian born, with 400 Horse in his company did the like. And Antiochus, leaving a strong Garrison in Atabyrium, removed thence, and took in Pella and Camus and Gephrus, upon surrender: which so prosperous successe of his, moved the Arabians, which bordered upon those parts, with one consent, to cast themselves into his armes, and to joyn with him. Antiochus, borne up with these new hopes, and confiding in the riches of Arabia, marched into the Country of Galatis; and having made himself Master of the field there, took the City Abyla: and in it, all those, who under the command of Nicias, came to succour them. There remained now only Gadara, a City in the opinion of the World, far stronger than any in all those parts: Antiochus therefore came and shewed himself before it; and beginning to cast up his works, with the very sight thereof, he struck such a fright into them, that they presently sent, and rendred themselves unto him, [Ib. pag. 414.]

In the same Summer also, in Pamphylia, the Pednelissenses, being besieged by the Selgenses, and in danger to be taken by them, sent and prayed in aid of Achæus; who forthwith sent them 6 thousand Foot, and 500 Horse, under the command of Garsieres; who purposing to enter the Town, by the way of Mylias, found that passage blockt blockt up by the Selgenses: whereupon, he made as if he would be gone, and the Selgenses seeing him gone his way, brake up, and went their way too: some to the Camp, and others to their harvest, which was then ready for the hook; which Gasieres perceiving, turned back short, and passed the streight of Mylias, near unto Climax, without impeachment; and left a strong guard upon it, and then committed the whole management of that war, and defence of Pednelissa, to Phaylus: who, going presently to Perga, stirred up the people of Pamphylia and Pisidia, to come and help the distressed: Whereupon they of Aspendus sent them in 4 thousand Foot, and they of Etenna 8 thousand; but the Selgenses instead of blowing the fire, blew it out, and by their rash and unadvised carriage of matters marred all, and being shamefully overthrown, lost 10 thousand of their men, and fled home to Selga: Phaylus followed them at the heeles; wherewith they took such a fright, that they forthwith sent Logbasis to treate of a peace: and he instead of a treator, played the traitor with them; for a truce was taken, in which time, the souldiers of their adverse party came freely into Selga; but they of the Town had underhand sent to Achæus, and put themselves wholy into his mercy, to deale with them as he would: mean while, Logbasis plotted the delivery of the Town to their enemies: and when things were now ready for their purpose, the plot was discovered; and so both he, and those of the Town, whom he had drawn into the conspiracy with him, and the enemies, which lurked there, in expectance of the event, were all taken, and put to the sword. Then began Achæus seriously to deale for a peace between them: nor were the men of Selga averse from the motion; Whereupon they were to pay down 400 talents ready money, and 300 more a while after; and the Pednelissans were to restore them all their prisoners without ransome. Achæus, having gotten Mylias, and the greatest part of Pamphylia into his hands, marched forthwith to Sardes; where, harrowing Attalus with an uncessant war, he began at last to threaten Prusias also, [Ibid. from pag. 415. to pag. 420.]

Whiles Achæus was busie in making war against the men of Selga, Attalus sate not idle, but, having the Galls, called the Tectosagi (whom for the reputation of their valour, he had sent for out of Europe, to serve him against Achæus) of Europe, with him, he marched thorough the Cities of Eolia, and others thereunto adjoyning, which for pure fear had submitted themselves to Achæus: Cuma, Smyrna and Phocæa, all voluntarily joyned with him: those of Egea, and Lemnos, yielded to him for fear, at his first approach: Ambassadors also came to him from the Teians and Colophonians; whom, upon hostages given, he took in upon such conditions, and covenants, as before: and then going on still, and passing the river Lycus, he came into the Country, inhabited by the Mysians: and having gone thorough that, he came to the borders of the Carsenses, whom, together with those who kept Didyma-tiche, he so frighted, that Themistocles, whom Achæus had left to keep them for him, gave them up both into Attalus his hand: and, removing from thence, he ravaged all the region of Apia, and passed the hill of Pellicante, and encamped upon the bank of the river Megistus; and while he was there, the Moon fell into an eclipse: and thereupon his Galls, who were otherwise weary of so long trotting up and down, with their wives and children in their company, pretending they held this eclipse for some sad prodigie, would go no further, [Ib. p. 420.] for upon the first of our Septemb. the Moon, in the beginning of the night, was eclipsed for more than a whole hour long.

Attalus, fearing least his Galls, inclining to Achæus, would fall upon his Countries, yet because it was upon his word that they came out of Europe into Asia, would not fall upon them, and put them to the sword, but convoyed them all back safe to the Hellespont, where they first landed, and there laid them out lands to live and dwell upon; promising them further, that if at any time after, they should have occasion to use him, he would not, in any reasonable matter, be wanting to them. Then calling to him those of Lampsacus, Alexandria, and Ilium; and commending them for persisting so constantly in their loyalty to him, he returned with his army to Pergame. [Polyb. ib. pag. 421.]

3787. Antiochus, being advertised, that a great army of the enemy was met in a City of Arabia, called Rabatamana, (al. Rabbath-Ben-Ammon) and there plundred all the Country thereabout, marched thitherward, and came near to the little hillocks of earth, whereon the City stood, and having gone about and viewed them, he found that there were two onely wayes to get into it; and therefore planted his batteries against those places, committing the charge of the works, of the one to Nicarchus, of the other to Theodotus, to make breaches in the wal: and when they were made, and the walls quite thrown down, sooner than could have been imagined: the Kings men laboured day and night without any intermissions and with all the might they possibly could, to get into the City, but could do no good, by reason of the multitude of people that were within to maintain the breaches. At last, one of the prisoners in the Camp shewed them a vault, or hollow way under ground, by which they came down to get them water:

water: which no sooner had he stopt up, but they were forced to yeild for want of water. The King having thus gotten the place, left Nicarchus with a sufficient Garrison to keep it: and sent Hippolochus and Kiras, which had revolted from Ptolemei to him, with 5 thousand Foot to the Country joyning upon Samaria, to govern that province, and to safe-guard those, who were his friends in those parts, and acknowledged him for their Sovereign; and went himself with his army to Ptolemais, purposing there to winter, [Ibid. pag. 414, 415.]

b. Cn. Servilius, entered his Consulship at Rome, upon the Ides, or 7 day of March. Now among other prodigies, which were from sundry places certified to the Senate at that time, this was one, That in Sardinia, the body of the Sun seemed to be lesse, than it used to be: and another, from Arpi, that the Sun and the Moon, seemed to fight each with other. Ca. Flamminius the other Consul, who was with the army in the Spring of this year, fought unluckily with Hannibal, at the Lake of Thrasimene, in Hetruria, and was there slain with 15 thousand of his men, [Liv. lib. 22.] There was that year an Eclipse of the Sun seen in Sardinia, upon the 11 of our February, and [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 442.] telleth us, that as well that great battle at Thrasimene, as that other between Antiochus and Philopator, concerning Cœlosyria, were both fought toward the later end of the 3 year of the 150 Olymp. the later of which, fought at a place called Raphia; is by him described in this wise.

In the beginning of this Spring, saith he, Antiochus and Ptolemei, having all things provided for the purpose, were now upon the point to try it out for the mastery of Cœlosyria, in a main battle: Ptolemei therefore with 70 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand Horse, and 73 Elephants, set out from Alexandria, [Id. ib. pag. 421.] and made his first encamping at Pelusium, where he stayed till the rest of his army came in to him: and having there given every man his allowance of corn, he marched on thorough a country destitute of water, near the mountain Casius, and the Barathra, and so came to Gaza: and after five dayes march, came to the place which he intended; and there encamped, within 50 furlongs of Raphia, which is the first City of Syria, saving onely Rhinocorura, which a man meets withal coming out of Egypt, to go into Cœlosyria, [Ibid. pag. 422.]

Antiochus also at the same time, came thither with his army, consisting of 72 thousand Foot, 6 thousand Horse, and 102 Elephants: and passing by the walls of Raphia, encamped the first night about 10 furlongs, and the next day came within 5 furlongs of Ptolemeis Camp, [Ibid.]

At that time, Theodotus the Etolian, who was formerly a man well known in Ptolemeis Court, and one who had well observed his courses and manner of doings: with two onely in his company, about break of day, came within his trenches, and the night following, got into the Kings Pavilion, hoping alone to have done the feat, and there to have slain the King; but Dositheus (who was by extraction a Jew, but one who had fallen away from the Religion of his fathers) removing the King to another Tent, had caused another man of mean quality, to lie that night in the Kings bed: Theodotus therefore, that night brake into the Kings Tent, and there wounded two of the Bed-chamber, and slew one Andræas, the Kings chief Physician; and so returned untoucht, into his own Tent again, [Ibid. and 1 of the Macchab. cap. 3. v. 3, 4.]

After they had there laien 5 dayes, looking one upon the other, they then both resolved for a battle, [Polyb. ibid.] and fight they did; in which fight, when Antiochus appeared to have far the better of it, Arsinoe, Ptolemei's sister, went among the souldiers, with her hair hanging about her eares, and crying to them, that they would stand to it, and in that battle defend their own wives and children; promising them, if they came conquerors out of the field, to give every of them, two pounds in gold: whereby it came to passe, that the souldiers took fresh courage, and slew their enemies down-right, and took of them many prisoners, [1 Maccab. cap. 3. v. 5, 6. with Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 424, 425.]

In that fight, Antiochus lost little lesse than 10 thousand of his Foot, and upward of 300 Horse: besides prisoners taken, above 4000. of his Elephants there were 3 killed in the fight, two died afterward of their hurts. Of Ptolemeis side, there were slain 1500 Foot, and 700 Horse; of his Elephants 16 were killed on the place, and the rest for the most part taken, [Polyb. ibid. pag. 427.]

Antiochus, having buried his dead, returned home with the rest of his army; and Ptolemei took back again, both Raphia, and the rest of the places which had been taken from him, upon the voluntray surrender of the inhabitants: every man striving who should be formost, in acknowledging him their Lord, and returned to his subjection; especially the Cœlosyrians, a Nation naturally, and of themselves, ever inclined to the service of the Ptolemeis; upon this occasion, exceeded all others, in honouring him, with Crowns, Sacrifices, Altars, and other such like expressions of their affection, [Ibid. pag. 427, 428.] And Ptolemei going to visit the Cities next adjoyning to that place, bestowed gifts upon their temples, and thereby heartened up the people to continue in his service, [1 Maccab. 3. 7.]

When the Jews sent some of their Sanedrin, and Elders, to tender him their service, and to present him with gifts, and withal, to congratulate him after so great a victorie; it fell out, that he was thereby made the more forward to go thither, and to honour the City with his presence: and when he came, fell into an admiration of the beauty of their temple, and would fain have gone into the sanctum sanctorum; whereinto it was not lawfull for any man to go, save for the High Priest onely, and that but once in the year neither. But when the Jews stoutly resisted that motion, and the King upon their refusal desired the more and more to go in, and now all the Temple was filled with crying and howling, and the City, with tumult and sedition: then Simon the High Priest, kneeling down towards the Temple, to wit, between the Temple and the Altar, powred out his prayer unto God, begging his help, in this needful time of trouble: whereupon, the King fell into such a horror of mind and body, that he was unneath able to speak, and so was carried half dead out of the Temple, [3 Macchab. cap. 1. & 2.]

So soon as Antiochus was returned to Antioch, he sent Antipater, his brothers son, and Theodotus Hemiolius his Ambassadors to Ptolemei, to entreat of a peace between them. And Ptolemei, contenting himself with his unlookt for victory, and with the recovery of Cœlosyria, after a few high words to the Ambassadors used, and complainings against the unjust dealings of Antiochus, granted a truce for a year, and sent Sosibius to ratifie it with him, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 428. with Justin lib. 30. cap. 1.]

d. Ptolemei, having spent three moneths in Syria, and Phœnicia, to settle matters there in the several Cities and States, left Andromachus of Aspendus in Asia, to govern all that Country, and so with his sister Arsinoe, and his Nobles returned to Alexandria; having put such an end to this war against Antiochus, as his subjects, who knew the course of his life, much wondred at it. And Antiochus having confirmed the truce in the presence of Sosibius; set himself presently to begin a war upon Achæus, as he formerly intended to do, [Polyb. Ib.]

3788. Antiochus, having spent the winter in making his provisions, with all possible care, the next spring set forward, and passing the mount Taurus, made a league with Attalus, and began his war upon Achæus, [Id. ib. pag. 444, 446.] whom, whiles he besieged in Sardes, there passed between them sundry skirmishes, day and night, without ceasing: the souldiers on either side omitting no opportunity; but striving by all means, and lying at catch to entrap one another, and to fight upon all advantages, [Id. ib. lib. 7. pag. 566.] 4498. 216.

When the Galls, whom Attalus had planted in Hellespont, besieged the City of Ilium, the Alexandrenses, which dwelt in Troas; sent their Captain Themistas with four thousand men, and turned them going out of all the territorie of Troas, by keeping all provisions from them, and making head every where against them: and when they could stay no longer there, they went and possessed themselves of the City called Arisba, and the territories of Abidus; and from thence issued out, and sought to get the rest of the Country thereabout into their hands, making incessant war upon them. Whereupon Prusias, king of Bythinia, drew out against them, and fought with them, and first slew the men in fight; and that done, fell upon their Camp, and there utterly destroyed their wives and children, and all the race of them, and gave the spoile of them to the souldier, for their pains, [Id. lib. 5. pag. 44.]

Ptolemei, returning into Egypt, fell again to his old trade of living, casting off all care of any thing that good was, and wallowing in all filthery of gluttony and luxury, [Id. ib. lib. 14. in Excerpt. Hen. Valesf. pag. 62.] for, growing more and more mad in this kind; he not onely glutted himself with uncleannesse and lechery, but also vexed the Jews of Alexandria, with infamous and false reports cast abroad against them, and sought all means to turn them away from the true worship of the living God, and such as would not, he commanded to be slain; and turning them out of all place of office or dignity, markt them with hot irons in the face, with the signe of an ivie leaf, because that was the badge of Bacchus: but they that would fall from their religion, those he suffered to enjoy equal rights and priviledges with the native Macedons in Alexandria.

Hereupon, many there were that abandoned their religion, in compliance to the Kings will, and others bought their peace, and saved their lives, and escaped their marking in their faces with hot irons, for their mony. But they, who continued in the religion of their forefathers, held themselves punctually to their allegeance to the King, but would not converse or communicate in any kind with those of their own nation, who had apostatized from their religion; whereof their enemy made presently this construction, as if they opposed the King in his power and government, and sought to turn away the subject from his obedience. Whereupon Philopator, growing wroth with with the Jews, not onely of Alexandria, but even thoroughout all Egypt, sent forth order to have them all gathered together into one place, purposing there to destroy them all. Now there was an inventory taken of them by the Kings officers, 40 dayes long; to wit, from the 25 day of the moneth Pachon, to the 4 of the moneth Epiphi, that is, according to the sixt year of Alexandria, (which some later Chronologers without all reason, would have never to have been in use, till after the Sea fight at Actium, between Augustus and Antony) from the 20 day of our May, to the 29 of July following: and the day of the massacre was designed to have been for 3 dayes space; to wit, from the fifth of Epiphus inclusively, to the seventh of the same.

Upon the time appointed, the Jews of Alexandria were all brought, (as we would say) into Smithfield, there to be first reviled and set at naught, by all that passed by: then the King called for Hermon, Master of the Elephants, and gave him order against the next day to make his Elephants, to the number of 500, to drink and fill themselves with wine mingled with myrrh, or frankincense; that growing more fierce and starke mad therewith, they might so be let go, and driven upon the Jews; and either teare or tread them all to pieces. But the next day, the King fell into a dead sleep, and awaked not till dinner time; and by that time all the people that came thither to see, seeing nothing done, were gone home again. And upon the third day, when the Elephants were all prepared, and ready to fall upon them; there appeared two Angels, very terrible to look on, coming down from heaven, which so amazed all the company there present, that they stood amazed, and stirred not: The King also himself fell into a trance, and his fury towards those poor prisoners, relented; but above all, the Elephants, instead of falling upon them, turned short, and fiercely ran upon the souldiers, that, according to the custom, came in the reare of them, and trode them under-foot, all save such as could shift for themselves by fleeing.

Then the King commended the Jews for their constancy, and caused their fetters to be knockt off, and acknowledged, that their God it was, that had so delivered them; and for 7 dayes long, to wit, from the 7 of Epiphus, till the 14 of the same, (i.e.) from the second of our July, to the ninth of the same, feasted them: after which, the Jewes thus saved, obtained leave of the King, that they might do to death such of their own Nation, as had apostatized from their Religion; saying, that those who, for their bellies sake, had forsaken the Lawes and Commandments of their God, would never prove faithful to their King. Of this sort therefore they slew 300 in the way as they went; and came at last to Ptolemaiis, seated upon the River Nile, in Arsinoite Nomo, which from the abundance of Roses there growing, is surnamed Rhodophorus, where their Fleet attended them 7 dayes. There they altogether made a feast of thanksgiving; the King himself making every man a large allowance for his charge upon the way homeward: Whereupon they returned joyfully home, some by land, some by sea, some by the River, every man as his way lay. All which is more at large set forth and described in the 3 book of the Macchabees, which Philostorgius in the beginning of his Ecclesiastical History, calleth Librum portentosum, (i.e.) A book of miracles; and setting forth nothing like unto the first.

The Egyptians grown insolent, and proud with their successe at the battle of Raphia against Antiochus, never cared for Philopator afterward; but sought them a Head and Captain of their own, as having power enough in themselves to quell the like of him: which at last, and that not very long after, they did, [Polyb. lib. 5. cap. 444.]

3789. Philopator therefore was now forced to make a war upon his rebelling subjects, [Id. ibid.] wherein, there is no doubt, but the Jewes upon this obligation so lately by him 4499. 215 laid upon them, stood firm unto him. At least, this appears out of Eusebius, and Jornandes his Chron. that about this time, there were no lesse than 60 thousand of them slain in a battle; which so great a slaughter of them, caused perhaps Demetrius, who wrote a book of the Kings of the Jewes, to think it reason, to reckon the years, which ran from the captivity of Babylon, or the carrying away of the Jews into Assyria, downward to the reign of this Philopator: as we read in Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1. Stromat.] Whence also we gather, that this Demetrius the Historian, wrote after the dayes of Philopator; and yet before that vast desolation brought upon the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes: to which especially, if it had ever come to his knowledge, I could easily, and upon very good grounds imagine, that he would have applied the termes of those former calamities, which befel that Nation.

The City of Sardes, all save the Castle, was thorough the industry of Lagoras the Cretian, taken by Antiochus, in the second year after he began to lay siege unto it. Polyb. Lib. 7, 4, pag. 506. to pag. 510.]

Sosibius, who managed all matters in Egypt, under Philopator; dealt with one Bolis, a Cretian, how to deliver Achæus, who lay besieged in the Castle at Sardes, out of this danger. But he, treating with Cambylus, the Captain of the Cretians, which served under Antiochus, got Achæus out of the Castle, indeed by a train, but delivered him alive into Antiochus his hand: and Antiochus, having gotten him, caused his hands and his feet first to be cut off; then his head to be chopt off, and to be sowed up in an asses belly, and his body to be hung upon a crosse. The rest in the Castle, some holding with Ariobazus the Governour of Sardes, others with Laodice, the now Relict of Achæus, and daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, and both at variance among themselves, quickly resolved to put themselves, Castle and all, into the power of Antiochus, and so submitted all to him, [Polyb. lib. 8. pag. 522. and pag.

Ptolemei Philopator had by his wife, and the same his sister, Euridice, a son called Egypt, [Justin lib. 30. cap. 1, 2.] whose birth day was first solemnly celebrated by all the great men and others of Syria, and the Country thereabouts of his dominion, at home, and then they made every man a journey to Alexandria, there to bid him Joy of his young son. Among the rest, Josephus the Jew, the son of Tobias, and of the daughter of Simon, surnamed the Just, the High Priest, collector of his tributes thoroughout Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestina, sent his youngest son Hyrcanus, begotten of the daughter of Solymius, his elder brother, to kisse the Kings hand; with letters to his agent Arion, who had the managing of all his monies at Alexandria, amounting to no lesse than three thousand talents, to furnish him with monies, to buy the most rich and pretious present for the King, that that place could afford. And whereas the others, that went highest, presented the King not with above 20 talents; Hyrcanus brought with him an hundred beautifull boys, and as many maidens, and put in each of their hands a thousand talents, to offer them, the boys to the King, the maids to Cleopatra the Queen, for a present: which so great and unexpected a present, the King much admired, and not onely entertained the young man with all princely honour, and royal gifts, but also by him wrote his royal letters, commendatory on his behalf to his father, and brethren, and to all his Commanders, and chief Officers in those parts, and so dismissed him, with all kind of honour that he could do him. But his brethren, (who were seven in number, yet all begotten of another Venter) seeing what great honour the King had done him, agreed among themselves to meet him as he was upon his journey homeward, and to murder him, not without the privity of the father himself, who, being angry with him for the profuse expense which he made of his monies in his presents to the King, cared not now what became of him: but when his brothers set upon him, he slew two of them, and sundry others of their company.

And when he came to Jerusalem, and saw that no man there would look upon him, he, for fear of the worst, withdrew himself to the parts beyond Jordan, and there kept

Philippus, King of Macedon, fought two several battles against the Etolians, borne up though they were with succours from Rome, and from Attalus the King, and in both battels overthrew them: and received shipping from Prusius, King of Bithynia: and both Attalus, and P. Sulpitius, the Pro-consul in those parts, wintered that year in the Isle of Egina, [Liv. lib. 27.] See also [Polyb. lib. 10. pag. 612, 613, and

In the beginning of the Spring, Sulpitius, and Attalus, joyning together, sailed to Lemnos, and from thence coming into Eubœa, took Oreum and Opus. And then Attalus hearing that Prusias had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, left the Romans, and the war in Etolia, and sailed into Asia; and Philippus came to Elatia, where he had appointed the Ambassadors from Ptolemei, and from the Rhodians to meet him, and there, when they treated of putting an end to the war in Etolia, news was brought them, that Niachanidas the tyrant of Lacedemon, was ready to fall upon the Eleans, whilst they were busie about their solemne Games at Olympus, [Id. lib. 28.] and this Summer began the 143. Olympiade.

3797. [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 719.] tells us, that Arsinoe the Queen, and sister of Ptolemei, was murdered by one Philammon, set on by Sosibius. See also [Hen. Vales. Excerpt. pag. 65.] and we find also in [Justin, lib. 30. cap. 1.] that Philopator slew his wife and 4507. 207.
sister, Eurydice: Whereby it should seem, that Polybius his Arsinoe, and Justin his Eurydice, and Livies and Josephus his Cleopatra, [sup. an. Mund. 3794, and 3795.] were all one and the same woman.

But whatever her name was, when she was dead, Philopator, falling in love with one Agathoclia, a dressing woman, and with her brother Agathocles in a sodomitical way, set this Agathocles, to the wonderment of all men, at the helme of his kingdom: being a man of no Court-wit at all, nor ever versed in any point of State affairs; and with them took in also their mother Oenanthe, who, by her two childrens means, engaged the Kings affection to her self also. Agathocles, keeping always close to the King, ruled the whole State: and the women bestowed all offices of the State, with all commandership, and captain-ships in the army where they pleased; and the King himself, who was now in their hands, could do the least of any man, in his own kingdom, [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 720. *and in Excerpt. But when the people wanted a man, by whose hand to wreak their anger upon Agathocles, and Agathoclia, they were fain to be quiet for the present; yet had their eye still upon one Tlepolemus, and fed themselves with some hope in him, [Polyb. pag. 66. Excerpt. Vales.] This young man, who had ever carryed himself eminently, and with great honour in the war, had at that time the managing of the Kings treasure committed to him; which when he used, not as an officer, but rather like a young heir, he fell into the dislike and hatred of the Court: Whereupon, when Ptolemæus the son of Sosibius, (of whom I spake ere while) returned from Philippus out of Macedon, with the other Ambassadors, it should seem, who had been sent thither the year before, began to speak his mind somewhat freely of Tlepolemus, he found every man at Court, ready to applaud him in his way, [Idem. lib. 16. pag. 82, 85. and Excerpt. Vales.] assembly complained of Tlepolemus, and Tlepolemus on the other side, set himself to frame one general accusation against them all to the King: which Sosibius hearing, (who had both the keeping of the Kings Seale, and custody of his person) gave up the Seale into Tlepolemus his hand; which he receiving, did all things afterward at his pleasure in the State, [Ibid. pag. 85, 86.]

the College of the Decemviri, a certain saying, written in the books of Sibylla, which were in their keeping, to this purport, and in these words. Quandocunque hostis alienigena, &c. That whensoever a forreign enemy should make war upon Italy, he might be driven out again and overcome, if the image of the Mother of the gods at Ida, which fell from heaven, were sent for, and brought to Rome. Whereupon, there were five Ambassadors dispatcht away presently to King Attalus, to desire her of him, and to bring her by sea unto him. These five, had each of them a ship of five tire of oares, to go in; to the end they might appear in a fashion answerable to the honour and dignity of the State of Rome, in those parts, where they were at their first arrival to ingratiate themselves, and to beget an opinion of the Roman name and Majesty of their State. Attalus received and entertained these Ambassadors at Pergamus, with all expressions of love and kindness; and then led them to Pessinuntis in Phrygia, and there delivered into their hands that sacred Stone, which the people there said, was the mother of the gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome, as they desired, [lib. 29.]

In the prologue to the 30 book of Trogus, it is noted, that Antiochus in that journey of his, quieted all the upper Provinces of Asia, as far as Bactria. But there, when he long laboured, though all in vain, to turn Euthydemus out of that Province; he was fain, in the end, to come to an agreement, and make a league with him: for the ratifying whereof, when he sent his own son, called Demetrius, to Antiochus; Antiochus seeing his behaviour, judged him a man fit to be a King, and first promised to give him one of his daughters to wife; and then gave his father leave to take upon him the title of a king: and lastly, having subscribed to the other articles of the league between them made, and taken his oath for the true observance of them, removed with his Camp; having first distributed provisions largely among his own souldiers, and received from Euthydemus all the Elephants, which he had with him, [Polyb. lib. 11. page 651.]

Then

Then passing the Caucasus, he re-entered upon India, and there renewed the league, and friendship formerly made with Sophagasenus their King, and there he received more Elephants from him, and then distributed a further admeasurement of corn among his army and so returned, leaving Androsthenes of Cyzicum, to bring after him the treasure, which Sophagasenus had promised to put into his hand. [Id. Ib. pag. 652.]

3800. Then came he into Arachosia, from whence, passing the river Erymanthus, and going thorough the Country of Drangia, he came into Carmania, and there, because the winter season come on, he quartered his army about the Country, [Ibid.] 4510 204

The Romans made a peace with Philippus King of Macedon; and into this league were taken by Philippus, Prusias the King of Bythinia, and by the Romans, the state of Ilium, and Attalus the King of Pergam. [Id. ib.]

Philopator died at Alexandria, leaving for his successor Ptolemeus, surnamed Epiphanes, (i. e.) the Noble or Illustrious, whom Appianus in his Syriac. surnameth also Philopator, after his fathers sur-name. He succeeded his father at the age of four yars, as Hieronym. upon the 11 of Daniel sayes, or of five, as Justin, and he reigned 24 years: as [Cl. Ptolem. in Reg. Can. Clemens Alexandr. Porphyr. Euseb. and Jerom] tell us.

Philopators death was concealed a long time, whiles Agathoclia and Oenanthe her mother, rifled the Kings cofers, and got all his monies into their hands, and so put the state and kingdom into the power of their own lewd consorts, [Justin l. 40. c. 2.] Till at length Agathocles, calling together the principal of the Macedons, came forth unto them, and bringing with him his sister Agathoclia, and the young King, tells them; That the King, when he lay a dying, delivered the child into his sisters bosom, and commended him to hers and his care; and withall produced the testimony of one Critolaus, who testified that Tlepolemus was about to invade the kingdom, and to set the Crown of Egypt upon his own head. And when he still continued to utter the same words in all places where he came; every man scorned him. And he, to make his disagreement with Tlepolemus yet more apparent to the world, took Danae, Tlepolemus his mother in law, out of the Temple of Ceres, and dragged her thorough the open streets, and bare faced to prison; and then took Moeragenes one of the guard, because he gave information of all things to Tlepolemus, and favoured his partie, (as he could do no lesse, in regard of that intimacy that was between him and Adæus, the Governour of Bubastis) and delivered him into the hands of his Secretary Nicostratus, to be tortured: but when he strangly escaped the rack, and got out of their hands stark naked, as he was, he fled to the Macedons, and stirred them up against Tlepolemus. [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 712, 713, 714.]

And now when the people of all sorts came flocking to the Court, in a tumultuous manner, Agathocles, taking the King with him, went and hid himself, in a place called Syringes, which was a gallery or walk, which had every way three walls and gates to passe, before one could come unto it. But the Macedons forced him to deliver up the King into their hands; and they, having gotten him, brought him out to the people, and there set him in a Royol Throne: to the great joy and comfort of all that saw him. And not long after, was brought fourth also Agathocles, well fettered; but the first that met him, cut his throat. Then came Nico, and then Agathoclia all naked with her sisters, and all the generation of them: and last of all, the old beldam Oenanthe, haled out of the Temple all naked, and set upon a jade, was brought into the Piatsoe, and being all together delivered up to the peoples pleasure, some fell a tearing them with their teeth, some lanced them with their knives, others pulled out their eyes, and as any of them happened to be killed, they presently fell to pulling them in pieces, untill there was no signe of any of them left. At the same time also, the damsels, who attended upon Arsinoe, whiles she lived, hearing that Philammon, whose hand was principally used in the murder of her, was come from Cyrene to Alexandria, brake into his house, and there slew him, with staves and stones; and finding there a little child of his, strangled it, and dragged his wife stark naked into the street, and there cut her throat, [Ibid. pag. 716, 718, 719.] And then afterward, when the tumult and fury of the people was over; the management of the affairs of the kingdom, was committed to one Aristomenes, born in Acarnania, [Ibib. pag. 717. & lib. 17. pag. 771, 772.] and he, being made governour of the King and kingdom, administred the affairs thereof, with a great deal of moderation and wisdom, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 294.]

Antiochus, King of Syria, and Philippus, King of Macedon, hearing of the death of Philopator, entered into a wicked consultation together, how to share his kingdom, between them two; encouraging one another, to begin with the murder of the young King that was, [Id. lib. 15. pag. 705, Livie, lib. 31. Justin, lib. 30. cap. 3.] whereof

Polybius

Polybius in special, [lib. 3. pag. 159.] speaketh in this wise; Πτολεμαίε τε̃ Βασιλέως μεταλάξαντος τὸν βίον, &c. (i.e.) When Ptolemei the King was departed this life, Antiochus and Philippus, laid their heads together, to share the estate of the young King between them, and began a wicked practice. Philip laying hands upon Egypt and Caria, and Antiochus, upon Cœlosyria, and Phœnicia. And Jerom upon [11. Dan.] Philippus, saith he, King of Macedon, and Antiochus the great, conspiring together, made war upon Agathocles, (he would have said, Aristomenes) and the young King Ptolemæus Epiphanes, upon this condition, that each of them, should take of his Dominions, what lay next him: which gives a light to that place in [Josephus, lib. 18. Antiquit. cap. 3.] where he saith; When Antiochus Magnus reigned in Asia, Judæa and Cœlosyria both, lived in a continual trouble and vexation, by reason of the continual war which he had, first with Philopator, and afterward with Epiphanes his son, for whether he had the better of it or the worse, these countries were ever plagued by him, being tossed and tumbled between his prosperous and adverse fortunes, like a ship in the sea, between contrary waves: Yet at length, Antiochus had the upper hand, and laid Judæa unto his Dominions. But when Philopator was dead, Epiphanes sent a great army into Cœlosyria, under his General Scopas, who recovered both Cœlosyria, and our Country also, to himself again, &c. For this is that he would, at least he should, say, that Antiochus after a long war with Philopator and Epiphanes, concerning the Dominion of the land of Judea, got it at last from Epiphanes; and Epiphanes by his General Scopas, recovered it from him again, and anon after, lost it a second time unto him: which Eusebius not perceiving, in the 10 year of Philopater, saith, that Antiochus having overcome Philopator, joyned Judæa to the rest of his Dominions. And an. 1. of Epiphanes, in his Chron. saith, that Ptolemæus Epiphanes, by his General Scopas, took Judæa. Whereas Antiochus, after his overthrow at Raphia, is no where read to have made war upon Philopator any more: and that the league, which was after that battle made between them, was first broken by Antiochus in the very first year of Epiphanes, (when Scopas was not yet imployed in the management of that war, as hereafter shall appear) is shewed by Jerom upon [11. Dan.] where he he saith, When Ptolemæus Philopator was dead, Antiochus brake the league, made with him, and led an army against Ptolemei his son, who was then but 4 years old, and was surnamed Epiphanes.

3801. When Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, were Consuls in Rome, it fell out, that at Frusino, the Sun seemed to be encompassed round with a little circle, and then that circle again, was surrounded by a greater body of the Sun, [Liv. lib. 30.] and it should seem, that was none other but that very Eclipse of the Sun, which the Astronimical tables shew us to have fallen this year, upon the 6 day of our May, according to the Julian Calender. 4511. 203.

The Carthaginians, worn out with the continual victories of P. Scipio, and despairing of all other safety against him; called Hannibal out of Italy, to their rescue: and he after 16 years stay in Italy, thereupon left it, and returned into Afric, [Id. ibid.]

Philippus, King of Macedon, sent one Heraclides a Tarentine born, and a most vicious fellow, to Rhodes, to destroy their Fleet: and then sent Ambassadors into Creet, to stir them up to a war against the Rhodians, [Polyb. lib. 13, pag. 672, 673.]

There was a sea fight between Philippus King of Macedon, and the Rhodians, near to the Isle of Lada; wherein he took two of their ships of five tire of oares apiece. The rest of their Fleet, fleeing into the open sea, were lighted on by a foul tempest, and driven ashoar, first upon Myndia, and the next day upon Coos: But the enemy, trailing the ships which they had so taken, at their poupes, went into Lada, which lieth over a-which the Milesians perceiving, they presented not Philippus onely, but even Heraclides himself, with Crowns, at their entering into Miletus, [Idem, in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 70, and 73.] out of Zeno and Antisthenes, two Rhodian Historians.

Philippus, wanting corn, ceased not to waste all Attalus his country, even to the very walls of Pergamus: but when he could neither take any one City of his, because they were so well fenced, nor get corn or other spoil out of the Country, by the exquisite order which Attalus had taken to prevent him: then he fell upon the Temple and Altars, and spoiled them, breaking the very stones of them in pieces, that they might never be put together again. And having utterly destroyed the Nicephorian Grove, planted near the City Pergamus, and laid many a Church and Chappel thereabouts level with the ground: he went from thence first towards Thyatira, but then turned back again, and went to a field called Thebes, hoping to get some great booty there; but failing there also, and coming to a place called Hiera-Come, he sent messengers to Zeuxis, Governour of Lydia under Antiochus, desiring him to supply him with provisions for his army, according to the articles of peace, between his Master and him: but Zeuxis made at first as if, by all means, he would do according to those articles: what else? but indeed resolved to do nothing whereby any good might come to Philippus,

This Philippus had another ſea fight againſt Attalus and the Rhodians, near the Iſle of Chios; in which there were ſlain of the Rhodians 60. of Attalus his men, to the number of 70 men, but of Philippus his part, were ſlain of his Macedons 1200, and of his aides and aſſociates, to the number of 6000. There were alſo taken priſoners of the Macedon nation, with their fellows, 2000, and 700 Egyptians. Neverthele ſſe, Philippus, though he had every way the worſt of it, yet chalenged the honour of the day to himſelf in two reſpects: one was, for that Attalus being forced to fly to Erythræ, he had ſeized on his Ammiral, and trailed her at one of his ſhips tails into his port; The other was, for that himſelf coming on ſhoar at Argenaum, a fore-land in Ionia, he there took up his ſtanding, to recover what might be ſaved out of the naverage, [Polyb. lib. 16. from pag. 723. to pag. 730.]

When Philippus beſieged Prinaſſa, a City of Caria, and could do nothing upon it by plain force; yet at length he got it by a ſtratageme, [Id. Ibid. pag. 730, 731.] and put Garriſons into Iaſſus, Bargyllis, and the City of the Euromenſes, [Ib. pag. 731. & lib. 17. pag. 744.]

3803. P. Cornelius Scipio utterly overthrew Hannibal. in Afric. and this was the laſt battle of this ſecond Carthaginian war; we read in Zonaras, that the Carthaginians were amazed at a total eclipſe of the ſon which fell at this time: but that this was no ſuch great eclipſe, we find by Livie, [lib. 30.] who ſaies, that indeed the body of the ſon at Cumæ ſeemed to be ſomewhat leſſened: and the Aſtronomical Tables ſhew as much, and tell us of a very ſmall eclipſe of the ſun, this year, upon the 19 of our Octob. Some there are, who ſay that Hannibal flying out of the battle, came to the ſea ſide, where he found a ſhip laid for him; and therein ſailed directly into Aſia, to King Antiochus: and that when Scipio demanded of the Carthaginians, firſt, and above all things, to deliver Hannibal into his hand, anſwer was made him, that Hannibal not in Afric. [Liv. Ibid.] But others more truly, that Scipio neither demanded him at all of them, nor any wayes inſulted upon his overthrow. [Plutarch in T. Q. Flaminio.] 4513 201

When Phyilippus came toward Abydus, they ſhut their gates againſt him, not admitting ſo much as his meſſengers, which he ſent unto them: he lay long in ſiege before that place; and they might have eſcaped his hands, had Attalus and the Rhodians made any ſpeed to their reſcue. But Attalus ſent them in onely 300 men for a ſupply; and the Rhodians, who with their whole fleet lay at Tenedus thereby, ſent them one onely ſhip of four tire of oares to help them. The men in Abydus, at firſt, having good ſtore of Engines all about their walls, kept him off very manfully, not onely from making his approaches by land, but alſo, from coming into their port by ſea. But afterward, when a breach was made upon the main wall, and they had caſt up another within it, and the Macedons went to undermine that alſo, then were they fain to ſend to Philip, to treat of conditions for a ſurrender, one of which was, That the Rhodian ſhip, with the ſouldiers and mariners in her, might depart in ſafety; the like for Attalus his men that were in the Town: and the laſt, That they themſelves might depart with one ſuit of cloathes onely upon their backs. But when they could get no anſwer from him, unleſſe they rendred themſelves wholly and abſolutely to his mercy; they, what with indignation, what with deſpair, grew into ſuch a rage, that they made fifty of their principall men to ſwear openly, That if they ſaw the inner wall once taken by the enemy, they would preſently go and kill every man his own wife and children, and throw his ſilver, gold, and jewels, into the ſea: and that done, the ſouldiers bound themſelves in common, each to other, that either they would vanquiſh their enemies, or die every man of them ſword in hand, and fighting for his Country. [Liv. lib. 31. Polyb. lib. 16. pag. 736, 737, 738.]

About the ſame time came Ambaſſadors to Rome from Attalus and the Rhodians, both, complaining of the wrongs done them by Philippus and his Macedons, to whom anſwer was made, that the Senate, would take the affairs of Aſia into their conſideration and care. [Livie, lib. 32. with Juſtin lib. 30. cap. 3.]

Three *A*mbaſſadors were ſent from Rome to Ptolemei and *A*ntiochus, to put an end to all differences between them. The *A*mbaſſadors were, C. Clau. Nero. Mar, Emil. Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus; who coming to Rhodes, and there hearing of the ſiege of Abydus, and deſirous to have ſome ſpeech with Philippus, as they had in their inſtructions to do, put of their journey to Ptolemei and Antiochus, for the preſent, and ſent Emilius the youngeſt of the three, unto Philippus; and he meeting with him at Abydus, gave him to underſtand, that the ſenate of Rome had a purpoſe, to deſire him to forbear making war upon any City of the Grecians, nor lay hands or touch any thing belonging to Ptolemei King of Egypt. This if he did, he might live in peace; if he did not, he should know, that the Romans were resolved, and ready to make war upon him: to whom Philippus returned this answer, Thy age, saith he, and comliness of thy person, and above all, the name of a Roman, makes thee speak thus high: but I would advise you, to remember the league and covenant made, and to keep peace with me: if not, I am also resolved to do my endeavour, and to make you know and feel, that the power and name of a Macedon is no way inferiour to, or lesse noble than that of a Roman is. [Id. Ibid. with Polyb. pag. 738, 739, 787, 388.]

Justin, [lib. 30, cap. 30.] tells us, that this M. Emil. Lepidus, was sent also by the Romans into Egypt, to govern the Kingdom of Egypt, on the behalf of this young Ptolemeus Epiphanes. Whether moved thereto by an Embassage sent to them from Alexandria, that they would vouchsafe to take upon them the patronage and tutele-ship of the Minor, and defend the kingdom of Egypt, which Antiochus and Philippus were said already to have shared between them, [Ibid. cap. 2.] or whether, the Minor himself was by the father in his death-bed committed to their care and trust, as he elsewhere intimates, [lib. 31. cap. 1.] whereof [Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 6.] speaking, useth these words: When King Ptolemei had left the people of Rome Guardian to his son in his minority, the Senate sent M. Emil. Lepidus, High Pontif. and one that had been then twice Consul, to Alexandria, there to take care of the Wards estate, and was content to want the holiness of a most honourable, and withal, of a most upright man, and so long versed in their own affairs, to imploy it in the exercise of a forreign charge, rather than suffer the faith and trust of our City to have been implored in vain. For he conceived that this man had executed the office of a Guardian or Tutor in Egypt, whiles he was High Pontif. and when he had been already twice Consul in Rome; when as yet Epiphanes was dead before that time, the reason of which error in him was; because it should seem, he had seen some coine, wherein, together with those titles of his honour and dignity, he found this office of his, Guardian-ship in Egypt, joyned; for to this day, there are extant to be seen, some silver coines, with this inscription; on the one side thus, Alexandrea; and on the other thus, S. C. M. Lepidus Pont. Max. Tutor Reg. who also, in the Image side, is stamped, putting a Crown upon a young mans head, standing on his right hand, with a Scepter in his hand.

And now the Athenians, seeing their territory wasted all over by this Philip, sent and prayed in aide from all parts; from the Romans, from the Rhodians, from Attalus, and from Ptolemei, [Liv. lib. 31.]

Whereupon the Ambassadors of the Romans and Rhodians, meeting with Attalus at Athens, by a common consent, agreed to aide them: for which the Athenians presently decreed excessive honours, first to Attlus, then to the Rhodians; nay, they went so far, as to call one of their own Tribes, after his name, and made it supernumerary to their ten, that were before, [Id. Ib. Polyb. Legat. 3. pag. 786, 787.]

Whiles the Romans were busie in preparing war against Philippus, there came Ambassadors from Ptolemei, or rather from his Curators, to Rome, who informed, that the Athenians had craved aide of the King, against Philippus; But though they were confederates, both of the Kings, and the Romans, yet would he do nothing that way, nor send shipping, or army thither, or any whither else, for defence or offence of any, without the leave and authority of the people of Rome. That if the Romans would be pleased to undertake their quarrel, the King would be well content, to sit quiet at home: or if it pleased the Romans to sit quiet, He of himself should easily be able to furnish the Athenians with power enough to represse the force and violence of Philippus. The Senate decreed, That the King should be thanked for his kindnesse, and to tell him, that the Romans were purposed to defend and maintain their own friends and confederates themselves: If they wanted any thing necessary to this war, they would acquaint the King therewith; and that they knew well enough, that the Kings Forces and Means, as they were very great, so they were also very necessary for the defence of his own State. Then they ordered presents to be sent to the kings Ambassadors, to every of them 5 thousand pieces of brasse money, [Liv. ib.]

In the year 54. for so it is in the Greek Manuscript at Lambeth, not 52, as in the vulgar edition of the second Periode of Calippus, 547. of Nabonassar, the 16 day of the moneth Mesor, the 22 of our September, 7 hours after high-noon, there was an Eclipse of the Sun observed at Alexandria, [Cl. Ptol. lib. 4. cap. 11.]

3804. Toward the later end of Autumne, P. Sulpitius Galba, Consul, passed over with an 4514 200
army into Macedonia, against Philippus; and thither came to him Ambassadors from Athens, desiring him to deliver them from the siege, which was then laid unto them; whereupon was dispatcht away C. Claudius Cento, with a certain number of ships, fraught with souldiers, to the relief of Athens; for Philippus himself lay not before it; but was then busier then ever, at the siege of Abydus, [Liv. lib. 31.]

They of Abydus, remembring the oath they had made, fought it out so stifly, that when the night should have parted the fray between them; the king amazed at their courage, or rather at their rage in fighting, was fain to give off first, and to sound a retreate: But then Glaucides, and Theognetus, conferring with some of the Ancients of the Town; who had the hardest part in this tragedy to play, if it came to acting, when they saw that after the fight, there were but few of their men left, and they spent with wounds, and blood which they had lost, so soon as it was day, sent their Priests, in their priestly attire, to give up the Town to Philippus; which when the multitude perceived, they forthwith grew into so desperate a rage, that they ran to kill every man his own wife and children; and that done, slew every man himself in such manner as liked him best; some one way, some another. The King amazed at this strange fury of theirs, commanded his souldiers to forbear, saying, That he would give the Abydenians three dayes time to die in: in which space they acted more barbarous acts of cruelty upon themselves, than they could have expected from an enraged enemy, nor came any one of them alive into his enemies hand, that was out of bands, and at liberty to kill himself. The King, having seized on their wealth, which they had brought all into one place, with a purpose to destroy it, left a Garrison in the place, and departed, [Liv. Ib. Polyb. lib. 16. pag. 738. 739.]

Coming to Bargyllii, he there grew much troubled in his mind, to see the Romans, & Rhodians, and Attalus, and all confederated and preparing for a war against him: & when his army was allmost affamished, Zeuxis the governour of Lydia, and the Cities of Mylassa, Alabanda, and Milesia, sent him in some small provisions to relive them: and he, when they brought him in any thing, contrary to his nature; used all fair and flattering speeches to them: and when they forbare lending, was presently ready to mischief them: and in the end, when by the policie of Philocles, a train was laid to have blown up them of Mylassa, it miscarried through his own folly, and then went he and wasted the territorie of the Alabandi, his good benefactors, as if they had been his open enemies, giving onely for a reason, that his souldiers must not want meat, [Polyb. lib. 16. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 86, 89.]

In the 55 year of the second Periode of Calippus, in the 548 year of Nabonassar, on the ninth of the month Machir, about midnight, in the beginning of the 20. of our March, there was a total eclipse of the Moon at Alexandria, [Cl. Ptol. l. 4. c. 11.]

In the Summer following, the Romans, with the help of Attalus, and the Rhodians, made war upon Philippus, and his associates in Macedonia, [Livie lib. 31.]

Scopas, the prime man of all Etolia, sent from Alexandria by Ptolemei, with a great masse of mony, took up six thousand Foot, besides Horse, and shipt them away for Egypt: Nor would he have left a man there, able to bear arms, had not one Democritus put them in mind, sometime of the war, which they were ready to engage in, and sometime, of the solitude and nakednesse, which the Country would be left in, which caused a great part of the gallants that were going, to put off their arms, and stay at home: and this he did, but whether out of a true zeal to his Country, or because Scopas courted, and bribed not him, as he did others, was uncertain. [Id. ib.]

About this time Josephus, the son of Tobias, happening to depart this life; the people of Jerusalem rose in a combustion among themselves, in the quarrel of his sons, while the elder brothers, sought to make war upon their youngest brother Hyrcanus, of whom I spake before: for many of the Jews favoured the elder brothers, and among the rest, Simon the High Priest, for kindreds sake, [Josephus lib. 12. cap. 5.]

In the year 55, of the second Periode of Calippus, in the 548 year of Nabonassar, on the fifth of the moneth Mesor, at three a clock after midnight, upon the 12 of our Septemb. there was a total eclipse of the Moon at Alexandria, [Cl. Ptol. lib. 4. c. 11.]

Attalus, before the Autumnal equinox, recovered Oreum by surrender, he was present at the feast of Eleusis in Athens; and then having sent home Agesimbrotus and the Rhodians, himself returned into Asia, [Liv. lib. 31.]

3805. After Simon 2. succeeded his son Onias 3. in the High Priesthood of the Jews, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4, 5.] a good man, and a gracious, of a venerable aspect, meek in his carriage, and very advised in his language; and one, who, from his youth, framed himself to all behaviour tending unto a vertious life, [2 Macchab. 15. 12.] In the Fasti Siculi (for here Scaligers Greek Eusebian Fragments fail us,) he is said to have sate High Priest, 24 years. 4515. 199.

3806. Ptol. Epiphanes sent a great army under the command of Scopas, into Coelosyria, who, by main force recovered many Cities to him, and among them, the City of Jerusalem, as Josephus reports, [lib. 12. cap. 3. Antiquit.] adding thereto this testimony out of Polyb. lib. Histor. 16.] ὁ δὲ τοῦ Πτολεμαίου στρατηγὸς, &c. (i. e.) But Scopas, the General of Ptolemeis army, marching into the upper regions, subdued the nation of the Jews, in the winter season: whereof Jerom also, upon the 11 of Daniel speaking, saith thus: When Antiochus, saith he, held Judea, Scopas the Etolian was sent General of Ptolemeis forces, and fought valiantly against Antiochus, and took in Judea, and, carrying along with him the chief men of Ptolemeis party, returned into Egypt. 4516.

Mean

Mean while Antiochus invaded Attalus his kingdom, which at that time was unfurnished of all provisions for defence, because all was imployed for the Romans, in the Macedonian war, [Liv. lib. 32.]

b. The Senate of Rome, upon complaint thereof made by Attalus, sent their Ambassadors to Antiochus, to tell him, that the Romans at that time made use of Attalus his forces, by sea and land, against the Macedons, a common enemy to them both; and that the Romans would take it well at his hands, if he would hold his hands from medling with any part of his kingdom, for that present, and abstain from war against him; that it was fit and requisite, that such Kings that were in league and friendship with the people of Rome; should also live in peace and amitie between themselves. Upon hearing whereof, Antiochus presently drew off, and ceased from any further war making against Attalus. And Attalus dispatcht away his Ambassadors to the Senate of Rome, to thank them for this so great a befit received by their means, and offered a Crown of gold of 246 pound weight in the Capitol. [Id. ib.]

c. At this time, two fleets out of Asia, the one under Attalus the King, consisting of 24 ships, of five tire of oares a piece, the other from Rhodes, of 20 fighting ships, commanded by Agesimbrotus, both which joyning with the Roman fleet, pursued Philippus with all extremity, [Ibid.]

d. That Summer, Antiochus took in all the Cities of Cœlosyria, which Ptolemei there possessed, as Livie saith, [lib. 33.] and we likewise find in Chron. Euseb. that in the same summer, Antiochus, having overthrown Scopas in a battle, recovered all the the Cities of Syria, and grew friendly and favourably minded to the Jewish nation.

For Antiochus, meeting with Scopas at the heads of the river Jordan, (where the City Paneas was afterward built) there fought with him, and routed him; and when he had recovered the Cities, which Scopas had gotten from him, together with Samaria, the Jews voluntarily submitted to him: and receiving his whole army with his Elephants, into their City, maintained them very plentifully, and readily assisted them, in the siege of the Castle, whereinto Scopas had put a Garrison, which stood out against them: so Josephus, [lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 3.] confirming it further out of the very Epistle, which Antiochus himself wrote to Ptolemæus, the Captain of the Garrison there: where he also reports out of Polyb. [lib. 16.] how after the overthrow of Scopas, Antiochus took in Batanea, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and how the Jews who dwelt at Jerusalem, and that famous Temple there, put themselves into his hand, and how Antiochus took and destroyed Gaza, which stood out against him most constantly in the behalf of Ptolemei all which is delivered in the same book of Polyb. see Vales. Excerpt. [pag. 77. & 86.]

Zeno Rhodius, in his Local History, mentioned by Laertius [lib. 7.] hath at large described this battle fought at Panias, near the heads of the river Jordan, between Antiochus and Scopas, the chief heads of which narration of his, with the more exact censure of Polybius thereupon, with other Excerptions of his out of Polybius, the most learned Hen. Valesius hath given us, [pag. 77, 78, 81.] the issue whereof was, that Antiochus put Scopas to flight, and pursued him to Sidon, and there besieged him with 10 thousand men; and to rescue him, Ptolomei sent three renowned Captains of his, Eropus, Menocles, and Damoxenus; but could not raise the siege, till he for very hunger yielded, and was with his companies suffered to go all naked of the place, [Jerom

3807. upon Daniel, cap. 11.] 4517 197

So Antiochus by that victory gotten at Panias, recovered all Phænicia, and Cœlosyria, and the other Cities of the Country indeed of Syria, but belonging in right to the Kings of Egypt, [Justin. l. 31. cap. 1.] and left them to be held afterward by the Kings of Syria, [Polyb. Legat. 72. p. 893.] But himself returned to winter in Antioch. [Liv. l. 33.]

In the 551 year of Nabonassar, and the 3 years preceding, the 17 day of the moneth Athyr, which is moveable, and from which to the 21, as Plutarch in his book, De Iside & Osyride, teacheth us, was celebrated the feast of Isis, by the Egyptians, fell upon the 28 of our Decemb. upon which day, as we have shewed in the seventh chapter of our book, De Macedonum & Asianorum, anno solari, Eudoxus placed the winter Solstice. This when Dositheus, in his Octaeris, (which, Censorinus tells us, was attributed to Eudoxus) or in his Parapegma thereunto annexed, which he published at Coloniæ, near Athens, (or rather at Coloni, in Eolia) had noted in this time; thence came it to passe, that the Grecians fell into that opinion, which Geminus mentions, [c. 6.] of his Astronomical work, to wit, that the feast of Isis was allwayes kept upon the winter Solstice, or shortest day of the year, which error, as he there also sheweth, was formerly observed in Eratosthenes, in his Commentary De Octaeride.

In this winter season, Philippus came to a parlie with the Roman Consul, Ti. Quinctius Flaminius, to treat of a peace, and upon what conditions, among which Flaminius propounded this for one, That Philippus should restore unto Ptolemei K. of Egypt, all the cities which he had taken since the death of Ptol. Philopator, his father, [Polyb. 17. pag. 743, Liv. lib. 32.]

b. In the same year, between the two Islands of Theramene (al. Thera) and Therasia, and in the middest of the sea, lying between them, there was an Earthquake, by which there start up a new Island, with hot Springs, or Fountains of hot waters. And in Asia, upon the same day, an Earthquake shook Rhodes, and many other Cities, and overturned sundry houses in them, and some other Cities it swallowed up whole; whereupon their Priests and Soothsayers foretold, that the then rising Roman Empire, would swallow up and devour the kingdoms, both of Macedon, and Asia, [Justin, lib 30. cap. 4.]

c. In the beginning of the Spring, Flaminius, sending for Attalus to come to him to Elatia, went with him in company to Thebes, there to draw the Bœotians into a society and league with the Romans: where when Attalus made an Oration to them, to that effect, with more vehemency and stretching of his voice than his age would bear, being now grown old, whether by a vertigo taking him in his head, or by a rheume falling upon his throat, he grew suddenly speechlesse, and fell all along, and then being taken with a dead palsie in all one side of his body, lay sick thereof at Thebes. And Quintius, when he saw that there was no fear of present death, but onely a weaknesse of body, which required time for his recovery, left him there, and returned to Elatia, from whence he came, [Liv. in the beginning of 33 book, printed at Rome, out of the Manuscript of Bamberg, and at Paris an. 1616. with Plutarch in the life of Quinc. Flamin.]

At the same time also, Antiochus, sending his two sons, Ardues and Mithridates, before him by land, and willing them to stay for him at Sardes, set sail with an hundred tall fighting ships, and other smaller vessels, purposing by the way, to try what he could do, with the Cities of Caria and Cilicia, which were of Ptolemeis possession, and withal, to assist Philippus by sea and land, what he might: and having taken in first Zephyrium, and Soli, and Aphrodisias, and (then doubling the Cape of Anemurium, a Foreland of Cilicia,) Selinus, and other Towns, Cities, and Castles, all along that Coast; which either for fear or favour, rendred themselves, without resistance, at last came to Coracesium, which contrary to all expectation, shut gates against him, [Livie, lib. 33.]

Whiles Antiochus lay at the siege of Coracesium, Ambassadors came to him from the Rhodians, to tell him, that if he kept not himself on the other side of Nephelis, a Foreland of Cilicia, they would oppose him; not for any grudge they bare unto his person, but to keep him from joyning with Philippus, and that he might not impeach the Romans, who had now undertaken to procure and maintain the liberty of Greece; which when he heard, he tempered his choler, and told them onely, that he would send his Ambassadors to Rhodes, to treate about that matter, and with instructions to renew the leagues formerly made between them and him, and his forefathers, and to bid them not to fear his coming to them, for that it should bring no damage to them or any of their friends: for that he was resolved not to infring his amity with the Romans in any sort, appeared well enough, both by his late Embassie sent unto them, and their honourable decrees and answers made thereupon to him, [Id. ibid.]

The Rhodians challenged to themselves Peræa, which is a Region lying in the Continent of Asia, over against their Isle of Rhodes, and had been alwayes in the use and possession of their ancestors, but was now invaded and possessed by Philippus; and were at this time upon the recovery of it out of his hand. Pausistratus was their General, and he had routed the Macedons which kept it, with Dinocrates their Captain: And had they then marched streight forward to Stratonicea, they might have gotten that also, for the asking: but forasmuch as they returned after the battle to their Camp, Dinocrates with those which remained of his army, gat into it, and so fortified it, that the Rhodians coming afterward to besiege it, could do no good there; which story is more at large described and set forth by [Livie, lib. 33.]

Attalus was carried sick from Thebes to his City Pergamus by sea, and there died, [Id. ibid. Polyb. pag. 820. Plut. in Quin. Flamin.] He lived 72 years, and was King 44. [Liv. ibid. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 102. and in Suidas, in the word Attalus:] though Strabo says, he reigned onely 43 years, [lib. 13. pag. 624.] He left behind him, a wife and four children, [Liv. ibid.] His wives name was Apollonis, of the City Cyzicum: his children by her, were Eumenes, Attalus, Philetæres, and Athenæus; of which, Eumenes, the eldest of the four, succeeded him in the kingdom, [Strabo, ut. sup. and Plut. in his book περὶ φιλαδελφίας: (i. e.) of brotherly love,] where he telleth us, that the two younger brothers, though all of brave and lusty spirits, yet lived in that awful respect of him, that they were as so many pensioners and watch men about him, for the preservation of his Crown and Dignity, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 169. and Suidas, in the word Attalus.] Whereupon it was, that their mother would often say, that she was a happy woman, not in regard of her wealth, nor for that she was a Queen; but because she saw her 3 younger sons, to be as so many watchmen and keepers, about the eldest:

eldest: and that whereas they ever went with their swords about them, yet he lived in the midst of them, without the least dread or fear of them, [Plut. ut. sup.] and of Apollonis, or Apollonias, their mother; and the filial duty and respect which they all bare unto her: you may read more in Polybius, [in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 113, 114.] and in Suidas, in the word Apollonias.

d. Philippus, being overthrown, Horse and Foot, in the battle fought at Cynoscephalas, in the Country of Thessalia, of which victory we find mention made, [1 Maccab. c. 8.] Flaminius gave him yet peace, upon conditions; much the rather for that he understood that Antiochus was allready marched out of Syria with an army, to come for Europe; and thereupon he made a truce with him for four moneths, that in them he might send to Rome, and submit all to the will and pleasure of the Senate there. [Polyb. in Legat. 6. pag. 792. Livie, lib. 33. editio. Roman. & Paris.]

The Rhodians, hearing of the defeat of Philippus, cast not off the care they had of defending the liberty of such Cities as were confederate with Ptolemei, and which were in present danger of being invaded by Antiochus: but to some of them they sent aide, to others advertisement, and advice, & were the means of safety from his attempts, to the Caunians, Myndians, Halicarnassians, and Samians, [Liv. lib. 33.] and yet all would not serve; but Antiochus, in spight of them, surprised Coracesium, Coricos, Andriace, Limyra, Patara, Xanthus, which belonged to Ptolemei, and last of all, the City of Ephesus it self, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.]

3808. Antiochus, spending his winter at Ephesus, endeavoured to reduce all Asia into the ancient and uniform frame and body of an Empire. And he saw well, that the rest of the Cities, would easily be brought unto it: but finding that Smyrna in Eolia, and Lampsacus in Hellespont, purposed to stand out, he both advised them to do like the rest; and also used some threats too, in case they would not, fearing least the rest should follow their example, in opposing his designe. And when it would no better be, he sent some companies from Ephesus to besiege Symrna, and others from Abydus to do the like to Lampsacus. [Liv. lib. 33.] Whereupon they both, and such other Cities, as thought fit to joyn with them, sent their Commissioners to Flaminius, to crave his favour and aide against him, [Appia. in Syriac. pag. 87.]

When Cl. Marcellus was Consul, immediately upon his entering into his office, came Ambassadors to Rome, to treat of a league to be made with Philip; and thereupon was passed a decree of the Senate to this effect. That the Grecians every where, as well in Europe as in Asia side, should be free, and live after their own laws; That such of them as were under Philippus his dominion, or had any Garrisons of his in them, should before the celebration of the next Isthmian games, deliver them up into the hands of the Romans: That from such as were in Asia, as Euromus, Pedasa, Bargylia, Iassus, Abydus, Thasus, Myrrina, Perinthus, he should draw away his Garrisons, and leave them free. That he should not renew his war with Eumenes, (for Valerius Antias observeth, that a special heed was taken of him) Attalus his son, the new King. And as concerning the enfranchising of the Cyani, that Ti. Quin. Flamininus should write his letters to Prusias, that the will and pleasure of the Senate was, &c. And to see these things duly put in execution; the Senate sent ten choice Commissioners into Greece. [Polyb. Legat. 7. pag. 793. & Legat. 9. pag. 792. Livie, lib. 33.]

b. When the Isthmian games were ended, at which the general liberty of Greece was proclaimed, by the publick Crier; then did Ti. Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners which came from Rome, give audience to Hegesianactes and Lysias, which came Ambassadors from Antiochus to Flaminius: and they were bid tell Antiochus, that he must not meddle with any free Citie in Asia, much lesse make war upon them; and that he must presently get him out, of such places as he now held, which were formerly belonging either to Ptolemei, or Philippus, and to command him from them, not to set foot in Europe himself, nor to send any of his forces thither: and added, that some of themselves would shortly make a journey to Antiochus. [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 798, 799. Liv. lib. 33.]

When the assembly was dismissed, the ten Commissioners parted the work, they came about, among them; and every man went to see his proper quarter to be set at liberty, according to the decree; and of them P. Lentulus went by sea to Bargylia in Asia, and willed that City to be from thence forward free, (i. e.) to live according to their own laws. L. Stertinius, at Hephæstia and Thasus, and the Cities of Thracia, and where ever he came, did the like. P. Villius, and Lu. Terentius, undertook the journy to Antiochus, and Cn. Cornelius, to King Philippus. [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 799. Liv. lib. 33. Plut. in Flamin.]

c. At the first of the spring, Antiochus went by sea from Ephesus, and came to Hellespont; and passing over his land army from Abydus, and joyning them with his sea forces, landed in Chersonese, and there took in such Cities as for fear gave up unto him: from thence he went to Lysimachia, which being utterly destroyed, a little before, by the the Thracians, he began to rebuild and to make it the seat of his son Seleucus his kingdom in those parts, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia. in Syria. pag. 86, 87.]

And when all went on roundly with him, and as heart could wish, L. Cornelius, who was sent by the Senate of Rome to make an attonement between him and Ptolemei, came to Selymbria, P. Lentulus from Bargylia, and L. Terentius, and P. Villius from Thasus, being three of the Commissioners, and from thence went to Lysimachia; and thither also P. Cornelius came from Selymbria, and a few dayes after Antiochus came thither likewise out of Thracia, and there they met; Hegesianax also and Lysias, who had formerly been sent Ambassadors from him to Flamininius, happened to be there at the same time. Where in the conference, P. Cornelius said, That he thought it reason, that Antiochus should restore unto Ptolemei, all such Cities and places of Ptolemeis Dominions, as he had lately taken from him; and should further, draw off his Garrisons from all such places as were belonging to Philippus, because the Romans had now overcome him: and warned him withal, not to meddle with any free State; whereunto the King answered, that he wondred first, by what right the Romans quarrelled with him, about the Cities in Asia any more, then he questioned them of what was by them done in Italy: and then, that he was content the Cities in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, but should thank him, and not the Romans for it. And as for Ptolemei, they two were good friends already, and that he was further, at this instant, about to joyn in affinity with him, [Polyb. pag. 800. 769. and 770. Liv. lib. 3. Appia. in Syriac. page 87, 88.]

And when P. Cornelius went on, and told him, that reason would, that the Ambassadors of Lampsacus and Smyrna should be called, and suffered to speak for themselves; called they were. Then appeared Parmenion and Pythodorus, for the City of Lampsacus, and one Cœramus for Smyrna: who speaking boldly and freely in their own cause, Antiochus stormed, to see, that he was there called to yeild an account of what he had done in Asia, before the Romans, as if they were his Judges: and bad Parmenion, hold his peace, saying, that the controversies by him then moved, were to be debated before the Rhodian Judges, and not the Roman: and so that conference brake up, nothing done, [Polyb. lib. 17. pag. 770.]

Polycrates, who was Governour of Cyprus, and had withal, the gathering of the Kings revenue there, having given up his charge to his successor, Ptolemæus of Megalopolis, returned to Alexandria, and delivered up to the King Epiphanes, a great masse of monies: for which he was very welcome thither, and much applauded by all there, [Id. pag. 773.]

Presently after, the Etolians began to mutiny, under their Captain Scopas: who having a numerous company of souldiers under him, and had opportunity enough, the King being but a child, to act what he would, while he stood dawdling, was taken short in his undertakings; for when Aristomenes perceived, that his friends repaired to him in his own house, and there used to sit in council together; he sent a company of the Guard, and called him before the Kings Council: But Scopas, upon this surprisal, grew so wild, and void of sense, that he neither went on with what he intended, as he might have done, nor yet would obey the summons of the King, as he should have done: Aristomenes therefore finding what case he was in, sent a company of souldiers, and beset the house round, and caused him to be brought before them, by Ptolemei the son of one Eumenes, [Ib. pag. 771.]

Being brought before the Council, and there charged, first by the King, then by Polycrates and Aristomenes, he was est-soones found guilty, and condemned, not onely by the Kings Council, but also, by all the Ambassadors of forreign Nations, which were there present. For Aristomenes, intending to accuse him, had purposedly brought thither, not onely sundry other Noble personages of the Greeks, but even the very Etolian Ambassadors themselves, who were at that time, sent thither to entreat a peace, between the King and them: among whom, was one Dorymachus, the son of Nicostratus. Upon the hearing therefore, Scopas with his consorts, were all cast in prison: and the night following, Aristomenes caused both him, and all that were of his kindred, to be poisoned: but as for Dicæarchus, which was a most impious wretch, he caused him to be rackt to death. For this was that Dicæarchus, who when he was Amiral of Philippus his Navy, in harassing the Cycladian Isles, erected two altars in a certain Port there; the one to Impiety, the other to Iniquity, and sacrificed to them both, as unto two gods. For the rest of the Etolians, as many of them as had a minde to return, the King gave them free leave to be gone, and to take with them, whatever theirs was, [Ibid. pag. 772.]

When this businesse of the Etolians was settled, and all quiet, then the whole Court, fell to their solemn Revels, which they used to have when any one is first saluted King, which they call, Anacleteria: not that the King was then ripe for Government; but because they thought, that if it were once blown abroad that the King was come now to rule in his own person, things would go better, and grow more quiet in the kingdom than earst they had done; and therefore made all provision they could to perform this solemnity for the honour of the kingdom. [Ib. pag. 773.]

Whiles that debate held at Lysimachia, between Antiochus and the Commissioners from Rome, there grew a report, raised, as it seemeth, from what had betided Scopas at Alexandria, but without any certain author, that Ptolemei was dead: and so that conference came to no issue; for neither party would be known to have had any tidings of it: and L. Cornelius, whose proper errand was to treate with both the kings, desired some time to have speech with Ptolemei: his drift being to come at all hands into Egypt, before any thing could there be resolved on, for the new settling of things there, after the kings supposed death. And Antiochus made no doubt, but that if the king were indeed dead, Egypt would be his: wherefore, having sent away the Commissioners, and leaving his son Seleucus with his land Forces, to go on with the new building of Lysimachia, he with his whole Fleet sailed to Ephesus, and from thence dispatching away Ambassadors to Flaminius to desire him to persist in the league and amity made between them, took shipping again, and, keeping along by the coast of Asia, came into Lycia, and at Patara, understood for certain, that Ptolemei was living: and thereupon gave off his journey intended for Egypt, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia. in Syria, pag. 88.]

3809. Antiochus, hasting away toward Cyprus, which he hoped certainly to get, when he had doubled the Cape of the Chelidonian Foreland, upon a mutiny raised among his Mariners, was fain to stay a while in Pamphylia, at the mouth of the River Eurymedon: and from thence sailing to a place called the Heads of the river Sarus, a foul tempest befel him, which was like to have drowned him and all his Fleet: many of his ships were driven on shoar, many swallowed up in the sea, so that no soul escaped of them. A multitude of men perished in that tempest, not onely of the Mariners, and common souldiers, but also of his Nobles, and Principal men belonging to him: yet having saved what could be gotten out of the wreck, seeing he was in no case to go on for Cyprus, he sailed to Seleucia in Syria, and there fell to rig up his Navy again; and prepared for the marriages of his children, Antiochus, and Laodice, whom he had joyned in Matrimony: and then, putting to sea again, because now the Winter grew on, he sailed to Antioch, [Id. ibid.]

b. The Decemviri, or ten Commissioners, returning to Rome, informed the Senate there concerning Antiochus, and his return into Syria, [Liv. 33.] Hannibals enemies at Carthage, informed the Senate of Rome, that he sent messages, and letters to Antiochus, and daily received the like from him again; which, though false, yet was taken for true, by those who ever lived in fear of him. Whereupon they sent Ambassadors to the Council at Carthage, complaining to them, that Hannibal held correspondency with Antiochus, and advising them by one means or another, to rid him out of the way, [Id. ib. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 1, 2.]

Flaminius his answer to Antiochus his Ambassadors, when they moved for a league, was, That he could do nothing now the ten Commissioners were gone; and that they should do well to go after them, and make their addresses to the Senate at Rome, [Liv. lib. 34.]

Hannibal hereupon, stealing away from Carthage, came safe to Tyrus, and was there received by the founders of Carthage, as in a second country of his own; and having rested himself there a few dayes, sailed to Antioch: but finding that Antiochus was removed from thence, he there spake with his son, who was celebrating a solemn Festival in Daphne: and having been courteously entertained and caressed a while by him, took ship again, and followed Antiochus, and overtook him at Ephesus, beating his brains, whether he should, or should not, engage himself in a war against the Romans. But Hannibals coming to him, set him a gog, and now on he would: nor thought he now so much of the war it self, as of what great matters he should acquire, by conquering the Romans, [Liv. in the end of his 33 book, Justin, lib. 31. cap. 1, 2. and Emil. Prob. in Hannib.]

And here it was, that when one Phormio, a Philosopher of the Peripatetic sect, had disputed a long time in his school, concerning the duty and office of a Commander, or General of an army, and of the Art Military, and ordering of a battle, and all very wisely in his presence: Hannibal could not hold, but cryed out, and said, That he had heard many a doting fool in his dayes, but a verier dotard than this Phormio was, he never heard, [Cicer. de Oratore, lib. 2.]

c. T. Quinctius Flaminius, joyning with Eumenes and the Rhodians, fought very successefully against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, [Liv. lib. 34.]

When M. Porcius (Cato) was Consul, the City of Smyrna began, and built a Temple to the City of Rome, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4.] and by their example, the Alabandenses, not onely built another Temple to her, but also instituted certain anniversary anniversary plaies and games, in honour of her, as of a proper Goddesse. [Livie. lib. 43.]

Eratosthenes of Cyrene, the son of Aglaus, whom a man may well call, not onely a Grammarian, though that were his chief profession, but also a Poet, and a Philosopher, and a Geometrician, for he excelled in all alike, this year died, [Lucia. in Macrobiis,] after whom, in the keeping of the library at Alexandria, succeeded Apollonius Alexandrinus, a scholar of Callimachus, and he which wrote the Argonautica, who because he lived many years at Rhodes, was therefore surnamed Rhodius, [Swidas in Apollonius.] 4520. 194.

Antiochus perceiving the great affection which the Jews bare unto him, conferred great favours on them again, and by his letters highly commended them therefore. [Eusеb. Chron.] These letters of his are extant in Josephus, [lib. 14. Antiq. cap. 3.] in one of which, written to Ptolemæus his Governour there, are mentioned many donations of his, and immunities granted both to the City, and also the Temple at Jerusalem, and in another to Zeuxis; he commanded two thousand of the families of the Jews, which lived in the provinces of Babylonia, and Mesopotamia, to be transplanted into the parts of Phrygia and Lydia, to keep them in order there, who were otherwise disposed to innovation.

Antiochus, preparing now to make a war in Greece, and there to begin his war against the Romans, imparted his purpose unto Hannibal; who told him, there was no conquering of the Romans, but in Italy it self: and to effect this, he desired onely to have 100 of his fighting ships, with 16 thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, to be put into his hand: that with his fleet he would first saile into Afric, that he doubted not, but to stir up the Carthaginians themselves, to a fresh rebellion against them; but if that failed, yet he would land them in some part or other of Italy, and there begin the war a new against them. And when he had perswaded the King to hearken to this motion, he went not presently in person into Afric, (as Emil. Probus, in the life of Hannibal imagineth) but having lighted upon one Aristo, a Tyrian born, at Ephesus, sent him in fashion of a marchant to trade at Carthage, and there to prepare their minds, for a revolt from the Romans. Upon this Aristo Hannibals enemies at Carthage laid hold; and whiles they spent many dayes in consultation what to do with him, and whether to send him to Rome, in justification of their own innocency, he got a shipboard, and came back to Hannibal again. Whereupon they presently dispacht away Ambassadors to the Consuls and Senate at Rome, to let them know what had passed. [Livie, lib. 34. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 3, 4. Appia. in Syriac. pag. 89, 90.] 4521. 193.

Mean while Antiochus sent Lysias, Hegesianactes and Menippus his Ambassadors to Rome, to feel the pulse of the Senate there, for though their pretence was to sollicite for a league and friendship between him and them: yet were they willed to intimate to the Senate, that the King wondred, why they should bid him to get him out of the Cities of Eolia, and Ionia, and to release his tributes due unto him from other places, and not to meddle with matters in Asia, and Countries of his ancient inheritance in Thracia; for that these were not commands to be laid upon friends of theirs, as he was, but enemies, when they were conquered. But they were told, that they should go and attend Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners, formerly sent into Greece, for an answer; And when they came, the Commissioners pressed, that Antiocus should eitther forbear Europe, or suffer the Romans, to maintain what they had allready in Asia, and acquire more there if they could. But the Ambassadors told them plainly again, that they neither could nor would make any bargaines, whereby the Kings rights and dominions might any wayes be impaired, so that matter brake off, and the Ambassadors sent away, [Liv. ib. Appia. in Syriac. pag. 89.]

Scantly were the Ambassadors gone, when news came from Carthage, that Antiochus was busie in his preparations for a war against the Romans, and that Hannibal was designed for his General therein: which put them into a fear withall, least a fresh war should be raised again from Carthage, [Liv. Ib.]

Antiochus, having given his daughter in marriage to Ptolemei at Rhapia, in Phenicia, or rather in Palestina, returned to Antioch, [Liv. lib. 35.] for, being now resolved to make war against the Romans, he thought fit to legue himself by marriages and affinities, with as many Kings and Princes thereabouts, as possibly he could; and therefore he sent his daughter Cleopatra, surnamed Syra, into Egypt to Ptolemei: giving him, for a dowrie with her, all Cœlosyria, which he had formerly wrest from him, thereby to pacify the young man, and to keep him from joyning with the Romans in this war, [Appia. in Syriac. pag. 88.] Jerom upon Daniel, [cap. 11.] saith, that Antiochus, purposing to get Egypt it self into his dominion, espoused his daughter Cleopatra, in the seventh year of the young mans reign, by one Eucles of Rhodes, and that in the 13 year of the same, according to Eusebius Chronicle, which he follows, or according to 4522. 192.

our computation, in the 12 thereof, sent her to him; and gave him for a Dowry all Cœlosyria and Judæa, and yet could not get Egypt neither; because Ptolemei and his Council perceived his drift, and stood the more cautiously on their guard, and Cleopatra her self the Queen, stood more affected to her husbands part, than to her fathers. And Josephus, [12 Antiq. cap. 3.] writeth that Antiochus, giving his daughter Cleopater to wife unto Ptolemei, gave him also for her Dowry Cœlosyria, all Phœnicia, Judæa, and Samaria to boote; and that equally dividing the tribute due out of them all, between them, the chief men in every of the said countries gathered it for them, and paid it in unto them.

Another daughter of his, called Antiochis, he proffered in marriage unto Ariarathes, the King of Cappadocia, and sent her to him: and a third unto Eumenes, the King of Pergamus. But Eumenes, seeing him set upon a war against the Romans, and that he was the cause of seeking his affinity, refused the offer. And when his two brothers, Attalus and Philetærus, wondered that he should refuse such an offer made him by so great a neighbouring King as Antiochus was, he told them what, and how great a war was now at hand: wherein, said he, if the Romans get the better, as he verily believed they would, he was then sure to hold his own by them: or if Antiochus happened to overcome them, then his fortune would be, either to be turned out of all by an over-powerful neighbouring Prince, or be but forced to live under him: concerning which, we may see Eumenes his own Oration, [in Polyb. Legat. 25. and Liv. lib. 37.]

b. Antiochus, having passed the Taurus, marched thorough Cilicia, and in the very end of Winter came to Ephesus, [Liv. lib. 35.]

And from thence, in the first of the Spring, sending back his son Antiochus into Syria, to look to matters there, and in the remote parts of his Dominions Eastward, whiles he was busied in the West, he with all his land Forces, went to invade the Pisidians, which inhabite about the parts of Selga, [Id. ibid.]

At that time there came to Elæa, Ambassadors sent from Rome to Antiochus, who, under colour of an Embassie, were to spie out, and inform themselves, of what preparations he had made, and by often conversing with Hannibal, might either abate his rancor toward them, or if not that, yet by their familiarity with him, might perhaps make Antiochus jealous of him: these Ambassadors were, P. Sulpitius, and P. Villius, who among others, had met with Antiochus at Lysimachia, [Liv. lib. 34. and 35. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 4. Fronti. Stratag. lib. 1. cap. 8. Appia. in Syriac. page 90, 91.]

The Ambassadors went up from Elæa to Pergamus, where Eumenes his Palace was; because their instructions were, First to confer with Eumenes, before they went to Antiochus: and Eumenes did what possibly he could, by advice or perswasion, to stir them up to a war against Antiochus: Sulpitius staid behind at Pergamus sick; but, P. Villius, hearing that Antiochus was busie in war against Pisidia, went to Ephesus; and during those few dayes of abode which he there made, was careful to converse with Hannibal as frequently as he might, both to sound what was in him, and withal to mitigate his rancor toward the Romans, by assuring him, that they intended him no further harme, [Liv. lib. 35.]
